The Bishop, as I have hinted, is an enthusiast in the cause of education, and many of his theories on the subject are as delightful as they are common-sense and reasonable, for they give a charming glimpse into the character of a man who might otherwise perhaps strike people as being somewhat hard, unsympathetic, and domineering. He is, for instance, a great believer in the formation of child character, and not even "Lewis Carroll" himself in his delightful "Alice" books showed such a realisation of the infinite and myriad and singularly delicate variations in the characters of the flowers of the human garden as does Bishop Knox. And the first duty in the education of children which the new Bishop of Manchester presses upon parents and teachers is the development of the child conscience, for intelligence, as Carlyle has so well put it, is the handmaid of conscience. Ruskin, too, once wrote: "If you resolve to do right, you will soon do wisely; but resolve only to do wisely, and you will never do right." Therefore, argues the Bishop, the teacher must study the conscience of the child, for conscience is a very tender plant in children, and of all child-life it is the element which we most easily misjudge.

Bishop Knox is strong on the necessity for a thoroughly well-organised system of Sunday schools. That he considers essential, however good may be the religious education in the week-day schools. And he is vigorous in his desire that Sunday and weekday schools shall go hand in hand, working over the same ground, the Sunday school enforcing the spiritual and devotional aspects of the history taught by the day-school during the week. At the same time, he urges us to remember that the office of the Sunday school is primarily and distinctly spiritual. He was talking recently with a Nonconformist upon the position of present-day

Sunday schools, one who was an authority on the subject, and he asked him to what it was that he attributed the undoubted decline in Sunday schools. "Simply because I believe that Sunday schools have become too educational," was the rather unexpected reply. And the Bishop sympathised with what his companion told him, although himself a keen educationalist—for, as he afterwards remarked, "The Sunday school tries to do over again the work of the day school." The two have worked in utter independence for the most part—the one has not known what the other has been teaching.

And then—and this is very interesting—he would remodel the whole Sunday school system. First of all, there must be an infant Sunday school, with proper teachers. "Oh, anyone can take a class of a few infants." "Can they?" sarcastically smiles the Bishop. "I know they can't. Infants require the best teachers, not any mere casual passer-by." And then you must take care what you teach, says Dr. Knox. "How often have I heard it said, 'It does not much matter what you teach infants, just read them a story and keep them quiet." On the contrary, if the foundation is wrongly laid in the infants' school, your work with the older children will always be more difficult and more insecure. We must teach our best, and not be satisfied unless the school has a definite aim and the children make definite progress." And the third silly old axiom that the Bishop would abolish is that "infant schools need no appliances, save a few dirty hymn-books in the last stage of dissolution."

On the contrary, he points out that there is no school in which more appliances are needed—sand for writing on, clay for modelling, pictures for object lessons, sheets for reading lessons, rocking-chairs and cradles for the baby room; and, above all, a museum of stuffed birds or animals, or a collection of eggs or shells. If a teacher is going to teach children about a frog, she will first collect the spawn, and let them watch the earliest stage of its development; or if about a bird, she will hold a stuffed swallow or a robin in her hand. And all this, urges the Bishop, will tend to make things real, and not mere names and words. "Now, how better can you teach little children the simple truth 'God made me and all the world'?"

MRS. KNOX.

What the Bishop feels is so much against the spread of education in England, religious or secular, is what he very truly terms "the deep-rooted national dislike of all serious application to study." As a nation, he considers, we are amateurs with an instinctive horror of all professionals, except those, he sarcastically adds, who are athletic. Alongside of all education, secular or religious, he places the teaching of catechism. And in this connection he regards the latest of all our catechisms as being full of significance. "The catechism of the Evangelical Free Churches," he says, "is a very remarkable sign of the times. It is the evidence that the need of a catechism is felt; that there is a growing desire to insist on points of agreement rather than of difference; that the outcry against dogmatic teaching is admitted to have its drawbacks and to need some qualification." The Bishop is strong in his plea for the right teaching of the right catechism to all classes of the community, but especially to the working classes. "For," as he well says, and he speaks from the experience harvested in the great industrial centres of the busy Midlands, "you will generally find that artisans or labourers who make any effort to learn, or to continue their education in after-life, have a strong bias either religious or anti-religious. Religion, and more than that—what you may call theology or religious philosophy in a simple form—is that which sets the working classes reading or thinking."

I have expended much of my space on the Bishop's educational themes, for, as I have pointed out, education is his hobby, and from a man's hobby, I often think we learn much concerning his life and character, and approach some sort of realisation of what the man is in himself. But, of course, scholar and educationalist though he is, I do not for a moment imply that he is that and nothing more. His work as a parish clergyman and as a "curate" bishop has been of the most valuable and self-sacrificing description, for he has given himself wholly and entirely, body, soul, and spirit, to the regeneration of the masses—a fact which in itself augurs well for his future as Bishop of Manchester, and promises great things for the spiritual welfare of that vast diocese. He is a fine preacher, quiet, vigorous, simple, eloquent, rarely, if ever, indulging in any very great flights of imagination. He is an Evangelical of the older type, tempered by a dash of modernity, for Bishop Knox has a keen appreciation of the value of this present world as a school of preparation for that which is to come. I once asked him what he thought would be the issue of the Higher Criticism generally, and how far he considered roughly it was possible to harmonise the teachings of science with the revelations of religion. His reply was much as follows: "I have never considered myself an authority on the Higher Criticism. Indeed, I do not know how anyone can be, without a rather profound knowledge of Hebrew. I have read of course, as the ordinary clergyman reads, and have drawn my own conclusions, which are mainly that the last word on the subject has not been said, and will not be said for many years. As to the harmony between religion and science, we must remember that the isolation of religious from secular learning is only a part of the division of labour which has become a necessity with the advance of learning. Theology was once the dominant science, when the thing written occupied so small a compass that one was able to read everything, and co-ordinate and subordinate all that was unknown to the supreme science. Now, as I said in some lectures I recently delivered on education, the range of things knowable is beyond the most encyclopædic mind. Each science is obliged to pursue its own investigations independently of the rest. Hence it may be urged that the isolation of theology is not in any sense a dangerous symptom, but part of an irresistible tendency, which no skill or industry could arrest. I am quite prepared to grant that the theologian cannot master all other sciences, nor, as some seem to expect, can the ordinary clergyman keep abreast of all the current literature of the day. But there is a right and a wrong attitude of mind, as between investigators in different fields of research; there are right and wrong methods of inquiry; there is such a thing as making use of good work done by others and there is such a thing as indifference to what others are doing. And since God manifested Himself in the whole of His creation, and all real truth is in some sense a revelation of Him, those whose study is in Divine things have need of mental alertness to what is going on around them more than any other inquirers, and those who teach Divine truths should be masters of the art of teaching, lest by their unskilful setting of it they bring into contempt 'the pearl of great price.' The Bible is often misapprehended because it is wrongly taught. We cannot draw too much upon other resources to enforce and to illustrate its teachings. I will tell you what I mean.

"Take the Fatherhood of God as revealed in the Old Testament. Your starting point will be the world without the revelation of God. Very well, take representatives of objects of idol worship from the rudest African images, ascending to the various forms of animal worship of Egypt, Assyria, and India, and to the human form, as worshipped in Greece and Rome. These would supply the background of Old Testament history, for lack of which it is often unintelligible. From this basis it would be comparatively simple to teach the first three commandments. I do not see why we should not regard each new discovery in the world of science as a fresh revelation of God's love and mystery. In that sense assuredly I believe that religion and science can go hand in hand together."

BISHOP'S COURT, HIGHER BROUGHTON

THE GREEN LADY.

A Complete Story by Gertrude Herbert.

TEDDIE had lived with the trains all his life. He was the son of a station-master, whose house overlooked the platform, so, naturally, he was familiar with all the sights and sounds of station life. He had never been frightened at the huge engines when they came racing past, breathless with haste, long lines of white smoke streaming out behind them.

As a matter of fact, from babyhood he had looked upon them as his friends. Their never-ceasing industry filled him with wonder, their height and strength with awe; but he was never afraid of them after he found out that they sometimes laughed.

It was a summer night when he first made the great discovery. He was lying in his cot with the window open, listening to the roar of passing trains, when a peculiar sound struck on his ears. The little room shook as the train thundered by, and it was only when it had quite gone that Teddie realised what that sound was.

The engine had laughed!

He sat up in bed and listened carefully. Out of the darkness came screams and shrieks of—what? Why, laughter, of course. Teddie wondered why he had never noticed it before. What were they laughing at? he asked himself. A night or two afterwards the answer dawned upon him. As soon as the sun had gone down and the darkness hid them, all the trains joined in one huge game.

What fun they were having!

Teddie crept out of bed, and stood at the window in his little white night-shirt. How they raced and roared, calling to and answering one another, plunging fearlessly into the darkness, and only returning to decorous and seemly behaviour when passing under the eye of Teddie's august father!

The child's eyes shone with excitement as the wind from a passing express blew back his fair curls.

"Take me wif you!" he called, stretching out his arms.

But the train passed on unheeding. Teddie was very proud of his secret. No one else knew of the great nightly game but himself and the players.

True, the engines shrieked and whistled in the light, but to Teddie there was a difference in the sound. They never laughed in the daytime. The day after his discovery Teddie went up to the first engine which deigned to stop in the station, and said in a low, clear voice:

"I know what you were doing last night, but I won't tell."

The engine, staring at the sky in a dignified and haughty manner, pretended not to hear. Of all the engines which passed through the station, none was so full of interest or so dear to Teddie as the London express.

He called her "The Green Lady," because she was a beautiful green colour, and because when he had asked his father whether the engine was a man or a woman, he had answered:

"A woman, because it talks so much."

And, indeed, the Green Lady never passed the station without shouting out something to Teddie or his father.

"Say somefing I tan understand," pleaded the child. "Dear Gween Lady, do, please."

But the Green Lady never took any notice. One winter night Teddie had just been sent up to bed when his favourite passed. He ran to the window to watch it, and then a most marvellous thing happened. A piece of white paper fluttered out of the retreating train and lay on the platform just under his window. Teddie did not see just where it came from, but there was no doubt in his mind. A message from the Green Lady at last! It was for him, of course; but oh! what if anyone picked it up before he could reach it?

Shivering with cold and excitement, he crept out of the room and down the stairs. His mother was in the parlour with a lady to whom she had once been nurse, and who was staying with them at the time.

He passed the half-open door with bated breath, opened the front door softly a little way, and looked out. The platform was deserted; not even his father was in sight.

The letter from the Green Lady lay straight in front of him. He darted out, clasped his treasure to his breast, and hurried upstairs again.

Then he examined it.

"She tan't 'ave known I tan't wead w'iting," he murmured mournfully to himself.

Never mind, he would wait till he was old, and then he would read it. His eyes glowed with delight at the distant but glorious prospect. Meanwhile he must hide it where even his mother would never find it. He finally decided on the pillow, out of which he was wont to pull curly feathers when alone. He made the hole wider with his fingers, folded the letter tightly, and pushed it inside. Then he undressed, and, jumping into bed, laid his cheek contentedly against the Green Lady's letter.

About an hour later Geraldine Symons and Mrs. Martin were sitting comfortably in the parlour, when the station-master, red and flurried, burst in upon them.

He sat down in a chair.

"Such a bother!" he ejaculated. "There's a young gentleman outside looking for a letter 'e dropped hout of the express. Says it's mighty important, and 'e must 'ave it. We've looked for it 'igh and low, but we can't find it anywhere."

Geraldine looked interested.

"How did he lose it?" she asked. "And has he told you why it is so important?"

"'E brought it out o' his pocket with some other papers, and the wind caught it and blew it out o' the window. As for what's in it, I 'aven't the least idea. 'E's mighty excited about it anyway. 'E got out at P——, and walked back along the line. Now, what I wants to know is, was Teddie in bed when the express passed?"

"No," said Geraldine; "I saw him go upstairs a minute or two afterwards."

"I'll ask 'im if 'e's seen it," said the station-master, and went upstairs.

He came down, looking rather distressed.

Teddie, when questioned, had gone very white, but had refused to say either that he had or had not seen the letter.

Mrs. Martin and Geraldine then went to question him, but were equally unsuccessful.

Mr. Martin explained the situation to the owner of the letter, and he demanded to see the child himself. Teddie was accordingly brought down to the parlour, and the stranger followed Mr. Martin into the room.

Geraldine looked at him with interest, and as her blue eyes met his dark ones the colour left her face, and her heart seemed to stand still. For the owner of the letter was the man to whom she had been engaged a year ago, the breaking off having been the result of a quarrel.

Stuart Hargreaves started when he saw her, and opened his mouth to speak. Then he closed it again, bowed coldly, and turned his attention to the troublesome Teddie.

The child stood with his back to the fire, the light making a luminous halo of his fair curls.

"Have you got my letter?" asked Stuart sharply. "Or have you seen it anywhere?"

Teddie shrank from the face which had grown so white and fierce, but he answered nothing. It was a curious situation. In Teddie's keeping lay a letter written by the girl at his side to the man who faced him—a love letter of long ago. And the man, secure in his belief that the girl no longer cared, was fiercely eager that she should not know that that letter was still dear to him. But his secret was in Teddie's keeping, and Stuart had no power to take it from him.

"Do not be absurd," went on Stuart impatiently. "If you will not speak, we shall all think that you have the letter."

Teddie's heart grew sick with fear. Then in a moment his spirits revived. Why, of course, it was not the stranger's letter! It was his own, from the Green Lady.

"I hasn't got oor letter," he said defiantly.

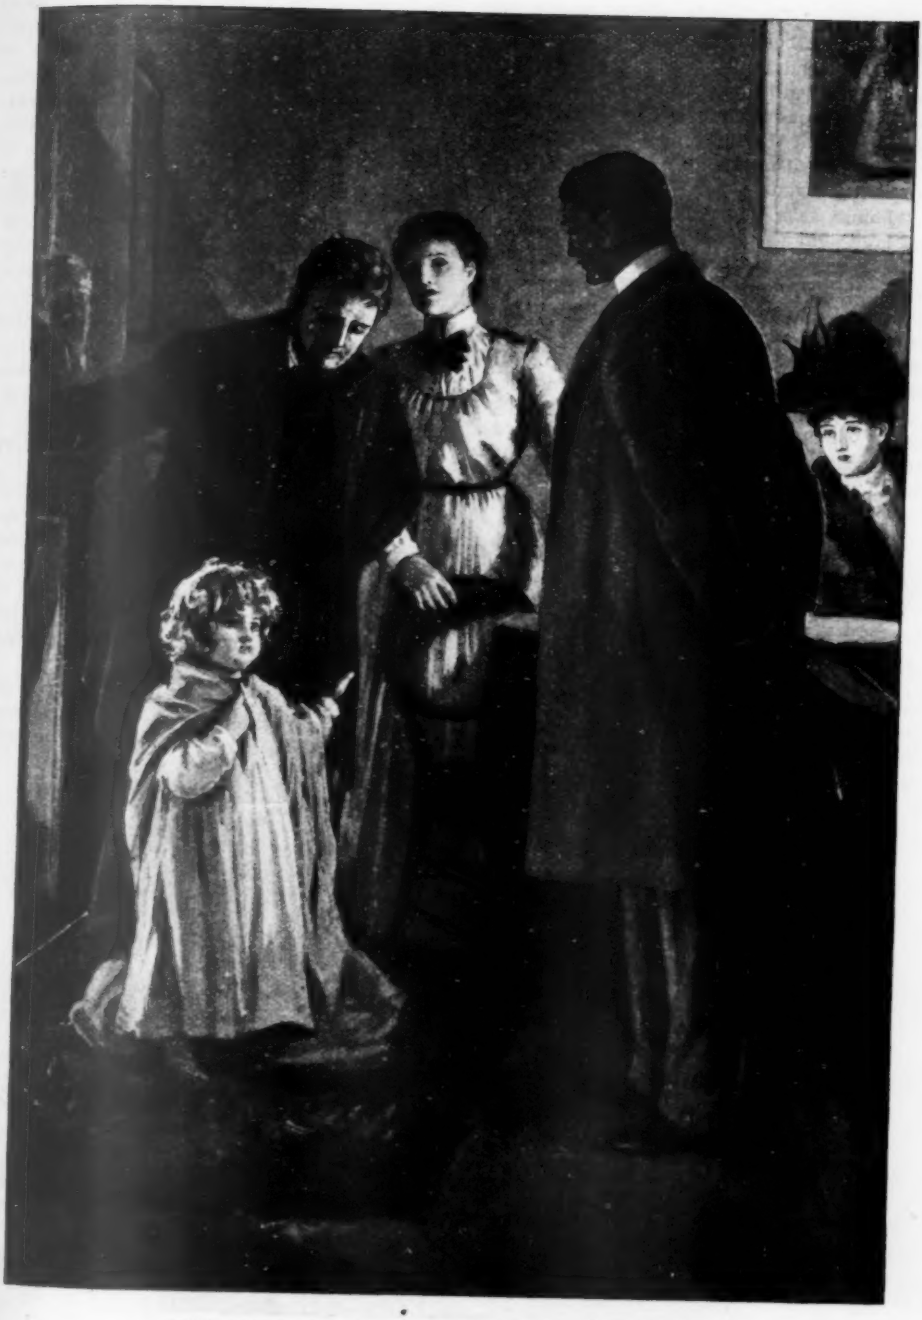
"Why didn't you say so before?" said Mr. Martin vexedly. "You'd better go back to bed."

Geraldine came forward to carry the child away, and, though Stuart looked dissatisfied, he raised no objections. The blanket slipped from Teddie's shoulders as the girl lifted him, and Stuart helped her to readjust it. Their hands met, Geraldine's eyes were smarting with unshed tears, as she hurried from the room To think that she still cared so much!

Stuart was conscious of a sudden thrill at the contact, and felt annoyed with himself

"She does not care—why should I?" he thought angrily.

Then he went out to search the rails beyond the platform, where the letter might have blown. Meanwhile Geraldine put Teddie into bed, and was just about to leave him when he burst into tears and clung to her weeping.



"Teddie dear, what is the matter?" she said gently.

"I—I fought it was fwom the Gween Lady," he sobbed. "And—and now I fink it must be the howwid man's. Oh, dear!"

"Hush, Teddie, and tell me all about it. Who is the Green Lady?"

Little by little she drew the story from the sobbing child, and the letter was produced.

As she took it into her hand, her eyes rested on it for a second. It was her own handwriting. The words which caught her eye made the colour surge to her forehead.

"He turned his attention to the troublesome Teddie."

But why had he kept it? A multitude of thoughts rushed through her brain as she stood with the letter in her hand, but instinctively her soul found the right answer, and clung to it. She turned to Teddie, and the look in her face startled him.

"I must take it to him, Teddie," she said. "It is all right now. Lie down and go to sleep."

She kissed the child, and walked slowly downstairs, the letter in her hand. She paused in the passage to compose her features into their former grave expression. She meant to play with her happiness for a little time. It was too good to come all at once.

The platform was deserted, and dimly lighted by a gas-lamp. Geraldine walked to the edge and looked along the line. She saw a tall, dark figure walking towards her, and when it came closer she said:

"I have found your letter."

Stuart stood on the rails, and looked up at her, holding out his hand.

"I unavoidably saw the handwriting," she continued in her coldest tones.

"It is mine," said Stuart quickly.

"I told you to burn every one, and you did not. I will burn it myself." And she turned to go into the waiting-room. A momentary fear clutched at her heart. What if he did not follow her? Her ears were strained to catch the sound of his footsteps, and at last they came, quick and heavy, as though the man were angry.

The fire in the waiting-room was nearly out, and the room almost in darkness. As she bent over the coals, her wrists were seized by a pair of strong hands, and Stuart said:

"Give me my letter!"

The look on his face touched her. She would not vex him any more. Besides, she herself was already tired of the game.

"If you will let me go," she said, "I will give you something in exchange for your letter."

He loosened his grasp. She drew a little piece of cardboard from her pocket. It was a miniature photo of himself, which she always carried about with her, though she seldom, very seldom, dared to look at it.

Stuart took it from her hand, and carried it to the window to see what it was.

She waited, and it seemed to her that the silence had lasted for months and years. She closed her eyes and wondered when the end would come. It came suddenly, and without warning, and as Geraldine submitted herself to the clasp of those strong arms the peace which she thought had left her for ever stole back into her heart.

Upstairs in his little bed Teddie, wearied with crying, had fallen asleep, and was dreaming that he and the Green Lady were playing the great nightly game.

A BOOK IN THE EARTH.

SOME RECENT DISCOVERIES IN PALESTINE.

By F. M. Holmes.

(With Illustrations from Photographs supplied by the Palestine Exploration Fund, 38, Conduit Street, W.)

IT is an interesting story which the Palestine Exploration Fund has to tell of its recent discoveries in the Holy Land, ranking among the most remarkable the Society has ever made.

The scene of the discoveries is an extensive mound, situated about two hours' walk from Ramleh, between Jaffa and Jerusalem, and named on the map Tell Jezar, and by the people in the neighbourhood, Tel ej Jezari.

On this spot, some years ago, Professor Clermont-Ganneau, who was then in the service of the Fund, found a stone bearing certain marks, which he translated as meaning the limits of Gezer.

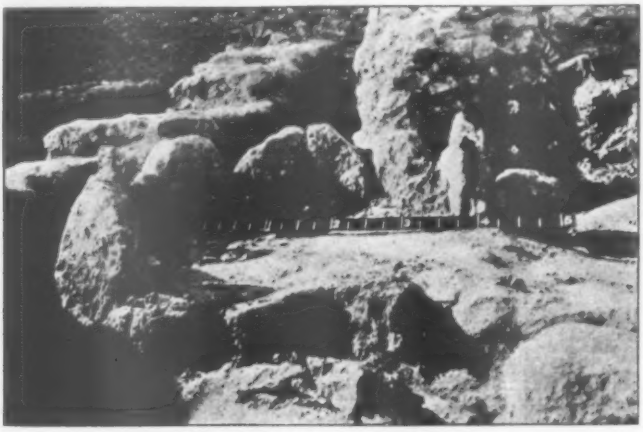
Now Gezer was an important Canaanitish city taken by Joshua; it afterwards became one of the Levitical cities of refuge, and it is frequently mentioned in the Biblical record and in the Apocrypha. It evidently had a long, and possibly continuous, history. Consequently, when the permits held by the Society for excavating other places had duly expired, the committee unanimously selected this mound as the scene of their next exploration, and, a permit or firman having been obtained, work was commenced by Mr. R. A. Stewart Macalister in 1902.

The results have surpassed expectation. The discoveries go back even to the Neolithic age, and to a race of cave-dwellers thousands of years before the Israelite occupation.

Deep down below the surface implements and idols of stone have been discovered, and a cave containing bones, some of which have been burnt to ashes and others only blackened by the fire. Here the prehistoric people burnt their dead ages and ages ago, so that those who practise cremation to-day are only returning to a custom which was in vogue far back in remote antiquity.

TEMPLE OR HIGH PLACE BEFORE EXCAVATION

Another most interesting discovery of a later period, but still dating back thousands of years ago, has been the remains of a Canaanitish temple, or High Place, with the bones of infants enclosed in large earthenware jars buried beneath the floor. These dumb, pathetic things speak to us across the centuries in a piteous voice of abominable infant sacrifices, and we do not wonder at the denunciations of the Hebrew prophets if these were the enormities condemned.



Other discoveries are of a more pleasing import. This stone quern, for example, shows how the ancient people ground their meal, and these old vats indicate the pressing of oil from the olives. Fair women wore these silver bangles thousands of years ago, and people probably played draughts on the chequered boards now found in fragments, using for draughtsmen the small worn pebbles discovered in a Jewish period of remains.

TEMPLE, OR HIGH PLACE, AFTER EXCAVATION.

Gezer stands some 760 feet above the sea-level, and lies, not far distant, west of Jerusalem, overlooking the maritime plain. When Mr. Macalister began his work, he found a small plantation of mulberry trees flourishing on the western end of the mound, a house and farm not far distant; next, a modern cemetery, and a partly ruined shrine of a local saint. A hillock rose at either end, and in certain places thick walls appeared, just showing above the surface, something like a city wall being traceable on the south.

STONE CIRCLE IN HIGH PLACE.

The explorer hired about fifty or sixty labourers, who were armed with pick and basket. They were instructed to show everything found to him, or to someone authorised to act on his behalf. The earth which they dug up was to be sifted, or carefully examined, so that nothing of importance should be missed.

Seven strata of remains have been cut through —one resting upon the other—and revealing seven periods of human occupation. In addition, Mr. Macalister found beneath the mulberry trees a number of stones prepared as for building, and these he suspects were the relics of a fortress raised, or used, by the Crusaders. With certain interruptions, therefore, it would appear that this place has had an almost continuous history from the long-distant Neolithic age down to the times of the Crusaders.

Sir Charles Wilson has explained in a masterly manner the principle upon which the whole of scientific exploration really depends. The site upon which a town or village has stood is always covered by a bed of rubbish, containing foundations of walls and objects connected with the life of the people who dwelt there.

Should the site have been occupied by various races, one after the other, during many centuries, the rubbish will form a series of several strata, which will lie one over the other, and will contain certain characteristic objects, differentiating the strata from one another, and illustrating the life of their respective occupiers.

Sometimes, it is true, the objects in successive strata will become mixed—as, for instance, in digging for new foundations, portions of one stratum may mingle with another ; sometimes the same objects may be used in different periods of occupation ; but, as a rule, an explorer who is really skilled will be able to detect the different strata, and refer almost everything he finds to its own period.

BROKEN JAR WITH BONES.

From the articles discovered he is able to deduce certain ideas as to the people who used them. Thus in the two lowest strata at Gezer were found stone implements and stone idols, also caves, and rude dwellings made of stone and mud-brick, a cistern for water, pieces of very primitive hand-made pottery, and objects of bone. These objects naturally point to the occupation of the site during the Neolithic age, and suggest that the inhabitants dwelt in caves.

Moreover, the lowest stratum rests practically upon rock, and we may suppose that the presence of caves in the rock, or of the opportunity to hollow out caves, led to its occupation by mankind. It was in this stratum that a cave was found, evidently prepared as a crematorium, and containing, amid human ashes, bones only partially burned. These relics indicate that the people dwelling here in the remotest antiquity were small in stature, averaging five feet three or four inches in height, and none exceeding five feet seven inches.

XUM

They were not Semites, and from the fact that no metals were found with their remains, we may judge that they were unacquainted with the use of those valuable substances. The discoveries in these two lowest strata—representing the first and second periods of occupation—show that people dwelt here resembling in some respects the inhabitants of Europe during the same age.

A break now takes place in the story. Bronze weapons were found in the third stratum, and bones belonging to a larger-sized people of Semitic race. Traces of houses made of stone and mud were discovered, and of a stone wall enclosing the town. The problem of overcrowding may conceivably have arisen, for the buildings seem to have been thronged together during this epoch.

The inhabitants at this period buried their dead instead of cremating the bodies, and used the caves of their predecessors for this purpose, food vessels and bronze weapons being buried with them.

From the bones discovered, it would also appear that the people varied from five feet seven inches to nearly six feet in height, and their heads were well developed. Mr. Macalister's father was present when the cistern was cleared, and he was able to report on the bones discovered, and contrast the characteristics of the two races.

Coming upwards, we find the fourth stratum still giving evidence of Semitic occupation Varied objects were discovered in both strata, but the pottery in the higher part shows influence of the Ægean styles.

Ladies will be interested in learning that a little bone needle-case was found containing a needle of bronze, and suggesting the question, What work did the fair damsels of the Semites find to do 2,500 years before the birth of Christ?

Impressions of scarab-seals, and scarabs themselves, belonging to the Egyptian Middle Empire (2500–1500 B.C.) have been discovered in abundance, and also broken plaques, bearing figures of the goddess Ashtaroth, while moulds for making arrow-heads, and cylinders denoting Syrian and Babylonian origin, appeared among this marvellous rubbish of centuries. The High Place which was discovered was originally built in the earlier period of the Semitic occupation, and apparently enlarged during the later epoch —that is, during the period connected with the fourth stratum of remains.

Eight large monoliths were found in an upright position on a stone flooring of chipped limestone, and arranged in a slightly curving line running nearly north and south. The remains of a circular wall, still six feet high, were also found, on the western side. The High Place appears to have been enclosed, and—most significant of all—a number of earthenware jars were discovered beneath the floor, each jar containing the bones of a newly-born infant.

The monoliths vary from about five and a half feet to more than ten and a half feet in height, and within the precincts was found a man's skull belonging to a different race. It may have been the head of a great enemy who was killed in battle, and buried here in the temple.

After these Semites came the Jews, and the fifth and sixth strata refer to them. Private houses were found to have encroached on the LAMP SHAPED LIKE A DUCK.

High Place ; iron was discovered, bronze was common, but infant bones were uncovered built into house-walls, or placed under house foundations, and lamps and bowls were also found similarly buried.

The reason for placing these bones and bowls under houses remains a mystery. Mr. Macalister thought the lamps and bowls were connected with some foundation rites of the Israelites, but he subsequently found beneath a pre-Israelite house a jar containing the remains of two infants, also saucers, lamps, and jars.

It is possible that some of the Ammonites—the Semitic tribe who probably dwelt in this part of Palestine at the time of the Israelitish conquest—continued to reside at Gezer with the Israelites, as, indeed, is described to be the case in the sixteenth chapter of Joshua, and it is possible that some of the Israelites may have adopted certain of their rites, even lapsing into the horrors of infant sacrifice. Just as we now place newspapers and coins in foundation stones, it would appear that these ancient peoples placed lamps, bowls, and even the bodies of babes.

The sixth stratum has been recognised with some certainty as belonging to the time of the Jewish monarchy. Jar-handles have been found bearing the words "To the King" in Hebrew, pottery of Jewish character prevailed, houses still further encroached on the High Place, and a flint axe was found with a Hebrew letter scratched upon it. Iron and bronze were common, but flint objects—though of inferior workmanship—were also discovered. A bronze statuette of Osiris, with portions of gilding still to be seen upon it, and a statuette of the goddess Astarte, also in bronze, and with horns, were also discovered.

The city during this sixth period was restricted to the western part of the mound. We know from the ninth chapter of the first book of Kings that Pharaoh, King of Egypt, had burnt Gezer, "and slain the Canaanites that dwelt in the city," and that Solomon rebuilt it. When he did so, he appears to have made of it a fortified place, and skilled investigators can trace it all out to-day, thousands of years afterwards.

MACCABEAN CISTERN OR BATH.

A complete break again occurs after the sixth stratum—the next, and last—representing a period when the site was occupied alternately by Egyptians and by Jews, the latter being under the Maccabees. A Maccabean cistern or bath was one of the discoveries, and Mr. Macalister traces the reforming zeal of Simon Maccabæus in the destruction of stones belonging to the High Place, at the north end, as recorded in Maccabees, thirteenth chapter, and forth-third to forty-eighth verses.

The remains of a wall, probably built by Bacchides, has also been found, and no doubt part of the fortification referred to in 1 Maccabees ix., and fifty-second verse. Greek bowls and Rhodian jar handles, and stones with Greek and Hebrew letters, show the influx of Grecian civilisation; but lamp and bowl deposits, and flint implements, were no longer found. Bronze was only used for ornament, but iron was common. An Egyptian inscription some four hundred years before Christ was unearthed, also masonry and pottery, which are described as being similar to those found at the Ptolemaic town of Marisa.

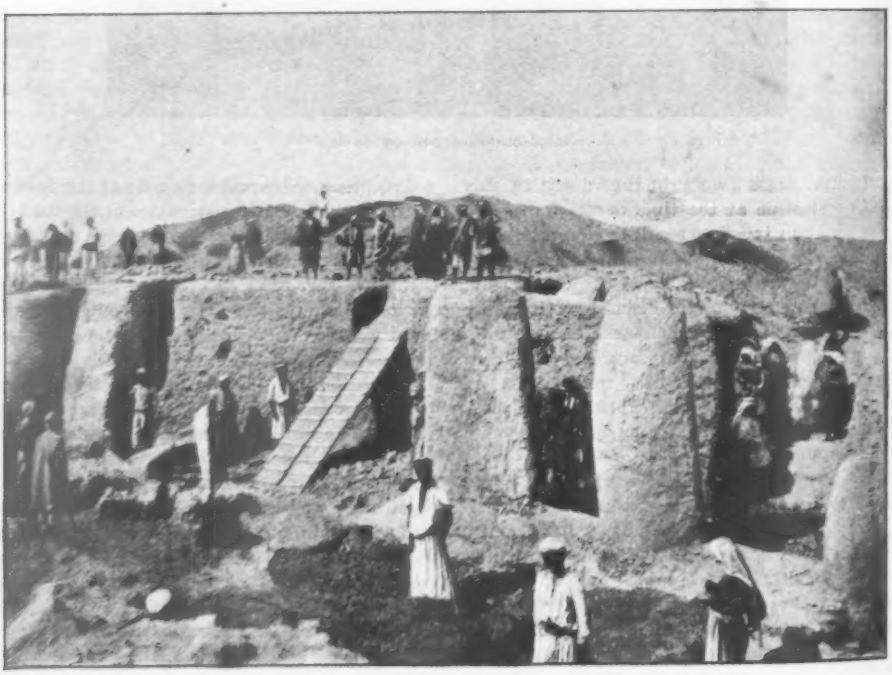
After this period the remains are few and inconclusive, though it is said that a battle was fought on the site in 1177, when Baldwin IV. won a victory over Saladin; and also that a few years later Saladin conducted negotiations on this spot with Richard Cœur-de-Lion.



Here, then, at Gezer, we have, as it were, a book in the earth, telling us, though with torn and missing pages, something of the human history from very ancient times.

Here man dwelt in caves, and used instruments of stone; here he afterwards built huts and used implements of bronze; here he raised houses and heathen temples, and here the worship of God struggled with the worship of idols. Ancient people, whom we know not how to name, Canaanites, Egyptians, Jews, Europeans, and Arabs have all flourished on this historic spot, and left their traces behind.

The excavations have been found so valuable that much more of an interesting and informing character may be revealed. The permit will expire on June 14th, 1904, and, if not renewed, all work here must cease. It is very expensive, the committee estimating that it costs about £200 per month.

The Palestine Exploration Fund was founded in 1865 for the purpose of conducting systematic research in the Holy Land on scientific principles, and although it is not a religious society, in the ordinary sense of that term, yet it claims that its work possesses unusual interest for Bible students of all denominations, and that the results which it has obtained confirm and illustrate the historical truth of the Old and the New Testaments in a remarkable degree.

No wonder it is gratified with its work at Gezer, no wonder that it appeals confidently for the wherewithal to read still further these remarkable pages in the history of mankind.

Words and Music by the Rev. W. H. Bliss, M.A., Mus.B.
(Vicar of Kew and Hon. Chaplain to the King.)

2. There, too, our Father, Whose great love
Sent down to us His Son,
Receives each loving, trusting soul,
And speaks the word "Well done!"
There dwell the hosts of loving hearts
Of every race and time—
Their brightest hopes now perfected
In that sweet, happy clime.

3. There dwell our own so fondly loved,
Parent and child and wife:
Once more with them—no more to part—
Ah! this indeed is Life.
O Holy Spirit of our God,
Inflame our souls with love!
Thine may we be while here below,
Thine in Thy Heaven above. Amen.

"THERE'S A FRIEND FOR LITTLE CHILDREN."

By the Author of "Beneath the Banner."

I.—THE TOYS THAT WERE GONE.

"WHAT does 'a rest from every turmoil' mean, Mummie?"

It was Jack's voice.

"Why, Jackie, I thought you were asleep. Father has been down a quarter of an hour since."

"No, Mummie, I'm thinking."

"What about, darling?"

"About my hymn. It says:

"'A rest from every turmoil,
From sin and sorrow free,
Where every little pilgrim
Shall rest eternally.'"

"It means, dear, that in Heaven there will be no tumult or commotion."

"O-h," said Jackie. "No tumult or commotion."

That was a most remarkable state of things: he could hardly imagine it. About two big tumults and several little ones was Jackie's present share daily.

"Then me and all of us will be quite, quite different from what we is now, Mummie?"

"Yes, Jackie. Everything will be changed. In that beautiful home everyone will be quite happy."

"Oh, yes, I know," said Jackie.

"'No home on earth is like it,
Nor can with it compare;
For everyone is happy,
Nor could be happier there.'

That means you and Daddie and Ella and Arthur and Hal and Baby Bunting and Nanna. Any more?"

"Oh, yes, Jackie. Not only your brothers and sister and friends, but everyone!"

"What! Governess and the servants and the milkman, and all the people we meet in the streets, and"—after a pause—"all them dear little cripples you was telling us about and what we are going to see some day?"

"Certainly, dear."

"And no one won't want to quarrel or to have things that don't belong to them or mind when anyone else takes his toys? That is very strange, Mummie, isn't it?"

"Yes, Jackie; we can't understand all about Heaven, but we shall all have new hearts, so that there will be peace and joy for ever."

"I suppose if I had had my new heart to-day I shouldn't have minded giving all my toys for the cripples when you asked me, Mummie?"

"No, dear; but I was very pleased you and Arthur gave so freely."

"Arthur gave up best, Mummie."

"Well, dear, Arthur is older."

"I didn't mean older—I meant better."

"How, dear?"

"Well, Arthur never wanted his back, and I've got a little spot in the heart which wants mine back," said Jackie reflectively; "so I'll be very glad to have a new heart by-and-by."

"All of us need new hearts, Jackie. But when you see the cripples I think you will be glad you've given your best for them."

Next morning the sun rose bright and red. The heavy, muggy weather, with fog and mist and dirty streets had given place to a bright, clear atmosphere, with a full breeze from the north which had brought a sprinkling of snow in the night and enough frost to cover the lakes with ice half an inch thick.

Mother's birthday was near, and all the children were elated at the prospect of the festivities.

It was such a happy time with them. Mother's birthday was kept in great state, for Father and Mother loved to see the eyes of their children sparkle with gladness and to make their lives bright. They had a half-holiday on every family birthday, and even kept Valentine's Day in the old, old style—with a real Old Valentine banging at doors back and front, while they hurried and scurried hither and thither in answer to Old Valentine's frequent rat-tat-ting on the knocker.

Each birthday was a time of numerous presents for the child, on the purchase of which a large amount of thought was bestowed.

So now as the children stepped out on the frosty road past the little pond where they sometimes skated they were in such high spirits that it needed all Governess's authority, all the persuasion of twelve-year-old Ella, to keep them in order.

Arthur and Jack, the eldest boys, went quite to the borders of the pond, and crunched their feet on the young ice, delighting to hear it crackle. They hurled stones across the pond, listening with the joy made up of present pleasure and joyful anticipation as the stones hummed across the frozen surface.

There was enough snow to make snowballs, and they pelted one another.

One hit Jack full in the face. It had some little stones in it, for, the snow being very thin, in his excitement Arthur had gathered up some grit and stones.

In an instant Jack's ire was aroused. "Arthur, you——"

Arthur heard the warning sound and fled, with Jack close on his heels, with a face full of wrath.

Just as he overtook Arthur the line flashed across him, "A rest from every turmoil," and what Mummie had said about the new heart, and he stopped.

Arthur, surprised, looked round presently to find that the chase had stayed.

"It hurted a little," said Jack peacefully, "but I know you didn't mean it."

"No, Jack, I really didn't," said Arthur.

And there the matter ended, very much to the astonishment of Arthur.

That evening Arthur and Jack were to pay their long-promised visit to the Cripples' Parlour. They had talked a great deal about it for days past.

All the children had given up some of their toys and games, and each one was to go in turn. Jack thought a great deal about the cripples that afternoon.

"I suppose, Mummie, all the cripples will have crowns just like us?"

"Oh, yes, dear; they are Christ's own little ones."

"And they'll have robes and harps and palms and everything?"

"Yes; there will be great joy, Jackie, in Heaven, and all Christ's children will be there."

"And you are quite sure I'll have my new heart? I've only got a little bit of it at present," said Jack, remembering what took place in the morning.

"Quite sure, Jackie. I think sometimes you are getting it now."

II.—LITTLE PILGRIMS.

WHAT a sight it was! About a hundred cripples gathered in a big hall, the room well lighted, with about a dozen tables at which were from six to a dozen children seated at work of various kinds.

"Are these the cripples?" asked Arthur.

"Why, I expected to see a lot of miserable little things being amused. Why, these boys and girls are all at work!"

"Yes, they are getting ready for a sale of work," said Mother. "You can ask them about it."

So they sat down at the first table they came to, and Arthur said, in his politest manner:

"Will you kindly tell me what you are working for?"

"Can the cripples make fretwork things?" he asked, noticing how busy the boys were with their little saws.

"Yes, indeed; they are getting quite clever," answered the boy. "This is to be a wheelbarrow match-box," he continued, taking up some pieces of wood that were being traced for sawing; "this will be a money-box, and that a watch-stand."

"Don't they break a lot of saws?" asked Arthur, remembering the ineffectual attempts he made with his fret-saw.

"Oh, yes, they broke ever so many at first," said the boy, laughing; "but they soon got to know how to use them, and have made a rare lot of nice things since. Come to the sale next week, and you'll see."

Meantime, Jack had deserted both Father and Mother, and was in earnest converse with a little hunchback at a table where the children were drawing with chalks.

"I say," whispered Jackie. "I thought they was cripples here."

"So they are," said the boy shortly.

"I'd never have known it," said Jack. "They look just like other children. What's your name?"

"Bob," said the boy.

"Would you mind telling me why you're called a cripple?"

"Not a bit," said Bob. "You can see if you look. I've got a hump on my back."

"But isn't it very painful to—carry?"

"Oh dear, no," said the boy. "I'm accustomed to it."

"I shouldn't like it," said Jackie.

"Well, no, not just at first; but you'd soon get used to it."

"Don't the boys laugh at you and say things?"

"Why, no, not of any account; and if they do it don't break any bones," said the boy, laughing.

Jack was puzzled. It didn't come up to his idea of cripples a bit.

There were the boys and girls, all as happy as if they were having a holiday, and working as hard as if their living depended on it. Their faces were bright, and there really was nothing to show that they thought themselves badly off.

"I've learnt to make leather things," said Bob. "Will you come to the sale and buy some?"

"I'd like to very much," said Jack. "What do you make?"

"Well, just now I'm making purses."

"Oh," said Jackie, opening his eyes wide. "How did you learn to do that?"

"First of all, they showed me here, and then a saddler I know helped me as well. I've sold a lot."

"And what do you do with the money?"

"That all goes for the cripples."

"And don't you keep any for yourself?"

"Oh, no; we love to work for the cripples."

Jackie was getting more and more mystified, and he exclaimed, "Why do you like to do it?"

"I don't quite know," said the boy thoughtfully. "I've never thought much about it, but—but," he said hesitatingly, "I suppose because Jesus Christ gave us everything."

"What has He given you?" said Jackie.

"Why, Himself. That's best of all. He's my best Friend. That's splendid, isn't it?"

"Yes," said Jackie. "He's a Friend for little children above the bright blue sky."

"Oh, you know that hymn," said Bob. "It's a lovely one. "How would I ever get along without Him? I love hymns, and 'tis so pleasant to sing 'Happy Land' and 'Rock of Ages' and 'I Love to Hear the Story' and 'How Sweet the Name.'"

"Aren't you ever miserable?" asked Jackie.

"Rather. I get the hump sometimes pretty bad."

"But you has your hump on always, don't you?"

"Oh, I don't mind that hump. It's the sadness hump I don't like."

"What is that?"

"Oh, you don't know," said the boy, and a spasm of pain passed over his face, "how bad things are at home. Perhaps you've got a good father what loves you."

"Yes, that I have," said Jackie; "Father loves us all ever so much."

"Well, my father," said the boy, dropping his voice to a whisper, "gets drunk and sometimes he beats me."

Jack's face puckered ready to cry.

"Oh, you needn't trouble," said Bob. "He don't mean it, and it don't hurt much afterwards; and everybody's very kind," the boy continued. "About a week ago a lady what comes here gave me a beautiful suit, blue with white cord, and a whistle. My, it was lovely!"

"That was nice."

"Yes, she has been kind to us cripples for years. But there was a sad story about this, for her little boy had died, teacher told me, and it nearly broke her heart; so you see everybody wants the Friend for little children, don't they?"

"Yes," said Jack, "they do indeed. But why haven't you got on your suit to-night?"

"Oh, that's only for Sundays. Besides, Father pawned it——"

Jack felt as if he had lost his own new suit, and said so.

"Oh," said Bob, "it can't be helped, and I've got another suit to wear; only my boots went too, and that was worse."

Jack looked down at the boy's boots. They seemed to be made mostly of holes, for he wobbled his toes through the tops quite comfortably.

"Why, Bob, your feet must be wet now."

"Aren't they just," said the boy; "but they're warm, so 'tis all right."

Jack felt as if he couldn't talk much more; there was a lump in his throat.

He had never heard of such things; they seemed too dreadful to think of.

But Bob continued cheerfully, glad to have a sympathetic listener:

"When I'm miserable I think about Jesus, the Friend for little children, and the home in Heaven."

"Does that help you?" asked Jackie, his eyes opening wide.

"Oh, yes: you see Jesus was worse off than the foxes and the birds; He hadn't anywhere to lay His head, and I have."

"Have you a nice bed?" asked Jack, glad to think that Bob had some good things.

"That I have," said Bob. "'Tisn't anything much to look at, but 'tis awf'ly comfor'ble. 'Tis a big orange box, and it fits me to a T. I mean I fit it."

"And do you have a nice little room all to yourself?"

Bob grinned from ear to ear. "What do you think?" he asked. "Why, there's Father and Mother and me and Harry—that's my younger brother—in one room, and 'tis so little that if

"'Well, my father,' said the boy, dropping his voice to a whisper, 'gets drunk, and sometimes he beats me.'"

I want to dress when Father's dressing I have to go outside."

Jack was learning a great deal. He was almost sorry he had come, and yet Bob was so cheerful.

His brain was working very fast with what he intended to do when he got home.

He had been so engrossed in talking to Bob he hadn't noticed what Father and Mother were doing.

Now, however, Mother came for him, and he went round to the other tables, seeing how the girls were sewing ever so quickly, making all kinds of garments and toys, and lots of rag dolls. How well the boys were making toys and useful things! Some, too, were drawing birds and animals, some were tracing clearly with coloured chalks, but everywhere they were as busy as bees and as happy as birds.

There were young men who were showing the boys how to work, and ladies who were teaching the girls how to sew, and others who were telling the children how to draw.

Then after they had been there about an hour, the tables were cleared, and one of the teachers said, "Charlie Grove will recite to us now."

Charlie, a tall, thin boy, with a pale face and sightless eyes, came forward and was placed on the platform and recited, "The Pied Piper of Hamelin."

He had a splendid voice, which filled the room. Jack, who was at the end of the hall, could hear quite distinctly.

The children were delighted. When Charlie finished they clapped their hands, and even began thumping their feet, but that made the dust rise, and a voice commanded them to stop.

Jack had returned to Bob.

"How well he recites," said Jack.

"Yes, he makes a lot of money," said Bob.

"How does he do that?"

"Why, his mother lets him recite at all kinds of places, and he gets ever so many pennies."

"But he's blind. How did he learn?"

"Oh, one of the teachers is very fond of Charlie, and taught him."

"Is Charlie very miserable because he can't see?"

"Sometimes," said Bob, nodding his head. "Sometimes he's pretty bad, but a doctor thinks he may perhaps see some day."

"Oh, I'm so glad."

"Yes, the Doctor puts drops into his eyes. It hurts Charlie ever so much, but he loves to go because he thinks that some day he will be able to see just as you and me do."

"Now we're going to sing a hymn," said Bob.

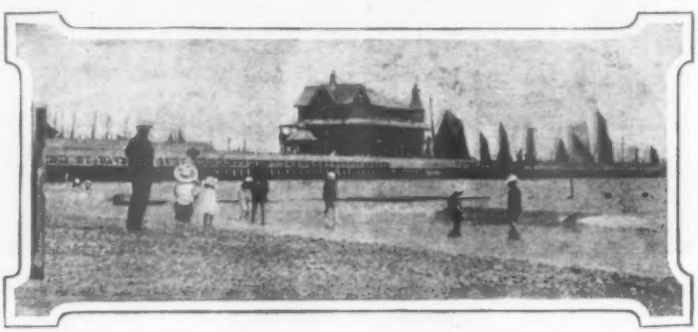
"I hope it will be 'There's a Friend.'"

It was.

"It's ever so good," said Bob, "to think how some day we'll all be in Heaven, and have all we want, and always be happy and warm, and have crowns."

The cripples seemed to think so. They sang very heartily, but with no shouting; they had been very well trained.

Arthur and Jack both enjoyed it thoroughly.



III.—GLADNESS IN GIVING.

"I'M so glad I gave my toys," murmured Jack, as he kissed Mother "last thing" that night. "Last thing" meant that after Father had heard their hymns and said good-night, Mother came round to see that they were ready for sleep.

"That's right, Jackie."

"And I'm glad the Friend for little children loves the cripples as well as us, and I shall look for Bob, Mummie. He's sure to be there."

"Yes, dear; I know Bob will. He has a very sad life, but he loves His Saviour, and will one day be in His kingdom."

THE MODERN MARTYRS OF RUSSIA.

By Edward P. Field.

RUSSIA appeals to the imagination. Her vast territories, varying climates, immense armies, impenetrable forests, possess characters distinct from those of every other country. Travelling eastwards from Berlin, an air of comfort and prosperity marks the small farms, homesteads, and gardens of the German peoples to the very border of Russia. The train runs into Eydtkuhnen by the side of the Custom-house. We leave the train, walk through the Customs, and after a rigid examination of both person and luggage, pass on to the Russian platform. The air of comfort and prosperity has vanished. The country around is bare, wild, untilled; the peasants crowding the platform with their shaggy hair and long smocks, present an appearance of extreme poverty. A tiring journey of eighteen hours brought the train at length to St. Petersburg. Here I had several opportunities of meeting some of the leaders of the Stundists, before proceeding southwards.

These Protestant Nonconformists are now to be found throughout Russia. They are simple evangelical believers who have been constrained to secede from the worship and ritual of the Greek Church. For the last sixty or seventy years they have borne witness to their faith through severe and persistent persecutions. They are the martyrs of the Greek Church.

It was in 1778 that the Empress Catherine of Russia, anxious to colonise her Southern provinces, invited the industrious Lutheran farmers of South Germany to leave their homes and to settle in the province of Kherson. Many came and received large grants of land. They brought with them their evangelical faith. Till this time the Russian peasants had been treated as an inferior creation by the nobles. The newly arrived German immigrants, however, regarded the poor who laboured for them in the fields as men and as brothers, and when the day's work was done welcomed them into their houses to be present at the singing of hymns, and the reading of the Word of God. Soon the peasants learnt to read, and hours (German, Stunden) were appointed in which they should meet daily to read and study the Scriptures. They were nicknamed "Stundists." Day by day, as they learnt more of God's Word, it became ever more impossible for them to join in the services of the Greek Church and in the superstitious veneration of the Ikons.*

They therefore gradually abstained from their customary attendance in the Greek Church, the Church of the Russian nation, and of the Russian Government. It was not long before the village priests, whose incomes practically depend on the gifts of their congregation, began to suffer pecuniary loss through the secession of the new believers. With few exceptions, these priests were ignorant men, incapable of even understanding this fresh spiritual movement. Having failed altogether in their attempts to induce by persuasion the seceders to return to the parish church, persecution was resorted to. The Stundists were accused of political disloyalty. They were charged with desiring to overthrow the civil power. From that time until this present the contest has been between bitter bigotry on the one side and patient endurance and victorious faith on the other.

The methods of persecution have been various. At an early stage in the 'eighties the Ispravnik, or local village policeman, was authorised to inflict fines on his own motion on all such as after being warned continued to attend the Stundist meetings for worship. If the fine was not paid, the Ispravnik was permitted to seize the furniture and even the bedding and clothes, and to sell the same by public auction. Intense wretchedness and suffering during the long Russian winter was caused amongst the Stundists by these fines and forced sales.

Great, however, as the distress and suffering was, it was not sufficient to satisfy the bishops and the clergy, in answer to whose petitions recourse was now had to exile by administrative process. The Governor of each province was permitted arbitrarily and without trial to order the exile of any person in his province. Count Ignatieff, the late Governor of the province of Kieff, made himself notorious by his administrative orders. Many were exiled in this manner, many others after a form of trial. The accusation is usually laid in a double form, viz. (1) that the accused has withdrawn from the worship of the State Church, (2) that the accused has spoken against the Ikons. A faithful believer is asked whether he will worship in the Greek Church, or whether he has withdrawn from it, and on his own answer is convicted. On his conviction he suffers the same treatment as the vilest convicts and criminals. The sentence is a sentence of exile for life or for a term of years, and involves the loss of all rights, including the rupture of the marriage tie, the inability to sign legal documents, to hold property, or to give a bond. The exile must wear prison dress, and have half the head shaved. He is marched off with the ordinary criminals, wearing leg irons, crowded with others in étapes which are temporary night shelters swarming with vermin, and thus through weary days and nights journeys for months to his destination. The sick and infirm are carried in wagons (telegas).

* The Ikons are paintings on a flat surface of the Madonna, of the infant Christ, and of all the Saints. They are painted or enamelled in brilliant colours, but never engraved. In the command "Thou shalt not worship a graven image," the priest of the Greek Church lays all stress on the word "graven," and regards the Roman Catholic worship as idolatrous, while he enforces in his own church the veneration of the plane-surfaced figure.

THE CZAR IN HIS ROBES AS HEAD OF THE GREEK CHURCH.

For many years exiles, political, criminal, and religious, were sent to Siberia and numbered yearly from 17,000 to 20,000, including all classes. Now Siberia is becoming too civilised, and the Government authorities therefore dispose their prisoners in small numbers in the different Tartar villages of Transcaucasia, near to the Persian border. Our Stundist brother, on arriving at his destination, is put down in some small village. He does not know the language, he has no means of subsistence, barely sufficient clothing to cover his body, no tools, no employment, no passport, no food, no friends. He is also under strict police orders not to leave the place. Thus it is that, while many lose their lives from cold and hunger on the journey, others die from the same causes when they reach the place of exile. If they were permitted to travel in search of employment, they might have hope, but, limited to the borders of a small Tartar village, no work can be obtained by the men. The women earn a scanty pittance by washing for the Tartars. Thus these Christian brethren remain in poverty, in hunger, in cold, in nakedness. The trials and sentences of the Stundists do not cease, and the needs of those sentenced are continuous and urgent.

These trials of the Stundists are kept secret. They are not usually reported, and access to a trial is a difficult matter. One trial took place in a small rural town on the Volga. The accused believers on this occasion numbered nineteen. They were accused of perverting a number of Russians from the Orthodox Church. There were no less than fifty-four witnesses called, and the accused pressed the witnesses to say what took place at their meetings. Three or four were also charged with blaspheming the Ikons, but on this charge they were acquitted. Their leader was their own minister, and the rest were his helpers and workers in the congregation. The principal witness for the prosecution was a priest of the Greek Church, who was brought forward as an expert. He said he had been a missionary in Southern Russia, and had had much to do with the Stundists. He said there were two classes of Stundists—first, the Old, who baptise and have presbyters; secondly, the New Stundists, who do not baptise and have not presbyters. Making a speech from the witness box, he proceeded to point out the danger of the sect, because they refused military service, and were opposed to the Government politically. He said they were averse even to be regarded as Russians, changing their costume for this reason. The Procureur interposed, "Maybe they have pretensions to found their own Kingdom?" To this the priest assented. The President then addressed the jury, composed of peasant bigots of the Greek Church. He said, "You have now heard the words of the Procureur, and also of the expert witness. It has been told you that these people are exceedingly dangerous. Now take care that it does not enter into your heads to acquit any one of the accused."

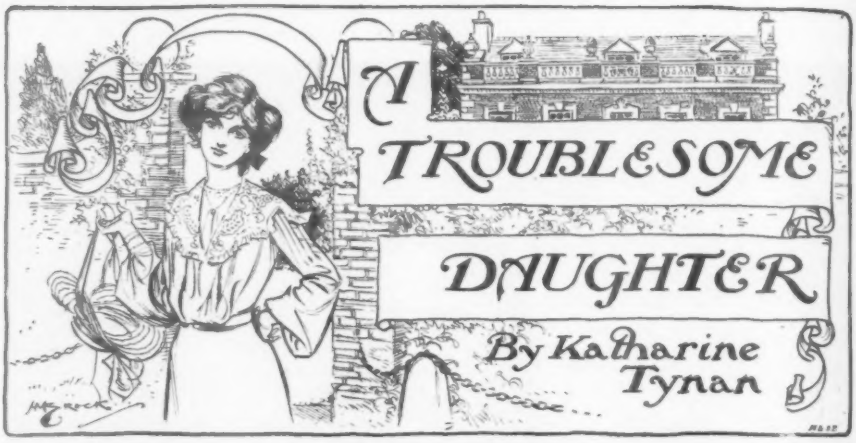
The trial lasted till midnight, when all were sentenced to varying terms of exile. One especially, an old blind man named Alexis, was full of joy, and said, "I have been poor and miserable from my childhood; now I am filled with joy, and I know that 'none shall pluck me out of His hands.'"

The trial is over. It is typical of all the trials. After the verdict and sentence little time is lost; the convict bread-winner is usually accompanied voluntarily by his wife and children. After weary months of marching by short stages these victims cross the mountain passes of the Caucasus, and we meet them in Elizabethpol, in Erivan, in Troitz, Saratovka, Ivanovka, distant and desolate Gerusi, and other villages. One said to me, "I saw forty-three families when on their journey they came out of the prisons in Elizabethpol. The men were in tatters, very dirty; and one woman shivering in her rags, just before her confinement. The Christians—some eighteen in number—in Elizabethpol tried to put clothes on them, but as there were ninety-four prisoners they could not get enough clothes. They were not allowed to stay in Elizabethpol, but were sent out into the villages in the mountains around. They were most joyful, singing with loud voices hymns as they came out of prison. I visited them in the villages, and found in one village eleven families. Three or four families were sheltering in one room. They had nothing to live on—no money, no food, no work, and could not speak the language. They were waiting for the Government to give them some land to work on, but could not get any. I went to another village and found a man there living in a hole in the ground with his two daughters. They had dug a large, square hole in the clay, and lived there without a roof, winter and summer. His wife had come with them, but she had died from the exposure. When he saw me coming he came out of the hole, carrying his bible, and said, "Oh! read and speak with us and pray with us; it is four years since we had any Christian fellowship." For this in his exile he hungered more than for food.

This instance is typical, and is taken from my travelling note-book, in which many similar cases are recorded. I went from place to place meeting the leaders and talking over matters in great detail, and returning to England, brought with me their requests and suggestions as to the way in which they might best be helped.

The need of continuous assistance has already been referred to, and in this connection the Baptist Union may be mentioned as an active body which is doing to-day active and strenuous work. Most of the Stundists are Baptists. But the greatest deliverance is to be expected from a gradual improvement which is working now, as yeast works, throughout Russia. The whole country is at this time going through the same spiritual and moral upheaval as that through which England passed some centuries ago.



Both the decree abolishing exile by administrative process and the recent manifesto by the Czar are acknowledgments of, and in some degree concessions to, this movement. It is, in a broad sense, true that every Russian who loves his country is persistently striving by every lawful means to break down the fence which in years past was built by the Government to prevent and hinder the education of the people.

The nation, as a whole, desires to follow the English style of education for the people. The best Russian papers—the Vedimosti especially—advocate this advance, and it is reported that the Emperor himself to a great extent desires it. The spread of education cannot fail to bring with it greater liberty of conscience and freedom of worship. Even in the last decade a marked change has taken place in this direction. Persecution has much diminished, and spiritual liberty is increasing. A seed has been sown which is daily springing and growing up, we know not how; that seed is the Word of God.

CHRIST TEACHING HUMILITY.

A SERIAL STORY.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE WAY OF THE TRANSGRESSOR.

AFTER all, Mr. Evelyn had not gone to the dinner at Battlements. He was sitting by the fire in his own room, smoking, and apparently thinking somewhat gloomily, when the door opened and Judy came in.

"Why, Ju," he cried, springing to his feet, a broad light of pleasure breaking over his face, "it's good to see you. I was just going to send over to ask Lady Flora to spare you to dine with me. Why, what is the matter? No bad news?"

Judy took off her hat and laid it on a chair before she spoke.

"Major Lindley is very ill—dangerously ill with enteric," she answered. "There has been an official telegram from the War Office."

"Dear me! dear me!" said Mr. Evelyn, his ruddy tints altering. "That's bad news, indeed; but not the worst, Ju, not by any means the worst. Lindley has a fine constitution. Please God, we are a long way, a very long way, off the worst news yet. My poor Judy!"

He came to her, and with awkward kindness laid his hand on his daughter's ruffled hair. Judy accepted the caress gratefully, as was shown by her taking her father's hand and putting her lips to it, yet with a certain air of restiveness.

"There is going to be a nine days' wonder, papa," she said. "I wish it were next Wednesday, so that it would be over."

He looked at her in amazement.

"What do you mean, Ju?"

"Oh, papa"—Judy suddenly burst into tears, and then hid her face shamefacedly on her father's coat-sleeve. "You have always helped me through everything. You have always been better to me than anyone in the world. Help me through this. Don't let mother, don't let anybody, ask me questions."

"Why, surely not. What is there to ask? And why have you left Lady Flora in her trouble? There is nothing to say, is there, except that the poor fellow is in the hands of God, and that we must hope for the best—for the very best, my little girl."

Judy raised her tear-stained face and looked at him steadily.

"Miss Rosamund Lindley is at the Cottage," she said. "Godmamma needs me no longer."

"What!"

"Yes, papa. You see there is plenty of food for a nine days' wonder. I have discovered—don't ask me anything about it—that Major Lindley asked me to marry him while under the impression that Miss Rosamund was about to marry Mr. Neville. I have reason to believe that he would never have asked me otherwise. And—papa"—Judy became red as a rose—"I have been finding out that I haven't quite the right feeling for Philip. I have suspected it for some time. And godmamma knows it now, and for the moment she cannot forgive me. She has taken Rosamund Lindley to her heart because there is no doubt of her love."

Mr. Evelyn smiled whimsically.

"If it were permissible to be amused at anything while that fine fellow Philip is in danger, I could be amused at his mother's inconsistency. Here she has been keeping Philip and his cousin separated all these years when they ought to have been married, and now at last she accepts Rosamund because of her faithfulness. My poor Judy!"

He rang the bell, and as soon as a footman appeared he gave him orders that Miss Judy's trunk was to be fetched from the Cottage, and that Cook was to be informed that Miss Judy would dine to-night.

Thomas went off looking pleased. There was not one of the servants who was not the happier for Judy's presence in the house.

Mr. Evelyn kept repeating "Well, well!" and "Dear, dear!" whenever he thought of Philip Lindley's illness; yet he had a feeling of having his favourite daughter to himself once again which gave him a distinct access of pleasure. Besides—of course Philip would get well, a splendidly built fellow like Philip, and he would marry Rosamund Lindley, and everyone would be rejoiced to see the old romance end so happily. It was a great thing Lady Flora had come to her senses, even so late. Philip would not grudge the fever that brought about such a happy ending.

And so Prim was to marry the parson. Why, that was excellent. He had always said that he believed Neville was after Prim just as much as he was after Rosamund. Neville was immensely rich. Why shouldn't he give his sister-in-law a dowry? It was just the thing an open-handed, high-minded fellow like Neville would do. Then they could keep up the Manor House as it ought to be kept.

And then—he forbore to think any further. No; it would never do to think of such things while yet Philip's life was in danger. And Judy was not one to be off with the old love and on with the new in such a hurry as all that. Still, Maurice certainly had seemed taken with Judy last summer, and she with him.

He became suddenly sobered whenever he recalled Philip's illness. Still, it was uncommonly pleasant to have his little girl sitting opposite to him at dinner—his own again, even if she did once or twice dissolve in tears during the meal. That was a fact the sympathetic Thomas reported to the servants' hall, which was not at all surprised later to hear of Major Lindley's peril.

They dined at a round table set by the library fire, a thing Mr. Evelyn liked to do when he was alone, although Mrs. Evelyn always frowned on it in her gentle way, as she did on any informalities.

They had a long, quiet evening together. About nine o'clock Lady Flora's Charlotte came across the Green with something which had been forgotten, and a message:

"Her ladyship's love, and would Miss Judy step across the first thing in the morning to hear if there was news?"

After that assurance of forgiveness Judy's face was brighter. Presently Mr. Evelyn, who had been watching her wistfully, suggested that if she would like to escape from the nine days' wonder she might perhaps run up to town for a short visit to Lady Mary Winstanley.

"And you would hate me to go," said Judy, gratefully. "No, thank you, papa dear. I'll just live out those nine days, and as soon as the bulletin 'comes, 'Out of danger,' you and I perhaps might go up to town together."

It was several days before the list of sick officers, for which the newspaper was so eagerly scanned, announced, "Major Lindley, slightly better." But with what passionate gratitude even so much hope was received at the Cottage and at the Red House! Lady Flora immediately swung round from despair about Philip to the most absolute certainty of his recovery. She was almost too sure for those early days. It was wonderful how her thoughts anticipated the long, weary days before even at the happiest Philip could be with them again, how she planned every detail of his home-coming, and imagined how Philip's eyes would look when he saw her and Rosamund together, united in the heartiest bonds of love.

"It will not be his first home-coming," she said; "but it will be the first really happy one. I can never forgive myself, Rosamund my dear, for those old days and that wicked will of mine which has stood for so long between Philip and his wife."

"We were all to blame," Miss Rosamund would say, in seraphic forgiveness. "I can never forgive myself."

To other people Lady Flora remarked that once she had seen Philip and Rosamund married she would say her "Nunc Dimittis" and pass away in peace.

This remark of hers was the cause of a certain chuckling delight whenever Mr. Evelyn remembered it.

"Pooh!" he said. "Lady Flora doesn't mean to die. She'll move into the Manor House with the newly married couple, and exercise a benevolent despotism over Mrs. Philip. She's in her seventies. She'll live to her century most likely, and she'll be the real mistress of the house; and, indeed, Rosamund has been used for so long to Prim's autocracy that I don't know how she'd do if there weren't the old lady to step in and take her place. 'Nunc Dimittis' indeed!"

Prim, too, had agreed to bury the hatchet, although it is safe to say that her relations with Lady Flora were rather on the basis of an armed neutrality than anything more cordial; but since she had accepted Mr. Neville she had given his teachings more of a hearing than she had ever given them in her days of apparently hopeless spinsterhood.

"It would never do," she said, "for a clergyman's wife to be on terms of open enmity with any person, much less members of the same family. For Algernon's sake I am no longer a free agent. He has taught me that it is my duty to forgive; and I will say as much as this, Rosamund, if it will make you happier, that I believe Philip Lindley's faults towards us in the past were directly traceable to the woman whom it was his misfortune to have for a mother."

With this concession Rosamund was forced to be satisfied. Indeed, being a simple soul, she thought it was rather handsome of Prim, whose hostility in the past had been so uncompromising, even though she could not acknowledge that Philip had ever any faults towards them or anyone else.

Lady Flora was equally handsome according to her own ideas.

"I forgive Prim for your sake, dear Rosamund," she said, "and because it is my duty as a Christian woman. Of course, her hostility to Philip is something I can never altogether forget, although I can forgive it. But he will be noble-minded enough to overlook it, dear fellow. I hope there need be no more separation than is necessary between you at the Manor House and Mrs. Neville at the Vicarage. Fortunately, the Manor House is large, so that I need be no check on your happy meetings."

Slowly, slowly, and with many ups and downs, many sickening disappointments, many elusive hopes, the days went on till at last the happy day came when the announcement appeared, "Major Lindley, out of danger."

They had agreed between themselves that not until he was able to bear even the shock of joy was he to hear of the altered condition of affairs. They had sent their letters as usual, so that he would have a budget as soon as he was able to read them; and these were the hardest letters Judy had ever penned, for she had always been one to tell the truth, no matter what it cost her.

Now at last she felt she could speak.

"MY DEAR PHILIP," she wrote,—"We are wild with joy over the good news. Get well very quickly and come home—to great happiness. I have been finding out things—for instance, that we both made a mistake last April. It is Miss Prim, not Miss Rosamund, who is to marry Mr. Neville at the New Year. Miss Rosamund is with your mother in great love and peace. At that terrible time when we heard you were so ill your mother found out that she wanted the person who loved you best in all the world to be with her; and who should that be but Miss Rosamund? So forgive me for having hindered you, and believe me always your loving friend,

"JUDY."

She had seen Stocks go off with the mail-bag containing her letter, and was returning home across the Green when she caught sight of Rosamund Lindley coming towards her, peering at her with her beautiful, purblind eyes.

"It is you, Judy," she said. "I have been to the Red House looking for you, but they told me you were out. Are you writing by the afternoon post, Judy?"

She had a scared and anxious expression.

"What is the matter?" asked Judy, without answering the question.

"There is nothing the matter, only I want to talk to you. You had better come back to the Cottage with me. We may be disturbed here at any moment."

All the morning radiance which had lit her face for the good news was clouded over.

Judy turned and went with her down the path to the Cottage.

"We shall be alone," Miss Rosamund said. "Lady Flora is at the Manor House. She said I was to write and tell Philip everything. She is making arrangements for us to move in, so that Philip shall find us there when he returns. She is in as much hurry about it as though he were coming next week; yet we shall hardly see him before the end of February at earliest."

A little smile played about her lips, yet it did not take away the perturbation of her face.

They were in the drawing-room of the Cottage before Rosamund spoke. Then she clasped Judy's two hands in hers.

"Judy! Judy!" she cried. "I am frightened about Philip. Now I know that he will get well, that he will come home to us, please God, I am terrified. Supposing, Judy, supposing it were you he wanted! I should die of the shame of it."

"You have loved Philip Lindley for years; you have known him all your life. Don't you know he isn't a person to transfer his affections like that? I'm surprised at you, Miss Rosamund."

Rosamund's eyes fluttered like moths in summer twilight.

"You think so, Judy?" she said eagerly. "You think so?"

Then she added naïvely:

"I confess that I was surprised when I thought that Philip had forgotten me even for you, little Judy. Though we were estranged so long, I no more thought of his forgetting than of my forgetting myself."

"And you were quite right," said Judy slowly. "He never did forget you, not for one minute really; although," she added, her invincible love of truth compelling her, "I think he was comforted for a few days when he thought he had made me happy."

Rosamund Lindley looked at her wistfully.

"I wonder whether it is fair to Philip," she said. "You are twenty years younger than I am, Judy."

"And he is more than twenty years older than I am," said Judy stoutly. "Besides, Miss Rosamund, listen while I tell you a secret. I know you will never tell anyone else in all the world. I don't love Philip. Indeed—I almost think—I love someone else."

Miss Rosamund started back from her.

"Is it possible, Judy? Not love Philip! Although you have been wearing his ring all these months! Then I think it is very stupid and ungrateful of you, child. Poor Philip!"

Judy laughed, but her laugh had a little forlornness in it.

"It is just as well for me, Miss Rosamund, that I didn't love him, since he didn't love me," she said.

"Still, Judy, you were engaged to him!"

Evidently Miss Rosamund was not going to be placated for some time.

"Never mind," said Judy, "I don't feel myself engaged to him any longer. I always wanted him to be happy with you from the time I was a little girl, so it was an odd thing I came near frustrating it, after all. Was there anything else, Miss Rosamund?"

"I thought perhaps it would be as well, Judy, if we said nothing to Philip yet about this change. Let him come home—but I should run away and hide myself if he were to come to-morrow. Let him choose between us. That is what I was going to say."

"He will get well quicker," said Judy, with the same somewhat melancholy humour, "if he knows he is no longer obliged to marry a stupid little girl who fell in love with him without his wanting her. Hasn't his mother told you? She thought I cared for him, and told him so; and he thought he might as well make me happy—in fact, quite erroneously, he felt himself bound to do so."

"How beautiful and unselfish of Philip!" said Miss Rosamund, with adoring eyes.

"Yes; wasn't it?" said Judy drily. "Anyhow, I've written to him, Miss Rosamund. Stocks carried off the letter on his little bicycle mail-van just before you met me on the Green. I have told him that he is free, that I have no more claim to him."

"Poor Judy!" said Miss Rosamund, kissing her. "How hard it all is on you."

"She will believe till the crack of doom," said Judy afterwards to herself, "that I never really gave up Philip willingly. All I confessed to her will slip out of her simple, beautiful head, and she will think of me all her days—even if I should happen to be the most blissful woman in the world—as the poor little girl who had to give up Philip."

CHAPTER XX.

GOOD TIDINGS.

JUDY and her father were at Claridge's. The nine days of wonder had passed by as a term of such suspense that Judy had no care as to what her little world might be thinking of her or of the topsy-turviness of affairs generally.

It wanted only a week to Christmas, and they were to return home on Christmas Eve. Judy had so much to do, such quantities of shopping for herself and everyone else, for she had accepted enough commissions to take up nearly all the time; and then there was the Duchess to be seen, and Martha and Mary, and a few other humble friends in the East End, and of course there was Lady Mary.

Mr. Evelyn had declared himself ready to be sacrificed on the altar of paternal duty and to accompany Judy on her shopping expeditions; but luckily he was spared the severe strain that would have been—Judy declared that he'd have given up after the first half-hour—since Jack Winstanley was at home and ready to devote his days to Judy's service. So Mr. Evelyn sat in a luxurious chair at the Carlton and read his papers, and rubbed off some of the country rust, as he fondly imagined, by talking to gentlemen who were mainly visitors from the country like himself, for town was very full.

They had gone up by an early train on the Monday, so as to have as much time as possible for the multifarious things Judy had to do.

As they drove in a hansom from the station Mr. Evelyn announced, without looking at his daughter, that he had written to Maurice to join them at lunch.

Judy did not say anything for a few moments, and then she broke into somewhat inconsequent chatter, which was unlike Judy, especially in her relations with her father, with whom she could be silent for long periods in which the silence spoke more eloquently of sympathy and affection than speech could have done.

However, soon after they had arrived at the hotel and been shown to their rooms.

"'I have come to the conclusion that her case is perfectly curable.'"—p. 610.

Judy came to her father's door in walking costume.

"I've found a letter from Lady Mary asking me to come to lunch," she said. "She wants me particularly. I shall just have time to get there by taking a hansom to Charing Cross."

"Very well, little girl. Make that young rascal Jack see you home," Mr. Evelyn said, hardly lifting his head from his portmanteau, where he was searching for something.

"H'm!" said Judy to herself. "Glad to get rid of me!"

She came a step or two into the room. She wanted to ask him not to tell Maurice Evelyn anything of the altered condition of affairs. But a sense of the futility of it made her change her mind.

"What is it, Ju?" her father asked, lifting a very red face from the portmanteau. "D'ye want anything? Got enough change for your cab, eh?"

"Plenty. I only wanted to tell you to take care of yourself. I shall be back about six."

"Oh, I shan't get lost. Good-bye, little girl."

Judy reached River Lawns without mishap, and found Lady Mary, as usual, on the sofa in the drawing-room. All the late dowdiness was gone. She was dressed much more fashionably than Judy had ever known her to dress, and the red crape tea-gown, with its beautiful old lace, while quite suited to an invalid, was extraordinarily becoming to Lady Mary's rich, dark colouring. She had been filling out since last summer, regaining more than her old comeliness. Judy said to herself shrewdly that if that tea-gown meant anything it meant that Lady Mary was in no mind for dying.

"What has been happening to you?" Judy asked when they had exchanged greetings. "You look so—so bright—and alert, I should not be surprised if you were to get up and dance a hornpipe. You have good news, surely you have good news?"

"Sir Francis has seen me, Judy. He says that he can make me well. I was improperly treated. They know so much better now! There is only one thing—to tell Hugo, Hugo does not know. I shall have to go into plaster of Paris again. Why, I would go into my winding-sheet with joy, if it would make me walk. Sir Francis is coming at four o'clock. Hugo will be home by then. I insisted that Hugo should not be told while it was only a hope. Then, when Sir Francis came on Friday, he thought he had better see Hugo himself and tell him what had to be done. He knows nothing. I couldn't keep him on the rack of expectancy for those three days."

"The rack seems to have agreed very well with you, dear Lady Mary," said Judy, with laughing eyes.

"Yes, am I not smart? I have just been surveying myself in that glass." There was a handglass lying on the table. "I've got a new maid, Judy. Old Lovekind—she had really got quite too old-fashioned—decided at last to join her sister, who is setting up as a dressmaker at Upminster. You must give her a frock to make now and again, Judy, just one to wear on your country walks. I shall have to do the same thing myself—occasionally, because even for Lovekind's sake I can't be a dowdy, can I, Judy, as a Cabinet Minister's wife? Everyone says—which means principally Margaret; she knows, of course—that Hugo will be in the Cabinet some day. She found me my new maid, such a clever French creature. What do you think of her dressing my hair, Judy? And Margaret has found me a dressmaker, not too ruinous—Madame Colombe, of South Audley Street. Do you like her gown?"

"Dear Lady Mary, I like all," said Judy heartily. "Your gown, your hair, and yourself are all just lovely. You are really not the same person. You are—are you your own daughter, by any chance?"

Lady Mary laughed. There was brilliance in her eyes and cheeks—not the painful brilliance of feverish pain which Judy had often seen there, but the ensigns of hope and joy.

"Hugo is rather forlorn over the change in me," she said; "but, then, he is always talking of a pink frock I wore in the early 'eighties, when he saw me first, and the way I had my hair, curled down to my nose. He would like to see me in just those things again, dress improver and all, I suppose. I'm so glad you think I look well. I believe I shall really be helpful to Hugo when Sir Francis has put me straight. He says I am a woman of a splendid constitution, and built for an active life. The wife of a rising politician—rather, one who has made his mark already—ought to entertain, to make friends for him, to go about among his constituents."

"I daresay you and Mrs. Mountford will run rival salons," said Judy, laughing.

"Ah, here is lunch."

The footman had come in, pushing before him a wheeled luncheon table, which had been specially designed so that Lady Mary could receive her friends at lunch without being moved herself.

"Will you have lamb cutlets or fricasséed chicken, or fried soles, Judy? A little of the sole for me, please. I am always hungry now, and I am going to have something of everything. Do you remember when I used to eat no more than a bird?"

"I remember," said Judy cheerfully. "I am so glad you are going to keep me in countenance. I have always so unrefined an appetite."

After lunch, when they were alone again together, Lady Mary turned to Judy in her quick, eager way.

"I have been abominably selfish," she said, "for when you came in I could only think of my own affairs. But all the time William has been going and coming during lunch I have been simmering to ask you about Stannington. What does it mean, Rosamund and Lady Flora being as thick as thieves, as I hear they are? It's the oddest thing. And Rosamund has not written, as she promised she would. Of course, I know that Major Lindley is out of danger; your own letter announced as much. How you must have suffered, my poor Judy!"

For a few seconds Judy's eyes were lowered. Then she raised them and met Lady Mary's gaze.

"As a matter of fact, Miss Rosamund is with Lady Flora because she has the best right to be," she said; and then proceeded to tell Lady Mary all, or nearly all, the circumstances.

"And how beautifully you take it, Judy!" said Lady Mary, when the tale was told.

"You see, it was a mistake right through," answered Judy; "it is just going back to where we started last April, only that the trouble between Lady Flora and the Lindleys is at an end."

"And so they will settle at the Manor House. Well, Judy, since you're not heart-broken, child, I confess I'm glad. It was a shock to me when I heard that Rosamund's lover had forgotten her for you. Not but what he was miraculously faithful to her, and I never had any patience with either of them for letting those other two mar their lives for them. I am glad they will be happy, after all. He was too old for you, and he had given the best years of his life to thinking of another woman. But why hasn't Rosamund written to tell me? I knew her sorrows."

"She will not write till Major Lindley comes back and takes possession of her by main force. I have no doubt that she will run away when she knows he is coming."

"Ah! I might have expected as much from Rosamund."

Sir Francis Burnett was punctual to four o'clock. In fact, he was timing himself on the doorstep with his gold watch in his hand when the church clock pealed out the four strokes.

Judy would have gone, but Lady Mary seizing her hand held her fast, so she sat down again by the sofa.

Not five minutes of the great man's time had gone by when Major Winstanley's firm, commanding step was heard in the hall outside. As always, he came first to see his wife, and he came in now with a sheaf of unopened letters in his hand.

"I have to dine in town to-night, dear," he began, "my secretary, Hildred——"

Then he came out of his preoccupation, discovering his wife had visitors.

"I am very glad to see you, Judy," he said; and then turned to the other person.

"Sir Francis Burnett—my husband, Major Winstanley," said Lady Mary.

Major Winstanley looked at the ivory face and coal-black hair of the great surgeon with wondering interest. He had not known that Sir Francis was on his wife's visiting-list.

"Hugo——"

Judy, holding Lady Mary's hand, could feel the violent trembling of her whole frame.

"My dear lady," said Sir Francis, with professional blandness, "let me speak. I think I can explain things to your husband better than you can. Major Winstanley, my charming friend, Miss Greville, told me some time ago about the injury your wife received and her consequent invalidism. It interested me profoundly. As it happened, my treatment of some cases almost identical have been brilliantly successful. It is really quite a simple matter. My dear sir, surgical knowledge is progressing by leaps and bounds. The 'eighties were the dark ages to us. The treatment of your wife was the accepted treatment then; but I assure you it was quite mistaken. I have come to the conclusion that her case is perfectly curable."

"Curable! Without danger to her?"

Major Winstanley's fine dark gray eyes sought the purposely expressionless ones of the other man, and seemed as though they would read his innermost thoughts.

"Absolutely without danger."

"If there was to be danger—I tell you I shall take no risks. I would give up everything in the world rather than put her life a hair's-breadth in danger. She is more to me than all else the world can give me."

"Yet it can give a good deal if report speak truly," said the great surgeon, bowing graciously. Then, with a sudden darkening and softening of those inscrutable eyes:

"My dear sir," he said, "I would be the last man in the world to put your felicity in danger. I myself am happily married. If the operation were to fail, which I think is practically impossible, she would be no worse than she is now. The most she will have to fear is the plaster-of-paris in which we shall have to keep her for some weeks, perhaps months. After that—she will walk."

Things were settled, and Sir Francis, having given them a quarter of an hour of his golden time, departed. Then Judy thought she would look for Jack, and report to him on Rory's progress. Jack was to be found, his father thought, in the stable yard, where he kept a good deal of live stock, tame and wild.

She had felt the agitated clasp of Lady Mary's hand when her silent, reserved husband had made that profession of love for her, had noted the wave of colour that flowed over her face.

Now, as she left the room, she heard Lady Mary's joyous cry:

"I shall walk, Hugo, I shall walk. Oh, can you believe in our happiness?"

And the man's impassioned answer:

"It has been enough happiness for me to have had you all those years, Mary."

CHAPTER XXI.

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

CONSIDERING that he was so often in attendance on Mr. Evelyn, Maurice Evelyn seemed to see little of his cousin Judy during the early part of that week.

Of course, Judy was incessantly busy; and once, when her father had suggested Maurice as an escort to her instead of Jack Winstanley, she had begged that things should be left as they were.

"You can't imagine, papa," she said, "how lovely Jack is to me, and how he takes care of me. It would break his dear little heart to have his duties usurped by any other person."

The speech indicated how far behind Judy had left the playfellow of her early days. Mr. Evelyn, who had been unselfish in his willingness to give up his dear Maurice even to Judy, was satisfied and said no more.

So Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday Jack called for Judy, in the smartest hansom he could find on a West End cab rank, with a polish on his high hat you could see your face in, the most immaculate of garments, the shiniest of boots, and a flower in his coat; so palpably one of the golden youth, although a very young representative of it, that Judy found herself and her escort treated with immense respect by cabmen, porters, messengers, and all sorts of humble persons. To be sure, Jack had a lordly way of squandering coins, which, no doubt, helped them to win the ready service they found everywhere.

Never was any squire of ladies so patient as Jack while Judy made her purchases, so ready to accompany her wherever she would, even if it was into the uninviting East, although that was an expedition planned for later in the week.

It was delightful to go with Jack to a smart restaurant for the mid-day lunch, to see the way he selected his table, and ran his eye over the menu, and, at Judy's request, picked out the dishes he thought most desirable for her consumption as well as his own. Judy would not have interfered with his prerogatives for worlds; and never forgot for an instant that Jack was in charge, and that things might safely be left to so accomplished a man of the world.

If occasionally she saw a humorous glint in someone's eye as they looked at Jack, or intercepted a wink between one waiter and another while Jack ran through the wine list, confessing at last that his preference was for ginger beer, she would not for worlds that Jack had seen the same. She always treated him as the young man he considered himself, and deferred to him in all practical matters in a way which made Jack more her slave than ever.

After the first moment of her meeting again with Maurice Evelyn she had no doubt that he knew of the altered state of affairs: and her conviction that she had been the subject of conversation between her father and him brought the blood rushing to her cheeks.

Once during the week they met by accident in a Regent Street shop.

"All the world shops in Regent Street in Christmas week," he said, and seemed to be as busy about his purchases as Judy herself.

Yet when she had finished she found him at her elbow with an unobtrusive readiness to help in carrying her parcels or in any other way.

That unobtrusiveness won Jack's heart, which had already been flattered by the manner in which Maurice called him "Winstanley," and handed him his cigarette-case. On this occasion Maurice saw his cousin and her young escort into the cab which was to take them to Claridge's, and while he held the door of the cab half open in his hand he proffered the modest request that if Judy were meditating a visit to River Street he might be permitted to accompany her and Jack thither.

"I am going down to-morrow early," said Judy. "Jack is to escort me to St. Mary's, Whitechapel, where I am to be handed over to Martha. You don't know Martha. I must tell you all about her and Mary. I am to be there till the afternoon, when Jack is to come for me."

"May I come too?" Maurice Evelyn asked, including Jack in his air of entreaty. "After we have handed you over to Martha, Winstanley and I could amuse ourselves together for the day. I happen to be off duty with your father, who is in Major Winstanley's hands to-morrow. Then we shall come to fetch you together?"

Jack growled in a deep young voice, assumed in order to conceal his natural silver treble, that he would be very glad to have Evelyn's society for the day; and so it was settled.

Judy had a delightful day. It was a clear, soft, exhilarating winter morning, when a west wind roamed about the black streets and met one at corners with a suggestion of the country and the spring.

The journey from Charing Cross to Whitechapel is not exactly an exhilarating one; but Judy felt quite gay as she made the journey with her smartly dressed escorts, who were to bloom on the dingy Whitechapel platform like flowers in a grimy street. The morning paper had brought good news to Judy concerning Major Lindley. "Making rapid progress to complete recovery," ran the bulletin, and the words sang themselves in Judy's heart.

Martha was standing square and reliable on the platform when the train rolled in. Her blue eyes expressed a modest admiration of Judy's escorts.

Maurice Evelyn looked her over for an instant, lifting his hat as he did so with a courtesy that won him Martha's heart.

"You are quite sure," he said, pleasantly, "that you can take care of this very precious young lady?"

"I wish I was as sure of Heaven, sir," Martha responded fervently.

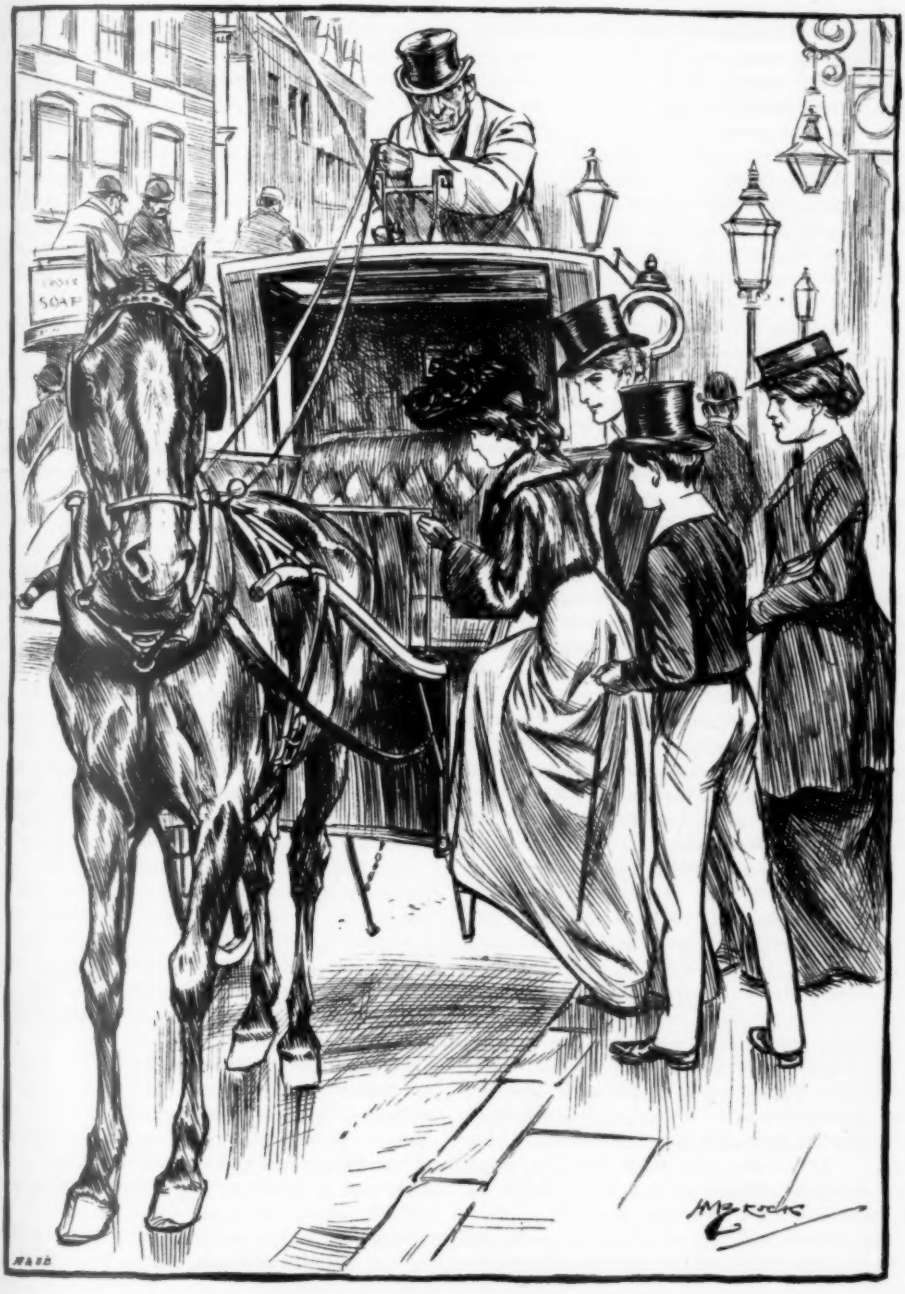
However, he insisted on putting them both in a hansom, in which Martha confessed that she felt like a queen.

She craned her neck to look back at the elegantly attired figures as the cab moved off.

"Beautiful they are, Miss Judy," she said. "I don't know that I've seen more beautiful young gentlemen since I last laid eyes on the MacNamara's sons at home in Kiltrasna. Not but what Master Gerald's yellow curls used to stick out through a hole in his straw hat, and Master Emon's knickerbockers had patches in the knees of them that the Madam—Lord rest her!—had put there herself. Still, they were the great ould blood, an' I fell to thinkin' o' them as soon as I saw your young gentlemen, Miss Judy."

"The elder is my cousin," Judy explained, "the younger is a great friend of mine with whom I used to play all sorts of wild pranks when I was younger. I couldn't tell you all the mischief he led me into, Martha—or perhaps it was I led him into it."

"See that now!" said Martha. "And he looks as if he stepped out of a band-box this minute! Master Gerald and Master Emon never could keep themselves that clane: sure they wor always tumbling into the water or out of it, or down in the dirty gripes otter-huntin', or sittin' wid their feet in bog-holes lookin' for shootin' wild duck. They couldn't be expected to be clane. Still, they looked the hoight o' grandeur always."



"I've seen that young gentleman quite as dirty as the MacNamara's sons could be," Judy said, laughing. "But tell me how Mary is."

"Sure she's a bit dawny, Miss Judy. I do be tellin' her 'tis a shame for her to be wantin' to go back, seeing all that's done for us. Sure she's not ungrateful, the crature, though I do be scoldin' her to put the heart in her. But sometimes when she's bad with the pain she keeps sighin' an' moanin' for the mountains an' the smell o' the say. 'Twas a poor little place enough we had there; but you'd think it was Heaven to hear her talk whin she's bad."

Judy looked thoughtful.

"You'd never think of going back, Martha?" she asked.

"Sure how would we go, Miss Judy? We've put nothing by. Anything she can spare, and that isn't much, she gives away. Even if we could manage the tickets, I'd be afeard to take her unless I'd a bit saved. I often thought I'd like to start a little bit of a shop over there; an' I could mind it, an' Mary could have the parlour behind, an' a bit o' garden, an' a view o' the mountains. I mind a little spot in Kiltrasna I'd like to have. It had a big window. But sure, maybe it's gone out of it now. 'Tis twenty years since we left it."

"He insisted on putting them both in a hansom."

Judy had much to tell the Duchess—so much that her time for visiting her humble friends was short. She found Mary indeed looking thinner than when last she had seen her, though that would hardly have seemed possible, and with the hectic of pain brighter in her hollow cheeks.

"I'm thinking," she said, "Miss Judy, that when the Lord calls me He'll be giving me leave to pass over Kiltrasna on my way home. Did you never hear that the soul travels just before death, and goes visitin' the places it loved best in life? So they say in Ireland, anyway. I do feel that if I only smelt the heather and the say 'tis well I'd be getting. You get the hunger on you sometimes, no matter how you battle against it."

"You'll excuse my ould plain, queer ways, Miss Judy," she said again, almost in a whisper as they parted; "but Martha has been ravin' about the beautiful young gentleman that came with you. There was two of them, I believe, but only one grown up. Martha thought—you'll excuse us, Miss Judy, for making so bold as to talk about you—that the young gentleman loved the ground you walked on. I did hear, dearie, something about your being promised to a gentleman out at the war; but I suppose it was a mistake. Anyhow, may God bless the young gentleman that loves our Miss Judy!"

Judy went away with two very bright cheeks, to find the Duchess entertaining Maurice Evelyn and Jack Winstanley, and apparently greatly pleased with her visitors. She had heard from Mr. Trafford, Maurice's East End friend, about him, and had been prepared to like him cordially. Indeed, at the last she drew Judy apart, and, taking her face between her hands as she was fond of doing, she looked down into Judy's eyes, which met hers less frankly than usual.

"He is bonny and good, little Judy," she said. "And I am sure there was the finger of God in that first meeting. Don't keep him in suspense longer than you need."

Judy said nothing at all, but permitted herself to be kissed, and then went off with her escort.

On the way back in the train Judy told them all about Martha and Mary, and had hardly finished her tale when they had reached Charing Cross, for one thing led to another, and Judy was a good story teller, especially when inspired by a sympathetic audience.

On the following Monday, which was Christmas Eve, they all travelled down to Stannington together, the Winstanleys as well. As Lady Mary was lifted on her litter into the carriage she held out her hand to Judy.

"The operation is fixed for the first week in the new year," she announced joyously. "The next time I travel down I shall walk into the train and out of it, Judy, please God."

"Please God!" echoed Judy.

Mr. Maurice Evelyn had brought down a prodigious number of packages with him. The contents of some Judy knew already to be gifts for so many of her friends on the Village Green who were also his friends. Indeed, she had assisted to choose them. The postman's small boy earned a handsome sum the next morning by going round with a handcart distributing the things; and if you will call to see Mrs. Foulser, at the Green Dragon, you will still see the fine silk shawl which is so warm and so good that it seems never likely to wear out. There was a microscope for gloomy Mr. Jupp at the post-office, who had scientific tastes, and had become much less gloomy of late; and a volume of Mr. Gladstone's speeches for Stocks, the postman, that ardent Radical; and Longfellow's poems for Miss Stone, the dressmaker; and sweets for all the children; and fat hampers for some of the poorest people; and smart caps for the old women in the almshouses.

Nor had one of the servants at the Red House been forgotten, nor any of the family. The exquisite Venetian glass table decoration was just the thing Mrs. Evelyn needed, for since they had become so gay it had been borne in on her that her table was a little bit early Victorian. And the very latest make of gun for Mr. Evelyn. And the flounce of exquisite old lace for Mabel, and the little daintily jewelled watch for Bertha. Both young ladies confessed with a little sigh of pleasure that it was pleasant to have a cousin as rich and as generous as Maurice. The young man lived and breathed in an atmosphere of good will.

But what had he selected for Judy? Wrapped up in Judy's table-napkin that Christmas morning there was a thin envelope containing something that rustled within a sheet of notepaper. The enclosure was a Bank of England note for a hundred pounds. On the sheet of paper was written, "From Papa and Cousin Maurice to Judy, the money to send Mary and Martha back to Kiltrasna."

"The fellow was right," Mr. Evelyn said afterwards to his wife, "when he said that Judy would derive more pleasure from that than from anything else we could give her. Did you see her face? My Judy has beaten your girls, after all, ma'am. She is handsomer than her sisters."

Mrs. Evelyn smiled indulgently.

"Judy has grown very pretty," she said. "The child has improved beyond my wildest hopes."

"I never thought she was in much need of improvement. There is someone who shares my fond partiality for Judy. Here is something to appeal to you, Helen, with your sense of delicacy which in my bad moments I have called fantastic. Maurice is head over ears in love with the child. He will say nothing till Lindley comes home or writes, and Judy's engagement is formally ended."

"It is what I should have expected from Maurice."

"Judy will give you your favourite son-in-law. There are few men to whom I could give Judy willingly. Perhaps no one but Maurice. I expect we shall soon be an old couple alone, Helen."

"We shall have each other," said Mrs. Evelyn, turning and kissing her husband, with the unexpected and beautiful impassionedness of a woman who has always passed for cold

CHAPTER XXII.

HAPPY ENDINGS.

MAURICE EVELYN'S Christmas gift to Miss Meredith had been a set of Tennyson, her favourite poet, in a tiny case, with lock and key of its own.

But one afternoon of mid-January Judy, paying her a visit in her room, found her weeping over a far different present. It was an ingenious little model, made up in seashells and cardboard, of Captain Kennet's house and garden, the latter made with silver-sand for the paths and fine little mosses for the grassy lawn, one of the quaint things the sailor man takes delight in fashioning.

"He says he has spent his evenings doing it for me," said Miss Meredith, wiping her wet eyes. "I've been wondering what kind of a Christmas he's had, poor Willie! He has been all alone. That ungrateful wretch Susy took her baby up to exhibit it to her husband's people in Sunderland, and never thought of her poor old father. He says he wishes he had me to"—Miss Meredith laughed a little hysterically—"to mix his glass!"

Judy looked at her very severely.

"I'm glad you're coming to your senses, Janet Meredith," she said. "Do you know I haven't been able to feel the same about you since you turned your back on Willie?"

"I know you haven't." Miss Meredith's eyes became watery again. "I haven't been able to feel the same about myself. I don't know how I was so unkind to the poor fellow. To think of him sitting by his lonely fire, and the sea-gulls crying about the house! Yet it was for love of you all, Judy, especially for love of your dear mother and of you. Who was going to look after your pretty things, I'd like to know? Of course, it's Sutton's business; but Sutton has all she can do to look after Mabel and Bertha. They are rather selfish about her, I must say."

"For the matter of that," said Judy, "I'll have Sutton entirely to myself presently; but, anyhow, those things are all unessential. Your duty is to Willie."

"It has been borne in on me," said Miss Meredith, a light breaking through the clouds of her face. "I have been thinking about it for some time, but I really didn't feel that I could write. It seemed such a forward thing to do. And I don't know what to say."

Judy laughed.

"Never mind, Merry dear," she said. "I will write the letter for you, and you shall copy it."

She found paper and pen and ink, and began to write.

"My Dear Willie,—I have changed my mind, and will come to take care of you whenever you like,—Your loving "Jeanie."

"Oh, I couldn't, I couldn't," cried Miss Meredith. "Think of how my whole life would be altered! And perhaps I shouldn't find I cared for him, after all."

"He may be ill, you hard-hearted woman," Judy said sternly. "He may be dying, for all you know, a lonely man with no one to call a doctor if he were suddenly taken ill in the night."

"Oh, don't, don't!" said Miss Meredith piteously. "I'll do whatever you like, but don't bring up such dreadful pictures. I think it is you who are hard-hearted, Judy. There, I will write; and then you'd better take it away and post it, or I'll be wanting it back again."

"You shan't have it," said Judy. "I'll post it the minute it's written. There—what are you hesitating over?"

She went back into the house slowly, and laid all the other letters on the hall table. Then, with a furtive look about her to see if anyone was likely to interrupt her, she went on to her father's study.

The lamp was lit, but there was no one there. Her father and Maurice Evelyn were out shooting the very last of the pheasants.

"'I loved you from the very first,' he said."

"Over 'very loving,'" said Miss Meredith, blushing hotly. "It doesn't seem quite suitable to—Willie's age and mine, and all that."

"Put it down," said Judy remorselessly.

Miss Meredith did, and Judy pocketed the letter. Just as she reached the hall door she heard Stocks's fine rat-tat at the outer gate, and going across the courtyard received the letters herself.

There was one that made her heart leap up. The handwriting was Major Lindley's.

Standing by the table, she tore open the letter and held it in the little circle of lamplight. She took in the contents almost at a glance. There was not much of them:

"MY DEAR LITTLE GIRL,—I could never forgive myself for the blunder if it had hurt you. As it is, I set you free, Judy, and accept my own freedom at your hands. I shall be on the sea before this reaches you. God bless you, little Judy. I shall never forget your sweetness and magnanimity.—Your devoted friend, "Philip Lindley."

So Philip was not angry, not quixotic or foolish in any way. He was coming home to Miss Rosamund, and he had given Judy her freedom. She kissed the letter in a kind of ecstasy—she was going to be awfully fond of Philip for ever and ever—thrust it into the bosom of her frock, and went out. She must not have poor Willie's fateful letter late for the post.

As she stepped through the postern on to the road the last watery gleam of sunset was dying in the west. It was very dark under the trees, so that she almost knocked up against someone.

"Maurice!"

"Judy!"

"Where is papa?"

"With Mr. Neville, discussing some question of church restoration. We met Mr. Neville, and your father turned back with him. Where are you going to in the dark like this, Judy?"

"To post a momentous letter."

"Your own?"

"Miss Meredith's. I will tell you in confidence, Maurice, that she has made up her mind to accept an old and faithful lover."

"Ah! I am glad of that. Old and faithful lovers are not to be lightly thrown over."

They went into the post-office for stamps. Jupp, who was a privileged person with Judy, came forward and hoped there was good news of the Major. He begged to be excused for noticing that Miss Judy had had a letter from him in his own handwriting.

"Yes," said Judy steadily, although her heart was thumping against her side. "He is on the sea. He will soon be at home once more."

She handed in Miss Meredith's letter, and she and Maurice turned and left the post-office, which was also one of the village's three general shops. The gleam in the west had become rose colour, and the clouds were breaking up, giving promise of a beautiful after-sunset. The January wind blew like April. In the velvety shadows of the great trees lights were coming out in cottage panes. A mystery of darkness and silence brooded under the long avenue of elms that was the high road.

"Come and sit on the Cripple's Seat," Maurice said. "I want you to tell me about that letter. Come!"

He took her hand that was cold and trembling, and did not relinquish it. The west had broken into a shower of curled rose leaves, a splendour of roses and fire, as they walked along under the trees. It was short and splendid. By the time they came to the seat known as the Cripple's Seat, built around a great tree-trunk by some kind soul for the tired traveller, the glory had turned to ashes of roses. The Green was dark at their feet. Beyond it the waters of a little pond glimmered coldly. Over against them the hill shadowed the north-western sky.

"What was in the letter?" Maurice Evelyn asked in a whisper.

"He gives me my freedom," Judy whispered back.

"Your freedom to be mine?" said the lover in an impassioned voice.

"To be yours," sighed Judy, as she felt his arm steal about her.

"I loved you from the very first," he said.

"And I you. Ah, it was wicked of me, seeing that I was an engaged girl; but I could not help it, indeed I could not help it. I went away to fight it. Then I found out that I had taken another woman's place through a mistake."

"I know, beloved, I know. Your father told me. It has cost me something to be silent all the weeks since then."

"It was like you to be silent. You could not have done anything else."

"I thought to have had a longer probation. What a fairy tale it is, in which everything ends happily!"

"They will be so glad," sighed Judy blissfully. "Papa never wanted the other engagement. I think—I believe he wanted to keep me for you. And mother will approve. It will be something altogether delightful for mother to approve."

"I thought my dear old uncle's intention would have been frustrated," Maurice said happily. "In fact, when I came down last summer I was in an odd frame of mind, for I was head over ears in love with a fair damsel to whose rescue I had come in the East End. You remember, Judy? I was determined not to marry one of my cousins before I had found out the lady. Trafford was to discover for me which of the Duchess's helpers she was."

"How surprised you must have been when you saw me!"

"I fell to blessing Cousin Peter's will. You can imagine what a facer it was when I discovered your engagement."

"Never mind," said Judy, "it is all over."

"You will marry me, Judy—— ?"

"When Major Lindley and Miss Rosamund are married. Not till then."

* * * * * *

All this happened a long time ago, and Judy Evelyn has been a wife for five years, and is a charming young matron with a nursery of her own, from which she is not distracted even by the claims of society, fashionable and political, by which she is much sought. For Maurice Evelyn has entered Parliament, where he has made a very creditable figure. His chief, Major Winstanley, always says he would do more than creditably if he could forget that he is a country gentleman. But this is something he and Judy never forget, and it is to be feared that the green pastures call these two in a way that will not be denied, so that Maurice has but half his heart in his Parliamentary career.

However, as Judy says, you couldn't expect little Stannington to produce two statesmen; and Major Winstanley is quite sufficient cause of pride to the countryside. No one looking at his beautiful, dark-eyed wife, as she receives Cabinet Ministers and Princes of the Blood, and all manner of famous people, could believe that she had lain for years on a sofa an apparently hopeless invalid. People have been found to admire Lady Mary Winstanley as much or more than the beautiful Mrs. Mountford, who is her attached friend and rival as a great political hostess.

Jack Winstanley is at Oxford, and is going in for the Foreign Office. He is as proud of his beautiful mother as of his distinguished father; and has long forgiven Judy for throwing him over a second time. In fact, he says that he means now to marry Judy's daughter, a child like a brown pansy, who is the delight of her grandparents.

Miss Meredith's marriage turned out very happily. It is to be questioned now if she ever remembers that Willie has a bald head; she sees it with a halo of light upon it. And as for his plain manner of speaking, why, Willie's speech is golden to his wife, no matter what he says. Judy declares that Merry is spoilt, and that no husband of the younger generation ever would wait on his wife hand and foot as Captain Kennet does on his—which is, perhaps, only to provoke her own husband to defend himself. Captain Kennet's attitude to his wife is certainly one full of awe and wonder that such a delicate creature should ever have fallen into his rough hands.

The Lindleys at the Manor House are the most stay-at-home people of all. Major Lindley's health after his South African campaign was such as to induce him to give up the Army and settle down at home. The Manor House Park and its few outlying farms may not be much of a property; but Mr. Neville actually did give his sister-in-law a dowry of £10,000, which helped things considerably, and Major Lindley has the strongest interest in nursing the property for the sake of his son and heir whose advent came as a wonderful joy to both his parents. Their world revolves around that small sun of their system.

"Pooh!" says Mr. Evelyn. "Lindley needn't be planning and contriving for that boy. There'll be a pretty plum to fall into his lap when Neville drops off; or sooner, for I don't think Neville is one to keep people waiting on dead men's shoes, and he adores that child."

Judy's sisters' marriages turned out excellently, and the father and mother of such creditable daughters have cause to congratulate themselves. But, after all, though Mrs. Evelyn is on the most affectionate of terms with her two elder daughters, she has discovered that the richest and rarest nature of the three is Judy's.

"I always told you so," says her husband.

"Yet as a child she was so wild, so undisciplined."

"It is the way of some things to be wild, Helen. Your other girls are pretty, prim garden flowers. Judy is the wild rose, growing her own sweet way."

"But I pruned her," says Mrs. Evelyn, smiling faintly. "I directed her, I taught her to control herself."

"Anyhow, the result is excellent," her husband replies; "and it takes all sorts, Helen, to make a garden."

[THE END.]

THE HIGHER MOTIVES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE.

By the Ven. Archdeacon Wynne, D.D.

EVERY good man is glad of a new argument for the truth, a new motive for duty. We are so fashioned that we are less impressed by familiar than by unaccustomed things. The most thrilling story, when repeated for years, ceases to stir our emotions, and the familiar voice of one who has been our pastor for twenty years may affect us less than that of a strange preacher.

And hence we are grateful when, in the wise guidance of Him Who has all His children in His great school, He keeps in reserve, and brings forth in comparatively later periods of the Christian life, some of His best pleas for righteousness. It is one of the joys of advancing Christian life to have new lights flashed on truth and duty. A certain staleness may have —for we are weak—begun to attach to some of the familiar motives for obedience and activity. Our habits, indeed, continue to carry us along, even when our feelings have diminished in force. Habit will lead the Christian to obedience without feeling, just as it leads the careless man to sin without the presence of any direct temptation. The boat has, as it were, "got way on her," and glides on for a space under the unexhausted influence of a past breeze. But it is very helpful when a new, gentle current springs up from a fresh quarter and brings an unexpected and joyful help to progress.

You may have noticed how our Lord thus comes sometimes to the help of His faithful disciples, when they have begun to find the temptation to apathy within, and indifference to others, growing rather dangerous, or when the interest they had felt in their own spiritual progress slackens for a while because their religious life has been a little monotonous and without any excitement.

When certain great and familiar motives to do our duty to others have lost, not indeed their force, but some of their freshness—and these motives, for the very reason that all Christians know them so well, I do not here stay to recite —it may be a help to some to have their attention drawn to two thoughts not often urged on young Christian people, which St. Paul in one of the writings of his later life, pressed on his readers in a church which he had himself built up from its foundation.

It is easily seen in most of his epistles that the earlier part is doctrinal and the later part practical, and that the truths in the one are relied on as giving force to the exhortations in the other. The connection is usually made with the word "wherefore." (See Romans xii. 1; Col. ii. 6, iii. 1; 1 Thess. iv. 1.)

In the Epistle to the Ephesians the Apostle, in the wealth of his eloquence and his urgency, approaches the practical side more than once, as in chap. iii. 1; iv. 1, 17. But he is called off from his purpose as one after another fresh truths rise in his mind, fresh pleas suggest themselves. At length, however, there emerges —almost, as it would seem, incidentally and unintentionally—the truth of the unity of Christ's people as one body under one Head, Christ Himself. And this thought—already partly familiar, perhaps, to his readers, as it formed the subject of a forcible passage in his earlier letter to Corinth (1 Cor. xii.)—brings him into a new and elevated region, as there opens before him the glowing prospect of a new motive for the practice of duty towards our fellow-men—the mutual relationship among the members of the Body of Christ.

He becomes more and more absorbed as he is borne on by new waves of thought, in the boundless possibilities of holiness arising from the social relation in the Christian Church. He sees here more clearly than he ever did before the most potent motive for the relative duties of Christians. You will see how he by degrees leads his readers to the point attained in Ephesians iv. 16—a magnificent verse. And in completing that fine argument he reaches a hill-top, whence suddenly there breaks upon his view a wide prospect of the splendid fertility of the new land in which all the fruits of devotion to Christ and love to man may grow. It is a motive and guide which has been held in reserve, save so far as it is touched on in general terms in the passage I have referred to in 1 Corinthians. But now St. Paul sees that he has here before him a fresh incentive to mutual duties, which is capable of being unfolded in attractive detail, and applied to many forms of life. How far it was a new discovery on his part, or a result of an evolutionary process, of which an earlier stage is met with in that earlier epistle, we cannot tell; but that it is likely to come as a new motive to the advancing Christian, and be superadded to the already familiar and more elementary motives by which he has long been urged, is very certain.

To what motive do I refer? You will see it clearly by reading, in the light of the sixteenth verse, verses 25 to 32 of this fourth chapter of Ephesians. The introductory "wherefore" is resumed, after several tentative beginnings of practical suggestions, and now this new motive s added, with all the force of a new and sublime truth, to the well-known simpler pleas for goodness.

"You are," he says, "all members one of another." In a society united for any purpose, loyalty and mutual help, mutual self-sacrifice, are conditions of the well-being of the society. In the human frame every member is the servant of, and is in some sense served by, every other; and not one exists or discharges its functions for itself alone. Let the thought of any human brotherhood, and, even more, the thought of the mutual relationships within the human body, give you a new clue and a new motive to social right-living and to the victory over selfishness. Of this he takes several examples in detail, and refers to lying, to anger, to stealing, to foul language, and to quarrelling, as among the great social sins from which he would deliver his readers. And his method, in the light of the doctrinal part of this chapter, is the same in all. First, the sin is discredited, as being a sin against the law of membership in one body; it is as though the eye cheated or deceived the hand or foot, or the mouth fed on that which would poison the brain, or stop the heart's beating. Loyalty to the other members of the body, loyalty in each case to that one member whom we are tempted to wrong, loyalty to the whole, must forbid, by a new and powerful plea, the wrong action.

You will see, more or less clearly, in St. Paul's manner of dealing with each of these sins in this place, the urging of a motive and the teaching of a rule. Neither of these has been as prominently taught before. The motive is drawn from the realisation, as a practical thing, of the union of believers in one living body; the rule is that a temptation to do wrong is best resisted by the resolute doing of some definite action in the opposite direction. Weigh these two thoughtfully, and you will see that the Apostle, in this advanced teaching, grasps great principles which are of wide application. There is no sin against others which does not look doubly evil when you see it as a sin against the unity of the Body of Christ. There is no better way to avoid going in a wrong direction than energetically to move in a right direction.

Now see how these two principles, the motive and the rule, are applied. In verse 25 observe that, to speak truth to our neighbour, to use the tongue positively to impress truth and advance the knowledge of it, is the cure for speaking falsely. It is a definite incursion into a totally different field; and our neighbour is more than a separate, isolated individual living near; so he adds, "For we are members one of another." This is the ruling thought of the whole chapter, and is to be borne in mind till its close.

Stealing, in verse 28, is discredited, and rendered impossible in the like manner. Instead of taking the property of another, diligent labour is to be undertaken to enable you to have that out of which you may supply his wants. "He who needeth" is as much to be supplied as yourself, because of this membership. In a well-ordered family, each member is really concerned that the others should be fed, clothed, and warmed; and failing these, he could not enjoy these comforts himself.

Foul language (verse 29), corrupting others, is banished, not by mere silence, but by speech directly designed to edify, purify, and strengthen the spiritual life of that other with whom you live as a fellow-member, whose holiness and purity are your concern.

And finally (verse 31), bitterness and quarrelling are to be banished by active kindness to one another. Mutual happiness and union among the members of Christ are to be aimed at by all; and as light drives darkness away by its own power and the darkness is not first removed that the light may be able to enter in, so quarrellings among friends and neighbours are to be ended, and will be ended, by a common realisation that our membership demands active service of each other, and the discharge of all kindly offices; while, if they are present, the hateful feeling of rivalry, jealousy, and the sole pursuit of individual interests will disappear.

Those Christian people who most fully enter into these two principles, will be the makers of peace and the levers by which Christian society will surely be raised to a continually higher level under the teaching of the Holy Spirit of God.

APRIL 17TH.—Jesus Transfigured.

Passage for reading—St. Mark ix. 2—13.

POINTS. 1. Christ in communion with God.
2. Christ the beloved Son of God.
3. Christ to suffer, and die, and rise again.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Communion with God. There was every morning during Charles George Gordon's first sojourn in the Soudan one half-hour during which there lay outside his tent a handkerchief, and the whole camp knew the full significance of that small token, and most religiously was it respected by all there, whatever was their colour, creed, or business. No foot dared to enter the tent so guarded. No message, however pressing, was carried in. Whatever it was, of life or death, it had to wait until the guardian signal was removed. Everyone knew that God and Gordon were alone in there together. (Bishop of St. Albans.)

Honouring Christ. Theodosius the Great, of the fourth century, at one time so far favoured the Arians, who denied the divinity of Christ, as to let them open their places of worship. Soon afterwards he made his son, a youth of sixteen, an equal partner of the throne with himself. Public notice was given of the event, and the noblemen and bishops of the Empire came on an appointed day to pay homage to the Emperor and his son. Among the number was an aged bishop who had suffered much under the Arian persecution. He made a handsome address to the Emperor, and was about to take his leave, when Theodosius exclaimed, "What! do you take no notice of my son? Do you not know that I have made him partner with myself in the Empire?" Upon this, the good old bishop went up to the young man, and putting his hand upon his head, said, "The Lord bless thee." The Emperor, roused into rage at this apparent neglect, said: "What, is this all the respect you pay to a prince whom I have made of equal dignity with myself?" Upon this the bishop, with the grandeur of an angel and the dignity of an apostle, looking the emperor in the face, indignantly said: "Sire, do you so highly resent my apparent neglect of your son because I do not give him equal honours with yourself? What must the eternal God think of you who have allowed His co-eternal and co-equal Son to be degraded from His proper divinity in every part of your empire?"

Christ Suffered for Us. A Roman servant, knowing that his master was sought for to be put to death, clothed himself in his master's garments that he might be taken for him. He was taken, and put to death in his master's stead, in memory of which his master caused a brass statue of him to be erected, as a grateful monument of his servant's fidelity and affection. What monument of loving gratitude should not Christians erect in their hearts and lives for Jesus Christ, Who, when we lay condemned to eternal death, came down from heaven and died to effect our salvation? "For a good man some would even dare to die, but God commendeth His love to us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us."

APRIL 24TH.—The Mission of the Seventy.

Passage for reading—St. Luke x. 1—16.

POINTS. THEIR OFFICE. 1. To be messengers of peace.
2. To proclaim pardon and the love of God.
3. To warn the unrepentant.

ILLUSTRATIONS: How Peace is Found. In the reign of Henry VIII. there was a young student at Cambridge named Bilney. He became deeply anxious about his soul. Fasts, penances, and other observances were prescribed for him, but with no result. He could not find peace. But he became possessed of a copy of the New Testament, and shut himself up in his room to study it. As he read the book he came to the words, "Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners." He laid down the book to think on what he had read. He thus states the result: "This one sentence through God's inward teaching did so rejoice my heart, being before almost in despair, that I soon found peace. Jesus Christ saves! yes, Jesus Christ saves!" From that time he became a preacher of those glad tidings, and at last he suffered martyrdom.

Christ's Pardon. A man was once being tried for a crime, the punishment of which was death. The witnesses one by one testified to his guilt, but there he stood quite calm and unmoved. The jury brought in a verdict of "Guilty." When the judge was passing the sentence of death upon the criminal, he told him how surprised he was that he could be so unmoved in the prospect of death. When the judge had finished, the man put his hand in his bosom, and pulled out a document, and walked out of the dock a free man. For it was a free pardon from his King which he had in his pocket all the time. That was why he could be so calm. It was by the King's orders that he produced the pardon only after he was condemned. The same it is which will make us joyful in the day of judgment. We who believe we have got a pardon from the great King, and it is sealed with the blood of His Son. (Moody.)

Compassion for Sinners. Robert Flockhart was a street preacher in Edinburgh in the last century. Every evening, in all weathers and in spite of many persecutions, did this brave man continue to speak in the streets for forty-seven years! Let workers for God think of that, and never be discouraged. When he was tottering to his grave the old soldier was still at his post. "Compassion for the souls of men drove me," he said, "to the streets and lanes of my native city to plead with sinners and bring them to Christ. It was the love of Christ which constrained me." Nothing could move him. He rebuked error in plain terms, and preached the Kingdom of Christ with all his might. "Well done, good and faithful servant."

MAY 1ST.—Prayer and Promise.

Passage for reading—St. Luke xi. 1—13.

POINTS. PRAYER. 1. Must be in earnest.
2. Must include God's honour and man's needs.
3. Receives abundant answer.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Spontaneous Prayer. "Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name . . . Thy will be done." What else can we say? The other night in my ceaseless tossings about, these words, that brief and grand prayer, came strangely into my mind with an altogether new emphasis, as if written and shining for me in mild, pure splendour, on the black bosom of the night, when I, as it were, read them word by word, with a sudden check to my imperfect wanderings, with a sudden softness of composure which was unexpected. Not for perhaps thirty or forty years had I once formally repeated that prayer; nay, I never felt before how intensely the voice of man's soul it is; the inmost aspiration of all that is high and pious in poor human nature; right worthy to be recommended with an "After this manner pray ye." (Thomas Carlyle.)

Prayer and Resignation. Lord Bolingbroke once asked Lady Huntingdon how she reconciled prayer to God for particular blessings with absolute resignation to Divine will. "Very easily," answered her ladyship; "just as if I were to offer a petition to a monarch of whose kindness and wisdom I had the highest opinion. In such a case my language would be, 'I wish you to bestow on me such a favour; but your Majesty knows better than I how far it would be agreeable to you, or right in itself to grant my desire. I therefore content myself with humbly presenting my petition, and leave the granting of it entirely to you.'"

Abundant Answer to Prayer. Miss Ellice Hopkins, in her story of Miss Robinson's work among our soldiers at Portsmouth, relates that when the Institute was first projected, Miss Robinson one day went to her, almost in despair at the hopeless aspect of affairs. Opposition to the scheme was strong, and funds were sorely needed. The look-out was dark enough, but the eye of faith pierced the gloom. "We knelt down," says Miss Hopkins, "and prayed that if it was God's will, He would give us the means to stay this flood of iniquity that was sweeping away His work in the Army, and enable us to do the right thing. I fear our faith was not strong enough to ask for more than a few hundreds, but, still, it was the prayer of faith. The answer to that prayer was £15,000."

Passage for reading—St. Luke xii. 35—48.

POINTS. 1. Watchful servants blessed.
2. Watchful servants rewarded.
3. Unfaithful servants punished.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Self-sacrificing Service. A heathen king who was wounded in battle sent, in his dying hours, for his trusted servant, and said to him, "Go, tell the dead I come." The soldier-servant, without hesitating a moment, drew his sword and stabbed himself to the heart, that he might go to the dead before his master, and prepare them for his coming. Oh, that we had this spirit of service and of sacrifice for the Lord Jesus, the King of Kings! In his last hour on earth He said to all His servants: "Preach the Gospel to every creature"—tell the dead in sin I come to give life.

God Sees to Me. A man in the full strength of his years but most helpless, being very deaf and almost totally blind, is an occasional visitor at our house. The other day, as I talked with the poor fellow, I learned a lesson myself, for the man has wonderful faith. "Have you no fear in going about as you do," I said to him, "in omnibuses and tramcars, and in the public streets?" "I used to have," he said in the soft low voice which contrasts with the way people must shout at him to make him hear; "but I never have now, for God sees to me. I serve God, and He always puts it into somebody's heart to look after me, and I get along right well. Beside that, I can read my Bible, and I find there that hereafter God's servants shall get further blessings, for 'the eyes of the blind shall be opened and the ears of the deaf unstopped.'"

The Direct Road. Once at a united meeting for prayer, in response to a call for five-minutes addresses, a good brother arose and began to denounce the orthodox doctrine of future punishment for the wicked. There was a future punishment, he admitted, and he would even call it by the old name—hell. But there was, he said, a door in it that could be opened; there was time and opportunity for repentance; there was a possible restoration to happiness for all its citizens. Then he wound up by a challenge to any other brother to disprove what he had said, or to prove the correctness of the ordinary teaching on the subject. Then followed a silence till an aged minister, with hair as white as snow, rose, and slowly and deliberately said: "The brother who last spoke told us of a way to heaven that leads through hell. Those who want to try the road to heaven by way of hell may take it if they choose, but, as for me, I am going to heaven by the direct road, and I strongly advise all others to take the same road too. Let us pray."

"THAT COAT SAVED ME."

By Mrs. G. S. Reaney.

YES, ma'am, my story's worth telling. You can't think what a bit of sympathy means to us chaps, even when one's as far astray as I was in those days. My missis had faith that I'd not for ever go on drinking, and she'd try to encourage me when I got depressed like, as I might do when I'd be just coming out of a heavy bout; she'd say—you know there was a deal of talk in those days about the Reform Bill—'You'll be bringing in your self-reform bill, Charlie, see if you don't, as soon as you get a little more sense in your head!' And I'd vow I'd start there and then; but, ah; it was always the same. I kept straight for awhile, then off the line I went again, and for all her kind ways and cheerful manner of making the best of things, I know my wife was nigh upon broken-hearted over me. . . .

"Yes, I'm coming to it. The beginning of the end was my accident. I had a stiffish bit of chimney work at those houses over the way yonder, and somehow slipped one morning as I came down the ladder; and, I don't know, but I suppose my drinking habits had made my bones brittle—anyways, before you could say 'Jack Robinson,' my leg was broken.

"They carried me home, as this happened before our hospital was built, and our bit of an infirmary had scant accommodation for accidents, and for six weeks I lay just in that corner there—they brought my bed downstairs, as they thought it a bit more cheerful for me than being in the room above—and it was here the young lady who did the district visiting found me.

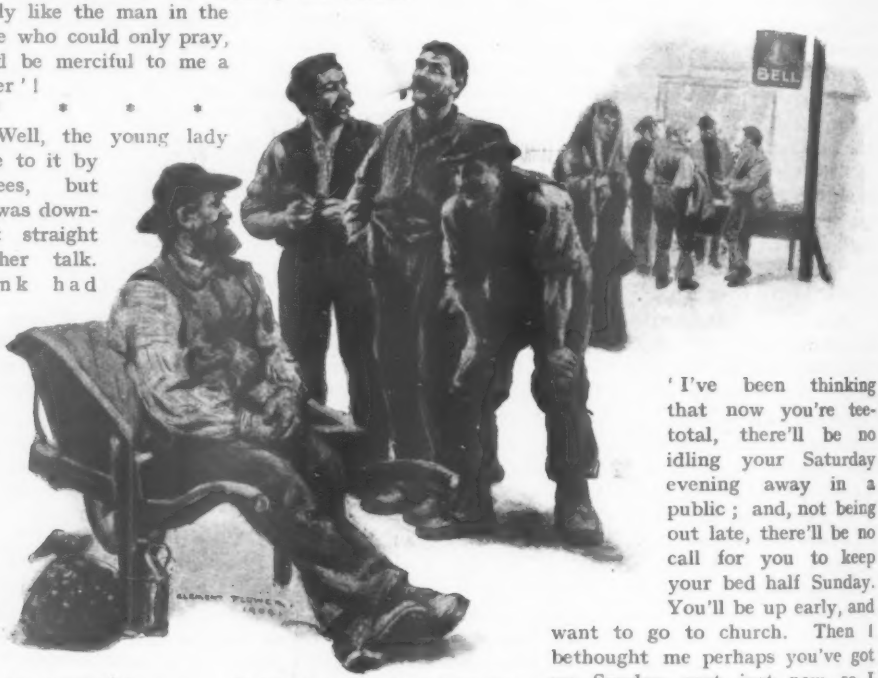
"It's a bit hard to confess, but I'm as well to be out with it all. I'd said pretty rough things about this lady, and had behaved badly to her a time or two, when she chanced to call and I was at home. If it had been me now, I would never have come in so sweet and forgiving-like as she did the morning after my accident. But there, I should not be telling you this story now if she hadn't been just like these visiting ladies are now, patient-like and kind of overlooking rudeness—like, I take it, a naughty child gets forgiven. She just took me in hand from that first day. Talk!—ah, she could talk! And didn't she make me laugh with her stories! I mind one now she told us. How, at a cottage meeting she was talking to, she thought one woman looked very much moved by what she was saying; she came creeping up a bit nearer and nearer—it was summer-time, you see—until she actually sat with her hand stroking her white skirt. Then, when they'd sung a hymn and the little meeting was over, the woman whispered to the young lady—what do you think? Nothing at all about the serious things she'd been talking about, but just this, 'Your frock would be all the better for a wash. I'm a washer-woman, will you please give me the job?'

"Well, you see, my young lady was very human; she'd laugh over that story, just as my old missis might have done, but she was as earnest as earnest, and could turn things round all in a moment. I remember another of her tales. She had gone to a public-house over the way there, just to ask if they could give her the address of a family who had flitted—for she found the house 'to let,' and no one about—and when the publican's wife had told her what she wanted to know (they were talking in a passage, you see, by a side door), the young lady thought to do a bit of good, and, says she, by way of opening out a serious conversation, 'Where do you go on Sundays?'—meaning church or chapel. The woman answered sharp and quick-like, 'Bless your innocence, Miss, when there are lodgers in a house you can't go to no place of worship. Why, it takes all my time to make the beds and cook the dinners!' Then she added, all in a hurry, 'But if you're thinking of what's to become of me when I die, you needn't call to trouble as I've a better chance of going to Heaven than you have.'

"Then Miss says to her, 'Why, how's that?' and she answered quite complacent-like, 'Because it tells us so in the Bible. Don't it say there that publicans and sinners shall go to Heaven before the righteous? Now I take it you're one of the righteous ones, while I'm, you see, the publican.'

"The young lady was all in a hurry to explain that publican in the Bible stood for tax-collector, not a man who kept a public-house, and then if the woman didn't start crying, and as she threw her apron over her head and ran into the house, she said, 'I wish you hadn't told me!

I wish you hadn't told me! I was so comfortable in my mind all along of it!'



"Well, as I was saying, the lady came most days for a little Bible reading and talk, and I can't help thinking this is the real secret of getting hold of us folks—this one by one looking up. She got me anyhow. First, I was interested in her cheery talk, and her serious bits I let her throw in without objecting, but after a while I liked the earnest bits best; they suited me down to the ground. I'd a restless mind at that time, and felt dissatisfied with my life, and somehow her serious talk helped me to see what was amiss. I certainly felt uncommonly like the man in the Bible who could only pray, 'God be merciful to me a sinner'!

"Well, the young lady came to it by degrees, but she was downright straight in her talk. Drink had been my ruin; I must sign the pledge. By this time she had made me ashamed of my past life and very anxious to do better, so I soon signed and felt I had done something to be proud of. My old missis was determined to stand by me, so she chucked her washing-day glass to the winds, and clean turned the drink out of the house. And we talked about all the good things which were going to happen when I got all right again.

"And so the time went on, and I got out a little, and by-and-by was ready to go back to work. The night before I started, me and my missis were sitting over the fire, when I says all of a sudden, 'It's one thing to be teetotal here with nothing to tempt you, but I guess I'll find it hard to say 'No' to-morrow when my workmates offer to stand treat.'

"And scarcely had I got the words out of my mouth than there was a knock at the door. I up quick to answer it, and sure, and who was it calling so late but my young lady! And she says so smart, 'It's you I've come to see, Mr. Moore' (she always called me 'Mister,' and I felt each time as if my self-respect scored one),

"'Let them chaff. . . . I'd learnt a few things from my young lady, I had."

'I've been thinking that now you're teetotal, there'll be no idling your Saturday evening away in a public; and, not being out late, there'll be no call for you to keep your bed half Sunday. You'll be up early, and want to go to church. Then I bethought me perhaps you've got no Sunday coat just now, so I begged the gift of one of my brother's. It's not old, and should fit you well. Will you give me the honour to see it's all right?' And before I knew what she was doing she helped me off with my old jacket, and started trying on the one she'd brought with her.

"'Why, if it had been made for you, it couldn't have been a better fit!' she cried, passing her hand kindly-like down the seams. 'Come, I'm that glad, I can't say all I want to do,' she went on, 'for after the long illness and all our nice reads and talks together, if you'd not made fair start with your Sabbaths, I think I should have broke my heart.'

"Yes, ma'am, I tell you, it's the sort of sympathy that wins a rough old chap like me. Do you think I didn't remember every word she said, and the coat hanging agin the wall in our best parlour when I went to work next day and mates wanted 'to treat' me? It was nothing else that made me stick to my 'No.' Let them chaff. I'd a reason worth all the chaff in the world which kept me firm. I didn't lose my chance either of ragging them. I'd learnt a few things from my young lady, I had.

"Now what do you think of this? Perhaps you know the figures, ma'am; but my mates were fairly struck back with them. When a master makes a five-pound note out of his woollen mill, three sovereigns has been paid in wages to bring it in, do you see? For making his five pounds' worth, he's paid three pounds for labour. But when the brewer makes five pounds, all he's had to pay in wages to produce it is five shillings. Turn all your mills into breweries, and the work-people would die of starvation in no time; but turn all the breweries into mills, and, my! what a prosperous time me and my mates would have.

"Well, I didn't have no drink—not likely with that coat hanging up on that there nail—and when Saturday came there was no old score to be settled up at the public—a tax my week's wage had always had ground out of it before ever my wife fingered my earnings. There was no late drinking and rioting, but early going to bed, like decent folks; and when Sunday morning came, I was that wide awake, I could have laughed for the pleasure of it; and I was like a child when it came to putting on the coat, I was that proud of it.

"Well, well, one thing led to another. Me and my missis, now that we went regular to a place of worship, couldn't be mean like and accept our seats for naught. Parson had to be kept, and while pew-rents went towards the keeping, we weren't going to be out of it; so we took our sittings, and——

"Ah! it's over fifteen years come Michaelmas when we first started walking the new journey. The coat was my 'Sunday best' long after it began to look shabby, but I was loth to change it. I did change it at last, making it my everyday coat when I'd had my bit of wash after I came in from work. When I'd once started it, I liked the feel, and I believe it was along of that that I asked the district lady if she'd step down sometimes of an evening and have a bit of a homely talk with me and my mates. Bless me! why, we've got dozens to a place of worship that way. They had a taste of good things, and wanted more; and I've got half-a-dozen pledge books well-nigh filled with names. No; all didn't keep their pledge, worse luck! but many did, and I take it, all told, there are more than a score of nice, comfortable, well-cared-for, what you might call prosperous homes in this place, that could, if they only knew the beginning and end of things, thank God above for that coat hanging up on that there nail.

"My missis kept it patched as it began to wear, but everyone couldn't tell the reason of my wearing such a mended garment when I was more than well off enough to buy a new one, so I gave it up at last, and pensioned it off like, to spend the rest of its life in peace and quiet by hanging where it could be seen on that door.

"I told you you'd think it a story worth telling, ma'am, when you'd heard it through. I don't know how many dozens of times I haven't been through it all these years. I have a feeling it's got its lesson for a many, perhaps for some of the gentlefolks, who think the poor only value things that cost money. I can tell them that while we can reckon coins up, and calculate their worth, sympathy is beyond reckoning up that way. It's priceless, simply priceless!"

And because I agree with Charles Moore, I have repeated his story, hoping to bring i' a-many" to his way of thinking.

THROUGH SORROW TO JOY

By the Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A., Minister of the City Temple, London.

"Ye now therefore have sorrow: but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you."—ST. JOHN xvi. 22.

THIS text is one of singular beauty and suggestiveness. It is full of sweetness and comfort to those in trouble, and has brought balm to many a wounded heart. It can hardly be necessary to remind you of the special circumstances under which our Lord came to utter these words. He is addressing His disciples at the valedictory meeting in the upper room, and the words are spoken near to the end of that wonderful address, the preparation for which was His own ministry, His own humiliation, and the announcement of His approaching departure. "Because I have said these things," He says to them, "sorrow hath filled your hearts."

There must have been a considerable contrast between the spirit of the disciples as they heard Him speak this sentence and as they entered the upper room after listening to the huzzas in the streets of Jerusalem. The last thing they expected to hear was that Jesus would say good-bye, and now that it came it is no wonder if, as He said, sorrow had filled their hearts. He announces to them, "Ye now have sorrow: but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you." Like ourselves, for we are just the same, in every disaster and in every season of extremity, they, including the man who has written them down, forgot all about these words; when the time of danger and tumult actually came, they all forsook Him and fled; they forgot He ever said that He was coming back again, and they forgot, too, the words of comfort and healing that He had spoken before His departure. "I will see you again" meant nothing to them in their moments of terror and despair, when they saw this Jesus of theirs, hitherto regarded as almost omnipotent, taken as a common criminal, bound, scourged, and finally crucified. The sorrow that they had had in the upper room when they heard Him say good-bye was as nothing to the sorrow that came afterwards, when they saw that He meant it, and that, in a death of agony and shame, this ministry that meant so much to them had come to an end. They forgot all about the possibility of that Easter Sunday morning when from the tomb that was unable to hold Him the Christ rose again. They did see Him again; they saw Him in the flesh, the same Jesus, but to them not quite the same.

From that tomb, on the first Easter Sunday morning, there arose something that did not go into it. There arose a higher spiritual experience on the part of those who met the risen Christ; there arose a Christ "with eyes majestic after death"; there arose a Being no longer subject to the limitations of the flesh, the Christ, in all the calm of a conqueror, assured of His victory. The crisis was passed, the cross stood bare, no putrefying corpse thereon, the tomb itself empty. The risen Christ really began the Christianity which we know now as the dispensation of the Comforter, and with that risen Christ, in contact with Him, and listening to His words, but with a great change over their spirits, were these very men who had fled from Him and the men who had sorrowed to hear Him say good-bye in the upper room. Think what it must have meant to realise the fulfilment of His promise! The old joy, the joy of listening to Christ in the upper room and on the hillsides of Galilee, had been a real joy, but it was as nothing to the new. There was an element of permanency in the new joy which the world could not take away from them. They had the Christ back ; and when, for the second time, He left them, it was with no sorrow that they viewed His departure—they "returned to Jerusalem with great joy." What a change passed over these men ! They went forth now without fear to bonds, imprisonment, to judgment, and to death. They were turned into heroes, these poor, frightened sheep of the Garden of Gethsemane ; and the experience that they had, an experience which nobody could ever rob them of, an experience which made them conquerors, an experience which, put into the words of the Apostle Paul, is that of many a man and woman at the present day as well as then—that to depart and to be with Christ is far better. Though the normal experience of the Christian does not exhaust it, we are not looking forward to a heaven all the time ; there is a life of glory here in the joy which no man can take away.

With this text in mind, I propose to address myself as far as I can to those in trouble, and I am going to attempt a big thing—namely, to leave every one of those whom my words reach, if God's power permit it, helped and comforted. I would like to be enabled to dismiss from your experience every shadow of unhappiness. "Man is born to trouble," we are told, "as the sparks fly upward." Trouble is a universal experience ; it comes to young and old alike ; there is no avoiding some acquaintance with it. Some people are running from trouble all their life, but the man who runs from it usually finds trouble as close to him as his own shadow. Religions and philosophies have come into existence because of it, and professing in some measure to deal with it. Buddhism, professed by 400,000,000 people, came into being because its founder was appalled by the mystery of human suffering, and thought he could find a way, though it was a sad way, out of it all. Stoicism was a philosophy—a philosophy of a certain type of manhood that did great things. What was Stoicism ? A perception of the pain which is latent in all life ; it is a profession of meeting hardness with hardness ; it is a recognition that life is sad, do what you will, and that the best thing you can do is to meet it with undaunted front. To-day, Dowieism, Christian Science, and all movements of that class, have come into existence because men are always looking for some way of escape from the sorrow which besets their pathway. Oh, we cannot get away from it ! It may be that the world is growing more sensitive—sometimes I think it is—but we never get away from, we never outgrow, our experience of pain. As a rule, the higher the sensibilities of a man, the greater is his susceptibility to trouble. Let me survey in demonstration of these statements some typical experiences.

It may be that some man has found his way into this church almost by accident. He hardly knows what he is doing, life has treated him so hardly, and for the time being he feels himself utterly unequal to its problems ; his manhood has deserted him. Now you probably think, sir, as you steal into a corner and try for the time being to forget your troubles in the brightness and the heartiness of this service, that you are altogether unique in what you have to suffer. Do not make any mistake about it. Perhaps next to you sits one who has been through his Garden of Gethsemane, and on the other side of you is one who has been in the valley of the shadow of death. Every man and woman, if he or she has not already come to that experience, finds it waiting for him, knows it will be waiting for her ; by-and-by you will surely come to it.

I speak, for instance, to some old man, who surely knows as much about life as—in all probability more than—the man who ventures to address him, who has found it has operated as he has grown older by a law of diminishing returns. His expectations are unfulfilled. Life came to him once with full hands, offered great things, and now he knows that the prizes were elusive. One by one his friends have passed to the other side ; he cannot adapt himself to new conditions, he lives a battered life. A very small measure of success has been his, many disappointments and defeats, and now he has come to a sad evening. All his days he has been straining after something that he has never obtained. Is it any wonder if such a man should accept the first part of my text, and say, "Yes, this is my experience, sure enough" ? "Ye now therefore have sorrow." Here, too, is a woman, one of a large class, too numerous in this overcrowded country of ours, who has to live a lonely life, to make a brave but apparently unavailing struggle, isolated, against heavy odds, to make a living. It may be that you have never known either husband or children ; perhaps husband and children are in heaven ; no one is particularly responsible for your life, and there is no friend to whom you can go with unfailing certainty of succour.

It is a miserable business to have to deal with a world that is unsympathetic simply and solely because it does not understand. "Ye now therefore have sorrow."

Watch that father or mother of a family in which something has gone wrong, or to which some great distress has come. You do not say anything about it to the world—you are loyal to your own—but the world is saying something about it; you have the miserable feeling that people are whispering about that shadow which has fallen upon your home, and the horror of it is that he who brought that sorrow down is bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh. You think with bowed head that life has gone hardly with you in consequence of a wounded love, a shame that cannot be repudiated; and "ye now therefore have sorrow."

Observe that man, the man with a guilty secret that will not let him rest day or night. You would never suspect it. Close to him is another who has suffered a wrong in early life, and never has got over it, and never risen above it. There is the poor fellow who once made a slip and has never recovered from it, and the world is taking care that he never shall.

And then as to the young people, do any of you know what I am talking about when I speak to the experience of those who are of maturer years? Assuredly. In fact, I am coming to the conclusion that some of the most spend-thrift and troublous years of a man's life are those between twenty and thirty, just as often the most dangerous times, and the times when a man oftenest goes wrong, are between forty and fifty. There are young people who never dreamed that they would have to work for their living as hard as they have to do, and endure the vulgar bullying of a man who is without everything essential to the life of the spirit; but for the sake of daily bread they have to bear it. Oh, some of you men and women, for all your exuberant life and light-heartedness and joyousness of spirit, and it is right that you should have these things, sometimes have your heavy hours. Life is a hard business after all, and if it were not for the period of relaxation—in fact, if we stopped to think—we should be inclined to challenge God, and say that He has made His world wrong. "Ye now therefore have sorrow."

Think of those people who have lost friends, fortune, position, reputation. There is a great danger lest they grow hard and bitter—for if sorrow does not achieve its perfect work, it has a way of doing sad mischief in turning men into cynics. To some, it may be, sorrow came but yesterday, like a bolt from the blue. The last thing you looked for was the ruin which has shattered your prospects, blighted your home. Only yesterday, God's face was shining in the morning, but it was hidden at night, and to-day, while we are singing, you are silent. The world seems to be outside of you, and other people are but—

> Of magic shadow-shapes that come and go
> Round with the sun-illumined lantern held
> In midnight by the Master of the Show."

You are half wondering if you will wake to-morrow, and find that it is all a dream.

This, then, is life. God in heaven must know all about it, that we therefore now, so many of us, have sorrow, and have had it, and look to having it again. What have I to say to that enormous problem? This: Here is Somebody who apparently knew what He was talking about. I often feel, when reading the New Testament, that one great apologetic for the truth as it is in Jesus is to observe how far He was able to see right down to the root-springs of human nature. If Christ had been a sunny-hearted optimist, who could not see anything wrong at all until He came to Calvary, it would be a poor thing for our religious life to-day. But He was not that. He had His joy, and even in that hour and article of death, in the very shadow of Gethsemane, He said: "That My joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full." They were getting the scourge and the ropes and the nails ready at that very moment, and He knew it. If Christ had ignored the terrible problem, the ever-present tragedy of human experience, we should have said that we could not listen to Him, because He did not know life as it comes to us. But did not He? Ah, yes, He did. When Christ came into touch with pain, He tried to turn it into peace. He exacted no conditions when He did a kindness that was to restore happiness to a human heart. "Weep not," He said to the mother sobbing by the bier of the dead son. So often He bade people dry their tears, and He enforced no theological lesson when He put forth His power that it might be so. If Christ, again, had died on Calvary cursing God and saying, "I have lived a pure and a noble life, and it has failed," we could have had no message of comfort; but thousands of congregations assemble Sunday by Sunday just because Christ's last word upon the cross was not,

"My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" but, "Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit." He bowed His head, and died. That is why I come with confidence to you, and take His words, and repeat them as if He were here to speak them. So He is; the voice of Christ shall speak within your hearts, so that you may appropriate His words. "Ye now therefore have sorrow: but I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you."

There is a joy of this world, remember—the mere joy of living. I like to look on trees and flowers, and they give me a happiness that I cannot analyse. Every lover of Nature will say that Nature talks to him; it has the power of imparting joy to us. We are able to take from beauty and from grace of form, from light and colour and sound, a happiness that ministers both to pleasure and to profit. But we know how the shadow can fall. Is there no higher joy than even the best that we can get from Nature? Assuredly; and I would that every man who does not now know it would partake of that joy, and do it speedily. It is a joy that the world cannot give and cannot take away. "Ye now therefore have sorrow"—that means the world's joy has failed. "I will see you again"—God's face shines radiantly upon us. When we feel ourselves taken up into fellowship with the great heart of the All-Father, when we feel the reality and the presence of the divine, and when we respond thereto with our own highest, there comes a joy which is not of earth. That is a light, it is true; but it is the light that never was on sea or land. I speak that I do know; I am not making this up because it happens to be appropriate pulpit language. It is true, and there are those, though they be only a minority in this world, who know that to be the truth.

Now, to be perfectly frank, I believe it to be God's will that you should be exposed to sorrow; everyone of us is meant to experience it, and I cannot explain—nobody can—why it should be so. All I can see is that out of sorrow comes a glad and a beautiful thing. It is God's will that through the experience of sorrow you should rise into fellowship with joy, and into an experience of calm and trust and peace and love. Not in spite of sorrow, but because of it, the best things come. Every trouble is meant to be like a billow which lifts us higher upon the shores of peace. In all holy joy there is a latent experience of pain. See, there is our little home nestling down in the valley; it is a winter's day upon the hill, and you and I go out to breast the storm. There is something of exhilaration in doing that; but we are glad when the battle is over, and we come down to that little home in the valley. Why does home seem so sweet after the mountain-side and the tempest? Because there has been a mountain-side to climb and a tempest to breast. Here are two friends—it may be husband and wife; you have known each other long years: why is your friendship so close, so sacramental that the mere presence of the one with the other is in itself a joy? Because of that stern time that lies years back now, when you two together went through a great moral tempest, when it seemed as if the whole world was against you; but you stood side by side, and proved each other. All friendship that is worthy of the name has been baptised in that experience; even if it be only a slight baptism, it must have been there. Here is a trooper looking into the face of his general. These two veterans know each other. With what pride the old commander looks upon the man who has followed him through a hundred fights! With what confident loyalty the trooper looks up into the face of his chief! Why is there such an understanding between these two? The comradeship of war accounts for it. They have been on the stricken field together; they have been the means of each other's safety; they stood shoulder to shoulder in the press of the fight. It is the fight that shows them in after years—the memory of it, the latent experience of it, though it never come again—how near they are the one to the other!

One day, you faithful one, all the suffering you have ever passed through will be swallowed up in victory not to be lost; it will go to the enriching of experience. The very smoke that is rising from London chimneys to-day will to-morrow in high heaven be purified, coming back to the earth in benediction; it is not destroyed, it is simply transformed. And so, in the case of all the best and the wisest of men and women, it is true that suffering has meant the making of character—yes, and in the noblest joy, that which is most divine, most Christlike, nearest to the nature of God, that has had its price. You do not want the suffering again; it is not an end in itself; it is no good when its work is done; but you want the joy that came out of the midst of it. Sorrow endureth for a night, joy cometh in the morning. You ought not to be tortured and crushed by the feeling that sorrow is eternal; it is not, and it cannot be. You will see presently what God has meant by this experience, and He means you so to see.

I watched from my window one evening a metamorphosis that took place in the western sky. While I was looking towards the western horizon, below which the sun had sunk, a heavy black bank of clouds, amorphous, shapeless, repellent, almost dense, hid the orb of day, and when the sun had gone down behind that bank one never expected to see the light of the evening again. Yet while I looked the cloud was changed from within. Where the blackness had been came a blend of crimson and purple and gold. If there had been no cloud, there would have been no splendour. God painted a picture on the canvas of the western sky vaster and more perfect than any artist of earth could paint, but He did not turn back the sun to do it. The light that came to that cloud from within was there all the time, in the midst of the blackness, though we could not see it; the blackness was turned into radiance. "Your sorrow shall be turned into joy." If there had been no cloud, there would have been no radiance; no sorrow, no joy; no cross, no crown. "Ye shall see Me again." Yes; but not because He comes back, He never goes.

"Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust Him for His grace;
Behind a frowning Providence
He hides a smiling face."

It is not that God has left us, but we cannot, any of us, in the time of extremity feel that He is really there. Is He there? Surely; and when the time comes that we can see Him again, see Him as He is, our hearts shall rejoice, and that joy no man taketh from us.

Do not live in the valleys; we are meant for the mountain-top. It is never God's will that man should stay in the house of mourning for ever. I plead with you to make application of this sweet truth that was taught by Jesus, and make it to your own circumstances. It is not that they shall be changed; it is that the black cloud will change from within.

Now, how to apply this. Who has not lost a friend—a dear one? Some of you are thinking,

"Oh, for the touch of a vanished hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still!"

Bereavement has cut deep wounds, and time does not heal them all. Your nature would not be a very noble one if it could. What shall I say to you? You shall see those you have lost again when you see Him. Heaven is where Christ is. It began here, and He is the golden bridge between time and eternity, and the guarantee of the restoration of all you have lost, and something added.

"Think, when our one soul understands
The great word that makes all things new,
When earth breaks up and heaven expands,
How will the change strike me and you
In the house not made with hands?
Oh, I must feel your brain prompt mine,
Your heart anticipate my heart;
You must be just before, in fine,
See and make me see, for your part,
New depths of the divine."

Are you mourning loss of fortune, loss of reputation, loss of opportunity? You are already rich, my friend, beyond the dreams of avarice, if you would only stop to think about it. Love is the great heritage, love divine. The higher you can carry your love, the greater and the nobler the sacrifice you are willing to undergo for it, the surer you are of knowing what is meant by that joy which can never pass away. If you build upon earthly fortune, you are sure to be disappointed. They tell me that the one form of trouble over which men seldom seem to get is loss of fortune. If riches increase, set not your heart upon them; hold all things loosely that are of the earth earthy. Opportunities are not to be despised, but a thing that you cannot take to heaven is only worth using on earth as an instrument. Some of you are worrying about present anxieties and cares; some of you about to-morrow, and some of you about the far future. What day is it that you particularly dread—to-morrow? Tuesday? Friday? God is already at Friday; there is no to-morrow with Him; it is all now. He cares as much for you as any earthly friend has ever done; make over the problem, dwell in the Eternal Now, and you will find that the things you most dread never come. When the things to which you have looked forward with the greatest amount of fear do come, that which you feared in them does not come. God is there; you will see Him again, and your heart rejoices when you expected to be sorrowing for ever. Give up expecting the worst, live in the best, in the quiet of God's presence. You cannot trust Him too much nor too far. He will bless you in proportion to your faith. For "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him. But God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God."

HONOUR BRIGHT

A Complete Story by G. M. Force.

"PLEASE, can you give me free-'alfpence; but p'raps you haven't got so much?" and a pair of wistful blue eyes looked up pleadingly into the bearded face above him.

"Well now, Clara, do you hear that?" and the master of the house irritably addressed the handsome lady presiding at the table. "Where does the child pick up such talk?"

"She said it would be 'nough to buy a slicer-ram," the voice went on pitifully; "and that's what she likes best, and it costs free-'alfpence, so please, father, if you've got so much, give it to me."

But the gentleman only gasped. The lady, with a coaxing air, beckoned the child to her side, and, taking him on her knee, she smoothed away the dark curls from his hot forehead, remarking gently:

"Now, Lionel dear, tell me all about it, and I will explain it to father."

The childish lips were quivering, and his eyes grew misty with the tears gathering at his father's want of comprehension, and with almost a sob in his voice he began:

"She was all alone in auntie's room; she is only a very little one, and the door was a little weeny bit open. So we talked, and I showed her my Grenadier—only he's got his nose broke—and I asked her, 'What does you like to buy best of all?' and she said, 'Slicer-ram,' and it costs free-'alfpence; and she was crying lots 'cause she couldn't buy it, and I promised to get it, cause she was dreffal misable."

The child looked up into his mother's face, anxious to know if he had been understood. For this small mite had learned by past experience that sometimes it took a great many words, and any amount of time, before he could make the grown-ups understand his meaning.

The lady pressed a loving kiss upon the boy's eager, upturned face, and folded him tightly in her arms.

"I think it must be one of Helen's children from the Sunday school," she remarked to her husband, "and by what I can make out the height of her ambition is a slice of ham, which she thinks she can buy somewhere for three-halfpence."

"And this is what Helen's charities bring upon us! The child is brought into contact with the very scum of the town, and is actually picking up their language," and the gentleman rose angrily from the table.

"It was quite an accident that the children met," returned the wife gently, "and I will see that it does not happen again. I really think the work is a distraction to Helen."

"Humph! she would have needed no distraction, but for that foolish quarrel with Lynton, as fine a fellow as ever breathed. I've no patience with her nonsense."

The child's eyes wandered from one face to the other. He did not understand the meaning of all that was said, but he tried to read from their faces if his wish was to be granted.

"May I have the free-'alfpence?" the little voice pleaded again; and Lionel anxiously watched his father's movements.

"Look here, Lionel." And the gentleman held a new half-crown before the boy's bright eyes. "That's better than three-halfpence, and you can have it for your own if you will promise not to talk to any more dirty little girls in Aunt Helen's room. Will you promise—'Honour bright?'"

Now before Lionel could say "Honour bright" he had to consider very seriously—for he knew that, those magic words once pronounced, nothing must turn him from his given word. And how could he present his gift if he could not speak with the little girl again? Before he could solve the problem in his childish mind his father's impatient voice asked again, "Well, Lionel, is it 'Honour bright'?"

Lionel looked up. His eyes fastened on the glittering bright half-crown poised so temptingly between his father's finger and thumb.

He felt he must possess it at all costs. In it lay his only hope of being able to gratify the little girl's desire, so he looked straight into his father's eyes, and answered firmly, "All right, father—'Honour bright.'"

"What is scum, mother?" he asked later, as she carried him from the room, and his eyes rested anxiously on her face.

"Oh, nothing, darling," she answered, with a light kiss.

"Yes, it is," he answered, "for I heard father say it to-night. What is scum, mother?"

"Only father's name for the little girl you talked to to-day," the lady answered, knowing the boy would not rest till he had had some sort of explanation.

"How clever of father to know her name!" he proudly returned. "I think it's a very pretty one, don't you, mother dear? It sounds much grander than Lionel."

Nothing would persuade the child to part with the half-crown for the night. He would not even consent to its resting under his pillow, but fell asleep with it clutched tightly between his plump baby fingers.

"I never knew a child say such funny things in his prayers as little Master Lionel," remarked nurse to her friends in the kitchen later in the evening. "It's always a job for me to understand what he says, but to-night I'd no more idea than the cat what he was talking about. He just puts 'is little 'ands together, and shuts 'is baby eyes tight, and says: 'God bless dear little Scum, and help her to get the slicer-ram.'"

II.

LIONEL was seated on a wheelbarrow in the toolhouse, with an anxious pucker on his baby forehead. Opposite to him on an old box sat his friend and ally, Jim, the gardener's boy, who, with pen in hand, and writing-paper placed carefully on the book on his knee, waited patiently for instructions.

There was always a perfect understanding between these two. Jim was such a clever boy, thought Lionel. He always knew at once what one meant—so different from the grown-ups, who never could understand what one was trying to say.

How cleverly he had understood about Scum and the money that was to buy the slicer-ram! He certainly was the best person to write the letter, and what a kind face he had!

"How does people begin letters?" he asked of his secretary.

"Well, it depends," Jim thoughtfully replied. "There's 'Honoured Sir' and 'Respected Madam,' but if you knows the pusson very well, you can put 'My dear Friend,' or summat of that sort."

"But I don't know her very well," sorrowfully replied Lionel. "You see, we only had a very little talk, and she was crying most of the time. I'm afraid I only know her well enough for 'spected," and he gave a deep sigh. "But perhaps," he added more cheerfully, "you could put 'dear' as well, to make it sound a little more loving."

Having come to this decision, the soft child voice went on dictating, and Jim's grimy hand travelled slowly and painfully over the sheet of paper as he transcribed:

"DEAR RESPECTED SCUM,—

"I karnt see you to give you the three-apunce because of Onner Brite, but I am going to put it in this honverlope, so as you can stop crying and get the slicer-ram quick. Jim says you get it prime at Smith's, in Cotton Lane. Ime so sorry, 'cos of Onner Brite, but if I see you in the street you'll know it's me, 'cos of my waving my hand, and my hat is written on—the Victory.

"From your loving

III.

A LITTLE boy in sailor suit and broad-ribboned hat, on which was stamped in bright gold letters, "The Victory," stood gazing wistfully up and down the street, as if uncertain whither to wend his steps Suddenly his face beamed with delight, and he sprang joyfully to greet a tall gentleman who was hurrying forward as if he had no time to lose.

"Mr. Lynton, where does people post letters, please? I keep walking and walking, and I can't find the place."

"Why, Lionel"—and the gentleman gazed with astonishment—"what are you doing here all alone, such a long way from home?"

"It's for one of Aunt Helen's little ones. She's called 'Scum,' and it's very 'portant, 'cause it's got money inside, and please I want to post it quick," and he showed a well-thumbed envelope, through which the shape of the half-crown could be clearly seen.

"'Will you promise—Honour bright?'"—p. 631.

The gentleman examined the envelope carefully, on which was written in large, clumsy characters, "Scum, Sunday School, London," then, gazing perplexedly at the boy's excited, flushed face, he remarked encouragingly:

"All right, old fellow, you trust it to me. I'll see it put in the right letter-box."

"Oh, thanks awfully, Mr. Lynton," and the child gave a deep sigh of relief as he saw the important document stowed away in his friend's coat pocket.

"It was a good thing I saw you, wasn't it?" he cheerfully remarked a few moments later, as they were driving swiftly homewards. "It's awfully jolly meeting a friend when you're out all alone."

"Yes, indeed," returned his companion; "and so you are out all alone, posting letters for Aunt Helen?"

"Well, not 'zactly," Lionel truthfully answered. "I 'ranged about it myself, only Jim did the writing. You see you can't bozzer aunts when they're not well."

"Is Aunt Helen ill?" queried the gentleman anxiously, "and a dark flush mounted to his handsome face.

"Well, not 'zactly ill, you know, but something like a cat, because of her running so much," answered Lionel seriously.

"I don't understand," gasped the gentleman.

"It was nurse said so," explained the child quickly. "She was talking to cook, and she said, 'Miss Helen has run down fast—she's nervous, like a cat.' But I suppose that's because her heart is breaking," he remarked, with a wise little air. "You can't help feeling nervous when your heart's like that, can you?"

"Who said her heart was breaking?" And the gentleman leaned forward, with white face and anxiously strained eyes.

"It was cook told nurse. She said anyone could see her heart was breaking, and she was withering up."

"Withering up?"

"Yes, I know it was 'withering up' she said, 'cause I thought it was like the flowers I gave mother on her birthday. You know she kept them ever so long, but at last she had to throw them away, 'cause they were getting smelly; and she said they was 'withering up'—fading, you know—yes, that's the word. Cook said she was fading away. It's a pity when people begin to fade away, isn't it? Cook said she was the same once. Her heart was almost quite broke, but when Harris sent her some flowers and a 'splanation she stopped fading at once."

He had to pause for breath here, and he gazed at his companion thoughtfully, as if wishing to hear his views on the subject. But the gentleman seemed lost in his own thoughts, whilst the boy continued to study his friend's face.

At last Lionel broke the silence by remarking slowly and emphatically:

"Well, now, I don't think your nose is a bit too big."

The gentleman started. "Who does?" he asked hurriedly. "Aunt Helen?"

"No; it was Henry said that. He said you wouldn't be at all bad-looking if your nose wasn't so big, but he doesn't like the way you part your hair. But don't you worry, Mr. Lynton," and Lionel patted his friend's hand soothingly. "Cook likes the way you do it very much."

"What a comfort!" remarked Mr. Lynton, with an assumed air of relief. "That's very nice of cook."

"Yes, isn't it?" And Lionel beamed a smile of comprehensive sympathy. "Cook's a very nice person."

"You seem to have some interesting talks in the kitchen," remarked his companion, after a short pause. "Do you often pay visits there?"

"Oh, yes; nurse and I generally go in for a talk, when we come back from our afternoon walk. It's very containing sometimes, but I was rather frightened the day Henry got the shock."

"What was that?" inquired the other, with interest.

"Oh, it was when cook was telling about her 'fading away.' Henry said it gave him a shock, and cook oughtn't to have told him so suddenly. It made him quite ill. He was quite red in the face, and making such funny noises in his throat, as if he was choking. He was so bad he said he must take his medicine at once."

"And did that make him better?"

"Oh, yes; and he was very good about it too; he didn't even pinch his nose."

"Why should he?" queried his companion in perplexity.

"Why, don't you know that?" asked Lionel, with wide-open eyes of astonishment. "You just say, 'One, two, three,' and then you take hold of your nose, and pinch hard ; then you swallow down quick, and that takes the nasty taste away. Only sometimes it comes back a little when you leave off pinching. It's best to put a peppermint in your mouth, and suck hard, before you leave off pinching," he remarked advisedly.

"Say, Mr. Lynton," the voice began again, after a short pause, during which Lionel's face had been set in a thoughtful pucker, whilst the gentleman had been gazing abstractedly out of the carriage window, "I wonder, if you was to give Aunt Helen some flowers—like Harris gave cook—if it would stop her fading away too ? Please, won't you try ? I don't want Aunt Helen to fade. And you might give her the other thing too, if you've got one—the 'splanation, you know."

IV.

LIONEL could not understand what all the fuss and excitement was about when the carriage drew up in front of the house. Everyone seemed to want to get hold of him at once, and "Lionel ! Lionel ! " his mother was saying, with a sob in her voice, as she clutched him tightly in her arms.

"What's the matter, mother ? " he asked in perplexity, as he surveyed the red-eyed group of servants standing round. "Has Henry had another shock ? " and he eyed that individual anxiously, who, with face approaching a beetroot in hue, was engaged in the operation of violently blowing his nose.

But Henry did not wait to give any information on the subject. He suddenly seemed to remember duties demanding his immediate attention elsewhere, and departed at once to the offices below, whereto he was at once followed by the female element of those regions.

Lionel's beautiful dark eyes were full of affectionate sympathy as they followed the man's retreating figure.

"I suppose he's gone to take his medicine," he remarked wisely to his mother. Poor Henry, he does get so many shocks ! "

With a flush of excitement on his lovely baby face he related to his mother all his adventures by the way, but before she would let him go he had to promise "Honour bright" that he would not venture into the streets alone again.

He gave the promise reluctantly, but, once given, his mother knew she could rest satisfied.

"It's a great 'sponserlibity,' he remarked gravely, "having to say so many 'Honour brights.' It was the other 'Honour bright' I gave father that made me so much trouble about the letter to Scum, and everything."

"Yes, dearest. It is a responsibility, I know ; and it gives one a great deal of trouble sometimes to keep one's word," she answered, fervently kissing his flushed cheeks, "and I am so glad my Lionel is always true to what he has promised."

"But it was 'Honour bright,' you see," he answered in a matter-of-fact way, "so I couldn't help keeping my word. . . . Why, where is Mr. Lynton, mother ? " he asked, suddenly noting his friend's absence.

"In the study, darling, talking to Aunt Helen," the lady replied, with a pleased look on her gentle face.

The next moment, and before his mother could stop him, the child had bounded across the hall, and stood confronting the two very happy-looking people, who were sitting side by side on a sofa.

"Well, old chap," said the gentleman, taking him on his knee, "I've followed your advice, and given Aunt Helen the explanation, and she has promised me faithfully to stop fading at once."

"Oh, I'm glad—glad ! " returned the boy, with eager, happy, shining eyes. And he knelt on the sofa between the two, and enclosed them together in one long loving embrace.

"Dear, dear little unconscious peacemaker," murmured Aunt Helen lovingly, as she returned his affectionate caresses with interest. "Dear little boy to care so much ! "

"You can't help caring," he returned pensively, "when you see people beginning to fade away. I'm awfully glad Mr. Lynton has stopped the fading," he went on ; "but I suppose "—and an expression of anxiety and doubt flitted over his lovely baby features, "I suppose now you'll soon begin to look like—like cook."

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

ARCHDEACON WILBERFORCE'S TESTIMONY.

IN response to very many requests, Archdeacon Wilberforce's striking paper, "Why I am an Abstainer," which recently appeared in our columns, has been republished in pamphlet form at 1d. per copy, 50 copies for 2s. 9d., and 100 copies for 5s. Orders may be given to any bookseller, or sent direct to the publishers, Messrs. Cassell and Company, La Belle Sauvage, Ludgate Hill, E.C. We trust that Temperance workers will make good use of this telling testimony, which is calculated to be of great service for popular distribution.

"SPEED THE PRESS."

We have so often urged Temperance workers to give increased attention to the use of the Press in their campaign that we need make no apology for introducing a portrait of the editor of the popular Alliance News, the journal which has the largest circulation in Temperance circles. Mr. R. A. Jameson has been identified with the work of the United Kingdom Alliance for the long period of thirty-one years. He was for some time sub-editor of the paper, and on the retirement of Henry Septimus Sutton succeeded to the editorial chair. While recognising that the main object of the journal is to further the special propaganda of the United Kingdom Alliance, Mr. Jameson maintains a thoroughly friendly attitude towards the work of kindred associations, and is always ready to give the hospitality of his columns to every phase of Temperance effort. The editorial chair is by no means a bed of roses, as the vanquished in electoral contests not infrequently attribute their non-success to the influence of the Alliance. It says very much for Mr. Jameson's tact and good humour that he generally manages to smooth over difficulties, and to come up smiling for the next electoral contest. The work of the Alliance owes much of its success to its official newspaper, and it is only right to acknowledge that the executive committee have always recognised this fact. Indeed, in their expenditure on the Press, they have set an example which might well be imitated by others. A glance at the annual report of most Temperance societies, be they large or small, or in town or country, reveals, as a rule, a very paltry disbursement for paper and print.

A WORD IN SEASON

"We will not have a suspensory Bill," was the effective climax to which an eloquent speaker brought his speech on the Government proposals in my hearing. The audience applauded to the echo; then the anti-climax was provided by the secretary, who announced that "after the March meeting we shall adjourn until October." This suspension of Temperance work for six months seems to be the height of folly, and a conspicuous example of "How not to do it." Open-air meetings were very largely interfered with last summer owing to the wet season. Why should not Temperance workers come to the decision to keep their meetings going regularly all the year round, making the proviso that in the summer months, weather permitting, the meetings shall be held in the open-air? There is no recorded instance of a publican closing his place of business for a six months' summer holiday.

THE MAY MEETINGS.

If this should meet the eye of any speakers whose services have been retained for platform duty, may we respectfully suggest that they should "remember not to forget" that the drink traffic has a most important bearing upon nearly every phase of religious and philanthropic effort? One of the most perplexing difficulties of the situation is the apparent indifference of Christian people to the Temperance movement. The work of the preacher, the teacher, the home missionary, the Scripture reader, the Bible woman, is all checked by the drink demon, while the expenditure on our national drink bill is a ghastly comment on the amount contributed for the evangelisation of the world. This appalling fact must be hammered into the heads of those who "profess and call themselves Christians," and the May meetings are an opportunity which we trust some of the speakers will thoroughly well utilise.

THE IMPROVEMENT OF ADVOCACY.

The efforts of the Temperance Collegiate Examination Board to promote and encourage the systematic study of the Temperance question in all its branches deserve every support. The board is unsectarian and non-political in character, and its examinations are open to all sections of the Temperance world. The syllabus at present in use is confined to a "General Science Course" spread over a period of three years. Every student pays an entrance fee of one shilling and sixpence for each examination. Those who obtain certificates in the three years' course, who are abstainers, and over twenty years of age, become members of the Temperance College. Prizes are also awarded, and the examination takes place on the second Monday in June.

A VENERABLE SOCIETY.

The planting of the Temperance movement in Chester is credited to John King, one of "the seven men of Preston," who lived in Chester for a short time, and founded a Temperance society there in 1834. Many well-known workers were associated with this society in its early days, notably Joseph Barker, one of the editors of the Star of Temperance, and a man who for some time allied himself with the Freethought movement. As a result of Barker's defection, the name of the society was altered to that of the Chester Christian Temperance Society, which it still retains. Among some of the leading members of the society may be mentioned Robert Roberts, David Roberts, John Jones, John Randall Williams, and William Farish, who was mayor of the city in 1877–78. Among present-day workers the first place is occupied by Mr. Beresford

MR. BERESFORD ADAMS, PRESIDENT OF CHESTER TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

Adams, the active and energetic president of the society, who has served the association in many capacities during a long series of years. He was born on September 2nd, 1850, and is practically a life abstainer. Mr. Adams is an excellent speaker, and makes a capital chairman, his fund of good stories being much appreciated by a popular audience. He wields the pen of a ready writer, and has written many Temperance hymns and songs, some of which have attained wide popularity. The society's Temperance Hall in George Street is a centre of aggressive Temperance work in the ancient city, and the various indoor meetings are well attended in the winter; while in the summer months considerable attention is given to outdoor work.

CHESTER TEMPERANCE HALL.

SHORT ARROWS

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

A Sunbeam and its Counterfeit.

IT was said of Monckton Milnes, the poet: "Whenever he comes into the room everybody is in better humour with everybody else." One like this, who comes to us as a sunbeam, is as useful as the butcher and the baker. A visit from a bright, sympathetic friend is better to a sick person than medicine. Most good things, however, have their counterfeits, and there is a cheerfulness which is desolating because the troubles of other persons do not disturb its possessor, an optimism which irritates because it refuses to acknowledge unpleasant truths.

The Religious Tract and Book Society of Scotland.

IF ever a century could claim to bring forth fruit in old age, it was the eighteenth. Religious societies and charities, which have proved a blessing to the whole world, appeared in bud or blossom just as its end drew near, and it bequeathed them to the young and hopeful nineteenth century. One of the number, a hardy Caledonian, has just celebrated its 110th birthday. The Religious Tract and Book Society of Scotland lives and grows. It derives its sustenance from three sources—subscriptions, profit from sale of books, and the revenue arising from the depository in Edinburgh. The depository supports itself honourably by trade; it does more: it helps to maintain the colportage—the largest part of the work of the Religious Tract and Book Society of Scotland. A peddler with his pack is an old and picturesque institution, but a member of the fraternity who only peddles in Bibles and good books belongs to a modern and reading age. The chief scenes of the colporteurs' enterprise are remote districts where they may be the only evangelists. One climbs the hills of the Orkney Islands; another shoulders his pack and makes friends with crofters, shepherds, and ploughmen in Perthshire; a third, by means of a tricycle, manages to make on an average over 700 visits a month in Dumfriesshire. So the Word of God runs very quickly, penetrating into homes which perhaps no other agency could reach.

THE COLPORTEUR AT THE DOOR.

A Dawn before the Dawn.

TRAVELLERS who have scaled the awful heights of the Himalayas describe a spectacle which is rare and sublime. Before the real dawn, at an hour when the stars are still shining in the dim arch of heaven, and when the world beneath is wrapped in shadows, peak beyond peak along the mighty chain is lit with a faint, weird radiance—a foreglow of the Indian sun's intolerable and comprehensive glory. This Himalayan image may be applied to the progressive and ever-brightening revelations of Holy Scripture. In the Old Testament mountain peaks dimly illuminated stand out.

We may call them persons, such as Elijah, Melchizedek, David, or we may call them places, such as Bethlehem or Sion. But in the New Testament the sun of righteousness rises, and by its unclouded beams we behold Him in Whom were united the three offices of Prophet, Priest, and King. We forget that Rachel was buried near Bethlehem, whose golden destiny the later voice of Micah foretold, when we hear the song of the angels over its fields on the night that the Saviour was born. We have no eyes for the magnificence of the Solomonian or Herodian structure on Mount Sion in His presence Who said, "In this place is One greater than the Temple." Type is merged in reality, and allusion or prediction in fulfilment. The true Dawn has risen along the Himalayan peaks of prophecy.

THE COLPORTEUR AT WORK (p. 638).

A History for the People.

A WIDESPREAD demand deserves a ready response, and the Dean of Gloucester's popular History of the Church of England has accordingly begun to appear in fortnightly numbers at the moderate price of 6d. each. The new issue is fully—we might say lavishly—illustrated, and the engravings almost form in themselves an eloquent pictorial record. Of the letterpress there is no need for us to speak; the readers of this magazine are already familiar with the charm of the Dean's style, and the uncompromising honesty and truth which are so characteristic of his pen.

Not Divided in Death.

Two funerals, one that of a Church of England man, the other that of a Wesleyan, met lately at a cemetery. As the graves were alongside of each other, and as some of the mourners wished to go away soon, it was suggested that the two bodies should be buried with the same service, the Church of England clergyman reading the prayers out of the Prayer Book, and the Nonconformist minister the lesson. One stickler for religious conventionality suggested that there are divisions in the Church. To this it was replied that there need not be divisions in the churchyard.

Successful Failure.

AN Emperor of China, belonging to an ancient dynasty, missed a shot with his bow at some wild geese because, as a deaf and blind peasant got in the way, he could not discharge the arrow. He was very angry, and spoke of having the peasant put to death. A sporting companion said: "Don't kill a man because game is wanting. A king must not be as savage as the beasts that he hunts." His Majesty, recovering from his anger, smiled, and took the arm of his counsellor to re-enter his carriage. On returning empty-handed, he said: "I have had a very successful day, for instead of bringing home a good bag I have had a good lesson." So it is that we ought not to consider anything in life an evil if it has helped to make us wise unto salvation. If the Lord Jesus Christ, our example of godly life, learned from the things He suffered, so should we.

"I Saves my Pint."

IT is comforting to reflect that, besides measures of direct and aggressive Temperance reform, there are subsidiary aids towards the gradual mitigation of the drink evil. Electric trams have lately been started in a Midland manufacturing town of moderate size, and a conversation in one of the luxurious cars will serve to illustrate the sort of thing we mean. "I wonder, John, how men like you, who have a wife and family to keep on a wage of twenty shillings a week, can afford to ride a couple of miles each day to and from your work?" "Well, sir, it comes out like this, do you see? When I walked it, I wanted half a pint of beer at the start, and, as often as not, another half-pint at the end, or, to buck me up a bit, when I had got half-way. There was threepence, and the tram is a penny; and I enjoys my ride, and I saves my pint!" Here is sound logic and finance. We happen to be acquainted with a public-house which lies upon the line of route of these particular trams, and its receipts have been £15 less weekly since the town was benefited by this cheap and rapid means of locomotion.

QUESTIONS.

61. In what way did Jesus prepare Himself for the Transfiguration?

62. What appears to have been the object of the Transfiguration?

63. What was one of the difficulties, as we learn from St. Peter, which the apostles had in accepting Jesus as the Messiah?

64. Our blessed Lord bade the seventy disciples, when on their missionary journey, to "salute no man by the way." Where in the Old Testament do we find a similar injunction?

65. How does the journey of the seventy disciples show us the large amount of visiting and preaching carried out by our blessed Lord?

66. What power was given to the seventy disciples by which to show forth the importance of their mission?

67. By what illustration does Jesus teach us the readiness of God to answer real, earnest prayer?

68. Quote passage in which Jesus teaches us how to pray.

69. What must be the character of our prayer in order that we may obtain God's blessing?

70. In what way does Jesus teach us the necessity of being prepared for His second coming?

71. What reply did Jesus give to St. Peter as to the duty of watchfulness?

72. What lesson do we learn from our Lord's instruction concerning His second coming?

HOW THOMAS HARLEY DIED.

VESSEL ON FIRE IN FALMOUTH HARBOUR, WITH MISSIONS TO SEAMEN DINGHEY ALONGSIDE

OUR NEW MISSIONARY VENTURE.

To all Readers of "The Quiver."

HAT terrible gale! For three days it raged. The wind screamed in chimneys, it howled through passages, it shook giant trees until their branches snapped and chattered, and their trunks fell broken and uprooted. The great North Sea roared like an army of hungry lions. The waves sprang upon the Northumbrian shore all brown and yellow with the sand and pebbles which they tossed into their foam.

The short November day closes. But one little company of men in South Shields have no thought of sleep. Members of the Volunteer Life-Saving Brigade go to the watch-house and prepare for a busy night. Some are on the look-out, whilst others take care that a fire, hot tea, coffee, and everything needful shall be ready in case injured or half-drowned seamen are brought in from wrecks. It is pitch dark; snow, sleet, sand, all seem to blow at once.

A cry of alarm arises; three vessels are driving helplessly ashore. Off start the brigade to the rescue. Young lads, quite new to the work; experienced men, quite alive to the danger; all, without one exception, turn out of their warm homes, although there is no thought or chance of pay or reward.

Foremost amongst them are two chaplains of the Mission to Seamen on the Tyne. Lanterns and rockets show three companies, one at each wreck, standing for more than an hour together up to their waists in water. They shoot a line over the helpless vessel. The sailors catch it, fasten the end to the mast, and haul in a hawser, or stout rope attached to it, which is passed through the ring of a breeches life-buoy. One by one the shipwrecked men get into the canvas bag or breeches fastened to the life-buoy, slipping their legs through the two holes for security. Then comes a giddy voyage through air, and perhaps through crested waves, as strong arms on shore pull in the life-line.

Can the brigade hold out and stand their ground? The question arises from anxious watchers, who know well that not long ago the waves dragged away stalwart men from the very place where those dark figures are stationed. For two nights they fight a good fight with the storm; they never give in until no more remains to be done.

By ten o'clock the first night thirty-one rescued seamen sit round the fire in the watch-house. How happy and thankful the poor fellows look—safe, warm, cared-for, and with friends at hand, though some are strangers to the coast, and some can only speak a foreign tongue! Hearts and voices sing for gladness in seamen's homes and fishermen's cottages when at last the gale is over; for about 133 men have been rescued on the North-East coast alone. But bitter tears are shed as well, because as many are missing. And who can tell how many more have been swept away around the shores of Great Britain? Life afloat is full of danger. On an average, forty seamen of the Merchant Service and ten fishermen meet with sudden death in every week.

Yet, with all its perils, it is the chosen calling of thousands of British boys. Many a lad would rather wear a blue jersey than a purple velvet coat. "He little knows what lies before him," says an old salt with a grim smile. "Not every young sailor can serve on a fine liner. What about a tramp steamer as a cradle of the deep? Will he like being rocked to sleep, eating and living in the forecastle with eleven others in a space hardly large enough for four? Will he find the company cheerful when bad food, bad tobacco mixed with the smell of the engine, make summer seem harder to bear than the biting winter?" The chance of seeing the wonders of the great world nerves an enterprising spirit to brave hardships. Glowing visions of coral islands and icy mountains are not to be obliterated by grey pictures. Life on deck when the blue sea catches sparks from the sun, or gleams silvery beneath moon and stars, will make up for hardships below, which, after all, the old salt has been able to outlive. As for bad weather, it will give him his chance of showing his mettle. This, at least, is true. Every storm discovers deeds of British pluck. Both England and Ireland had their tales to tell after that terrible gale of November, 1901. The hero of one was a fine young boatman on the staff of the Missions to Seamen in Cork Harbour.

A Humble Hero.

Thomas Harley chose to be a sailor. He was man enough to endure discomforts and to gain promotion. He obtained a berth on the Messenger, where he had no fear of living in miserable conditions under a hard captain.

THE OLD MISSION BOAT ON THE TYNE.

(To be replaced by the first QUIVER row-boat.)

Never had the Messenger lost a man by any accident, though for more than thirty-six years she had braved wind and weather in the roadstead of Queenstown and in Cork Harbour. Her blue flag, with a flying angel holding the Everlasting Gospel, proclaimed her the friend of all whose business was upon the great waters.

But the men to whom she brought welcome visitors and comforts missed her for two days. Her chief boatman ran her into shelter, for he knew that she was not so fit as in days gone by to bear the battering of the gale. When it fell slightly, she spread her wings and flew on an errand of mercy.

(By permission of the Missions to Seamen.)

THE OLD MISSIONS TO SEAMEN BOAT FOR THE RIVER ORWELL AND HARWICH HARBOUR.

The magnet which drew her from her moorings was a ship at anchor. Some of the crew had asked to buy Bibles. Their captain had gone ashore when the chaplain had boarded her before the gale, and they had been obliged to wait for permission to spend their wages. They might weigh anchor at any moment. Rough or smooth, merchant ships come and go; if for only a few months they should cease to bring supplies of food, our islands would be in a condition of starvation. The Mission schooner seized the opportunity of taking the men their Bibles, and they made their purchases. Last thanks were given, last good-byes were bidden; and Thomas Harley's last service on earth for God and man was done.

The Messenger returned in safety, but heavily laden with sad tidings. She had lost her active and willing young boatman. In the moment when the two vessels had parted he had been jerked overboard, and efforts to save him had failed. Thomas Harley had been called aloft in the midst of duty; he had died a sailor's death. But could the accident have been prevented? Inquiries brought out the fact that the schooner was old and weather-beaten, and no longer so safe and fit for service as she had been.

The Messenger has since then held on bravely for more than two years. She has been battered and patched by turns; but a time comes for the most gallant vessel to furl her sails and rest, and this one has earned repose. During thirty-six years, in connection with the Seamen's Institute at Cork, she has been the means of selling to seamen 28,999 Bibles in thirty-one different languages, besides 5,775 Prayer Books in sixteen languages. Is this work to cease? Queenstown Harbour and Falmouth are the two principal ports of call. This means that there is no other place where so many cargo boats anchor and wait for orders. One, laden with tea, for instance, shelters in the roadstead or outer harbour, and her owner telegraphs to Mark Lane, London, to inquire where to find the best market. A reply may arrive from Hull, Liverpool, or some other port within a few hours or after a few weeks. The time of waiting gives workers for the Missions to Seamen their opportunity.

Wet days are fine days for a call. In pouring rain the vessel with the blue flag draws up alongside and the chaplain asks the chief officer's leave to step aboard and see the men. By all means, is the general reply. The men have nothing to do, the weather forbids their painting the ship, and the mate will be only too glad to find them some occupation. Many of them are ready to give a cheer of recognition. An absolute repulse is rare, though every variety of creed, race, and character prevails in the ships. Here is one under the command of a Missions to Seamen helper—a member of a volunteer band of at least 700 seamen who have pledged themselves to promote godly living on the high seas according to the doctrines of Holy Scripture. Peace and good feeling reign here from stem to stern. Throughout the long voyage not one case of desertion has been reported. At a signal from the captain, all hands assemble for a service of thanksgiving. To those who go down to the sea in ships, see God's wonders in the deep, and learn to cry unto Him in their trouble, religion is a great reality. They raise their voices in hymns of praise with a fervour and reverence which leave little doubt that they readily confess that the Ruler of the Sea has piloted them to their desired haven.

Here is another merchantman, which for eighteen months has known no mention of God's Name except when taken in vain. And a round-faced, smiling Eskimo from Labrador. If he wears a tricoloured ribbon, he will point to the stripes, and explain that they are the sign of his triple pledge: "No drink; no smoke; no swear." Mohammedans, faithful to their worship of the One God and careful to kneel regularly on their prayer carpets; Hindus wearing the precious scarlet thread which distinguishes them as the twice-born Brahmans, and therefore to be reverenced by their brethren of lower caste; Lascars and various Pagans openly confess their faith; the God of the Christians alone seems to be forgotten. These sailors of different creeds, races, and tongues, are united under the British flag, and own one common brotherhood, as sinners needing the same Saviour; and they depend on voluntary effort to bring them near to Him. No chaplains are provided for the Mercantile Marine, and harbours are outside any parishes. Waterside churches and districts have usually more than they can do to shepherd the landsmen without taking up extra burdens, for the wreckage of humanity drifts down to dock labour. The all this while some hearts have been longing to know how they might find Him. The next call is on a ship with a crew consisting largely of foreigners. Amongst the most consistent Christians are hardy Norsemen, who buy more Bibles than any other seamen, and now and then best will and the best organisation on shore could not cope with overpowering numbers. Between 2,000 and 3,000 vessels enter Falmouth in a year. About one-third of these are long-voyage ships, and wait in the roadstead until they receive orders to proceed to a port of discharge. The Missions at Falmouth and Queenstown, though each possesses distinctive characteristics, bear a close resemblance to one another. Both can call ancient history to witness to their importance.

How long Queenstown Harbour has been a haven for ships hailing from the uttermost parts of the known earth it is impossible to say—perhaps since four centuries before Christ. Tacitus wrote in A.D. 97 that the approaches to Ireland were better known in his days through the far greater safety to all concerned. He need not wait for wind, tide, or swelling seas. He escapes the vexatious delay of being shut up in a becalmed cutter, perhaps for weeks, whilst he is wanted here, there, and everywhere. Meanwhile, little tugs puff past him with an air of insolent conceit, and mighty steamers leave the port bearing away thousands of souls, some on their last voyage. The marvellous power of machinery enables a mission vessel to run alongside the ships in both fair and foul

"THE GOOD HOPE."

(The Tees Mission steamer, which cost £1,500 in 1903. A similar vessel, but with motor or oil power, and not steam, to cost £1,500, is what is required for Cork Harbour.)

merchantmen than those of England. If Roman slaves brought tidings to Ireland of the Prophet of Galilee Who ruled even the winds and waves, their toil at the weary oar was glorified into labour for God. The winds and the waves now spread England's influence for good or evil throughout the world, for there is no port where her ships do not touch and trade. Sailors who profess and call themselves Christians, if true to their profession, are involuntary missionaries; if unworthy of the Name they bear, their example makes the Cross of Christ of none effect, and drags the honour of the British flag in the dust.

It is good to sing—

> "Waft, waft, ye winds, His story,
> And you, ye waters, roll,"

it is well to press all the powers of Nature into their Creator's service. The stormy wind fulfils His word; but so do fire and water, and the two combined as steam cause it to run very swiftly. A chaplain with a steam launch at his command can visit three times as many vessels as one who depends on a sailing yacht, and with weather. Boilers are good servants to sailors, but modern science can dispense with them whilst bringing fire and oil together into subjection in the form of a motor. A boat supplied with one is ready for action whilst her fire-and-water sister requires an hour to get up steam before starting, and must be allowed time to let it off when her work is done. A motor has not the same hunger for coal, nor constant thirst for water, nor heavy machinery with an insatiable appetite for grease. She costs, indeed, far less to feed, and is as swift on water as a motor carriage is on land.

A Ringing Appeal.

A cry resounds over the waters: "Save us, we perish!" Not only an agonised cry of short-lived seamen who pass away daily beyond the reach of human help, but from men whose souls are drifting away to certain destruction for want of a hand stretched out to save them. The call for a boat rings with such loud insistence from Cork Harbour that it reaches through THE QUIVER to the uttermost parts of the earth.

Proposed "Quiver" Mission Vessel.

£350 would suffice to supply a sailing vessel like the worn-out Messenger, but a motor launch would be more effective, and better worth while from every point of view. It would cost from £1,000 to £1,500. When readers of this Magazine heard of a plea for a lifeboat, they raised at once enough to buy, not one, but five, lifeboats, which together cost five times the amount wanted for a motor launch. There is every reason to believe that they will prove as worthy as ever of confidence in their will and power to meet the present necessity. It will be to their honour, as well as to the glory of God, that a vessel bearing the name of The Quiver should be fleet, strong, safe, and suitable. Collecting cards accompany each Number of this Magazine. Need any of them be lost?

The Children's Mission Row-boats.

Young hearts are open, and young ears keen, to catch a cry for help. Children are asked to make a gift of their own to the Missions to Seamen. On the occasion when our Lord used a boat on the Lake of Galilee, and replied to the cry, "Save us, we perish!" there were "other little ships" in the wake of His. Small as well as great vessels are required for His service. At the present time there is work under the blue flag which only row-boats can do. The Mission steamer Eirene can accomplish feats beyond the power of any other vessel. She is a church for seamen who can reach no other, and a home for chaplains and readers where they learn by experience the needs of sailors. But only "little ships" can come close to the smaller craft without causing them danger.

The children's gift will be, if possible, ten Mission row-boats. The cost of each one, as good and complete of its kind as may be, will be £25. The Editor is happy to say that THE QUIVER will launch this enterprise by contributing the first of these row-boats. It will be put in hand at once, and given to the Mission on the Tyne. That place of strong tides and risks to life, of strong courage to do and dare when there is a shout, "To the rescue!" is to have the one known as Quiver No. 1.

This boat and any that follow will be launched with the confident hope that they may be used to God's glory for years to come. Boys daily enter the Mercantile Marine. It is not the will of God that one of them should perish, but rather that they should "follow the Light, and do the Right." God alone knows how far their failures may lie to the charge of His favoured servants, who are blind to the signal of distress. He also knows the joy and reward that lies before the rescued and the rescuers when at last the storms of life are over and they meet together, safe Home in Port.

[The Mission Fleet which it is thus proposed to repair and reinforce is ably worked by the Missions to Seamen, of which the King is Patron, and Vice-Admiral H.R.H. the Prince of Wales Vice-Patron. By this Fleet, which may well be designated "The Lord's Navy," the Gospel in all its simplicity and fulness is brought to millions of sea-faring men of all races, nations, and tongues. This beautiful and necessary work speaks for itself so eloquently that we are confident our readers will heartily co-operate in the enterprise which is here ready to their hand.

The publishers of THE QUIVER, in order to assist this Fund, have generously offered to present to every reader who gives or collects the sum of half-a-guinea, a beautiful copy of Mr. Holman Hunt's celebrated picture, "The Light of the World." A further reference to this valuable gift will appear in our next issue.—ED. QUIVER.]

THE MISSIONS TO SEAMEN BOAT, "HENRY H. PARKER," FOR THE SHIPPING IN QUEENSTOWN HARBOUR.

THE KINDLY CAPTAIN COURIER.

By the Rev. Frederick Hastings.

"Julius treated Paul kindly, and gave him leave to go unto his friends and refresh himself [or, to receive attention]."—Acts xxvii. 3 (R.V.).

JULIUS was probably a "legionary" centurion on detached service, between the Emperor and his armies in the provinces. He was an officer courier, one of the well-known "troop of the Emperor," and may have ranked with an officer of a crack regiment, one which answered to the "King's Own" of this day, the Imperial Augustan cohort. He was, anyhow, also a gentleman in feeling; he was like several other centurions who are mentioned in the New Testament as being devout and considerate men—the one who built a synagogue, and was so humble that he said he was not worthy to receive Christ under his roof; or another who said, as he stood by the cross when Christ was dying, "Truly this was the Son of God"; or Cornelius, whose "alms came up before God." Julius had the same courteous manner of another, who, through the revelation by a youth of a plot of the Jews to kill Paul, acted rapidly to secure the safety of the apostle. This Julius had to take Paul to Rome as a prisoner, and was answerable for him with his life, yet he gave the apostle leave, when the ship stopped at Sidon, to go to his friends and get whatever of cheer he could, by association and interchange of thought with them. He might stand to us for an example of that thoughtfulness for others which should characterise every man. Julius had had a pagan training, but he acted in a most Christian manner.

All Christians are not thoughtful for others. They do not provide that which is necessary for the refreshing of others. Some are careless, and wound their associates. They forget that "evil is wrought by want of thought, as well as want of heart." This neglect in the Church often leads to rancorous bitterness and divisions. In the family, alas! it often leads to most terrible mischief, to chronic unrest, and to constant recriminations. Thoughtlessness will lead to a tornado that will seem to shake the whole house. The thoughtless seem at times to have their tongues dipped in adder's poison. They speak carelessly and harshly, remark on every movement of others, exposing anything they consider wrong. They are often indifferent to the shame or pain they may cause. Gangrene grows, passion rises which none can quell; meal-times sometimes become seasons of inquisitorial torture; while night, through thoughtlessness, sees pillows often soaked with tears of vengeful annoyance. The imperious and tyrannous tone intensely irritates. By reproaches and reprimands discontent and fretfulness are fostered. Young people, too, can unceasingly plague each other. Threats, insinuations, names, and abuse fly to and fro like a shuttlecock. Grudges gather. Keen watches are kept for chances of reprisal. Fiery words are often belched forth that scarify and rankle. Family love changes to family feud, hearts are broken, and home life is darkened, all by thoughtlessness.

To live together thoughtfully in the home needs more care than many imagine, especially when the members cease to be children. Near relationship is often the excuse for careless selfishness, for jibes at well-known weaknesses, for taunts at some slip, or for inflicting a deeper stab to some heart-sore member of the family. There is then anything but "rest" and "refreshment" in the family.

Those who can be very considerate for people outside the family circle are often cruel to members within, showing the worst side of their characters to those who hold to them the closest relationship. If such chance to be accounted Christians, they do endless damage to the cause of Christ. And some sections of the Church show their worst side to those who are nearest to them in creed and church government. Little points of difference are built up into walls of severest isolation. The good work done by one is minimised or misrepresented by another. Hindrances are put in the way of advance. Overlapping takes place, godly efforts are ignored, and the Great Master pained.

Thank God, a better and broader spirit has been manifest of late! Men are seeing that religion is deeper than verbal creeds, and that loyalty to Christ may consist with observances apparently most diverse. All this is hopeful for the future. Not only so, but in the present it brings a great sense of rest and refreshment. We go on over the ocean of life, and the very fact that, although we may be as "ships that pass in the night," we can show a flag or a flare of recognition is a source of strength. How refreshing it must have been to Paul to have met with one like Julius! How unexpected such kindness!

Kindliness seems to have become a habit of this Roman officer. We see that he found Paul had not abused the liberty granted, and so he was led to be more considerate still. Circumstances later on led to a still greater test of this habitual thoughtfulness. See how he acted when great peril threatened all. Read the record in Acts xxvii. 43.

Paul wanted to see Rome, but he little thought how he would have to approach it. His life was arranged in a fashion most startling to himself. The proud and zealous Pharisee was now going to Rome a prisoner! Nor was his voyage smooth. It was no mere yachting sail round an island. The ship in which he had to voyage was a corn-laden galley, and was caught in a terrible Levanter. Wearisome days and nights were passed, until at length the anchors were cast out of the stern, pulling up the ship close to breakers and rocks. Here they waited, wishing for daylight. With the dawn the land appeared. The crew and passengers try to secure their escape, but the prisoners, what of them? The soldiers say, "We must kill them, for we shall be answerable for them with our lives if any escape."

But the commanding officer, who wants to save Paul, is heard to say, "Think of what we owe to one of the prisoners, Paul. How he helped to save our lives, helped to inspire us with hope when despair was seizing us in the boat. Common gratitude demands the sparing of such a man." And the voice of the centurion prevailed. Hear him, "Now men, save yourselves who can. Swim, if you are able. If you cannot swim, seize something that will float you to land."

Listen to the rapid unshackling of fetters instead of the slaying of the defenceless. Oh, what a clattering there must have been suddenly of chains falling on that deck! Paul is free to swim or clutch some spar that may bear him to land. Directly the ship was beached he doubtless flung himself over the bulwark and seized something that swept him on shore. How he must have thanked God for a kindly official in power, as well as for his wonderful deliverance from the waves!

Not always is such thoughtfulness backed by will-power as it was in Julius. Fortunately, he had determination as well as gentleness. He little knew what good he was doing; how future ages would be grateful to him for helping, under God, to preserve the life of a man invaluable to the world.

It was after this that Paul wrote some epistles that have been treasures of untold wealth to the Church. We owe this in part to Julius. He thus helped the Christian faith. He helped Christ. Glorious privilege to be permitted to help Christ in the work He is carrying on in the world! Paul may have helped to develop this thoughtfulness in Julius. The centurion had evidently come under the influence of Paul even before they left Adramyttium, and formed a very high estimate of him. Paul at that time would appear as an insignificant man in stature, a very ordinary sort of man, even as one who was merely an unaccountable fanatic; but Julius saw there was something more than usual in that Jew. In talking with him, he would be struck by his balanced brain, by his fearless and yet modest demeanour, and above all by his attachment to One he called "Lord," One Whom he asserted had risen from the dead, and Who was the secret of his life's power. The gospel lived by the apostle produced the fruit of considerateness in the pagan. What a joy to Paul it must have been to have been a spiritual help to such a man! If the rest of his companions were rather uncongenial, here was one who answered to his craving for fellowship, and was willing to receive his teachings. They would have talks together and strengthen each other in all good things, in resolve to do the right and to keep faith in Him Who quickens and saves. Probably Julius came to believe in Jesus. He was certainly included in the promise of the angelic messenger, "Lo, God hath granted thee all them that sail with thee." The centurion vanishes from our sight, but his influence remains. Possibly the Julia mentioned in the Epistle to the Romans was his wife, and yet we may not build too much on the similarity of names.

Remember that Julius by his thoughtfulness saved Paul, and he was himself saved from wreckage. There was One Who saved him and saved others, One Who would not save Himself. Christ went to death that we might have life. His love was unbounded. It was as if Julius had said to the harassed, frenzied soldiery in the ship, "Kill me, but let Paul go; let all these go."

UNCLE ABE.

IT was Uncle Abe who married them. You see, there was nobody else to do it; and, if there had been, the young folks would just have stuck to Uncle Abe. Whether you wanted to be christened, or married, or buried, you always sent for Uncle Abe; and when folks were sick or in trouble, you would be sure to see Uncle Abe's buggy standing outside the door—and a rough kind of thing it was, for Uncle Abe had to be his own carriage repairer, if not carriage builder, and there was very little of the original left. He made his own harness, cut from a cow hide. Everybody did that much—felled the timber, and built the house, and roofed it with shingles; but it was Uncle Abe who could mend your furniture, and set your plough right, and cure your aches, and cobble your shoes, and held that nothing was worn out so long as it could be kept together by a bit of leather or a strip of bark.

He lived in what was then counted the backwoods of Canada, a place now as civilised as any old-fashioned town at home, where the latest advertisements cover the walls, and the latest fashions fill the drapery stores, and three daily papers record the latest news or invent it, as the case may be, availing themselves of the opportunity of contradicting it all in to-morrow's issue. But in the 'forties of the last century it was a wild spot, where there were so many wolves that nobody could keep a sheep. The old folks still tell how that, looking out of a window on a frosty night, they often saw a pack of wolves leaping over the logs and sniffing about the place. Here it was that a few hardy settlers had made a clearing and built each his wooden shanty. And here they lived their lives, rough and hard, but healthy and happy; and, however little they owned, it was all their own, which made it so much.

Uncle Abe was not exactly a minister. He never gave up business, and no man amongst them worked harder. His enterprise undertook much more than the care of his farm. He put his yoke of oxen to the waggon and drove ninety miles to Hamilton, carrying the skins that he had purchased from the trappers, and bringing home such things as tinware and earthenware, shoes and saddlery, stoves and drapery goods, which were collected in a lean-to at the side of his house, where the customers might call and get what they wanted.

A busy man indeed was Uncle Abe. In the springtime every maple tree was tapped for sugar, and everybody in the family went hurrying to and fro with pails, and poured the luscious liquid into the boiler that stood in the clearing, or stayed a moment to thrust a log into the fire to keep the pot boiling. In a good season he made as much as a thousand pounds of sugar, and sold it in exchange for wool, which the women of those days could card and spin and weave into blankets and shawls and dresses.

Now it was partly, perhaps, because he was so busy a man, always about hither and thither, that they gave him so much more to do. Partly because of that, but mostly because everybody knew him to be a good man. He was big and strong and utterly fearless, fearing God and then fearing nothing and nobody. Hard and narrow, it may be, in the view of some, when he found the evil doer, but all kindness and goodness when he came to deal with the sick and suffering. So it was that he was ordained a deacon in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He gathered the scattered population together in house or barn for preaching services. He baptised the babies, and married the couples, and buried the dead, and preached the funeral sermons, and did as much good as any Right Reverend Father in God. Payment for his services was mostly in kind. The sweet sentiment of lovers whose bliss was consummated by marriage found a grateful acknowledgment in the gift of a bear skin, and the peaceful burial of some old saint was requited by the skin of a wild wolf.

This was Uncle Abe, who married Dick Brimacombe to Jessie MacDonald, and, although they have all passed away, there stands to this day the maple tree under whose branches the bride and bridegroom stood on that memorable day.

II.

WHAT CAME OF A PARING-BEE.

DICK BRIMACOMBE, they said, would never marry; he was not a marrying man. That he was thirty-five years old, and had not sought a wife, was quite enough to settle the matter in the minds of the maidens who met at church or on the few and simple occasions when the settlers gathered at some festivity. He had come, a little lad, with his father and mother from the West country at home before he could remember. Indeed, there was but one memory that filled his boyhood's days; beside that all else was lost, behind that nothing seemed to lie.

It was one day in winter, when he was some twelve or thirteen years of age, that he had gone with his father into the woods to fetch the logs for fuel, a thing sorely needed where the cold often sank below zero. Dick's work was to drive the horses home with the load on the sleigh, and merrily rang his voice and the crack of his whip in the still and frosty air. On one of these journeys, as he drove along the rough track, a wolf ran from the bush and galloped snarling at his side. The horses, terrified, rushed madly away, and Dick had to hang on with all his might to keep from being flung off. The beast kept trying to leap upon him, and sprang, hideous with bloodshot eyes and open mouth from which the specks of foam flew as it ran, every now and then snapping its cruel teeth madly. Then suddenly an arrow from an unseen hand fled straight at the beast and killed it instantly. An Indian to whom they had shown some kindness had caught sight of it, and thus saved the lad. It was a mad wolf that had broken away from the rest of the pack and roamed by itself—a creature far more fierce than any other, since the venom of its madness meant that the least touch of its teeth—and some said even the scratch of its claw—meant certain death, and that perhaps the most terrible death that a man can die.

The Indian hastened to tell the father of the son's peril and escape, and as they returned together to the place where the dead wolf lay Dick joined them.

"Well," said the old man, when he had heard the story from both of them, and given the Indian all the tobacco he had, "we will have his skin, anyhow. He shall do some good now he is dead, which is more than he did when alive. The boy shall have that for his own."

Taking out the knife that hung from his belt, he proceeded to skin the beast. But he was all unmindful that his hands were chapped with the cold. It cost him his life. A fortnight later he died of hydrophobia.

From that hour the boy became a man. His was all the hard work of the place; his the burden of anxiety in the struggle to live. And bravely he carried his load. Utterly absorbed in his work, he grew old before his time, and as he passed through the years of his early manhood life had no room for sentiment, no leisure for love, except in the tender care and unceasing devotion which he showed to his mother.

The life of those days in those parts was by no means lacking in opportunity for courtship. No hired help could be had then, and the neighbours gathered at each other's houses in turn to lend a hand at all that required any extra help. And on such occasions Dick Brimacombe came gladly enough to do his share of work. There was a Raising-bee, when a man wanted to put up a barn, and every neighbour brought a horse or a yoke of oxen to drag the timber and then help to put it in its place. There was a Logging-bee, when they gathered to bring the logs to the fire, and made ready the potash, the only thing for which they got paid in cash; all else was a matter of barter. There was the Paring-bee, when they made ready the apples and pumpkins for winter use.

Such occasions were always finished by a great supper, at which as many as fifty or sixty guests would gather, and this was followed by all kinds of merry games. Then they drove home in waggons or sleighs. But Dick Brimacombe seldom stayed to supper, and never to the merry-making afterwards. There was nobody else to see to the cows and to set things right for the night, and his mother sat by the lonely fireside; so before anybody knew it he was gone. Little wonder the maidens had come to think of him as not a marrying man.

But old Mrs. Brimacombe had died, and there had come changes that quickly told on Dick. The evenings were long and lonely as he sat now after supper when the day's work was done, and there was nobody to cook his victuals and to see to his buttons. A hundred discomforts began to meet him which only a woman's hand could set right, if he could but find the one that suited him, one who could do all these matters as his mother had done.

The chance soon came, and Dick took it eagerly. It was at a Paring-bee, where the neighbours for half a dozen miles around had come together to pare and prepare the apples for the winter. It was as pretty a sight as one could wish to see—the men busy picking the ruddy apples from the trees and filling the baskets, then emptying them in piles where the groups of maidens sat laughing and chatting merrily, one skilfully peeling the apples, another quartering them, whilst yet another threaded the pieces with a needle on a fine string some yard or two long, these later to festoon the kitchen and thus be dried for winter use. The fallen leaves of the trees already littered the orchard, whilst the maple stood ablaze with gold and deepest crimson hues.

Amongst the girls was one more quiet than the rest, to whom Dick Brimacombe brought his basket more than once, and then lingered watching her hands as skilfully and swiftly she pared the apples. If it had been any other of the men, there would certainly have been some laughing pleasantry about it, but it was only Dick, and nobody took any notice of him—nobody, that is, except Jessie MacDonald herself. She, seated on the ground, her lap full of apples, turned her head and met the eager look of Dick, and at once had read the secret. With a blush on her cheek, she bent her face low down, and went on more busily with her work.

Then Dick flung himself down at her side. "Let me help you," he laughed, and, taking an apple out of her lap, he began to eat it. The others looked; but there, it was only Dick Brimacombe, and he did not count from a girl's standpoint.

The early supper was over, and all were taking part in the games. Dick, unused to games and awkward at merry-making had strolled away into the orchard again. The great harvest moon was rising over the distant woods. Presently he caught sight of Jessie leaning against a fence watching the moon rise. He little guessed how hardly she was trying not to think of what filled all her thoughts. His coming startled her. He was at her side before she had caught sight of him. For a few moments they stood in silence.

"I want to have a Paring-bee," said Dick.

Jessie said nothing, only turned her head towards him, hoping that he had not seen the blush that filled her face, and glad to notice that he was looking at the moon.

"I guess it would be a new kind of Paring-bee, too."

Jessie looked up with a questioning wonder.

"I am only going to ask one—a sort of Queen Bee," Dick went on.

Jessie's eyes fell, and she grasped the fence nervously.

"And when she comes I want her to stay and see the apples dried, and then to cook them, and help to eat them too."

Jessie beat the fence timidly with her foot. Then Dick slipped his arm in hers. "Jessie, will you be my Queen Bee?" The little hand slipped into Dick's big ones. For a minute there was silence, except as the crickets chirped in noisy chorus; but Dick heard the words, almost whispered, "Do you mean it, Dick?" Then he sealed the bargain with a kiss, and it was settled.

"We shall have to be quick about it," said Dick, as they came to the house again. "Apples won't keep long this season, I'm afraid."

So Dick Brimacombe was going to be married.

III.

THE WEDDING.

IT was within a very few weeks of the Paring-bee that there came the wedding. There was no need for delay, and Dick thought there was much need for haste; so they had seen Uncle Abe and fixed it all with him. They had got the licence, and the day was fixed when at the nearest little church the friends were to gather and the marriage was to take place. The autumn had passed into the early winter, and there had come a great storm of wind and rain. All night the wind blew, and all night the rain pelted. Dick slept soundly as only a tired man can; but Jessie lay awake half the night listening to the roar of the blast in the woods, moaning and howling, and to the beat of the rain. How could she get to church in the simple finery in which she was to be decked? And then a new horror seized her. What if the river were swollen, and Uncle Abe could not cross to marry them! She slept, but it was only to dream that she was being swept away in some fierce torrent in which Dick struggled vainly to save her. The day broke with dull, heavy clouds on every side; no sign of any clearing was there, and the rain came down with a steady and persistent beat as if it would never cease. Later, they met at the church, the bride and bridegroom, with a few of her friends. Dick had no relatives that he knew of in the world, and was his own best man.

But there was no Uncle Abe. The wind roared about the little church, then went howling into the woods like a thing in pain. In gusts the rain beat on the window panes. The little company sat waiting in silence, when one came into the church with the news that Uncle Abe was the other side of the river and could not come across. The stepping-stones were buried several feet below the raging flood. There was no chance of any wedding to-day. They must go home again and wait until the flood was over.

"Never," said Dick; "we'll manage it somehow."

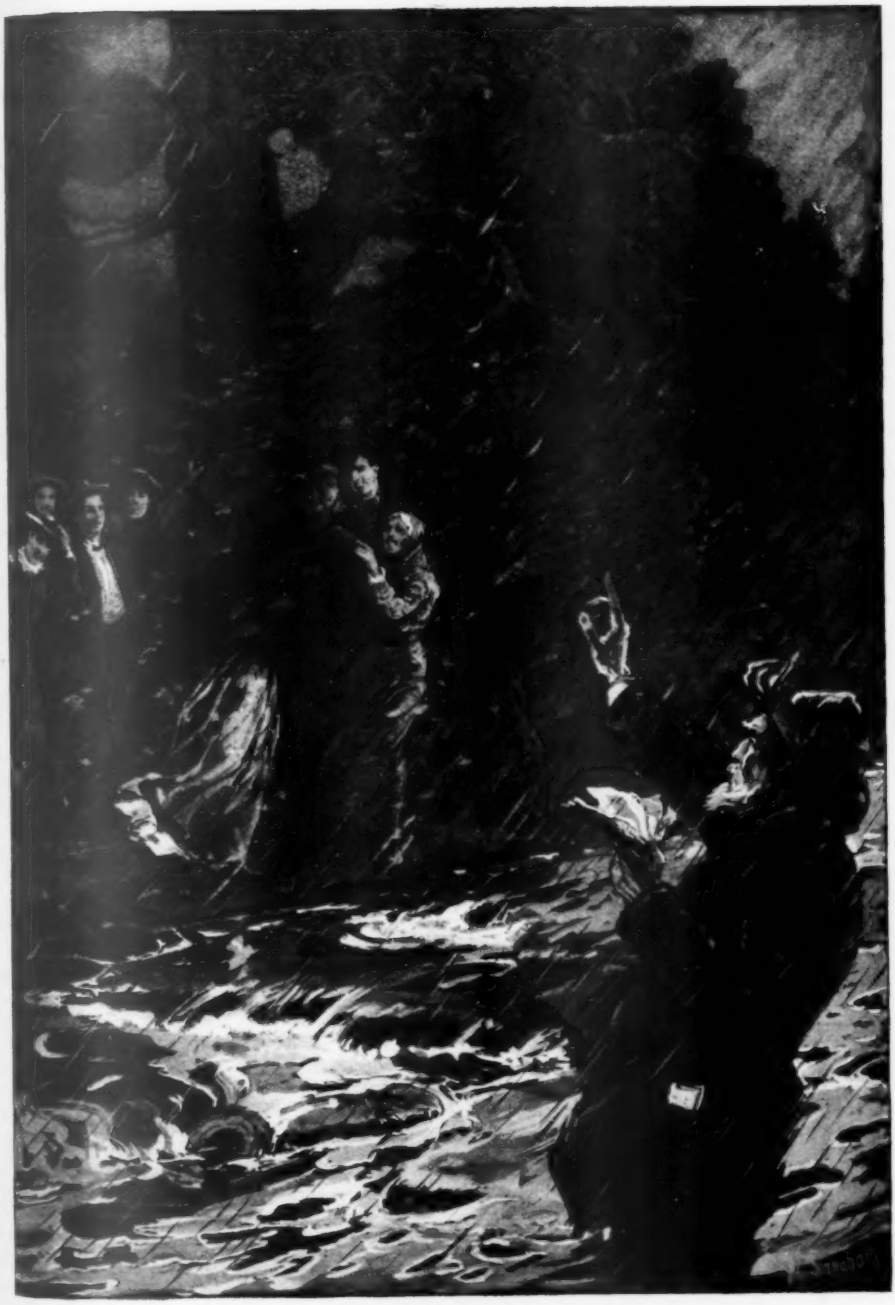
Forth went the bride and bridegroom to the bank of the river, where Dick set Jessie in the shelter of the big maple tree and then called across to Uncle Abe.

The rush and roar of the torrent was the deep bass to the howl of the wind, and it was difficult for him to hear his own voice as he shouted, "What's to be done, Uncle Abe?"

"Nothing, I guess, my son," said Uncle Abe. "I'm just awful sorry. I should have to go miles up the river before I could cross it, and it would take me all day."

"Dick," whispered Jessie, close at his side, "ask him if he can't manage it standing over there."

"Say, Uncle Abe," bawled Dick with all his might, "can't you do it over there?"



"What?" shouted Uncle Abe, and Dick had to say it again before it was heard.

"I don't see how I can," and Uncle Abe scratched his head. "I can't marry you without the licence."

"Dear, dear!" said Dick helplessly.

"We can manage the licence all right," said Jessie. "Take your handkerchief and put a big stone in it, and the licence, and you can fling it across."

"That's just grand," said Dick. "I should never have thought of that," and a minute later the thing went flying across the river to Uncle Abe.

"'All right,' roared Uncle Abe. 'That will do.'"—p. 654.

"Well, we can try it, anyhow," roared the Deacon, as he came to the brink of the river and stood in the pelting rain. "Come as near as you can."

So the service began. Now the words rang out clear and distinct as in a church, then again nothing could be heard. But Uncle Abe struggled on with his part, and Dick was not to be beaten.

"Say after me, Dick," roared Uncle Abe, "I know not——" For a moment it was useless to struggle with the roar of the storm. Then he began again, "I know not any just cause——"

Dick got safely through this part, but it was in vain that Jessie tried to make her voice heard across the river.

"I can't hear," roared Uncle Abe, leaning across the surging flood, and holding his hand at his ear.

"She said it right enough," yelled Dick.

"We heard her," said the little group about the maple tree; "we can swear to that."

There was a pause, and the whole matter seemed in peril. Then Uncle Abe roared across to them, "Hold up a hand, my dear. I guess that will do under the circumstances."

And up went Jessie's hand.

"Dick Brimacombe, wilt thou have this woman to be thy wedded wife?" cried Uncle Abe, and then stood listening, his hand against his ear. But there was no need for that. Dick put both his hands to his mouth, and in a tone that might have defied Niagara's thunder, roared, "I will!"

"Guess Uncle Abe heard that right enough," said the group to each other with a smile. Then Uncle Abe began again.

"Jessie, my dear, it's your turn now. Can you hear?" Jessie nodded her head.

"Jessie MacDonald, wilt thou have this man to be thy wedded husband?" But it was in vain that poor Jessie tried to get her words across.

"She says she will, right enough," said Dick impatiently.

"But I've got for to hear it," cried Uncle Abe.

"Let her hold up her hand," pleaded Dick.

"Well, then, Jessie, my dear, hold up a hand if you mean it."

"Hold up both," whispered Dick.

"You've got hold of one," said Jessie.

"Well, I'll hold up this one, and you hold up the other," laughed Dick; and up went both Jessie's hands high in the air.

"Have you got the ring?" cried Uncle Abe.

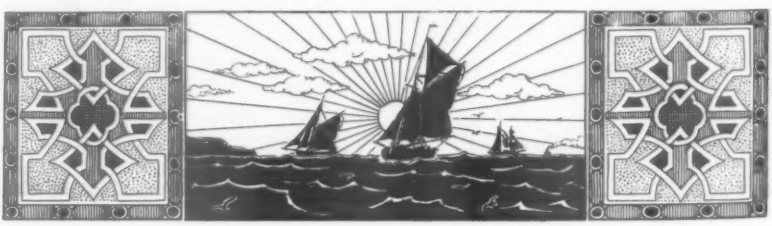
"Here it is, Uncle," Dick roared, holding it up.

"Well, put it on. Jessie will show you the finger."

"All right, Uncle Abe. What next?"

"Hold it there, and say after me——"

Now it was whilst Dick's hands were busy in this part of the ceremony that there came a violent blast, which sent Dick's hat flying before it and dropped it into the surging stream. It was Jessie's old aunt who flung a big black shawl over Dick's head and accidentally covered them both.



"All right," roared Uncle Abe. "That will do."

And Dick took the opportunity, whilst hidden in the shawl, to give his wife a kiss that sealed the wedding as a kiss had sealed the engagement.

"God bless you, my children," said Uncle Abe, as he crawled into his buggy. "I guess you're tied up all right."

"Thank 'ee, Uncle Abe; I'll owe you a bear skin," roared Dick.

"Come and see us soon," said Jessie, but the words failed to get across the river. They were lost in the roar of the flood and the howl of the storm.

THE REV. F. B. MEYER AND HIS WORK.

By Raymond Blathwayt.

(With Illustrations from Photographs by Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

THERE are few religious teachers whose writings are more widely read or whose opinions carry so much weight as those of the much-loved pastor of Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road. Mr. F. B. Meyer, who in the early years of his ministerial life acted as assistant to the Rev. C. M. Birrell of Pembroke Chapel, Liverpool—a man whom he has described as "one of the sweetest, holiest, most catholic, and most cultured men of his time"—exercises his singular influence over the hearts of men mainly by a remarkable optimism of character, which enables him to discern good in all humanity and a silver lining to the darkest cloud; and the average person is more swayed by optimism than by almost any other characteristic in human character. Why it should be so I know not, for it is not a quality for which, personally, I have any very great admiration, or in which I am inclined, as a rule, to put my trust. It never appears to me as though it could possibly and invariably be a quality of sincerity; but none who know Mr. Meyer can for a moment doubt the sincerity of life and thought which controls his whole existence.

He is optimistic simply because his faith is so joyous a one, so vivid and strenuous and inspiring that his life is one long pæan of praise and thanksgiving. And it has been in many respects a remarkable life—a life of which I will endeavour to give a fleeting glimpse mainly by a series of striking pictures, which, like a kodak snap, shall display the man in his happiest and most characteristic moments. To begin with, then, he has travelled far and wide, and as he makes a point of ascending the pulpit whenever he gets the chance, his voice and features are known, literally, to millions.

His presence is a singularly winning one.

THE REV. F. B. MEYER.

With a handsome, clean-shaven face, and clear-cut features surmounted by a white halo of hair, he attracts attention as soon as he enters a pulpit. His diction is clear and expressive, his action restrained, his style quiet, picturesque, convincing, his countenance is in itself an inspiration to the higher life; and you feel as you listen to him—those, I mean, who, unlike myself, are subject to such influences—that he is a man of sympathy, understanding, and of remarkable power and capacity for uplifting and encouraging the weary and the broken-hearted. You instinctively realise to yourself that he is a man who would never break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax, which is, perhaps, the highest qualification, as it is one of the rarest, that a minister of God can possess.

It is wonderful to reflect on the variety of audiences that Mr. Meyer has addressed, and the widely differing circumstances under which he has delivered his inspiring and Divine message. He has been singularly effective in his ministrations to his own brethren, and hundreds of them throughout the whole of Christendom are indebted to him for help and counsel and invigoration such as they had never experienced before, will never experience again.

On one picturesque occasion, during a tour in 1901 through the Southern States, Mr. Meyer was conducting a conference with about 150 Presbyterian ministers. The weather was fearfully hot, and so the good men betook themselves in all their lightheartedness—and Dissenting ministers in a holiday mass are as innocent and light-hearted as kittens, I am told—to an ancient forest hard by the town of their assemblage. Here, beneath the time-worn foliage, with the sunlight glinting through the scarce-fluttering leaves, Mr. Meyer took his stand, and exhorted his brethren on the subject of the day. After an hour or so of uplifting conversation, he turned to a friend, a well-known American preacher, Dr. Wilbur Chapman by name, and said to him: "My friend, one ounce of testimony is worth pounds of argument. Will you tell these men how God has dealt with you?"

To his astonishment, Dr. Chapman rose, and, with the bluntness and affectionateness of the American religionist, pointing to Mr. Meyer himself as he spoke, he said: "I owe more to this man than to anyone in the world." And then he proceeded to tell them how one wearied and desponding morning, when, as with Elijah, the iron of care and worry and disappointment had entered his soul, his eyes happened to fall upon these words which Mr. Meyer had chanced to preach at Northfield a day or two before, "Everything depends upon whether a man works for God or allows God to work through him."

"I realised then," continued the minister, "the mistake I had been making, although I was fully conscious that I had worked for God to the utmost of my power, in endeavouring to be an agent rather than an instrument. I determined then and there that for the future I should be the humble instrument, and that God's mighty power should flow through my life to men." His listeners were electrified into new life; new hope, new energy, took possession of their souls, and in a moment they realised the Divine nature of the message Mr. Meyer had been sent to deliver to them.

Now that was a really wonderful incident, for it displayed the subtle, all-persuasive influence of the spiritual life at its highest; and it further instanced the remarkable prevalence of that spirit in the religious life of America. Nowhere else is it so vivid, so absolutely a matter of course, so entirely invigorating. To me, personally, and to all in whom the spiritual side of their nature has not been very fully developed, such an incident comes in the nature of a great revelation, but it also comes as a great explanation of the life and influence of such a man as Mr. Meyer.

MR. MEYER IN HIS VESTRY AT CHRIST CHURCH.

On another occasion he held a great conference—what Anglicans would call a retreat—in the picturesque mountain village of Brummana, which hangs over Beyrout in Syria. Here he gathered together some two hundred missionaries—men from all parts of the Near East—and these he encouraged and exhorted to greater effort than ever they had even dreamed possible before. All this wonderful success in the farthest corner of the earth, coupled with a love of travel and a great appreciation of the beautiful, very nearly tempted him to quit for ever his now firmly established work in Lambeth, where he had won the love and devotion of thousands of artisans and labourers, whom he had grappled to his soul with bands of steel, and the undying hatred and fear of hundreds of evil-doers, into whose wheels of wickedness and vice he had inserted many a hindering spoke. But eventually other counsels prevailed, and now I believe the much-loved pastor remains faithful to the work which no other man could carry on quite so well, though, personally, I do not believe that any man can ever be considered altogether indispensable. Mr. Meyer, like many a High Church parson, has a great gift with poor people. He always attracts them, and they in turn will do anything for him. He is also possessed to a remarkable degree of the saving grace of humour, and I have often watched with pleasure the quaint twisting of his very flexible and clever mouth when he has been telling me some quaint anecdote of his past experience. Once he induced a man to sign the pledge under the following, to most men, adverse and discouraging circumstances. It occurred whilst he was carrying on his gaol rescue work in Leicester. A certain man came out of prison one morning, and was met by his wife and two daughters. Mr. Meyer offered the whole party breakfast at a neighbouring coffee-house, where the following colloquy took place :

"Sign the pledge," said Mr. Meyer. "You know it is drink that has been your bane. Now give it up, and begin a new life from to-day."

"Yes," said the man, "I will, but I must have a pint of porter first. I vowed I would have one the very first morning I came out of prison, and I must keep my vow."

"You ought to break a bad vow, my friend," said Mr. Meyer.

"I will have that pint," said the man.

"Very well," replied the good and sensible pastor. "If I let you have it, will you sign the pledge immediately after, and will you give me your hand upon it ?"

The man at once stretched out his hand, and the compact was entered upon. "But who was to get the beer ?" continues Mr. Meyer, as he tells the story. "I habitually used the coffee-house for these gaol-release breakfasts, and I could not possibly send one of the servants. That would have been simply out of the question. There was no one, I realised with a thrill of horror, to go and fetch that beer but myself. There was no help for it, so I snatched down the handiest jug, and then sallied forth—I, the champion of teetotalism in Leicester—to procure this wretched man his pint of porter.

MR. MEYER IN HIS LIBRARY.

Well, to make a long story short, having horrified the barmaid out of her wits, I returned with the beer, poured it out as slowly and quietly as possible, so as to avoid the tempting "head," and then gave it to the poor wretch to drink. At each gulp his wife, the two daughters, and I gave such a despairing groan that after two or three efforts he put the glass down, saying :

"'That is the miserablest pint of porter I ever drank. Where's your card, sir ? I may as well sign it as drink any more.'"

And the man signed then and there. Mr. Meyer procured him a new situation, and very shortly afterwards he became one of the most devoted and enthusiastic members of his congregation.

The anecdote does honour both to Mr. Meyer and to his protégé. It is such actions—actions which form the daily life of a Father Stanton or a Father Dolling, or a Wilson Carlile — that bind Mr. Meyer so closely to his people in Lambeth. It was he who first started that wonderful P.S.A. Brotherhood of his from out of the purlieus of Westminster. "I was told it couldn't be done. Christ Church was too imposing, too ecclesiastical ; the church of the better classes. Fancy talking like that to an optimist like me!

"And yet at the very first P.S.A. meeting I had no less than 200 men present. Dr. Newman Hall gave the address. We abolished the word 'Brethren' as being specially associated with the unreality of the pulpit and the pew, and called each other 'Brother,' reaching out our hands towards the Brother Who is at the right hand of God, through Whose sacrifice and eternal life we are linked to God Himself."

The cruel exigencies of space forbid my entering into further details concerning this most fascinating part of Mr. Meyer's strenuous life, but I suppose the Lambeth P.S.A. is known to the majority of my readers, and, therefore, I can well hurry on to glance at his work for and among young people. With all young people, boys and girls alike, Mr. Meyer is a veritable hero. In his own words, he has always tried to be a big brother to the girls of his charge, and he has never found the least tendency on their side to abuse the relationship. And he gives them work to do. Like the Roman Church and the Salvation Army, he believes in the power and influence of lofty womanhood. The young girls of Christ Church are banded together on the basis of devotion to our Saviour, total abstinence, modesty, self-sacrifice, and sisterliness. And it is much the same with his Lads' Institute. Thus on his Pleasant Thursday Evenings you will find gathered together week by week a body of young men, many of them rescued from horror and degradation unspeakable, who are now in their turn engaged heart and soul in the Christian endeavour to bring light and healing to their less fortunate fellows. Nay, he even sends certain of the young girls and boys whom he has thus enrolled in a life of service, to distribute tracts and to speak encouraging words in the dreariest and vilest of the slums.

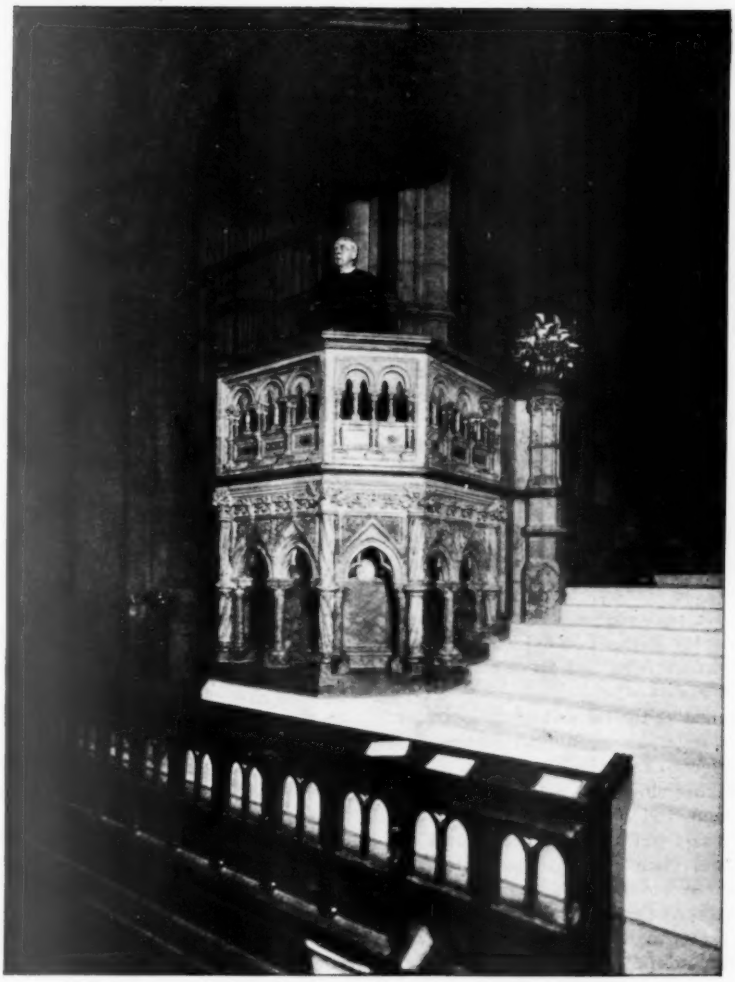
But he does not confine his ministrations to youth only to those of his own special district. A notable feature of this class of work is his correspondence with the young people of both sexes.

It is notorious that young people rarely and, as I think, very naturally, confide their greatest difficulties, spiritual or mental, to their parents, their own pastors, or their teachers. Some delicate reticence, some tender reserve holds them back, and they keep silence within themselves, and very often that silence is as a consuming fire. But now and again comes along a man of whom they hear, or whom possibly they encounter in a casual manner, and the floodgates of emotion are opened, and they find a relief of which they had otherwise not dreamed either the joy or the necessity. And such a saviour to thousands of young men and women of to-day is Mr. Meyer. His study table is crammed, it is piled up, and even the floor is hampered with the correspondence that these dear young people pour in upon him hour after hour.

And what revelations, what histories, what sorrows, what joys, what castings down, what upliftings, what sins and frailties and unimagined temptations, what depths of the soul unmasked these little letters reveal! What veritable human documents they are! What glimpses they afford into the mysteries and the sorrow and the suffering, the stress and turmoil, and the variableness of twentieth-century life! And each letter is answered, and in time each writer is sympathised with or tenderly reproved or wisely advised, and mayhap a soul is saved alive.



It is a great work, and in certain respects it is one of the most superb means to a life of real help and of lasting good that a minister of Christ could possibly desire. With a variation, with a difference, it is, after all, but the Confessional of the Catholic, but with the element of sympathy thrown in and of perfect understanding.

I have depicted Mr. Meyer as the strenuous worker, the cheery optimist, the universal sympathiser; but he has, of course, another side to his character: he would not be worth much if he had not. I should do him gross injustice if I depicted a persistently amiable, sugary, light-hearted, unthinking optimist, who could not discern the inevitable and the frequently hopeless tragedy of life. Mr. Meyer is far too deep-thinking a man, far too keen-sighted a character, not to realise to the full the waves of pathos and emotion and overwhelming force which roll tempestuously over the human soul from time to time. His life's work, indeed, is conducted in the very midst of the most horrible surroundings, the most despairing and the most awe-inspiring that this world has to show. And the wonder of it all is that he is never beaten or cast down by it. He sees it all, and he sets himself—face Zionwards—to put it right so far as in him lies the power of doing so. But to assert that he does not realise the horror and the magnitude of his task would be to write him down a fool; to imply that he is unthinkingly and unreflectingly optimistic at every turn of life's kaleidoscope would be to present an absolutely false picture of the man and his outlook upon life. Now and again, despite his pure, whole-souled, beautiful and inspiringly optimistic nature, he has lucid lapses into a certain form of sane, carefully considered, well-thought-out, scientific pessimism, out of the depths of which he will arise a stronger, a more hopeful and a wiser man than ever he was before.

In order that you may understand the nature of the man and what I am now saying, I will give you a remarkable instance of what I mean, for on a quite recent occasion his pessimism revealed itself to me in a dramatic and an unexpected manner. We were discussing the varied problems that are ever being thrown up for solution by the surging sea of humanity; and he set to work to regard them, and to express his outlook upon the whole of life, from as straight and steady a point of view as was possible.

With a vivid realism which was Zolaesque in its intensity, but with a sanity and truthfulness which the great French writer rarely, if ever, achieved, he depicted the human race—and that from his own lurid experience—as doomed to a hideous and inevitable catastrophe. He spoke with the pessimism of despair, and yet with the sureness and the certainty of a divinely inspired prophet, and he foreshadowed with brilliant colouring and an outline in which there was no variableness nor shadow of turning, the human race sinking into its grave, overborne by the weight of its own sin and of avoidable disease and horror.

I had alluded to the curious statement that had recently appeared, that the human race, according to scientific research, had already existed for 250,000, and was bound to continue on the earth for three million years yet to come.

"But they will never live to see it," cried my companion, with despair in his countenance and real anguish in his tones. "Long before that they will have decayed into nothingness, rotten with their own hideous vices and excesses!" And nothing I could plead for the moment would turn him from the tragedy of this view. But I realised as I listened how really deep and understanding, how fine natured, how far different from the smug, somewhat shallow, sugary individual he is sometimes represented to be, was Mr. Meyer's character as it revealed itself to me in letters of gold during our long and searching conversations. Mr. Meyer's wonderful success as a preacher and a pastor to-day is due mainly to his curious power of sympathy; his gentleness of nature; his capacity for seizing hold upon and grappling to himself the wastrels and the outcasts of this vast body politic; his keen sense of humour, which prevents him from ever making himself ridiculous, and his level-headed, common-sense outlook upon life, which acts with wise restraint upon a naturally emotional and hopeful nature. So that he is withal one of the best-balanced men I have ever met.

THE LITTLE NIPPER.

A Complete Story by Helen Boddington.

THE long corridor was deserted except for one solitary little figure. In the evenings a crowd of well-dressed men and women strolled up and down, or lounged on the velvet settees which were placed at intervals on either side. Now it was afternoon, and the idlers of the evenings were seeking their pleasure or pursuing their business elsewhere. The solitary figure was seated on one of the velvet settees, kicking his heels against its padded front.

There was something disconsolate in that regular "thud, thud," and something more disconsolate still in the poise of the golden head against the dark background.

"Presently the "thud, thud," was accompanied by soft mutterings. "I wis' I'd got somebody to play with—I wis' I could go out—I wis' it was to-night and Daddy was here. Oh, I wis'—I wis'——"

A door opened at the far end of the corridor, and Bobby forgot his unfulfilled wishes, and fixed his eyes with languid interest on a man who was walking slowly in his direction. He was a tall man, and his figure was erect and youthful-looking, but his hair was powdered with grey, and time and care had ploughed deep furrows in his face. The restless little feet still continued to play their "thud, thud," and but for the sound the man might have passed on, unmindful of the eyes which were fixed upon him. The sound, however, having attracted his attention, he came to a sudden standstill almost opposite the boy.

"Halloo! little nipper, what are you doing here all alone?"

The little nipper regarded his questioner somewhat curiously. "I'm not doing nothing," he said.

The plaintive sound in the childish voice perhaps touched a soft spot in the man's heart, for he moved nearer and laid a hand on the golden head. Keen grey eyes looked into innocent blue ones, the blue ones awakened some half-dead memories, while the boy in child-fashion took the measure of the man.

"Are you too old to play?" he demanded. The man laughed.

"Will you play with me? Do, do!" and the little face was full of eagerness.

"Haven't you got any playfellows? Or where is your nurse or your mother?"

"Oh! nurse is gossiping, I 'spects, that's what mother says; and mother—oh! she doesn't count."

"Oh! she doesn't count, doesn't she?"

"Daddy's coming to-night."

Bobby was standing now, his hands thrust deeply into his pockets, his face glowing with joyful anticipation.

"And Daddy does count?"

"Daddy! Oh, yes, o' course."

The man smiled and drew his own conclusions. Innocent, childish words—how much they tell!

"Does Daddy play with you?"

"Yes, horses and bears, and all sorts of things. Will you play with me? I'll choose a quiet game if you will. You see, you're not so young as Daddy," he added.

Major Bingham laughed again. "You're a complimentary little nipper," he said.

Bobby was still looking thoughtfully into the furrowed face.

"What are you sorry about?" he asked. "You laugh, but your eyes look sorry all the time."

The eyes shifted themselves, but the hand strayed again to the curly head.

"My lad, thou art clear-sighted for thy years!"

The words puzzled the boy, so he ignored them. "Will you play?" he demanded again.

"I've got to go out now, but I'll hurry up and get back," and he moved forward, the child walking beside him.

"You won't forget? You will make haste, and I'll think about some games while you're away."

"And choose a quiet one; remember, I'm an old man."

"Yes, I'll 'member."

The hall porter opened the great swing door. It was snowing hard, and a cold blast swept in. The Major shivered and turned up his fur collar.

"Beastly day," he muttered.

"Yes, sir, beastly day," echoed the porter.

On the step the Major turned and glanced at the sturdy little figure just within.

"Fearless blue eyes, rosy cheeks, golden hair! He was like that once."

"Good-bye, come back soon," the boy called out.

"Good-bye, little nipper," said the man, and there was a caressing sound in the gruff voice as it lingered on that "little nipper."

The great door closed with a bang. "He's gone," said Bobby, "and p'raps he'll forget," and he sighed unconsciously. Then in the next breath he added, "But he promised," and, with the remembrance of this, confidence in his new friend returned.

"Well, youngster, why don't you come and warm yourself?" said the porter, as he piled some logs on the hall fire.

The youngster held a pair of chubby hands near to the blaze.

"I wis' you'd play with me till he comes back."

"Can't, got too much to do," and the porter thought of a certain pretty chambermaid to whom he was paying his addresses.

"Why don't yer go and ask yer nurse to play wi' yer?" he said

"She won't play, she's got a bone in her leg."

The porter disappeared chuckling, and Bobby, after staring thoughtfully for a few minutes into the fire, walked slowly up the wide staircase and approached a door on the opposite side of the landing Softly turning the knob, he peeped in. The golden head attracted the attention of the occupant of the room.

"What do you want, Bobby?" asked a querulous voice.

"Will you play 'Happy Family,' Mummy?"

"No, I can't; go away and don't worry; I've got a headache."

A graceful body arranged itself a trifle more gracefully among a multitude of cushions, while a slender hand took up the novel it had for the moment laid aside. The little golden head and the pleading voice were forgotten. Bobby closed the door and went downstairs again.

"Some people's too busy," he said to himself, "some people's got headaches, and some people's got bones in their legs."

If he had been a few years older he would probably have marvelled at the number of white lies which were told him during one day.

The time hung heavily, but it passed as it invariably has a way of doing, and at the end of an hour Bobby stood on tiptoe peering expectantly through the glass-panel of the front door.

The snow was still falling heavily, and the people who passed the hotel were few and far between. Whenever a tall figure came in sight his heart rose within him, only to sink again as the figure drew nearer.

"Oh, dear, what a long time he is!" he said to himself.

Bobby was the proud possessor of a watch, and now he drew it out and looked at it lovingly.

"Half-past three!"

There was a sound of wheels, and the watch slipped back again into its owner's pocket. A hansom drew up at the door. He had driven, perhaps, to get back earlier.

Somebody jumped out with a light, springing step, and Bobby dragged at the heavy door.

"Where's the hall porter?" inquired a hurried voice, and again the boy's heart sank, for this was not his new friend.

The new-comer rang the bell.

"Come and help me," he said as the porter appeared, and the man followed him out to the hansom.

What were they going to do? Bobby wondered. And as he watched his eyes opened widely, and a strange look came into them.

"Ah! he's come!" he exclaimed, but he did not finish the sentence, for somebody called out to him to open the door He struggled with it manfully, and the two men entered, supporting Bobby's new friend between them. His face was white and drawn-looking.

The boy gazed at it speechlessly.

"My room——" muttered the man, and as he tried to move forward a moan escaped him.

"Yes, yes; but take it gently," said the other soothingly.

Bobby drew nearer.

"What's—what's the matter?" he asked timidly.

"Keep out of the way," said the porter.

The man turned his pallid face towards Bobby, and a strange look passed over it.

"Ah!" he said, "it's the little nipper. I hadn't forgotten, old chap. I was coming back for that game, but—now it's all up, I'm afraid."

"Neber mind," said the little nipper, and the man smiled grimly, wondering if he were being consoled for the loss of the game, or sympathised with in his misfortune.

XUM

But the little face was growing indistinct, and the wondering was not more than of a second's duration. Further assistance was called, and Bobby's friend was carried away to his bedroom.

The boy followed with an unpleasant feeling in his throat, and then stood outside the door listening to the sounds within. Somebody brushed past him hurriedly. "What's the matter?" asked Bobby, but he got no answer. Presently others came, and he got the desired information. "Broken leg—slipped on the ice—naughty boys making slides"; and later he learned from the hall-porter that the doctor was setting the broken bone. Bobby thought a leg must be very hard to break in two, and harder still to stick together again, and he passed his hands thoughtfully over his own plump calves.

After a while the truant nurse came in search of her charge, and with great reluctance he left the doorway which held such a fascination for him.

"Come and 'ave tea, Master Bobby; you shall play about in the corridor afterwards," added the generous-minded person.

And so after a short interval the little boy once again might have been seen lingering near the closed door.

Presently it opened.

"The nurse will be here in about half an hour," said a man's voice; "until then you won't mind being alone?"

There was some response from the patient, and the doctor, with a cheery "Good-night," closed the door after him and hurried away, without so much as glancing at that waiting figure.

"He's all by hisself," murmured Bobby.

A minute passed, and Bobby drew a few inches nearer to the door.

"Rather lonesome all by hisself!"

Another minute! There was evidently something magnetic about that door, for the little feet moved again unconsciously to their owner.

"Wonder if it hurts—broken leg!"

Another minute, a few more steps, and two small hands were clasping the door-knob.

"P'raps he's asleep—peep in and see."

The knob turned as softly as a knob can be turned by a boy, the knees of whose first knickerbockers are only just beginning to show signs of wear.

The room was dimly lighted by a shaded lamp which stood near the bed. Bobby's quick eyes travelled to the mound of bed-clothes.

"Are you better?" piped the small voice.

A hand moved the curtain aside, and Bobby saw the face of his friend—the kind eyes and the stern mouth.

"Halloo! little nipper, is that you?"

"Yes, it's me; I came to see you."

"Come in and close the door, then."

He obeyed.

"Is it mended?" he asked in an awed tone, as he approached the bed.

The man laughed.

"Yes, they've made a good job of it."

"Ah! Did it hurt?"

"I've known a worse pain."

"What sort of pain? Like toothache or chilblains?"

"No, the sort of pain that has never touched you, little nipper."

"Nurse says her young man fighted, and got a bullet wound. That's bad pain!"

"Yes, I know that pain too."

"Are you a soldier? Have you got a bullet wound? Weally? Let me see!"

The firm-set mouth relaxed into a smile. "It's in my shoulder," he said.

"Can I go round to the other side and climb up on the bed? Then I can see it."

The pattering of little feet, a tug at the bed-clothes, and a sudden twitching of the invalid's lips as Bobby landed beside him.

The boy uncovered the shoulder and peered at it curiously.

"There isn't much to see, little nipper," said the owner of the wound.

Tiny fingers touched the dark mark caressingly.

"I 'spects you are a brave man. My daddy's brave, and he's a soldier."

A large hand closed over the little one.

"And you'll be a soldier too, some day, I suppose?"

"Yes, I shall fight like daddy, o' course."

The Major smiled. It was evident that "daddy" stood on a high pinnacle. But what of the boy's mother?

"Look here, old chap, won't your mother be wondering where you are?"

"No."

"Don't you think you ought to go and see if she wants you?"

"She'd only say, 'Don't worry.' She doesn't want me," and Bobby settled himself among the pillows with his golden head very near to that wounded shoulder.

"D'you know any tales?" he asked presently.

"I'm afraid my tale-telling days are over."

"Daddy tells me tales."

"Realiy!"

"Yes, 'bout Sylvie and Bruno, and lots of things."

"Sylvie and Bruno?"

"Yes, you know, the fairy children. Sometimes they were so tiny they could go in tea-cups, and sometimes they were big, just like common children. Haven't you never heard 'bout Bruno making a garden for Sylvie? And 'bout the dead mouse? Oh! and 'bout the dog what was inwisible all but his tail? It must be funny to see a dog's tail going 'long with nothing else to it."

Ah! yes, now he remembered. "Alice in Wonderland," "Sylvie and Bruno"—stories that had been told in a soft, sweet voice to a little nipper long ago.

"Have you got a boy same as me?" asked Bobby, as though divining his thoughts.

"Once I had," said the man, and the past ploughed its way through space and stood side by side with the present.

"The clasp of their hands tightened."—p. 666.

"I'll be a soldier like you, dad," said another voice.

"Is he dead?" came the query, and a tremor of emotion passed through him as he felt the little head nestle closer. So had another little head nestled.

"No, he went away."

"Did you send him away?"

"I was angry with him; he did something to displease me."

"Were you sorry when he went away?"

The small questioner was probing deep.

"I don't think I was then."

"Are you sorry now?"

"Life is lonely—and I loved the boy," he muttered to himself, as though in excuse for those softened feelings which had been aroused by the look in a child's eyes, the touch of a child's hand.

The quick ears of the little nipper caught the words.

"P'raps he'll come back again."

"I don't think so," he said aloud, and to himself. "Too proud, and there's the woman. But for his sake and my own I would tolerate her—now. God knows, I was a fool not to have done it then. I was hard, too hard; perhaps there has been regret since."

The head that rested against his shoulder reminded him of other things.

"It's time you went, little nipper, quite time."

"I'll see what time! I forgot to show you my watch."

A small hand went fumbling into a capacious pocket, and a good old English lever was brought forth, big, and thick, and heavy.

Bobby peered at the hands, holding the face towards the lamp-light.

"Six o'clock! I can tell the time; daddy taught me. See! isn't it a beauty? Daddy gived it to me on my birthday," and he put his treasure into the Major's hand.

His fingers closed over it. Ah! surely there was something familiar about the feel of that old battered case. That indentation right in the centre of the back, that bent ring, those deep scratches!

"Daddy's father gived it to him when he was a little boy," the soft, cooing voice was saying, "and he gived it to me. He told me to take care of it 'cause it's such a good watch."

The last words sounded far away, another voice was speaking:—

"I say, dad, the chaps at school call it a turnip, but I don't care; it's a rattling good watch, and keeps jolly good time."

"Yes, yes, little nipper, it's a good watch, though it's an old one."

"Yes, it's a good watch, a werry good watch," echoed the little nipper in sleepy tones, and he nestled his head still closer.

After a while the breathing became soft and regular.

"He's asleep," said the man. He turned his face, and his lips brushed against the glossy curls.

"Little nipper!" he murmured, and the words sounded like a benediction breathed over the sleeping child.

Exhaustion, the follower of physical pain, came presently, and the soft light, the strange hush in the room, the soothing presence of that small silent figure beside him, began to make themselves felt. Memories were blotted out, voices from the past grew fainter, and faces ceased to haunt.

Somebody opened the door and came softly towards the bed.

It was the nurse. An exclamation left her lips, and she smiled amusedly. Then she went back again to the door, and somebody else came towards the bed—somebody who looked long and earnestly at the two faces so near together, the old and the young: one with the flush of youth and health on it, the other deep furrowed by pain and time.

"Dad, dear old dad," he murmured.

The shadows of sleep had barely closed round him. Do voices speak so plain in dreams?

The heavy eyelids raised themselves. Are faces so distinct?

"Eric!"

Hands were stretched forth.

"Forgive!"

"Aye, surely! And you?"

"Life has been full of regret, but," and he glanced at the face of the sleeping child, "he compensated for much."

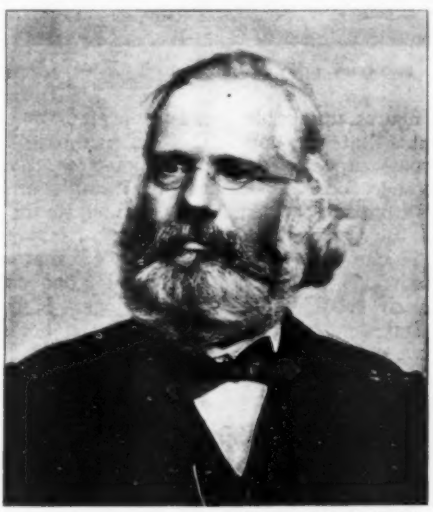
"Eric, I was hard, too hard. Let me try to make amends. My boy, I want you," the voice broke; "I have wanted you always, but I did not know how much till—till I saw the little chap."

"It's a good watch, a werry good watch," murmured a drowsy voice.

The two men smiled, and the clasp of their hands tightened.

"I'm glad you gave the old watch to the little nipper," said the one, and the other bent down until his lips touched the furrowed cheek.

WATER GIPSIES.



SOME PARTICULARS OF THE STRANGE LIVES OF THOSE WHO DWELL IN CANAL BOATS.

By Hugh B. Philpott.

A SADLY neglected people are the men, women, and children who make their homes on our inland waterways. The duties and the privileges of citizenship are associated with fixity of dwelling, and to be a nomad is to separate oneself from the common life of one's fellows. The bargee pays neither rent nor rates nor taxes; no one solicits his vote or summons him on a jury; the Churches have hardly touched his life, and School Boards—for all the use they have been to him—might as well have been non-existent. Like the gipsy, he belongs to a race apart; born on a canal boat, he has lived on a boat all his life and will probably die there; he rarely reads a newspaper (more often than not he cannot read); his little world is bounded by the canal banks, and he takes little interest in what goes on beyond.

Thirty years ago the isolation of the canal boat-dwellers was even more complete than it is to-day, and their condition, material and moral, was far more lamentable. It was the late George Smith, of Coalville—that indefatigable worker on behalf of oppressed and neglected children—who first directed public attention to the hard lot of the women and children in canal boats. Writing in 1873, Mr. Smith expressed the opinion that not more than 2 per cent. of the canal population could either read or write, and that not more than 5 per cent. of the children attended either day school or Sunday school. He drew lurid pictures of the moral degradation of the canal people's lives, of the terrible overcrowding of their little cabins, and of the cruelties inflicted on the children. Although some who have a right to speak on such a subject hold that Mr. Smith's pictures were overdrawn and his figures unreliable, yet there can be no doubt that the conditions of life in canal boats urgently demanded legislative interference.

The story of Mr. Smith's campaign, which resulted in the passing of the Canal Boats Acts of 1877 and 1884, is one of a long struggle against difficulties which to a less earnest and persistent spirit would have proved insurmountable. But victory came at last, and enactments were made which would, it was hoped, secure the education of the children and a cleanly, sanitary home for all dwellers on canal boats.

There is no doubt that the Acts have beneficially affected the lives of the canal population, though perhaps they have been less far-reaching than might have been hoped. Every canal boat must now be registered, and is subject to inspection—an inspection which varies in effectiveness according to the zeal and industry of the local authorities through whose districts the boats pass. It is the duty of the inspectors to see that the boats are properly registered, that the cabins are clean and not overcrowded, that offensive cargoes are separated by double bulkheads from the living room, and that various minor regulations for the health and comfort of the inhabitants are observed.

According to the report of his Majesty's Inspector of Canal Boats for 1901–2, it is estimated that there are now between 7,000 and 8,000 canal boats in actual use as dwellings. During the year about one-fourth of the boats were found to be infringing the regulations in one way or another. But many of these infringements were merely technical offences against the regulations regarding registration, and no doubt the same fault was often discovered by more than one inspector, and so would appear in the returns twice over. Altogether 1,101 cases had reference to the sanitary state of the cabins, but of these 231 related only to the temporarily dirty condition of the interiors, very often due to the nature of the cargo or the weather at the time; and the inspector reports that as a rule the boat people took a pleasure in remedying the fault as soon as possible. It would seem, therefore, that as regards the sanitary conditions of the canal boat-man's life a great improvement has been made; and my own restricted observations would lead me to suppose that a canal boat is a far healthier dwelling-place than a city slum.

In order to get a fair impression of the life of our canal population, and to gain information on many matters which cannot be recorded in official reports, I recently spent some time among the canal folk at Brentford. It is at Brentford that the Grand Junction Canal joins the Thames, and large numbers of barges bound to and from all parts of the Midland waterways make this place a port of call. To very many of these wandering canal folk Brentford is a sacred place. In the parish church they were married and their children were christened, and in the churchyard some of their friends and relations, their last voyage made, are sleeping their long sleep; here is the school where many of their children receive, during the occasional days spent in the town, all the schooling they will ever get, and here is the only place where very many of them ever hear the Good Tidings of Great Joy, or receive any impulse towards the higher life.

The centre of the good work among the canal folk at Brentford is the Canal Boatmen's Mission, which is under the care of a City missionary, Mr. R. Bamber, who may well be called "the bargees' parson." For twenty-three years Mr. Bamber has worked amongst canal dwellers, and no man in England understands them better or is more generally loved and respected by them. It was under his kindly guidance that I had an opportunity of visiting some of the boat folk in their curious little homes.

It is evident that the women for the most part take a commendable pride in keeping their tiny homes as clean and cheerful as possible. Some are models of neatness and cleanliness: the stove is black-leaded and polished, the household utensils are of brass and copper, and they shine like mirrors, the walls are adorned with pictures, and a little of the precious shelf room is spared for a few china ornaments. Even if we find a cabin which is untidy, and where the children are dirty, the mother will apologise and explain that we have caught her at an unfortunate time. Nevertheless, Mr. Bamber and anyone introduced by him are sure to be welcome. You cannot stand upright in these cabins, and the captain, if he is a very tall man, may touch one wall with his head and the other with his feet as he lies in bed. Many of the fixtures "contrive a double debt to pay": the seat is a locker for household goods and also the children's bed; one cupboard door is a dining table and another is the bed for the captain and his wife; there is thus more accommodation than one might at first suppose.

LOVE ON A BARGE.

The bargee has a terrible reputation; but it would be a mistake to suppose that he spends his whole time in drinking, swearing, and kicking his wife. There are rough characters on canal boats, but the typical bargee, though he has a rough tongue, has a kind heart; he is an honest, manly fellow, and if he can keep away from drink—the besetting weakness of his class—is a good husband and father. The canal boatwomen are a hardworking, industrious race; not only have they to see to the cleaning and cooking and to look after the children, but they have to take their turn at the rudder and on the towing-path, and not infrequently they are charged with such duties as seeing the owners and buying forage for horses, for it frequently happens that the wife is the best business man on the boat. To see the women in their picturesque print bonnets bustling about the boats on a bright summer day, or taking tea on the cabin top, is a pleasant sight enough; but to see them in winter time trudging along the towpath, ankle deep in mud, is to realise something of the hardships of the bargewoman's life; and in time of sickness it is easy to believe that her condition is pitiable in the extreme.

The children are generally healthy, bright little people, well cared for so far as their bodily needs are concerned, but sadly ignorant as regards the orthodox lore of childhood. In many cases they are past masters in the care of a horse and the art and mystery of barge steering, long before they can read words of one syllable or write their own names. The way in which the children are allowed to grow up almost entirely without education is one of the most unsatisfactory features of canal boat life. They are supposed to attend school wherever their boats happen to be making a stay. But it is impossible to enforce such a regulation; if the school attendance officer visits a canal boat in search of children he will be told—often truly enough—that the boat is leaving that day or the next. And even when the parents themselves would like their children to attend school, the difficulties are almost insuperable so long as they live on the canal boat. Teachers do not welcome these little birds of passage, who, of course, are dunces when compared with children in regular attendance, and for the little "boaties" themselves school must be far from attractive when they can only attend for a day or two at a time and are placed amongst children much younger than themselves, the object of remark, and perhaps of ridicule, by their schoolfellows.

For the past seven years a praiseworthy attempt has been made at Brentford to remedy this condition of educational darkness by holding a special day school for boatmen's children. It is a queer little school, meeting in the rather inconvenient premises of the Canal Boatmen's Mission. Judged by every educational standard it is, of course, sadly inefficient; in respect to irregularity of attendance it can surely have no equal in the kingdom. Imagine a school with about 500 children on the roll, and a daily attendance varying from none at all to fifty; a school at which three days' teaching, followed by three weeks'—or, it may be, three months'—holiday is quite the normal state of affairs. The wonder is not that results are poor, but that there are any results at all.

On the occasion of my recent visit there were about twenty children present. Their neat, clean appearance spoke well for the care of their parents, though I understand there are occasions when defects in the matter of personal cleanliness have to be remedied at the school. The ages of the children ranged from about two-and-a-half to fourteen or fifteen years; all seemed very quiet and attentive, which is the more noteworthy as the teacher had to attend simultaneously to pupils in several different stages of educational development. The teaching is necessarily very elementary. An exceptionally advanced scholar was writing from dictation a passage from a reading book; but even he had to be reminded that a new sentence begins with a capital letter. Most of the other children were still struggling with the alphabet. The equipment of the school is by no means up to date; but it is quite as good as one might expect, for with such irregular attendance it is, of course, impossible to qualify for Government grants.

Yet this little Voluntary school at Brentford represents the high-water mark of educational provision for canal boat children, so far as it has yet gone. The various school authorities seem to have given up in despair the attempt to educate these children, and the Education Department's report for 1901–2 dismisses the matter with a simple non possumus: "So long as children of school age are permitted to live upon the boats, no effective means can be devised for securing their regular attendance at school." The only way in which boat people can give their children a satisfactory education is by leaving them on shore in charge of friends when they go on canal journeys, and it is encouraging to know that many are sufficiently alive to the best interests of their children to make arrangements of this sort.

Whether the best remedy for the present state of things lies in the extension and regulation by local educational authorities of the system of boarding out children with foster parents, allowing them to return to the boats in holiday time, or whether women and children should be entirely prohibited from living on canal boats, and the men thus compelled to set up homes on shore, is a question on which there may well be differences of opinion. But that some reform of the present system is urgently needed is a proposition that hardly admits of discussion. Already, since the passing of compulsory education laws, one generation has grown up on our canals in almost total ignorance, and it will be a lasting disgrace elementary education. It is painful to hear—as I have heard—a young man decline the gift of a book on the ground that he "ain't no scholard"; and when one learns that he is fighting a grim fight against habits of intemperance, one feels that the lack of intellectual resources must make the struggle doubly hard.

But until the State takes in hand this much-needed reform, we may hope that the little private school at Brentford will continue its beneficent work. In spite of the adverse circumstances attending its work, the influence of the day school, and perhaps still more of the Sunday school, has already been widely felt. Mr. Owen J. Llewellyn, his Majesty's Inspector of Canal Boats, stated at a meeting not long since that he had frequently heard children in the Midlands singing hymns which they told him they had learned at the Brentford Mission School. And one may hope that the good influence is not confined to the children; a child's hymn or a child's prayer may sometimes come as an evangel of hope to men and women whose lives have all too little of the influences which purify and uplift.

On Sunday evenings in the winter the schoolroom becomes a chapel, and a little service is held, which the boat people can feel is entirely their own. The same people are never seen on two consecutive Sundays, and though each gathering is necessarily small, the total number of canal people who attend the service whenever they get a chance would make up a very good congregation. When Mr. Bamber came to Brentford seven years ago there were only two of the men who ever attended a place of worship; and as these continue their association with their own churches, it cannot be said that Mr. Bamber's work is carried on at the expense of any other religious community, and the friendliness of all the local religious leaders is a testimony to the absence of anything like proselytising. In the summer-time an open-air service is held on the canal bank, where a large shed is available in case the weather should prove unfavourable.

But to understand the real influence which Mr. Bamber undoubtedly has over these people one must see him in his daily work of cabin to cabin visitation. I was privileged to accompany him on some of these visits, and shall not soon forget the kindly tact and the gentle, affectionate earnestness of his words and manner. About three hundred families form Mr. Bamber's "parish," though of course only a few are at Brentford at any one time. He seems to know most of the people quite intimately, addressing them by their Christian names and asking after friends and relatives. It was pleasant to see how warmly the missionary was welcomed by men, women, and children alike. After inquiries about business and family affairs, he would read a few verses of Scripture, adding a few earnest words of appeal and admonition, and perhaps offering a brief prayer. The words spoken are always of the simplest. It is not theological subtleties that these people want; they have no concern with Darwinism or the Higher Criticism. They are only to be reached by "the old, old story," told as simply as to a child. For they are a simple folk, and sometimes astonishingly ignorant. Mr. Bamber has met men and women who could not tell how Christ died and who did not know the Lord's Prayer, and others who, remembering some few words of prayer or Scripture learned in childhood, would say, in answer to his inquiry, "Oh, I don't know nothing about the meaning." Many of them can have had scarcely any religious instruction in their lives until they came under Mr. Bamber's influence at Brentford. "It is only here," said a boatman to Mr. Bamber one day, "where we get cheered and lifted up in our struggles."

On the top floor of the mission house is a maternity room, which has proved a great boon to some of the women. Last year four babies were born in the room, and the work is likely to be further developed if better accommodation can be obtained. This work is not a charity in the ordinary sense of the word; the women pay 2s. 6d. a week for the use of the room, and make their own arrangements for the services of a nurse. The canal folk are not, as a rule, desperately poor; their great need is not alms, but sympathy and brotherliness. And that is one of the chief reasons of Mr. Bamber's success amongst them. Never did pastor or missionary give himself to his work with more whole-hearted devotion. His great hope is that he may be able to work for the rest of his life among the canal folk whom he loves, his one ambition being to serve their highest interests.

An important development of the work at Brentford is likely to take place in the near future. A site has been acquired and plans have been prepared for a new Canal Boatmen's Institute, which will replace the present inadequate mission premises. The new building, for which more than half the cost has already been subscribed, will not only provide improved accommodation for the day school and the maternity room, but will also contain reading and recreation rooms for the men and women. At present these people have no meeting place except the public house. The provision of warm and well lighted rooms, where they can gather on winter evenings to improve their education or indulge in innocent recreations and pleasant social intercourse, should prove an effective way of counteracting the evil influence of the drink shops.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

CHAPTER I.

OF COLIN'S RETURN.

A BROAD beam of sunshine, travelling from the far west, came slanting in at the end oriel window of Castle Hill library. As its name might imply, Castle Hill stood somewhat high—high, at least, for the English Midlands. The house, an old one, often added to in the course of centuries, was more than a hundred feet above the village of Castlemere, half a mile distant.

It had, therefore, full benefits of breeze and light; and this lengthy, irregular room, with its four windows, its black carved oak, its hangings of dull green and old gold, enjoyed the latest kisses of the monarch of day. The hour for those kisses was not yet come. Wavelets of ether, shimmering billions of them to each beat of the venerable corner clock, pouring across the vast expanse of ninety-three millions of miles, landed on wall and carpet abundantly.

Mrs. Keith's mind was fully occupied with other matters than scientific causes for everyday phenomena as she paced the room with impatient steps, glancing in turn out of each front window, in quest of the expected dog-cart conveying Colin from the station. He was returning from three years on the Continent.

She was a handsome woman, tall and slender, with good features, and dark eyes of unusual size and beauty. The rich brown hair, which held many silver threads, was perfectly dressed, and was all her own. She carried herself with a touch of conscious stateliness, which, however, failed to hide her present restless mood. A fixed red spot in either cheek made the rest of her pale face paler; her lips worked nervously, and she continuously clenched and unclenched her right hand.

Giles Randolph had risen when she rose, and he now stood in the oriel window reading—a man of large build, over six feet in height, and robust in make, with massive shoulders. The face was strongly outlined, with a straight, solid nose, a good mouth under the heavy brown moustache, calm, sombre blue eyes dragged downward at their outer corners, and a complexion of deep red-brown hue. In the features was a trait not easy to decipher. There was fibre of character, and of a will to meet and crush difficulty; yet that dim inscription seemed to speak of something in the past that had mastered him, something that had given a bias to his life, leaving him under a shadow.

"Half-past six! He ought to be here. I can't think why he is not," Mrs. Keith was saying. "The train was due more than half an hour ago."

She took another turn.

XUM

"He must certainly have missed it. How vexatious! When does the next come in?"

"Twenty minutes past seven."

"But I mean the next train from Dover. He would not be able to catch our 7.20 at the junction, I'm sure. I do wish you would look it out for me."

Giles put down his book, and walked to a side-table, where a little fumbling resulted in the remark, "I don't see Bradshaw."

"It's there somewhere. I know—I put it on the top shelf of that bookcase."

He took down the dingy paper-covered volume, remarking in his deep voice, which contrasted with her somewhat querulous tones, "This train is often late."

"Oh, don't be sensible, pray! I'm not in the mood for it."

Possibly her companion was at a loss how to be the reverse. He turned over the pages, and presently remarked, "In case Colin should have missed——"

"Yes, yes. I understand all that. The time of the train is what I want."

Then came an apology. "I really don't mean to be cross, Giles. Somehow I can't help it."

He looked at her with sympathy. "Of course I understand. One knows what this must be to you—your own boy coming home."

"Yes. That is—he may be different."

"No fear. Colin will be Colin still. Ah! here is the page."

She had moved restlessly again, and now stood behind him. A curious breeze of feeling swept over her face; something of protestation, of resistance, for which nothing present seemed to account. Tears filled her eyes, and were with difficulty blinked away. But she replied in a tone of forced gaiety:

"You have no business to talk like that. To speak as if Colin were more to me than yourself. You know perfectly well that you both are my boys—always have been and always will be."

He spoke soothingly. "At all events, if there has been any difference, it has lain the other way—more indulgence for me, more strictness for him."

"Oh, surely not!" That which he meant for comfort proved rather to be exciting. "Don't say so, Giles! So hard as I have striven to make absolutely no difference—even in my love!"

"You have made none, beyond what was inevitable. Colin has the right to your greater love, and he is infinitely more lovable than I am. Venetian glass can't be handled like a bit of granite. Come, you are not going to worry yourself," he added. "Things are all right."

"I hope so. I shouldn't like to think——" She left the sentence unfinished, and began anew: "I often wonder, can one hold oneself even? I know what you mean by 'greater strictness' and 'Venetian glass.' Just because—because he is my own—I have tried to be sterner with him, and his sweetness has made it impossible. He is so lovable, as you say. And yet, dear as Colin is, there is something about you, Giles——"

"Of course, your own boy is and must be more to you than all the world beside."

"Yes, true—that is true!" she murmured.

"I should be the last ever to wish Colin to come second." Giles spoke with meaning, glad of the opportunity to say so much. In point of fact, Colin always had come second. "But here is the dog-cart."

Mrs. Keith's attempts at self-analysing were brushed aside. Colin was through the front door before they could leave the library, moving with an absence of hurry, yet somehow forestalling them. He kissed his mother quietly, shook hands with Giles, patted the old hound who followed him with sniffs and whines, exchanged some chaff with the stout butler which set that excellent retainer grinning with delight, and finally took possession of an armchair, asking and answering questions in a soft, deliberate undertone, which was the precise antithesis of his mother's variable voice.

He and Giles were made after different models. A stranger might easily have set down the latter as a man of four-and-thirty, while few guessed Colin to have passed his twenty-third year. Yet less than six weeks had divided the birth of the one from the birth of the other, and each now had got beyond his twenty-eighth birthday.

Colin was distinctly the shorter, though he gained in apparent height from his slightness. His fair, pale complexion and chiselled delicacy of feature contrasted with the powerful outlines of Giles; but the finely-developed forehead spoke of intellect. The blue eyes were singular, not unlike those of Giles in colour, intensely observant, yet full of dreamy abstraction.

He had suffered severely in health from an accident in boyhood. A heavy blow on the head had resulted in disabling headaches, which for years had prevented study. His pluck and high spirit had made him less of an invalid than might have been the case; still, education had been with him a negligible quantity, so far as any regular "curriculum" was concerned. He had read much by fits and starts, and had picked up any amount of general information; but steady work had been impossible. Foreign travel had at last been recommended, and much was hoped for from the three years of absence now ended.

Glad to be back? Yes, certainly. Though he had enjoyed himself no end—thanks to Giles—with a glance at the latter.

Then presently, "Giles, I've been thinking—it is cool of me to talk of this as 'home.' As if I had a shadow of right!"

"You have every right."

"Not a particle. I have been realising that lately. Now that I am stronger, I don't mean to be dependent upon you."

"Nonsense!" came emphatically, at the same moment that Mrs. Keith stood up.

"Going to dress for dinner," she murmured, in a constrained voice, and Colin showed surprise, since it was still early. He did not protest, but when she had disappeared his glance went enquiringly to Giles.

"Nervous," came in reply.

"What about?"

"I don't know."

Colin dropped the subject, and reverted to what he had been saying. "It is all very well, you know; but I happen to have a trifle of self-respect. Call it pride, if you like."

"Between you and me, pride is impossible."

"The future Mrs. Randolph——"

"Will feel as I feel, or she won't exist. What is mine is yours. And not a man in the Empire is less likely to marry."

"Anyhow, I intend to work."

"You shall do what you can, without suffering for it. But for pleasure, not necessity."

"It is a moral necessity that I should be independent."

"And deprive me of the one possibility of——" A word of strong protest cut into the utterance. "Yes, I know!" Giles spoke calmly and solidly. "I promised not to say it again. No need that I should. You understand. I wish you also to understand that in no conceivable circumstances while I live will Castle Hill cease to be your home."

"So be it, then. Meanwhile, I intend to work."

"At what?"

"Modelling, of course. Will the mater be much exercised?"

He dropped the words slowly.

"I don't see why she should."

"She always hated to see me fingering clay. I never could conceive why. It is the one thing I can do."

"Better for you, at any rate, than headwork."

"'Yes. That is—he may be different.'"

"My dear fellow! Do you suppose sculpture is not head-work?"

"Better than books, I should have said. We must fit up a studio for you."

Colin murmured a soft "Thanks." He added, "I've done a lot of modelling lately—in Paris first, of course."

"Ah! that was what kept you there so long."

"I went through a regular course. This winter I've had a splendid time in Italy, studying the great masters. Plaster casts want a lot of practice. I've not made much way with them yet."

"Don't try for the present. Modelling in clay will give full scope for your powers, and a practised moulder will do the casting far better. For a wonder, I know the man for you in Market Oakley—a young fellow with talent. I shall like to encourage him."

"I dare say. But the cost——"

"Will be my concern. When you are receiving hundreds for a bust, you shall pay for your own casting."

"Ah! when! But I mean to stand alone."

"What are a few pounds more or less between you and me?"

"Well, perhaps for a time!" reluctantly. "I had no end of encouragement abroad. Some of my attempts won really good opinions."

"Delighted to hear it," said Giles cordially. "What do you think of the schoolroom for your studio? It is out of the way, and has no room over. You will want a skylight window, I fancy, and a tap of water, and a modelling stool, and instruments. Then there is a small inner room, which will be useful. We will have it all put in order at once. You must be properly equipped at the outset."

"Giles, you are a good fellow!" murmured Colin.

CHAPTER II.

OF MIDNIGHT MOVEMENTS.

"HOW do you do?" a precise voice said. It was not needful to announce Mr. Thomas Dugdale. He was almost as much at home in the house as its proper inmates, or he counted himself so. If a door were open, he walked in; if not, the butler opened it, but did not venture to treat him like a caller.

The greeting was meant for Colin. He never said "How do you do?" to the others, since they met so often.

He was elderly, composed, critical, daintily neat every inch of him, from the smooth, well-cut hair and the smooth-shaven face to the immaculate shoes, which never, on the muddiest day, managed to become soiled. Extreme exactitude, inside and out, was his prevailing characteristic. He lived alone in a small house on the estate, originally built by a former owner for an undesirable mother-in-law. Mr. Dugdale might have found a home with his widowed daughter on a neighbouring small property, but he preferred "freedom."

Dinner over, Colin, in a cosy chair, usurped most of the talk, till Mr. Dugdale's appearance.

Mrs. Keith looked often from one to the other of "her boys," as she called them, trying to impress upon both that neither was more to her than the other. They, manlike, would have taken the fact for granted. She could not let it alone. If she said "Dear Colin," she dragged in a "Dear Giles" within two minutes. If she laid an affectionate hand on Giles' shoulder, she carefully gave a like caress to Colin. The balancing of affection became a degree irksome. Mr. Dugdale's entrance made a not unwelcome diversion.

"Tired of travelling at last?" he suggested. "Three years of it—enough for the most voracious appetite. What is to be the next step?"

"Settle down at home," Giles replied for Colin.

"Well, perhaps—for a while. Give folks time to turn round."

Mr. Dugdale took off his far-sighted glasses with which he had surveyed Colin, put them away, and with dainty finger-tips adjusted his near-sighted pince-nez, pulling forth a letter.

"Something to interest you here. A response to my letter. Signs of yielding too. It takes the old lady six weeks to evolve an answer."

Mrs. Keith saw the writing. "Mrs. Wyverne!" she exclaimed.

Colin showed interest. "How about Phyllys?" he asked. "Something was said lately about getting her to visit us."

"Mrs. Wyverne ought to consent," stated Mrs. Keith. "Giles will be in that neighbourhood, and he means to try persuasion—not asking leave beforehand."

"Going to storm the fortress," suggested Colin, with one of his noiseless laughs. "Mind you don't capture by mistake the unspeakable Barbara."

"Not likely! Barbara must be a person to whom distance lends enchantment," remarked Giles.

"We have nothing to do with Miss Pringle. It is Phyllys whom we want. Certainly not Barbara." Mrs. Keith knitted her brows over the notion.

Mr. Dugdale began to fold up his letter in disgust.

"Barbara Pringle is an excellent person of her kind," he said stiffly. "Well-meaning and conscientious. Most people are well-meaning. But the bane of womanhood is to be always in the right. Barbara Pringle is always in the right. She never makes a mistake. Therefore she is monotonous and uninteresting."

"Let us hope devoutly that Phyllys sometimes blunders," laughed Colin. He saw the vanishing letter, and added: "But you were going to read something."

"Nothing, nothing." Mr. Dugdale waved the subject aside with his hand. "Merely a passing idea. Barbara Pringle has usurped its place. Inadvertently I interrupted somebody, or somebody interrupted me. In either case I apologise."

Glances were exchanged by the others. Mr. Dugdale crossed his legs, and contemplated the empty fireplace.

"The Infinitely Little!" he mused. "It may be masculine, but it is more commonly feminine. Woman, when she is small, is very small indeed. When last I had the pleasure of seeing Barbara Pringle, I should have described her as an excellent example of the Infinitely Little. Good, no doubt; ineffably good. But narrow—narrow—painfully narrow in her conceptions of life. A woman whose whole universe might be packed into an eggshell."

"Think what her life has been," suggested Colin. "Forty years in a Yorkshire rut."

"Narrowness is a matter of mental make. Not of circumstances."

"No doubt; but circumstances tell upon one's mental make. A plant, whatever its make, can't develop without light and air. Miss Pringle has had neither."

"If she had, she could not have made use of them."

"And the family aim is to rescue Phyllys from a like fate. Well, Giles should be equal to the old lady, even backed up by the redoubtable Barbara."

"Barbara Pringle is a woman not easily managed."

"Ten years since you saw her," asserted Mrs. Keith.

Mr. Dugdale put his finger-tips together, and entered on an elaborate discussion of dates. He proved to his own satisfaction that not ten years, but precisely nine and a half, had elapsed since the date of his visit to the Yorkshire village, where lived old Mrs. Wyverne and her pair of granddaughters. Then he stood up, his eyes bent upon Colin.

"Sorry; no. Can't stay longer. Busy; and so are you." He was still chafing under his supposed slight. "Ta-ta, all of you. Whom on earth has Colin grown like?"

The question was shot forth as he was in the act of turning away. He stood still frowning.

"It is generally decided that I am like nobody," remarked the object of his scrutiny. "Not the mater, in any case."

"You are as much like the Lama of Thibet as like your mother. But there is a look—for the life of me I can't locate the original."

"I should have said Colin was like everybody in turn," Mrs. Keith observed carelessly.

Mr. Dugdale, with wrinkled brows, pursued his quest.

"Can't imagine," he repeated. "It is a definite resemblance." He frowned anew, standing deep in thought. "I have it! That old portrait in oils, which used to hang here—I never could understand why it should have been banished to the gallery; it's one of the best things in the house. Of course, Colin has no right to any resemblance, but certainly a moment ago I caught a look extraordinarily like."

Mrs. Keith went off into peals of laughter. She held her handkerchief to her lips, overpowered with merriment. Colin laughed sympathetically in his silent fashion, though there seemed to be no adequate cause; while the set gravity of Giles's features deepened.

"My dear Mr. Dugdale! You really are too comical! The idea of likening Colin to that ancient fogey! Young, was he? Yes, I daresay he was—two hundred years ago! But it's really too rich—too funny!" Her laughter filled the room. She was not often noisy, but for once she let herself go.

"Oh, very well. Good-night! In future I shall keep my opinions to myself!" Mr. Dugdale walked off, affronted. He could stand anything better than ridicule. Giles went with him to the door, and on his return Mrs. Keith's merriment had subsided. Colin was saying:

"I have reverted lately to my old love—sculpture."

There was a moment of protest.

"I hope you are not going to be so absurd as to take up that fad again."

"She went lightly up the bank."—p. 682.

"If I have the gift, why not use it?" asked Colin in a level tone.

"You have not. It is a mere fancy."

"A fancy that has lived twenty years."

"You will never succeed." Her manner showed annoyance.

"But at least he can try," put in Giles.

"It will be an utter waste of time."

"That was not the opinion of an expert. He said there was no doubt about my having the gift, if I could work hard enough to cultivate it."

"You won't. You will never keep up anything long."

The words brought a shadow to both faces, more especially to that of Giles.

"If you wish to find work, pray take up something worth doing." She was greatly in earnest, and the red spot in either cheek began to burn.

"This is worth doing, if Colin wishes it," said Giles gravely. He counted her opposition unkind.

The subject was dropped, but Mrs. Keith looked far from happy, and her face fell into a haggard set. She went to bed early, Colin soon retiring also; and Giles then retreated to his private den near the billiard-room, where he could be secure against interruptions. Since he managed his own estate, without an agent, he was sufficiently busy. Papers had to be examined, letters had to be written, and this was his time of quiet.

More than two hours had gone by, when a consciousness came over him of something or somebody moving in the house.

The servants he knew would be all gone to bed. It was past midnight. He opened his door and listened, standing out in the long narrow passage. Opposite was the door into the billiard-room, and at some distance to the left this passage joined the central hall.

The whole house seemed to lie in darkness, in absolute repose. But, as he listened, he heard again that suggestion of a sound—hardly a footstep, hardly a creak, yet a token of somebody stirring. Then he caught sight of a needle of light falling athwart a corner of the hall, as if cast from above.

He took an unlighted candle and a box of matches, and groped his way along the passage into the hall. Long before he got there the needle of light had disappeared.

Again he listened, but could detect no sound. Mrs. Keith, or one of the maids, might have had occasion to get something from another room; but what puzzled him was that the ray had seemed to travel from the long corridor on the first floor, usually known as the gallery. Its position and slant were explainable in no other way.

Not wishing to disturb sleepers by stumbling about in the dark, he lighted his candle, and went quietly upstairs. Mrs. Keith's door was fast shut, so was Colin's. He merely glanced in that direction, and then turned to the gallery, pacing it deliberately. The gleam of his candle fell on a double row of old pictures, both portraits and landscapes, adorning the right-hand wall, the left being broken by many windows.

Another glimmer ahead. The gallery ran partly round two sides of the house, and this ray came from beyond the corner turn. He went faster, and probably the light of his own candle foretold his approach. There was a hurried sound, almost a scramble, then he heard rapid footsteps and the shutting of a door. When he rounded the corner, of course he saw nothing. Whoever it might have been, plainly that person did not wish to be seen, and had evaded him by going through a door which led to the back staircase.

Thither also went Giles, no longer troubling himself to disguise the fact of being in pursuit. He dashed full pelt down the back-stairs, which ended on a part of the ground-floor divided by a swing-door from the main hall. Still, no one was visible. He pushed the door open and passed through. The house lay in silence and darkness.

Giles walked on and turned back, searching round and about for a clue, and failing to find one. He could discover no signs of any presence except his own. Presently, in his peregrinations, coming again near Mrs. Keith's door, he saw a light below it, and wondered that he had not earlier noted the same. He tapped lightly.

Mrs. Keith opened the door, and faced him, with widely-opened eyes, her hair streaming loose, and a dressing-gown on. She breathed quickly.

"What—what is the matter? Anything wrong? Thieves—is it thieves? I thought I heard thieves."

She clutched his arm as for protection.

"I heard someone moving, and I wished to ask if you had left your room?"

"I? No. I shouldn't have dared. I heard sounds, and I was terrified—terrified! I locked my door, and didn't know what to do," she panted. "Steps coming and going! So strange, isn't it? Such a relief to see you! But what can it mean? If they are in the house still——"

"I don't think it could be a thief."

"No. But who could it have been? You don't—you don't believe in ghosts!" hysterically.

"Ghosts don't carry candles and scuttle down back staircases. What about the maids?"

"All in bed long ago. I'll speak to them to-morrow, but I know beforehand. It must have been a thief." She broke into a laugh, her eyes unnaturally large and staring; and her hand went to her side. "The fright has made me feel so ill."

"I think your best plan is to go quietly to bed. There is nothing to be alarmed about. If it was a thief, he has taken himself off, and I shall go round to look at all the fastenings."

"Do, please. I was so terrified. I shall not get to sleep for hours after this."

"No need to feel anxious. I do not mean to go to bed at present," he said reassuringly.

"I am so glad. I shall feel safe while you are about," she murmured.

He went round thoroughly, but found no door or window unbolted. If a thief had entered, it was difficult to imagine how he could have escaped.

CHAPTER III.

OF MRS. WYVERNE'S GRANDDAUGHTERS.

"PHYLLYS BELINDA WYVERNE." She wrote the words in large capitals with the point of a decrepit sunshade upon a patch of smooth sand by the wayside, and read them aloud.

"And that is Me," she murmured. "That always was Me. That always will be Me. Yet, when one comes to think of it, such a different Me now from what I used to be in the old, old days."

So far as looks went, she might have been between seventeen and twenty-one.

"And such a different Me from what I might have been, if they had lived!" she added.

She allowed a handful of dry sand to stream between her fingers, and Wiggles, the rough Skye terrier, with bright eyes under a shaggy penthouse of hair, had the benefit of it. She broke into laughter at his indignant bark.

"Your temper is too easily upset, Wiggles. You should wait till you really have something to bark at. There are worse things in life than a sprinkle of sand. O, infinitely worse, dear Wiggles!"

Above the written words rose a steep bank, clothed with trees and underwood. She stood, her head thrown back, as if meditating an assault. She dearly loved climbing, and nobody was at hand to protest, except one who owned no right of protestation. She believed herself to be alone. Wiggles knew better, and for a second time he ran to inspect the intruder.

XUM

A second time, however, he decided that it was no case for a rousing alarum. He was a dog of discrimination.

Phyllys pursued her soliloquy in a voice which, though subdued, was full, bell-toned and clear in accentuation :

"On the whole I don't wish to be anybody else. But that is not to say that I would not rather be somewhere else. O, Wiggles——" And she broke into vehement energy—"How I long—long to get away! Right away, absolutely away—away from everything and everybody! I'm tired, tired of it all. I feel as if I were shut up in a prison for evermore, never to get out, never to see, never to know, never to reach beyond this little cramped round. I want things different, things new, and people to understand."

The features of her unknown spectator relaxed with a touch of amusement. He was about to make a forward move, when checked by a spring on her part. She went lightly up the bank, as a sailor might have done, and proceeded to swing herself into the branches of a medium-sized tree. Evidently tree-climbing was one of her accomplishments. He drew back, fearing to startle her if she should glance round in the midst of her acrobatic feat.

She settled herself on the fork of a bough, leant against the trunk, and sighed with content.

The bough on which she rested gave a creak. "I say, I must not stay here too long ; but it is delicious. Why does one grow too old to enjoy things that one likes?"

Silence was broken by the trills of an enthusiastic wren, pouring forth its little heart in song. Then a cricket chirped ; and a large bumble-bee swung heavily by ; and a dragon-fly with iridescent wings swept to and fro in fierce dashes after his prey.

"Wough!" objected Wiggles, feeling himself left in the lurch.

"Hold your tongue, Wiggles. I'm coming soon."

Her gaze wandered over the wide expanse beyond the opposite wall—a wall of loose stones piled scientifically together, without aid from mortar. Grass fields, divided by similar walls, sloped downward into a hollow, where lay the clustering stone houses of a village, well-named "Midfell," since all around, at distances varying from two to four miles, broad moor-fells reared their summits. Their clear wide lines stood against a sky of pure blue ; and on their sides the bright green of grass-land contrasted with the richer green of July bracken, while other parts had begun to blush with the glow of opening heather. All was grazing land, varied only by uncultivated moor. No trace of corn could be seen.

It was a fair and calm look-out ; so still that the whisper of a brooklet near might be heard, on its way to join the main stream which cut the village in half. Phyllys could see that stream from where she sat, and a stout bridge over it, beside which was her own home. Now and again a low "moo" floated up from one of the meadows ; then the sharp bark of a dog, and, again, a shrill child's voice faintly wafted.

"Wough!" protested Wiggles anew.

He went on a third survey of the stranger, feeling himself responsible for his mistress's safety. There was a slight "Sh-sh!" and the stranger's eyes gazed straight into his. Wiggles knew that no harm lay behind those sombre blue orbs, and he wagged his tail.

"Good dog!" the stranger said aloud.

Phyllys overheard, and uttered an "Oh!" to herself. She had been well lectured on the fact that at twenty-three she was years too old for tree-climbing, and she never now ventured on the amusement, except in strictest privacy. There was nothing for it but to wait till the other should have gone on. Owing to the nature of the ground, a dignified descent was impossible. She would have to come down with a drop, a run, and a leap—enjoyable enough, but not to be permitted before spectators.

"Pardon me," the intruder said, advancing to the foot of the bank, and lifting his straw hat. "I could not help hearing your name. As it happens that I am on my way to your house, perhaps I may venture to introduce myself. If we are not acquainted, we ought to be."

Phyllys paid but divided attention. She had discovered that the bough which supported her was unequal to its task, and was fast giving way. If only the tiresome interloper would hurry on and leave her to scramble down in comfort, all would be right. Unfortunately he showed no such intention.

"My name is Giles Randolph," he was remarking.

"Oh, I say!" whispered Phyllys, as her support yielded more pronouncedly. She clutched the trunk.

"I hardly think you are comfortable up there," the deep voice said with exasperating deliberation, while its owner steadied himself for instant action.

"It is most delightful," hardily asserted Phyllys. "But if you will please go on, round the corner, I will come after you."

She was chafing with impatience, for each moment was of importance, and he stood as if an earthquake would fail to dislodge him.

'I think you had better let me help you down."

"Help me!" with a laugh, and an involuntary movement.

The slight jerk was fatal, and the bough snapped clean off, leaving her in a position of peril. She strove to cling to a stem too large for her grasp, and hung over the road which lay far enough beneath to mean, if she fell, at the least broken bones.

Three bounds carried Giles up the bank, and as she dropped he caught her with outstretched arms. She was instantly conscious of his rock-like strength and firmness. Then he set her on the bank, and holding her hand, leaped down with her to the road.

"You manage splendidly," was her first remark. "But I could have got down alone."

"I hope you might have been able, if I had not been there."

They stood face to face, each trying to make out the other. She noted with a sense of pleasure his powerful make, the strongly-knit frame, the well-set solid head, the sunburnt face and calm grave eyes. "I like him," she said to herself.

And he liked her, though he did not definitely say so, even to himself. Despite the second cousinship, he had never seen Phyllys since her early childhood, and he had never been to Midfell. Intercourse between the Castle Hill folks and the two granddaughters had been steadily discouraged by the kind but strict old grandmother; and during late years Barbara had used her influence to stiffen the family separation.

Phyllys was not what Giles had expected to find. Whether pretty or not was a matter of opinion; but certainly he thought her engaging. She was slight and active, with slim brown hands, perfect in shape, and high-instepped feet. Her complexion was a clear pale brown; the eyes were rich violet in hue, not large, but with long and thick black lashes, while the eyebrows were of a warm chestnut, matching the soft loosely-knotted hair. She had a trick of half-closing her eyes, so that the upper and nether fringes all but met, and only a glimmer of violet light crept through.

"We want you to pay us a visit at Castle Hill."

She flushed up.

"Do you really? That is what I have longed to do. But Mrs. Keith——"

"Mrs. Keith is as anxious as anybody to have you."

"Really!" in surprise. "How kind of her! But why? We are strangers."

Giles had long felt the puzzle insoluble.

"It isn't as if she and I were related," the girl added.

"No; she is merely a connection even of mine. But she has acted the part of a mother for years, and Colin and I are brothers."

"I should like to know Colin. Ought I to call him 'Mr. Keith'? Everybody says 'Colin.' How odd it was that Wiggles did not bark at you! He must have taken an extraordinary fancy. I always say Wiggles is a reader of character."

Her face broke into a smile, the eyelashes curling with mischief. Giles's smile was different. It could not be said to "break," but rather to dawn reluctantly, as if under protest. It was rare, but when it did appear it transformed the grave face. Phyllys was conscious of its pleasantness, and she murmured: "I almost think you and I are going to be friends."

CHAPTER IV.

OF THINGS PAST AND PRESENT.

MRS. WYVERNE waited in the front sitting-room of Burn Cottage, close to the window, looking out upon the stone bridge and running stream, the perpetual murmur of which came pleasantly to her ears. She always took care to be ready some time before she had to start on any expedition, having reached an age when haste and flurry are undesirable.

She was stout and heavy in figure, but she held herself with dignity, and there was a Quaker-like sincerity about her handsome old face. Her dress was of black silk, good as to material, studiously plain in make, and her large bonnet was a semi-copy of the olden Quaker type. In earlier years she had been drawn to join for a while the Quaker community, and she still greatly admired many of their methods.

By her side stood a small table, on which lay her spectacle-case, her large-print Bible, her knitting basket, and her writing-case. The centre of the room was overfilled by a round table, remnant of a bygone age. The walls were adorned with texts, some printed and framed in wood, some worked elaborately in silks on perforated cardboard, with fancy edgings of home manufacture. A row of devotional books, most of them printed fifty years earlier, with faded bindings, stood upon the elderly chiffoniere.

Grace and charm had evidently not been the aim of those who had arranged the interior of Burn Cottage.

The elder granddaughter, Barbara Pringle, only child of Mrs. Wyverne's only daughter—between whom and the father of Phyllys a wide gap in age had existed—had inherited nothing of the old lady's good looks. She was clumsily made, bony, and uncouth, with limp, lustreless hair, dressed in a flat and unbecoming style, features of an exaggerated type, and an expression habitually uncomfortable. Her dress seemed to have been put together anyhow, with no effort after what might suit the individual, and with total disregard to congruity in colours. Altogether, the effect made an unhappy exchange for the dignified simplicity of the elder lady.

Barbara Pringle was a good woman, but not so good as she counted herself, which augured a lack of humility. One marked virtue she had: a supreme and engrossing devotion to her grandmother, for whom she would have done or borne almost anything without a complaint. But out of this sprang something which was not a virtue—an intense jealousy of anybody who should interfere with her monopoly of the grandmother's affection. Since Phyllys naturally came in for a share, and a goodly share, of the latter, it followed that Barbara could see no good in Phyllys.

She did not know herself to be unfair. Few people discover that defect in themselves, and she was great at self-deception. Never for a moment did she admit, even in her innermost consciousness, that rank jealousy underlay her persistent condemnation of the younger, more attractive, more lovable cousin.

Things were doubtless hard for her. During more than thirty years she had all her own way, had been the only granddaughter in the house, had known herself to be exclusively necessary to the old lady, who to her had been mother, father, all in combination.

Then Phyllys, the only child of Mrs. Wyverne's beloved son, was also left an orphan, and she, too, was adopted by the large-hearted, though not wide-minded, old lady. At first Barbara had not realised what this would mean.

Not till the charming, wilful child of thirteen arrived; not till her winsomeness had been exerted over house and village; not till the newcomer had begun to reign supreme in the little world around, did jealousy spring in Barbara's heart. She failed to recognise the poisonous weed.

So, being what she was, a good woman, but not in character noble or generous, she took twisted views of Phyllys, and saw her actions from unjust points of view.

For instance, that Phyllys should not, at the present moment, have returned in time for the weekly meeting, got up by herself and Miss Robins, and good-humouredly tolerated by the Vicar, was a case of rank perversity.

"You told her to be back, grandmother."

"I really do not feel sure. Phyllys is aware of my wishes. I shall have to reprimand her."

Mrs. Wyverne drew out a huge old pinchbeck watch, then hunted in her pocket for a letter. Her receptacles for floating goods did not lie out of reach.

"We shall be in time if we start in a few minutes." Being a trifle hard of hearing, she preferred the front row. "I had another letter from Mr. Dugdale this morning. He writes strongly on the duty of letting Phyllys become acquainted with Giles and his people."

Barbara spoke tartly. "I suppose by 'his people' you mean the Keiths. If Phyllys gets among them she will be utterly spoilt."

Barbara, accustomed to have the upper hand in these questions, saw with amazement a look of indecision.

"It is out of the question," she added roughly. "There is no knowing what might come of it."

"I must do what is for the child's best interests. Perhaps I have realised too strongly the other side of the question. She is twenty-three. I cannot always refuse to allow her other relatives to see her. Giles Randolph has no one in the world nearer to him than Phyllys."

"Than us, you mean."

"Yes; but the circumstances are different. If Giles should die unmarried, Phyllys would inherit the property."

"Grannie," a musical voice broke in, "here is Giles Randolph. He has come to see us."

Nothing could have been more apposite to the run of Mrs. Wyverne's thoughts at the moment, and she took the intrusion more philosophically than might have been expected. Two minutes sufficed for Giles's explanation. Being in the neighbourhood, he had promised to bring a message from Mrs. Keith, and had granted himself the pleasure of seeing again his great-aunt. He had walked across the moors from the station, and had overtaken Phyllys. Mrs. Wyverne, he heard, had an engagement; but he purposed staying a night at the inn, hoping that she would spare him an hour next morning.

Giles used so few words that it was remarkable how much he conveyed. Mrs. Wyverne was not glad to see him, and she refrained from saying that she was; but her charming smile served in place of that which she would have condemned as an untruth. Barbara, declining to smile, waited in glum silence.

"I am sorry that we cannot offer to take you in here," observed Mrs. Wyverne; and the involuntary word "sorry" caused her some after-twinges. "The cottage is small, and we have no spare room. But you will be comfortable at the inn." Then she weighed carefully her conflicting duties, and decided to remain at home. Barbara and Phyllys would go without her to the meeting.

There was no escape for Phyllys. Her face fell; but it was evident that the old lady wished for a tête-à-tête with Giles. Barbara, curtly nodding her good-bye, marched off, and Phyllys reluctantly followed. She had learnt obedience in a strict school, and, though inwardly rebellious, she made no outward sign.

Then Giles bent his faculties to the task of winning over the old lady. Now that he had seen Phyllys, he was anxious for his own sake, at least, as much as for the sake of gratifying Mrs. Keith, to bring about the proposed visit. He did not know that the path to success had been made smoother by Mr. Dugdale; but he did realise that it might be a difficult path.

However, when Giles chose to be liked, he did not often fail in his aim.

CHAPTER V.

OF A BURNISHED STREAM

PHYLLYS stood, lost in a dream, beside the stream as it flowed through a field some three hundred yards distant from the house.

It swept here round a curve, its course being partly arrested by a bank of shingle; and beyond the shingle, in its wandering, it poured in a quick, rustling flow, bubbling out soft whispers and singing to itself.

This hour after breakfast was commonly Phyllys's most free time. At eleven o'clock, if not sooner, Barbara would remorselessly summon her in to practise and read and darn. Time spent in the open-air was wasted in the elder cousin's estimation. Barbara believed in a rapid constitutional, to and from a given point within a given time, for health; but she never lounged under a tree, never dallied by a stream, in dreamy thought. That with her meant "idleness."

With Phyllys it neither meant nor was idleness. She was not idle, standing on the grass bank, motionless, her hands clasped behind her back. She wore no hat, and a slight breeze stirred her hair, bringing forth reddish gleams in the sunlight.

Her mind was hard at work. She loved Nature, loved the beauty of flower and fell, and read meanings in the voices of running water, rustling leaves, singing birds. These things appealed to her impressionable nature, and drew her on to deeper thought. But this particular morning her mind was bent in a new direction, being chiefly occupied with Giles.

Once before, in childhood, she had seen him, and often since she had heard of "Giles and Colin," though not in terms of approbation. Mrs. Wyverne had rather implied than asserted disapproval; but according to Barbara, Giles and his friends were one and all to be avoided as objectionable people, from whose influence to withhold Phyllys was a matter of plain duty; which opinion naturally made her want to know them; and for years her dream of delights had been a visit to Castle Hill.

Now she might be again invited; probably would be. And—"Oh, if only she might go!"

The tinkle of a bell aroused her. She was often thus recalled. But already! She did not realise how long she had stood there. Was the whole of this lovely day to be wasted indoors? She walked back with a lagging step.

Within doors the cloud on her face vanished. Barbara was not visible, the grandmother was smiling, and Giles stood in an attitude of expectation.

"Put on your stout boots, child, and take a wrap. Giles wishes for a walk with you."

The black fringes widened with a start of delight.

"He does not know his way about, and Barbara is too busy," explained Mrs. Wyverne, apologising to herself. She felt uneasy; but the managing granddaughter being out of reach, her resolution had not been proof against Giles' determination. After all, the two were cousins, and since she had just granted her consent to three weeks at Castle Hill for Phyllys, a walk now could make little difference. The decision seemed to have been lifted out of her hands, and, despite her bewilderment, she looked with gratified eyes upon the great-nephew whom she had so long refused to see.

"Must I be back at eleven, grannie?"

"Not to-day, for once. Giles wishes to go to the head of the dale if you can walk so far."

"Oh, of course I can. That will be splendid. I have not been there for ages upon ages."

"My dear, you should not make use of such exaggerated expressions."

Phyllys tried to wear a penitent face as she fled. "If Barbara should come in!" was the fear. Barbara might upset all.

"Phyllys is a dear child, but far too impulsive," the old lady remarked. "It is desirable that she should be trained in habits of self-restraint."

Giles refrained from saying what he thought.

Fortunately, Barbara failed to appear, and the two set off at a brisk pace.

Phyllys was a quick walker, and she easily kept up with the pace adopted by Giles. She was in a state of jubilant exultation, but this was veiled. While lacing her boots she had resolved to behave with dignity, and not to allow her friendship to be regarded by him as a thing to be lightly won.

But miles and miles of happiness lay before her—miles and miles of fresh air, of freedom, exercise, pleasant companionship. There was no need to dwell on what might lie beyond. There was no need to anticipate Barbara's comments. When the time should come to listen to them in all their acidity, she would have had her day of delights, and no one would be able to rob her of the memory.

"Is this what you call the dale-head?" asked Giles.

"Perhaps more properly higher up. But I think we mean the whole of the valley as far as you can see, and beginning here. Isn't it pretty?"

It was much more than pretty. She used a word inadequate.

They were seated close to the river, on its grass-bank. Not the little Midfell stream, but a more important water-course; a river to which the Midfell stream was a tributary.

It flowed between tolerably steep banks, and the colour of the water was that of a burnished red-brown chestnut, almost mahogany. Hundreds of stones, large enough to act as small breakwaters, lay scattered on the river-bed, and around each separate stone curled a perpetual wave, foam-white, with a gleam of golden light shining as from a fairy-lamp at its centre. This was repeated times without number.

Behind them and in front were rounded fells, like a series of land waves, struck into immobility, forming the sides of the valley; and every fell differed from its neighbour. Here was one shaded in purple and brown, there another all bright grassy green; yet another, dark from summit to base with waist-high masses of bracken; and a fourth clothed in rich patches of dull red, purple rather than crimson, from heather bloom. A little way further a round-topped hill had donned a veil of blue gauze. Away to the left, much higher, might be seen a solitary farmhouse; a rough pathway, deluged with stones, winding steeply thither.

"They would give us milk at the farm," Phyllys remarked. But Giles, with a smile, produced sandwiches and a cup.

"I don't know any place like this," she murmured after their simple luncheon. She was in a state of measureless content, not only enjoying the beauty herself, but sure that Giles enjoyed it no less. He said "[illegible]," and she hardly looked at him; yet she knew. That was the one thing she had lacked and longed for in such scenes as the present—somebody who could feel with her. It made all the difference.

"Nor I." He had been thinking how like her hair was in tint to the burnished chestnut of the water, and it was true that he thoroughly enjoyed the scene. "One hardly expects such a spot in England. Few of us know our own country."

Phyllys lay back on the sloping bank, resting her head on folded arms, and looking at the sky. That gave Giles a fuller view than he had yet gained of her blue, wistful eyes. He forgot river and fell in their contemplation.

"I wonder," she murmured, "whether other worlds are half as lovely as this." She sat up suddenly. "Tell me about your home."

"You would find it flat." He refrained from letting her know that she would soon see for herself. "No fells, no mountain torrents."

"And the house——"

"Is respectably old. There was a castle—once. Only a wall of it remains now."

"And Mrs. Keith and 'Colin' live there with you. He isn't really your cousin, is he?"

XUM

Giles explained the connection. Thomas Randolph, his grandfather, had one son and one daughter. The son, James, married; and his wife died soon after the birth of their only child —"Myself," interjected Giles—the widow dying a little later, thus leaving an infant possessor of the Castle Hill property. The daughter, Annie Randolph, married Geoffrey Keith, and she too died early; after which her husband married again, his second wife being a Miss Cecil Reeves. They had one little boy, named Colin.

"So at best, he can only be called my step-cousin; hardly even that. But when my mother died, Mrs. Keith undertook the care of me, and on the death of my father that arrangement became permanent. Colin and I have been brothers from babyhood."

"I understand now. It always rather puzzled me. And was he not ill for a long time? Somebody said he had an accident when he was a boy, and didn't get over it for years."

"Yes." A stern set came to Giles's face, darkening it as a landscape is darkened by a cloud passing over the sun. Phyllys was perplexed.

"Barbara is as much your cousin as I am," she remarked, saying the first thing that came into her head. "I suppose you should have asked her first to visit Castle Hill." ("Heaven forbid!" was on Giles's lips, though no sound issued.) "But she never goes anywhere, so I come next."

"I think you come first," he replied drily, and she laughed.

"If only I had the least hope of going!"

"I don't think it will be long before we meet again—one way or another." His manner said that he intended it should not be. "Till then I hope you will remember that you offered me your friendship."

Her colour went up.

"That was silly. We did not know one another. I spoke without thinking."

"It would disappoint me if you took your words back."

"But it was too soon. I am always saying things in a hurry, and then wishing I had not." She twisted a grass blade round her fingers. "Does one ever quite conquer that habit?"

He ignored the question.

"Do you not think we know one another well enough now?"

She lifted her eyelashes gradually.

"Of course, I've rather wanted a friend—sometimes," she admitted. "The only one I had went away. There are Mr. and Mrs. Hazel, but Barbara is always trying to keep me away from them. And besides, they are older—so much older. But people ought to wait till they are perfectly sure."

"You do not feel sure yet?"

The steady purposefulness of his gaze held her spellbound. It was not that he saw deeply, but that he stirred deep feeling in her. For a moment he had a curious sense that he might do what he willed with Phyllys.

It did not last. She dropped her eyes and held up her head, and the spell was broken. Moreover, he did not yet will anything further. Their mutual knowledge, each of the other, was small, and he only felt certain that he wished to know her better. Besides, he was a man of punctilious honour, and she had been confided to his care.

So they reverted to surface topics, and no more was said about friendship. The word to Giles meant little. If he wanted anything, he wanted much more; but it served as a stepping-stone to intimacy. To Phyllys it meant a good deal; more than would have been guessed from her next careless remark: "I was afraid it meant to be a wet day. That would have been provoking."

"There was an early shower, I believe."

"Just the Pride o' the Morning."

He looked inquiringly.

"It's a saying about here. When a little early shower comes, that does not mean rain later, they say, 'Oh, it's juist the pride o' the morning.' Mr. Hazel sometimes calls me that"—laughingly.

The name sounded far from inappropriate, but it was with a sense of inward revolt that he asked, "Who is Mr. Hazel?"

"Our Vicar. Such a kind man! But I know why he calls me so. It was one day——"

"Yes. These local sayings are interesting."

"I don't often give in, but things were rather worrying that day, and I had a silly little cry by myself in the meadow. He came upon me in the middle of it, and he said it was just an early shower—'just the Pride o' the Morning.' He told me one must not expect to have everything always smooth, but he hoped mine was going to be a happy life. And since then, when we meet, he often says, 'Well, little Pride o' the Morning, how goes the world with you now?'"

"I should like to know your Vicar."

"Would you? Barbara doesn't approve of him."

"Barbara and I might not agree."

HOW TO READ PICTURES.

By C. E. Skinner.

IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY TRAFALGAR SQUARE.

GREAT numbers of picture galleries have been opened to the general public of late years by considerable effort and at considerable expense. Some disappointment has been felt by those who have made the effort, and some disappointment has also been felt by those who have availed themselves of the opportunity. You have only to watch the countenances of a great part of the visitors on a free day to trace this feeling on the part of the sightseers. They wander listlessly through these homes of art; they see many pictures they can—to use their own expressive words—"make nothing of," because they do not know what to expect from a picture. They do not know what it has got to say to them.

"Painting has a language of its own," and they have never learnt it. They feel stupid over it, it vexes them to be stupid; they make silly comments, out of sheer shyness, because they do not know what to say, and they do not like to say nothing. They have gained nothing from looking; they are no richer than they were before, and they go out no wiser than they came in.

I am afraid this is only too accurate a description of the feelings of a considerable number of those for whose especial benefit many of the picture galleries have been opened free.

Perhaps some of us who have encountered difficulties in the study of art may be able to put before others a few leading points which may serve, at any rate, as some help in the difficult art of looking at a picture.

In the first place, let us go to a picture gallery to learn. The artist is a teacher; he speaks to us in a picture (painting is his language), and he tells out in it what he has seen, just as an author tells it out in words. He has trained his eyes, and he sees beauties you and I do not see, and reveals them to us in his work.

Art is a revelation—a revelation means bringing out what is hidden—and artists are first seers, then revealers. Remember, "seeing is a distinct art," an art which requires cultivation, like every other art. Artists have trained themselves to see. There are "secrets in nature." Much in nature is locked up which art sets free. Art has the key, and the artist puts the key into the lock and discloses secret chambers full of the treasures of beauty. Let us take our stand before a picture by one of the great artists, either in the National Gallery, the Tate Gallery, or the Wallace Collection, and ask the artist what he has got to show us.

What are we to look for? Composition, colour, atmosphere, expression; four leading, definite things.

COMPOSITION.

What are we to understand by this? It means the putting together of the different parts of which a picture is made up—the relation of one part to another, placing them in their different positions, so that you may know what the picture means to say. Each separate part should combine into a whole. However good each part may be, unless it fits into the whole the composition is faulty. A work should be all of a piece, and people and things should be there for an end. There should be a leading idea all through it—a distinct intention. That is what composition does in painting—gives a whole. You should be able to say what that whole is in any individual picture.

Think of this the next time you look at a painting. Notice, in a common way, as if you were looking at a living group (if it is a figure picture), how many figures there are, what these figures have to do with each other—whether they are father and mother, brother and sister, or husband and wife. Get a grasp of the story first—the outline of what the picture has to tell you—as if you were reading it in a book.

DRAWING.

This means the proportion of the limbs—the legs, the arms, the shoulders; whether the body is light and graceful, or powerful and massive; how a limb should look when it is stretched to the full, or when it is throwing anything; when it is in repose, or when it is in action; which part should come forward and which should be backward; where the muscles should be, how much they should show under the skin; the wrinkles, or the hollows in the face; the proportion of one feature to another.

Action in a picture depends on drawing. Some of Poynter's pictures (for instance, such as "Atalanta's Race") require some knowledge of drawing to appreciate them fully. Good drawing is required to produce the effect of life. It sounds a simple thing to say that if a man is throwing a quoit, or a woman a ball, you should be able to realise that he or she is throwing it; but it requires good drawing on the part of the artist to enable you to see the action.

In art, the Florentine school is noted for drawing; it says what it has got to say by line, as the Venetian school does by colour. It is what is called "significant," to use the phrase of a recent art critic, Bernard Berenson.

Michael Angelo (born 1475) is the greatest master of drawing in the world. There are two of his pictures in the National Gallery, No. 790 and No. 809.

Leonardo da Vinci, that marvellous, all-round artist (born 1452), is specially noted for drawing and design. We are fortunate in possessing in the National Gallery a finer specimen of his art (No. 1093) than we have of Michael Angelo ("The Virgin of the Rocks"), which is remarkable, besides other great beauties, for drawing and balance.

Ghirlandaio (born 1449) is the best draughtsman up to that period; his "Procession to Calvary" (No. 1143) is in the National Gallery.

is to many a great perplexity, and it is very difficult to explain it in writing without using technical terms, which are only a puzzle to the general reader. It means "showing different distances on a flat surface." The object of perspective is to obtain the effect of distance within a limited space—to represent a mass of things within a small compass. A glance down a long street reveals this effect to us. It is perspective in nature when you see the figures in a street diminish in size the further they recede in distance from you. A person at the entrance of a long street looks quite tall; another, actually of the same height, at the end of it looks quite small.

Consider the task an artist has before him to represent on a small piece of canvas a number of different objects. For instance, in the painting of a landscape, distant hills, trees, a river, a road, cottages, cows, men and women; and his work consists in bringing all these objects within the limited compass of two or three feet, and in making them all look natural. It is only by means of perspective that he can represent all these objects in his picture. To form a picture, composition, colour, atmosphere, expression, are necessary. It is no easy task. I think the sense of a difficulty surmounted adds a human interest to the artistic one.

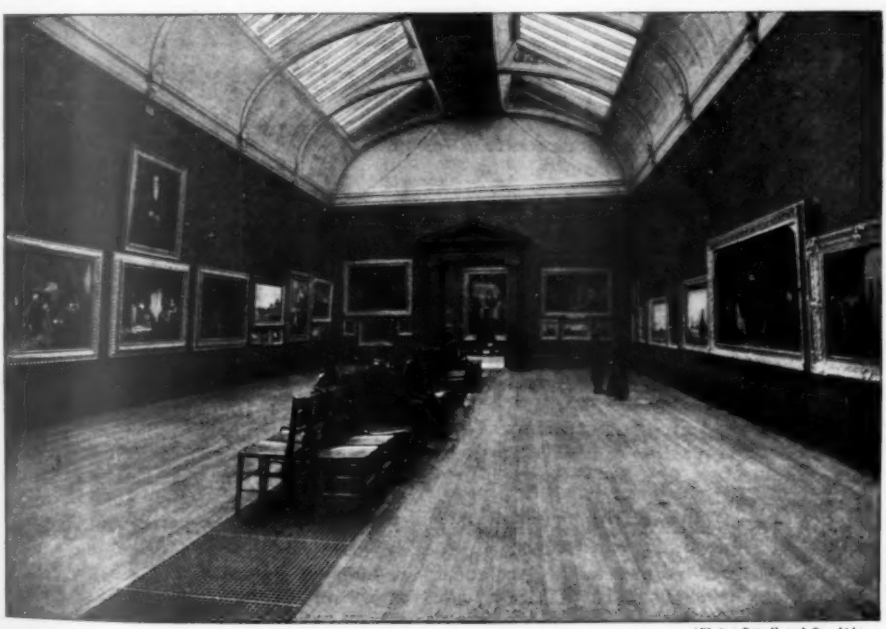
Again, in composition there must be an intention, or centre of interest—a leading idea—and every part must be subordinate to that interest. Try to get at it. There is a favourite picture of mine in the National Gallery which we may use as an illustration of this point, "St. Jerome in his Study" (No. 694). The saint is seated on a bench reading; in the background are two cupboards, a flask, and a candlestick. In the foreground, a sleeping lion, a partridge, and a cardinal's hat. The saint himself is the centre of interest, and the intention is the idea of quietness, indicated by the calm sea and the convent in the distance.

A picture should always produce unity of effect. After you have come away from looking at one, you ought always to be able to say what general impression it has made upon you; what you have gained from it.



Never mind people saying, "Did you see this picture?" or "Didn't you see that?" Be content to have wrenched the heart out of one.

Art is not meant to be like the shops in Regent Street—to glance at and pass by. When one goes to the Royal Academy, one often feels as if people were looking at shop windows instead of studying art!

COLOUR.

"Colour gives the glow and brilliancy of nature, as line its grace and grandeur; richness and transparency, lustre and depth of hue belong to painting, just as the placing of the muscles and the rounding of the limbs belong to drawing."

Ruskin says, "Of all God's gifts to man, colour is the most divine, the most solemn." There is a glory, a joy, in colour, a fulness of delight, which—to me, at any rate—nothing else in art gives. To fill your eye with colour is to fill your heart with joy and to flood your mind with brightness. "All men," it is truly said, "enjoy colour; it is meant for the perpetual comfort and delight of the human heart; it is richly bestowed on the highest works of creation, and is the eminent sign and seal of perfection."

"Colour is the test of a painter." There are many great artists, but few great colourists.

In a simple way, in beginning the study of colour, notice whether the colours contrast or blend, whether they are strong or delicate. Look at the force of some colours, the transparency of others, the gradation of tints in a third.

Some of the great revealers of colour are Titian, Giorgione, Paul Veronese, Correggio, Palma Vecchio, and John Bellini. There are specimens of most of these in our National Gallery. Titian, Nos. 34 and 35; Correggio, "The Holy Family" (No. 23), the "master of colour," as he has been called; John Bellini, "The Madonna and Child" (No. 280); but for the full charm of colour you must go to Venice. Venice is the best school of colour. Light, air, space, colour, are the marks of Venetian art. We have few representations of the great masters of colour in our National Gallery, though of Titian, the greatest of all, we have the "Bacchus and Ariadne" (No. 35) and "The Venus and Adonis" (No. 34).

For colour in English art we may name Rossetti, whose work you can study in the Tate Gallery, "Beata Beatrix" (No. 1279), the subject from the "Vita Nuova" by Dante, and "The Annunciation" (No. 1210).

Frederick Walker is another good English colourist, also to be studied in the Tate Gallery. His picture, "The Harbour of Refuge" (No. 1391), with the reds contrasted with the white flags in the sunshine of an afternoon in spring, is a delicious bit of colour; and "The Vagrants" (No. 1209), the shades of brown rising into reds, with the light fading into evening, is another fine modern example of colour.

The value of colour in life is hardly estimated at its full value. The study of it in art may help people to bring it more strongly into ordinary surroundings. The presence of colour, brightens life, and makes people better tempered and more cheerful. Thus it helps goodness and promotes harmony in households.

is the third point which you have to study in looking at a picture. The technical description of atmosphere is "an ocean, not of water, but of air, for use in breathing, for beauty in softening and harmonising natural objects"; but, when you speak of the atmosphere of a picture, you mean the sort of air there is in it. You can never have a real picture without air being, somehow, represented. Some pictures look as if they had no air at all—as if you could not breathe if you were in them. They have no atmosphere.

You ought to be able to perceive whether the atmosphere is misty or clear, sunny or cloudy; whether it is morning or evening, twilight or dawn. Turner's pictures are the finest examples of atmosphere we have in England, the marvellous golden haze in some, the seas of mist in others. Study "The Fighting Téméraire" (No. 524), "The Sun Rising in a Mist" (No. 479), "Moonlight" (No. 459), in the National Gallery.

Peter Graham's pictures are delightful studies of atmosphere. His "Rainy Day" in the Tate Gallery (No. 1524) is a striking instance of this. Only an ordinary village, a boy, and two horses; but seen through a mist which gives poetry to the simple subject. "The Valley of the Llugwy" (No. 1540), by Leader—misty hills, silver birch trees casting a shade, in the same gallery—is another illustration of the value of atmospheric effects. John Linnell's "Windmill" (No. 439), with its heavy clouds prognosticating a thunderstorm, is a remarkable study of a coming storm.

EXPRESSION.

Hitherto we have been dealing with outward life, as depicted in art. Now we come, in considering our fourth head, to the revelation of inward life—joy or sorrow, pathos or hardness, vigour or weakness, expectation or satisfaction, and, still more difficult, the mingling of emotion. A man may be a great painter if he shows us beauty—that alone is a great, a glorious gift—but he is a great artist only if he reveals the inward through the medium of the outward. In illustration of this we may mention one picture in particular, "The Virgin and Child Enthroned, St. John Baptist, and the Magdalen," by Mantegna (No. 274), in the National Gallery. This is said by a great authority (Richter) to be one "of the choicest pictures in the National Gallery."

Watts is the great modern master of expression. "I paint ideas, not objects," is his own description of his pictures. He, above all others, paints because he has got something to say. He is a teacher and prophet as well as a painter. Study his "Love and Life," "Love and Death," "Love Triumphant," for the expression of great ideas. The painter's gift of these noble pictures to the Tate Gallery opens a great book of thought as well as of art to the whole nation, like God's gift of beauty, without money and without price.

Portraits come under the head of expression, and in our National Portrait Gallery—far too little used—there is a collection of remarkable portraits. If you step in for half an hour's interview with great men and women, with whose names you are familiar in history or art, you will understand their characters better than you could by even personal knowledge of a casual kind.

Note what characteristic predominates in each: strength, thought, refinement, beauty. Notice which prevails, or, whether, if two or three appear on the surface, which gains the day. It adds to the interest of the study to consider whether the characteristics which appear in the portrait are borne out by the history of the man himself. Portraits are, or ought to be, a sort of painted biography.

"You ought to get the character and heart of a man from a portrait." "Not one particular, temporary expression—joy, sorrow, anger—one which may have passed any moment and left his face quite different; but if the picture is one of the noblest kind, we shall read the man's whole character there, written for ever and ever."

One of the finest portraits in the National Gallery carries out these requirements—"The Doge" (Leonardo Loredano), by John Bellini (No. 189).

THE NEW GALLERY, REGENT STREET.

In modern portraits, I think George Frederick Watts carries out most fully the ideal of a portrait painter, and in the portraits of the great men he has given us you can trace the characters of the men, and gain, besides, a wonderful insight into their natural powers and inherent possibilities—the ideal, not only the actual, of the men. This is art, not merely painting.

"Great art is the type of strong and noble life." If we take this fine saying with us into a picture gallery, and search for the pictures which illustrate it, our visits will not only increase our knowledge, but expand our lives.

THE BROWN BUREAU.

A Story in a Single Chapter.

SHE had passed the shop where it stood temptingly displayed to its best advantage for years. She had often looked enviously at its dark smooth surface, its inlaid drawers, and longed to possess them for her own.

But Ruth Cochrane was as poor as the proverbial church mouse. She eked out a precarious living by acting as typist and amanuensis to an old gentleman who was writing a book to startle the century. She had, moreover, a young brother to maintain at school, which further hampered her in the race for life, though she never even acknowledged it to herself.

Some years ago—five at least—she had met her fate in the person of a tall, dark, blue-eyed Irishman, who had stolen her heart almost unawares, and lost his own in the process. He had nothing beyond his pay in a merchant's office, with a very distant hope of being a partner some day; and, as Ruth had nothing too, the young people had decided to wait till time and fate should prove kinder.

So that the brown bureau was outside the limits of possibility, although the girl often let her imagination play with it, after the manner of such temperaments as hers.

But after months of careful saving, of denial with respect to her daily meals, eked out with a chance stray article written at a venture and accepted in a daily paper, much to the girl's surprise, she found she had scraped together just enough to buy the coveted bureau, and, full of hope, she sallied forth one Saturday morning after office hours to make the necessary negotiations.

The shopman smiled behind his hand as he extracted from her more than the intrinsic value of the second-hand piece of furniture upon which she had set her heart; and, as a compromise, he sent the bureau round to the address she had given him quite early in the afternoon.

Ruth clapped her hands together as she gazed at it, looking for all the world as though it had always occupied the corner by the fireplace in Mrs. Smithson's topmost-storey attic. What a treasure she had now! She must write a letter on it immediately. Derrick should be the first to receive one written just from that very spot.

But the temptation was too great to begin the letter immediately. The drawers all looked as if they wanted opening; the little pigeonholes in their neat rows invited her to inspect their shadowy depths.

There must be a secret drawer, too, if she could only find it; and in it she would place her money week by week, until the drawer should be so crowded there would be enough to —marry on.

She flushed as she passed her hand gently over the smooth polished surface, pressing in all directions anything that looked at all suspicious, and eagerly searching every crack and cranny.

Ah! if she could ever earn enough money for such a thing to happen! If life's plums were equally divided, instead of being so inclined to go all in the same direction!

Suddenly, with a click, something flew back. There was quite a cloud of dust, and Ruth rubbed her pretty eyes.

A secret little drawer lay exposed to sight, and in it, yellow with age, lay a paper—a big, thick paper packet.

With trembling fingers the girl picked it up and opened it. Whose hand had written those upright letters? What was this paper which had lain buried for so long, and had at last found its way into a stranger's hands?

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF LESLIE GODWIN.

Who was Leslie Godwin?

She opened the paper still further, and to her amazement out fell a hundred or more bank-notes, all and each for a hundred pounds.

What a find! Now she was rich—quite rich—and her dreams of marriage with Derrick could be realised. She counted out the crisp papers with shaking hands, her eyes glittering as they had never glittered before. There were a hundred banknotes in all, making ten thousand pounds. Quite a large fortune!

Was it hers—her very own, to do as she liked with?

XUM

Ruth paused. Her heart beat tumultuously. Why should her conscience awake just at the wrong moment, and make her hesitate about taking it all at once for herself? She had purchased the brown bureau. It was her very own. Why should she not have all that appertained to it? There was no one to know about her find. She could keep it to herself, and no one would be any the wiser. Then she could marry Derrick, and they would go away, somewhere in the country, and live a new life, putting the old one in the background. She would do a lot of good with her new fortune; she would subscribe to charities, help the poor, visit the sick. The money would do much more good in her hands in a few months than it had done sealed up in the secret drawer all these past years.

And to do good could not be wrong.

Then a voice within her spoke again. Her good angel was not going to let her slip out of his hands without a struggle. The money was not her own. It had belonged most probably to Leslie Godwin, and the will would have something to do with it.

Better take it all to a lawyer, and have the matter settled, and return the money to those to whom it had really been left.

But then she would be as poor as when she had first found it. There would be no marrying Derrick for many a long year to come, if at all. The outlook was black enough; just now it had been tinged with a roseate hue of hope and wealth and happiness.

Evil that good might come of it—that was what she had suggested to herself that she should do. And the Bible distinctly said that such was not to be done. And as for the morrow, was it not to take care of itself? Had not God promised to look after and provide for those who trusted in Him?

Ruth Cochrane had never been ultra-religious. She had attended church when she could, sometimes going out in the wet to do so; but she had never taken upon herself to speak to others on the subject; she had never fought strong battles for right against wrong when it had come her way; she had merely taken a passive part, and let others do the work.

But now it came upon her with a shock. Her conscience was awakened by the fire of temptation she had passed through, and she knew that at last her feet must be firmly planted either on one side or on the other; she must side with God, or with His adversary, the devil.

A stifled prayer rose to her lips; she crushed the papers in her hot hands, and, fetching her hat and coat from the peg behind the door of the little room where she slept, she went out into the short winter afternoon, and, taking a 'bus, she was soon deposited by it in a road off Camberwell where Derrick Desmond had a lodging.

It was a white-faced girl who confronted that same young man at the door.

"Ruth!" he exclaimed, drawing her towards him, "are you ill, dearest? Speak. I was just coming over to see you——"

"No, I'm not ill, Derrick," she stammered, flushing; "but I bought that bureau this morning in the Edgware Road—the one I have always longed for, you know—and in it I found all this money—ten thousand pounds—and a will!"

She sank on to a chair, and held out the parcel which she had brought.

"Ten thousand pounds!" repeated Desmond hurriedly. "What a find, Ruthie! I wonder whose it really is?"

He was carefully counting out the bank-notes.

"Some Leslie Godwin, I should think," returned his fiancée, a little sadly. "Derrick—do you know?—for a little while I thought I would keep it and say nothing about it; the temptation was so great, and we could have married on ten thousand pounds——"

"We could have," he answered quietly; "but it would not have been right. Poor little woman! it must have been a sore temptation to you. And I suppose you have brought the money to me in case you should not be strong enough to resist it any longer. We will take it to Mr. Geeley, the lawyer, on Monday, dear, and hear what he has to say about it. We may be able to find the real relations, and they may be in want all this time. We shall have the joy of returning them what is really their own—and it is better to give than to receive, Ruthie."

He bent down, and his clean-shaven lips pressed her forehead ever so gently. Derrick Desmond was strong to do the right—a man of sterling virtues, and yet no prig.

After a moment's silence, during which he locked the bank-notes away in his desk, he put on his hat.

"Come out for a turn," he said cheerfully. "Where shall it be? Do you know, I think I have time for Hampton Court, if you like. It doesn't matter about it being dark before we get home."

And to Hampton Court they went.

The following Monday Mr. Geeley looked askance at the two young people through his big gold-rimmed spectacles, as they sat down before him in his office.

"This is most certainly a will," he said, "and it is all signed and witnessed properly. It was a lucky thing for some person or persons unknown that you found it, Miss Cochrane. Let me see—yes, a Miss Leslie Godwin, who died at Bath in the year 1812, is the testator, and she leaves all her money, which is wrapped up in this packet in bank-notes, to a Mr. Henry Desmond, of Bedminster——"

"Henry Desmond, of Bedminster? That was my grandfather!" put in Derrick hurriedly. "There could not have been two Henry Desmonds at that time in Bedminster——"

The lawyer looked at him keenly.

"If you can prove it," he said, "go down to Bedminster and search for information, and then come and let me know. After all, this legacy may have fallen into the right hands. If so, it will be another instance of truth being stranger than fiction"—for Desmond had explained how they had come by the will and the money.

Derrick did go down to Bedminster only a week later, and was able to prove the identity of his grandfather with the Henry Desmond mentioned in Miss Leslie Godwin's will, and in a short space of time the inheritance was all his own.

Six months later Ruth Cochrane and Derrick Desmond were made man and wife, and the dream about the country life came true.

"'This is most certainly a will,' he said."

The brown bureau has an honoured place in Mrs. Desmond's own little sitting-room, for she declares she owes her husband to that brown bureau.

And she is quite right—in one sense, she does.

MAKERS OF MODERN CHRISTIANITY

GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS
THE THEOLOGIAN

By the Very Rev. H. Donald M. Spence, D.D., Dean of Gloucester.

PART I.—THE UNWEARIED STUDENT.

IN our story of the lives and work of the two friends we come now to Gregory of Nazianzus, of whom hitherto we have spoken but little. Indeed, all through the life of Basil, Gregory, although the elder of the two, was completely overshadowed by the more masterful and popular personality of Basil, who, however, passionately admired the great genius and profound scholarship of his quiet, retiring friend. After Basil's first withdrawal to his monastic home in Pontus, he begged Gregory to come to him and to take up his abode in his community of solitaries on the River Liris. Then, for a time, the two friends were together, and years after Gregory speaks with longing regret of those quiet, happy days spent in prayer and study together. Later, after Basil's elevation to the arch-see of Cæsarea, failing to secure Gregory's consent to live with him in Cæsarea, as a kind of coadjutor, after a time he literally forced upon him the Bishopric of Sasima, an obscure and noisy Cappadocian town where several important roads crossed. Gregory looked with dread on such an unquiet sphere of labour, and warmly remonstrated. Basil insisted on his accepting the irksome post,* and in an apologetic letter thus expresses his opinion of Gregory: "I would, indeed, that my friend Gregory had the government of a church, the importance of which was commensurate with his abilities, but these abilities are so transcendent that no group of churches would suffice here. As this, then, is impossible, let him consent to be a Bishop, not that he will receive any honour from the dignity, but, on the contrary, will confer honour on the See he occupies by the mere fact of his accepting it." Were his strange words here prophetic? When he wrote them Constantinople, the future See of Gregory, the first Archbishopric in the East, scarcely second to that of Rome, was completely in the power of an Arian Emperor. What seemed more unlikely, then, than Gregory, the unassuming, quiet friend of Basil, whom the Emperor and his Arian Government intensely disliked; Gregory, the learned champion of orthodoxy, would ever be summoned to preside over the Arianised capital of the East?

We have seen in our study in the life of Basil how Gregory during his long ten years' residence at Athens, the University of the Empire, had laid the foundations of that profound learning which afterwards characterised his writings and utterances. He left Athens circa A.D. 356 with a far-reaching reputation for scholarship and ability. For many years he assisted his father, the Bishop of Nazianzus in Cappadocia, in the administration of his diocese. From his long residence there came the name by which he is generally known in the annals of the Catholic Church, "Gregory of Nazianzus." His life—a student's life—at Nazianzus was often interrupted by protracted visits to Basil before and after Basil's elevation to the Archbishopric of Cæsarea. This long period of comparative stillness lasted nearly a quarter of a century. In these quiet years he studied deeply, preaching, however, not unfrequently, now and again putting out writings which have since passed into the treasure-house of Catholic letters. He was well known in Asia and the Eastern provinces of the Empire as a profound scholar and theologian, a preacher at once eloquent and inspiring, an ardent and enthusiastic champion of the Catholic cause, for many years well-nigh everywhere more or less depressed by the Arian policy of the Court and Government.

* Although Gregory of Nazianzus most reluctantly consented to be consecrated, it is doubtful if he ever took up his residence at Sasima.

Utterly devoid of all ambition, studious and retiring, he preferred to lead the life of a tireless ascetic student far removed from the busy haunts of men, quite content to live under the shadow of his father, the aged Bishop of his native Nazianzus, rejoicing in the lifelong friendship of Basil, for whose sake he ever and anon for a brief while came out of his loved solitary retirement. But the opportunity came at last when, in good truth, his light shone before men; when his splendid gifts, matured by the study of a lifetime, were used to deal the final blow to the deadly Arian heresy which for some forty years had deluded and deceived the Christian world. It came about in this wise.

In the year before Basil of Cæsarea's death (A.D. 378) an event happened which completely changed the aspect of religious affairs in the Eastern Empire. As the result of a vacillating and unwise policy, war between the Roman Empire of the East and the Gothic peoples broke out. The military chiefs of the Emperor Valens displayed in the campaign which ensued a want of capacity similar to that which his civil ministers had shown in their dealings with the Gothic nation. In a pitched battle fought near Adrianople the Roman army was defeated with enormous loss, and the hapless Valens himself perished in the mêlée which followed the rout of his army.

His nephew Gratian, the Western Emperor, who was marching to the assistance of his uncle Valens, without opposition succeeded to the imperial power and title in the East. Gratian was an earnest and devout Catholic, and his first act of power was to recall the Catholic Bishops in the East who had been banished by the Arian policy of Valens. Other provisions in favour of the long harassed Oriental Catholics were embodied in this edict.

Then feeling incapable of supporting the burden of the double empire, he associated with himself, on equal terms, Theodosius, the distinguished son of a famous Spanish general of the Empire, leaving to Theodosius the care and responsibilities of the East, while he returned to Gaul and his Western dominions. The energetic and wise military measures of Theodosius after some months scattered the Gothic invaders, and once more restored security and a measure of peace to the panic-stricken Eastern provinces. Theodosius, like his colleague and patron, Gratian, was an earnest Catholic, and bitterly opposed to any form of the Arian heresy. Early in the year 380 the new Emperor of the East published an edict in favour of the Catholic faith, referring to Damasus, Bishop of Rome, and to Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, as examples of the Catholic belief, which he insisted upon being received by his subjects as the only true form of doctrine, and branding all sects, including the long dominant Arians, as heretics deserving of punishment.

This pronouncement on the part of a strong and able Emperor was a complete reversal of that Arian policy which had for so many weary years been dominant in the Eastern Empire.

Catholic writers, not without reason, have regarded as a Divine judgment the sudden and unexpected defeat and death of the two Emperors, Julian and Valens, who, while pursuing different methods, had determined upon the extirpation of orthodox or Catholic Christianity, as expounded by Athanasius, Basil, and Gregory, and other great Christian teachers of the fourth century. Julian's project was generally to restore Paganism, Valens' to establish Arianism. Both these Emperors, when at the height of their power, were suddenly smitten down—Julian by the Persians in A.D. 369, and Valens by the Goths in A.D. 378. With the defeat and death of Julian the Pagan cause was irretrievably ruined; with the rout and fall of Valens the Arian party, which so long had triumphed, completely and for ever collapsed.

We return to Gregory of Nazianzus, who played the foremost part in the rehabilitation of the orthodox or Catholic Christianity in the Eastern Empire. For well-nigh forty years the new and magnificent city of Constantinople, the capital of the Eastern Empire, had been the great seat of Arianism. During most of this time the position of the Catholic party in Constantinople had been sad and depressed, and in late years the sufferings of the adherents of the orthodox faith had been extreme. Under Valens they possessed no church in the imperial city, and they worshipped in silence, almost in secret, as the votaries of a persecuted and defamed religion. The news of the death of the Arian Emperor Valens, and the accession of a powerful Catholic sovereign, came upon the depressed and sorrowful remnant of orthodox Christians in Constantinople as a startling and joyful surprise. Their first thought was to call for one of the great Catholic teachers of the East to assume the guidance and to reorganise this remnant of true believers in Constantinople.

None in the length and breadth of the East occupied in the ranks of the Catholic party a reputation for learning and eloquence like Basil and his friend and lifelong associate, Gregory of Nazianzus. Basil, alas! was dying.* but Gregory was still in the vigour of his vast powers. He possessed also the rank and status of a Bishop, having been some time before consecrated to the desolate little See of Sasima, Cappadocia. However, he never appears to have seriously administered this See, and when the summons from the Catholic party of Constantinople came the famous theologian was living in strict retirement in a monastery in the suburbs of Seleucia.

To the quiet-loving, retiring scholar the call to take up the supervision of the Catholic Church in the greatest and richest city of the East was, indeed, an unwelcome surprise, for it carried with it the certainty of the succession in the immediate future to the Archbishopric † of the capital of the East, and from such a task the spirit of Gregory shrank. Some of the leading Bishops and chiefs of the orthodox party in Asia, however, added the weight of their urgent persuasions to the arguments of the representatives of the Constantinople Catholics, and Gregory at length, with unfeigned reluctance, accepted the invitation. In his own moving words, he painted the charge he had undertaken as that of a church without a shepherd, and his work as a voyage across a lightless sea on a ship when Christ was sleeping; and in a sublime prayer he called on the "Divine Word," to Whom he had consecrated the labours of a life, and on Whose business he was undertaking the present difficult and painful task, to send him one of His angels, who should guide his steps with a pillar of fire and cloud.

The capital of the East was the favourite home of the various heresies which distracted men's thoughts in that age of struggle and curious inquiry. There were to be found congregations made up of disciples of Manes and Novatius, of Sabellius and Apollinaris, who all flourished under the protection of the ruling sect of Arians. The eager pursuit of religious controversy afforded a new occupation to the busy idleness of the metropolis, the city being full of mechanics and slaves, all of them, in their own estimation, profound theologians, and who loved to preach in the shops and in the streets.*

It was the curious custom in those days to discuss questions of abstract theology in the public squares, in the baths, in the antechambers of fashionable ladies, in the quiet privacy of family gatherings; here the orthodoxy of some well-known teacher was discussed, there the history of some disputed doctrinal question was the subject of debate. Crowds would assemble round the pulpit of a favourite preacher, would loudly applaud his words, or with equal readiness signify their dissent.

The appearance in such a feverish, excitable society of an orator like Gregory of Nazianzus, whose reputation for learning and eloquence was well known in Constantinople, would at once attract general attention, and, had he pleased, a huge following would rapidly have gathered round him. But he shunned all publicity, and studiously avoided any courting of popularity, refusing all invitations, and never appearing in public. He lived a solitary, austere life in the house of a devout and pious relative, only consenting after a time to address a little company gathered out of the persecuted remnant of Catholics. The large room in which he taught, however, soon was too small for the congregation who loved to listen to the words of the grave and simple teacher. The enlarged private hall, for it was at first nothing more, where he taught, Gregory named "The Anastasia," or "The Resurrection"—"the resurrection of the faith"—for in it, he said, he proposed to kindle anew the torch of the faith, which, as far as Constantinople was concerned, was burning very dimly.

* The exact date of the death of the famous theologian and Bishop is uncertain; some scholars think Basil had already passed away before the call of Gregory to Constantinople, but at all events, if not dead, the great Bishop was dying when the summons came to Gregory.

His early sermons in the little "Anastasia" were generally simple and practical, and touched none of the burning questions in theology which had so long agitated men's minds. Especially and repeatedly he inveighed against the fashion of the day, which invited public discussion at all times and in all places on questions bearing on the sacred mysteries of the faith; and this too often undertaken by persons utterly unfitted by their life and training to speak on such subjects. Then, after a time, when he had more or less prepared his auditory, he announced his intention to give a general exposition of the great Christian doctrines as they were understood by such famous Catholic teachers as Athanasius and Basil, Epiphanius, and Ephrem in the East, and by Hilary in the West. No one could do this like Gregory of Nazianzus; no one living knew the mind of these famous Catholic doctors like the friend and more than brother of the great Basil. His knowledge was built up by years of intimacy with that profound theologian, the intimate friend of those great ones; years of patient study of their writings, and the works of yet earlier teachers. Gifted, too, with unrivalled powers of eloquence, trained, too, in all the learning and dialectic skill of the old Pagan writers of Greece and Rome, Gregory of Nazianzus was able in the five famous doctrinal sermons preached in the "Anastasia" to give such an exposition of the Catholic faith as never had been heard before, has never been listened to since.

The first two of these sermons were mainly introductory, and may be summed up in the words "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God." The third and fourth dealt with the grand subject of all the burning controversies of the fourth century—"the blessed Son of God." The fifth treated of the "Holy Spirit, the third Person of the Trinity," round whose Divine personality the later Arian questions had been raised. Other very celebrated sermons were delivered in the historical "Anastasia," notably two which were devoted to the life-work and teaching of Athanasius of Alexandria and Cyprian of Carthage—magnificent and soul-stirring orations which will ever be reckoned among the masterpieces of Christian oratory. But it is on the "five" above referred to that the world-wide reputation of Gregory is mainly based; it is because of these that the Churches of the East and West have with one voice bestowed on him that high title of honour only given to one other—John, the friend of Christ—"the theologian," "John the Divine," as our English version renders the title. In these five, as it has been well said, "the preacher summed up and closed the controversy of a whole century." They dealt, did these masterpieces of theology, the final deathblow to the most dangerous heresy the Church has ever had to combat in its long and storied course. They were listened to with rapt attention by the Catholic party in Constantinople, who thronged the now enlarged "Anastasia"; but they rapidly reached a far larger auditory. Taken down as he spoke the thrilling and weighty discourses, all Constantinople was at once able to read them, and it was with mingled feelings of pride and thankfulness that they recognised how great an orator and theologian had come amongst them. The weighty and eloquent expositions of doctrine soon penetrated far beyond the capital of the East, and were received with wonder and delight wherever the Greek language was understood. They have never lost their interest, though fifteen centuries have passed since Gregory spoke his burning words in his hall of the "Anastasia," though the great controversy which called them forth and which they virtually closed, has long ceased to be a danger to the communities of Christians.

THE SURRENDER OF NANCY.

A Short Story by Elsie M. Eames.

THERE was no sound in the little kitchen save the gentle rustle of the white curtains at the lattice window as they flapped lightly to and fro in the fresh breeze, and away in the corner the heavy ticking of an old grandfather's clock. It was a glorious June morning, and the sunbeams flashed radiantly over the shabby furniture and faded carpet which had done duty for so many years in the little cottage which John and Nancy called "home."

On this particular morning Nancy had the kitchen to herself, as her husband was busy elsewhere. Now that John was too old and frail for regular work, he found employment in his garden and helping Nancy about the house. Although a very handy man in his own department, he failed lamentably in the household duties assigned to him by his wife, who was often heard to exclaim with terrible emphasis :

"Well, ov all the simpletons, that man's the biggest!"

But in spite of John's foolishness and Nancy's "bit o' temper," which had a habit of breaking out when least expected, the old couple lived very happily together. They had weathered many a storm side by side during the fifty years of their married life, and had toiled honestly and laboriously to make that provision for their old age on which they were now dependent.

The sunlight played tenderly on Nancy's face as she sat in her wooden rocking chair by the open window darning socks. The years of hard work and constant struggle had not quite withered the rosy bloom of her cheeks, or taken the sparkle from her keen blue eyes. She wore a cap as white as her own smooth hair, a grey gown which had been cleaned, turned, and patched more times than Nancy cared to remember, and a small shawl fastened across her bent shoulders with a massive silver brooch —John's gift to her on their wedding day.

Nancy was not so busy darning but that she could keep an eye on that foolish husband of hers as he stood leaning over the green-painted garden gate talking to a neighbour. Their conversation appeared to be very absorbing, Nancy noticed, and her curiosity was aroused. John looked flushed and excited, and was emphasising his remarks with a good many nods of the head. Old Peter Wade, too, seemed in high spirits ; and when he at last hobbled away from the green gate he shook John's great work-worn hand with more than his usual vigour.

John turned eagerly towards the cottage, and marched straight up to the lattice window where Nancy sat at work. When he had any news to impart he was as excited as a schoolboy, and never stood upon ceremony. Poor man, his few possessions did not include discretion, and many were the scoldings he received from his wife in consequence.

"Oh, Nancy," he quavered excitedly, "what do 'ee think ? I've promised——"

"P'raps you won't mind steppin' inside the house 'fore you tell yer news, unless o' course you want all the neighbourhood to hear," responded Mistress Nancy drily.

John turned hastily, saw a group of urchins at the gate watching his antics with considerable interest, and made for the cottage door with all speed. Once inside the kitchen, he sat down heavily in his armchair and began to pour out his story.

"Nancy, I've bin and promised Peter Wade to gi'e a donation t'wards the Chapel Organ Fund. Peter's goin' to do the same, an' all the others. 'Twill be fine to ha' the organ paid for 'fore it be played on."

"John Upton ! You never mean to tell me you've bin took in like that, surely ?" cried Nancy shrilly, letting her work slip from her trembling fingers upon the floor. Then, reading John's answer in his face, her hot temper rose instantly, and she turned upon the unhappy man a perfect torrent of wrath.

"Well, you're a reg'lar soft, an' no mistake ! I declare, 'tisn't safe for you to go nowhere without me at yer heels, to tell 'ee what to do. Donation indeed ! I wonder what 'twill be next ? 'Twas only a week ago since you went and gave away yer second pair o' boots to some crafty old beggar—just 'cause my back was turned a minute !"

XUM

"He hadn't a bit o' leather to his foot, Nancy. I'm sure he was thankful fur 'em," interposed John with his usual meekness.

"Don't interrupt me!" said Nancy sharply. "You know as well as me that you're as soft as a baby over some things. Why, you'd have gave away yer head long ago if only 'twould ha' come off! I only wish Peter Wade had asked me for a donation, now; but there, he don't dare!" And Nancy gave the sock she was supposed to be darning a spiteful dig with her needle, as though to relieve her feelings and intimate the kind of treatment Peter Wade might have expected to receive had he dared to call.

"Why, Nancy, you gave a shillin' fur the Missionary meetin' when the minister was here last time," remarked John in tones of mild surprise.

Nancy flushed guiltily. She was a really good woman at heart, and took as great an interest in the chapel affairs as her husband. But she lacked his generous spirit where organs were concerned. Nancy never could understand why the worshippers at the little Methodist Chapel wanted an organ for their services. She had not hesitated to express her strong disapproval of the "new fad," as she called it, and when her words had no weight with the rest of the congregation, had declared with bitter emphasis that they need not come to her to help pay for it: "they could pay their own debt theirselves."

Now John loved music, and organs in particular; and when it was proposed that a second-hand instrument be bought for the chapel he went into raptures of delight. He found it impossible to conceal his pleasure from Nancy, and naturally this state of affairs aggravated her still more.

There was silence for a few minutes in the lattice-windowed kitchen, during which John sat nervously clasping and unclasping his big hands, glancing now and again at Nancy, who maintained a most uncompromising attitude in the rocking chair.

Then, as the grandfather's clock in the corner solemnly struck the hour of twelve, and the old couple recollected that it was dinner-time, Nancy rose suddenly and crossed the room. With trembling fingers she reached down a small box from the shelf, and, opening it, poured the whole contents into her purse, which she then returned to her pocket. Placing the empty money-box back on the shelf, the old woman turned defiantly towards John.

"There!" said she, "I'll take good care those chapel folk don't get no donation from this house!"

John's ruddy face turned pale. "Oh, Nancy!" he said in a broken voice, "how can you?"

Nancy did not answer, but her conscience was not quite at rest. Already she half repented her hasty action, but the deed was done, and there "was an end on't," she reflected. Still, John's face at the dinner table troubled her; it wore such a grieved, weary look, so unlike its usual jovial expression. He would never have thwarted her in anything, she told herself reproachfully, and what if he chose to give his little donation? Surely he had a right to do as he liked with his own! It would mean a little sacrifice, for money was none too plentiful at the cottage, but still——

The day wore away, but Nancy took no heed of time. Her mind was full of the donation. How foolish her poor John would look at the service that evening, when the organ was to be used for the first time, and the donations handed in to the minister! Already she pictured the shamed, sorrowful face of the old man as he sat in his pew, unable to share in the rejoicings.

The hour for the service drew near, and John put on his best clothes with a heavy heart, for, instead of the donation he had meant to carry with him, he had only a small coin in his pocket. But somehow he never thought of arguing with Nancy; his great sorrow was that he could not help pay for the organ.

Nancy refused to accompany John to the service, partly because her pride and "bit o' temper" urged her to stay at home, and partly because she was too ashamed to put in an appearance. But when John started, and she was left alone in the silent cottage, such a great longing came over her to go and make her peace with him that she could not resist putting on her lilac bonnet and following him. All the way there pride and love struggled hard for mastery in her heart, but even yet she was not quite ready to surrender.

"I'll just listen outside for a while," she said to herself, as she reached the little grey chapel on the hill. "I won't go in and be seen."

But at that moment the full, sweet notes of the new organ rang out upon the evening air—now in rich, triumphant chords, then changing to soft, minor tones which stirred the very depth of Nancy's heart. She stood as though rooted to the spot. Music had found a way to her heart at last!

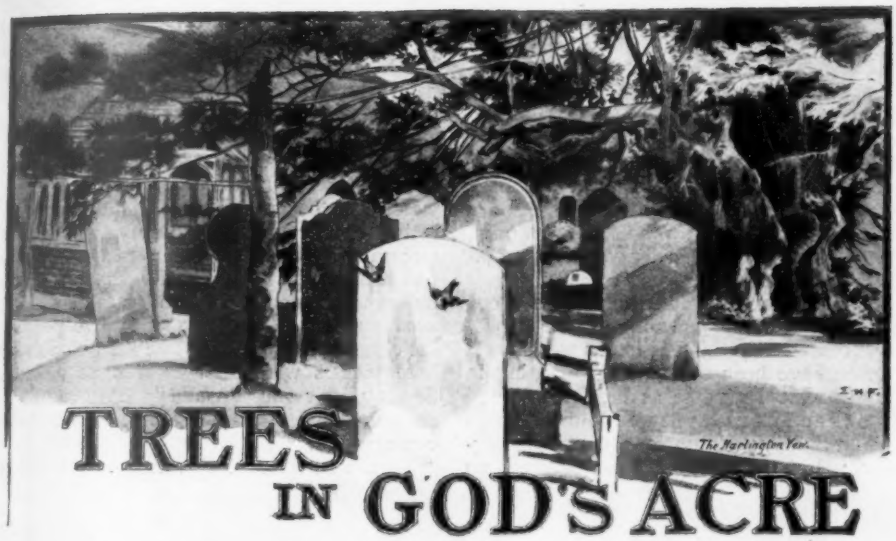
Then suddenly the whole congregation burst into song, and Nancy's heart gave a leap as she caught the words of the hymn:



"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee!"

Years ago it had been her favourite hymn, but now she could scarcely bear to hear it sung. Ah, what memories it awoke, what joy, what sorrow! It had been her boy's favourite hymn, too, and many a time they had sung it side by side in the little chapel. But now he was lying far away, out in his lonely sailor's grave, and the mother's heart bled afresh at the thought of him, for

"The old wound, if stricken, is the sorest."

Hastily drying her tears as the last notes of the hymn died away, Nancy peeped in at the open door and saw John sitting forlornly in his corner of the pew, the tears coursing down his cheeks. With quick, noiseless steps she reached his side, and, sitting down, stole her trembling hand in his. The old man started, then turned to Nancy a face beaming through his tears.

And when Peter Wade brought round the collection plate John and Nancy joined hands as they offered a donation for the Organ Fund.

TREES IN GOD'S ACRE

SINCE the day when the body of our Lord was laid in a newly hewn rock-tomb within the garden of Joseph of Arimathæa, how many of His followers have desired to be buried, like Him, amidst the beauty and the fragrance, the peace and the order, of a well-kept garden! And since it is natural that men should wish to lie near the hallowed place where God is worshipped, there would seem to be a special appropriateness in the custom which is now happily prevalent of keeping the churchyard as both burial-ground and garden. The cemetery is the outcome of the necessities of our modern civilisation, certainly not of the national sentiment; and, since it misses something of the sacredness of the churchyard, it is well that in it the idea of the garden should be even more carefully conserved.

In lands where churches do not abound, where the dead must be buried on the farm or the ranch, in the backwoods or the bush, a tree, which shall serve at once to mark the grave and to protect it, is selected, and the grave dug within its shadow. So was David Livingstone laid to rest for a time beneath a great tree on which his name was rudely carved, in the centre of that great continent which he explored. It would seem that a primitive instinct, or a tradition so old as to have become an instinct, leads men to associate a grave with a garden and a tree. Hence it would be much easier to compile a list of those graveyards which are treeless and flowerless than of those which abound in both flowers and trees.

The present article therefore makes no pretence to do more than draw attention to a few of those instances of "trees in God's acre" which have come under the writer's notice.

First of all graveyard trees we must certainly place the yew. The use of this particular tree in connection with the rites of burial can be traced far back into the dim past. Ossian tells us it was "a funereal tree, the companion of the grave among the Celtic tribes," and if one could credit the ages assigned to some of the individual trees still existing—such, for example, as the grand old wreck in the churchyard of Crowhurst, in Sussex, which Lower, the Sussex archæologist, tells us "is said to be 3,000 years old"—Julius Cæsar himself would be quite a modern in comparison. In point of fact, however, nothing very definite can be told about the ages of any of these trees, partly because of the lack of documentary evidence, and partly because the growth is very unequal in different seasons and in different soils, so that hitherto no reliable method of estimating their age has been discovered. Some of the oldest trees can scarcely be less than twelve or thirteen hundred years old, but even this computation would make them older than the churches beside which they grow. It has been suggested that, as the Druids worshipped in groves of yews, it is likely that some of the earliest churches were built within these groves, supplanting the heathen rites with the Christian worship on the same spots; but, as none of the existing trees can with any certainty be said to date from pre-Christian times, the theory is perhaps hardly worth examination for our present purpose.

If opinions are divided as to the age of our oldest yew trees, they are no less so in respect of the reason why this particular tree should so often have been selected for planting in churchyards. Its value as furnishing wood for bows and its use in lieu of palm branches in Palm Sunday celebrations have been suggested; but perhaps one need scarcely go beyond the primitive instincts to which reference has already been made—remembering its longevity, its evergreen character, its hardihood which enables it to withstand cold which would shrivel even the holly, and its sombre aspect—to find reasons sufficient to account for the choice.

The Crowhurst yew which we have already mentioned is certainly a very ancient one; it still, though hollow and split, shows considerable vigour. It must almost certainly have stood there when the Conqueror landed in Pevensey Bay near by, and when Harold fought his last battle at Senlac, within sight from the church tower. The churchyard boasts three other yew trees of less interest, and some grand old Sussex oaks.

Some thirty miles away is another Crowhurst, just within the boundary of Surrey, which also boasts a very ancient and interesting yew, now about thirty-two feet in circumference. This tree measured thirty feet in the reign of Charles I. In 1820 it was hollowed out and fitted with seats capable of accommodating some ten or twelve persons (at close quarters, it must be admitted), and here picnics were held as well as a Palm Sunday fair or "wake" until a more reverent age forbade them, some half-century ago.

In the interior of this tree was found a cannon-ball, doubtless a relic of the great Civil War, which is preserved in the adjoining farmhouse. Curiously enough, the church, which is well worth examining, is, like that of Crowhurst in Sussex, dedicated to St. George, so that confusion has sometimes arisen between them. Not far off, at Tandridge, is an exceedingly fine tree, one of the largest existing, in a churchyard which in the spring time is sweet with the smell of violets, and in the summer glorious with azaleas.

Kent, Surrey, Sussex, and Hampshire are all rich in churchyard yews. There is a very ancient tree at Buckland, by Dover, which has undergone the unique experience of removal in a ripe old age. The tree had already stood in the way of the enlargement of the church in 1851, and the architect of that day was compelled to add seats by widening the narrow Norman aisles. Unfortunately, this destroyed the symmetry of the church, for it left the nave wider than its length. When a further enlargement became necessary, in 1880, the only way in which it could well be carried out involved the destruction or removal of the yew. The latter course was decided on, and was at length successfully carried out. A trench was dug on all four sides of the tree, leaving a great block of earth, eighteen feet long, sixteen feet broad, and five feet deep, about the roots. The earth was bound together with timber and chains, and beneath the roots great baulks of timber were introduced by tunnelling; rollers were then placed beneath these timbers, and battens for the rollers to run on, and a trench was dug as far as the new site for the tree. By means of capstans and chains the great tree, roots, earth and all, weighing over fifty tons, was gradually moved to its new position, not without sundry mishaps in the way of broken chains and ropes. The tree had previously suffered considerable damage from lightning, probably in the same storms which bent the steeple in 1774; new wood has, however, grown over and completely encased the old dead wood of the trunk.

BEDFONT.

There is an exceedingly old yew tree, still showing a vigorous growth of young shoots, in the churchyard of Leeds, near Maidstone. Much of the trunk has decayed away, leaving a gap some four feet wide between the remaining portions, which have been secured by iron bands and wooden props by the present vicar. At Ulcombe, not far away, are four yews, one of them thirty-five feet in girth; at Bromley several fine yews line the pathway from the gate to the church door; at Brenchley is to be found an avenue of ten trees, clipped.

For clipped yews, however, Bedfont, in Middlesex, probably stands alone. There are two trees near the porch which have for at least two centuries been kept trimmed into the form of a pair of peacocks. It is perhaps as well to know what they are, for the peacock of the early eighteenth century must have been a very different bird from that we are familiar with if these grotesque creatures ever resembled him. The trees still bear, in figures which are kept carefully clipped, the date of 1704, and some initials, said to be those of the churchwardens of that period. Thomas Hood, in his poem on "The Two Peacocks of Bedfont," gives the legend connected with these trees, to the effect that they perpetuate the memory of two proud and haughty ladies who stood Sunday by Sunday, one on either side the church path, to receive the homage of their poorer fellow parishioners.

"And where two haughty maidens used to be,
In pride of plume, where plumy Death had trod,
Trailing their gorgeous velvets wantonly,
Most unmeet pall, over the holy sod;—
There, gentle stranger, thou may'st only see
Two sombre peacocks.—Age, with sapient nod
Marking the spot, still tarries to declare
How they once lived, and wherefore they are there."

Many old prints exist which go to show that the trees are scarcely altered in appearance since they were first clipped into shape. There is another and far older yew in the churchyard—to the right in our illustration—which is not clipped; all these are surrounded by circular banks of earth forming a sort of rough seat. The churchyard also boasts a weeping willow of goodly size. A pardonable but surely mistaken loyalty has recently added a very modern-looking clock and case to the quaint old wooden steeple, by way of commemorating the coronation of King Edward VII.

At Harlington, four or five miles away, is a very fine tree, nineteen feet six inches in circumference, and the height of which is given in Dr. Lowe's list of yew trees as having been eighty feet in 1895, though it can scarcely be as great now. This tree in 1729 was "upwards of fifty feet high," was surrounded by a circular seat, and was "So thick, so fine, so full, so wide,

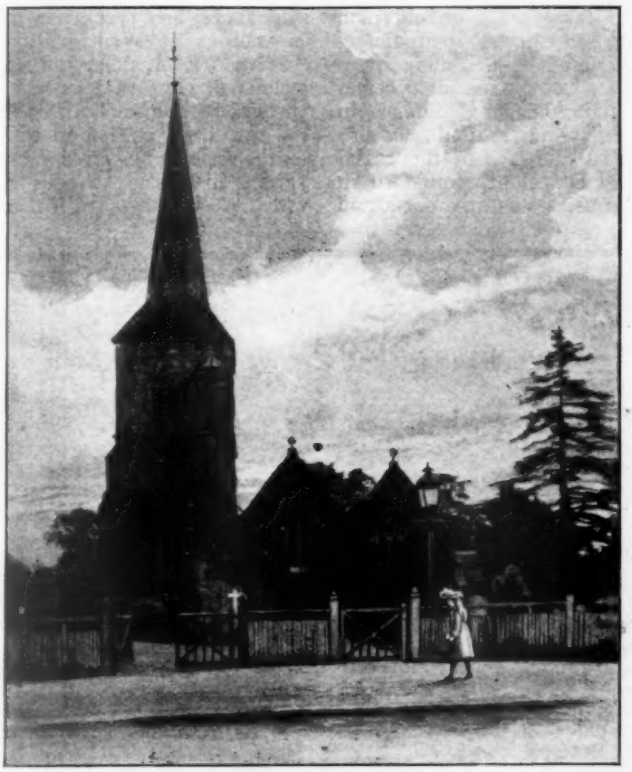
A troop of Guards might under it ride."

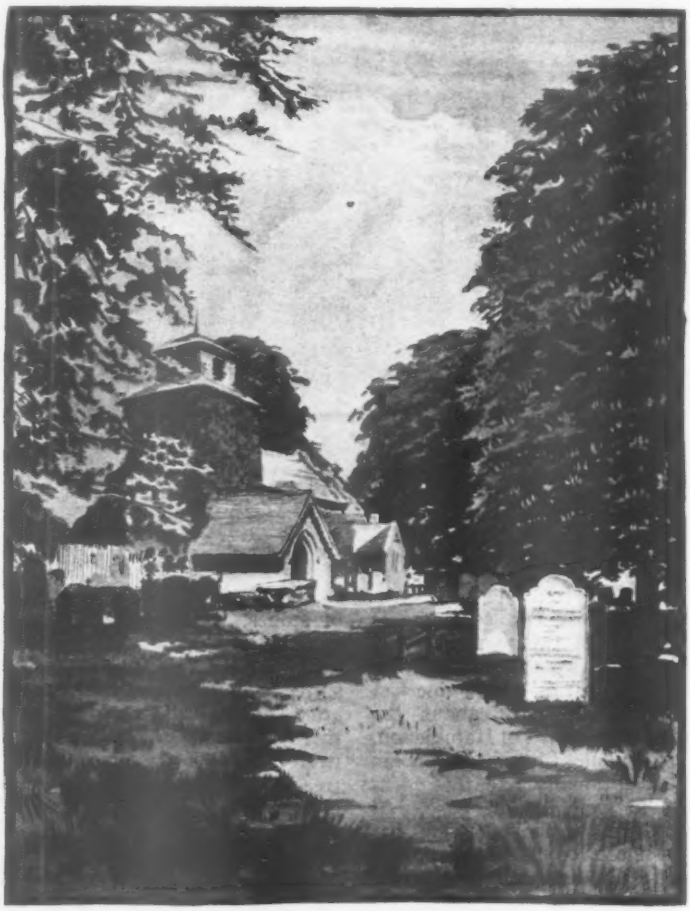


THE DARLEY DALE YEW.

Prints issued in the early part of the nineteenth century show it clipped into the shape of a huge vase surmounted by a hen sitting. The clipping was a yearly holiday; but since 1825 it has been discontinued and the tree allowed to grow naturally. Its branches once again reach to the porch of the church, as they did in the days before the clipping. The door within this porch, by the way, is a very fine example of late and ornate Norman work. There is a fine avenue of Irish yews behind this church. Another, of smaller trees, is to be found at Chislehurst, as well as an avenue of cypresses.

Mamhilad, near Pontypool, boasts eight very fine old yews, of which one is thirty-two feet nine inches in girth, and has a young tree growing within it. This is not the only instance by a good many of yew trees

"renewing their youth" in this way. On the other hand, the celebrated Darley Dale churchyard yew is an example of young wood growing up around the old, as its trunk encloses two dead ones. This giant tree is certainly one of the finest in the land: it is still in good health, although seventeen feet of its summit was twisted off in a gale in December, 1894, and it has lost two considerable branches within the last twelve years.



IRISH YEW, CHISLEHURST CHURCH.

One of the largest yews is that in Llantewy Vach churchyard, measuring thirty-nine feet in circumference. Another of about the same size is in the churchyard of Hambledon, near Godalming; while Church Prean, in Salop, has an exceptionally fine tree, forty feet five inches in girth at the base. At Llangeitho, Cardigan, a hollow yew has served as a coal-house for church purposes; it accommodates a ton of coals. Llanbedrog Church, near Pwllheli, has three rather remarkable trees, each old trunk being surrounded by a number of young ones forming a cluster. Strata Florida, Cardigan, had thirty-nine yews when visited by Leland in the sixteenth century; of these only two now remain. Guildsfield, in Montgomery, has twelve yew trees planted in the reign of William III. At Llanfoist, Abergavenny, the ancient tree is surrounded by a circle of stones, which some poetic imaginations have believed to be of Druidic origin. Painswick, Gloucestershire, has a hundred and sixteen clipped yews, not, however, of any great age. Tisbury, Wilts, owns an old tree, now hollow, in which a tea party of twelve persons was once held. From this tree seeds have recently been sent to Tisbury, Martha's Vineyard, U.S.A., where the fame of the original Tisbury yew will thus be perpetuated. It has a neighbour, quite young in comparison, whose age is estimated at six hundred years.

Much more might be said about churchyard yews, but space must be spared for the mention of some other trees. The weeping willow would seem to be a specially appropriate and beautiful tree for churchyards. Yet, curiously enough, it is not very often found there—perhaps because it loves water, and the soil of a burying ground should by preference be dry. Pines are often found; a noticeable instance is that at Bournemouth, where the graveyard is an old pine wood, and the graves are dotted about among the trees. The cypress is becoming quite common both in churchyards and in cemeteries. Planes are found in abundance in London churchyards, and mention may also be made of a very fine tree in the burial ground of the old chapel at Knutsford, in Cheshire; their cousins the sycamores and maples are not infrequently met with. The maple in Boldre Churchyard, beneath which Gilpin, the naturalist, lies, will be familiar to many of our readers, and there are several very fine sycamores over 150 years old, and sixty to seventy feet high, in the Friends' Burial Ground at Lancaster.

The horse-chestnut is less often seen as a decoration for churchyards, but there are some very fine specimens at Beaconsfield, as well as at Wootton, in Surrey, where "Sylva" Evelyn lies buried. There is an avenue of elms at Lichfield, in the churchyard of St. Michael's, which one passes on the way from station to town; and an ash on the western border of Winchelsea Churchyard is historically famous as the tree under which Wesley preached his last sermon.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.–XVII.

The story opens in the reign of Louis XIV. Yvonne de la Féronniere, a Huguenot girl, is being educated at the famous Abbaye aux-Bois. Her school friend, Gabrielle de Beaumanoir, is married to the Duc de Maillebois, and at the wedding Yvonne meets the young Chevalier Réné de Beaumanoir, and they are mutually attracted to each other. After the wedding, the girl-bride Gabrielle returns to the convent school with Yvonne, and the Duke, her husband, goes on an embassy to Rome, and takes Réné with him. Yvonne meets Réné again at the Palace of Versailles, when King Louis receives the Doge of Genoa. There she also meets her guardian, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, who abruptly removes her from the Abbaye-aux-Bois to his house, where she is plunged in a new life amid the gay, frivolous society of Versailles. She awakens to the fact that her guardian is intriguing to win her hand for his son, and that an assault is being made on her creed. In this a chief instrument is the cruel bigot, the Abbé de Chaylus, but with splendid courage the girl makes a noble confession of her faith.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THREE months had passed away, laden with sinister threats and dark forebodings to the persecuted Huguenots. At length, on a certain Monday, the 25th day of October, in the year 1685, the thunderbolt fell. The Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, long planned and decided upon by the King and his councillors, was made public, and the Protestants throughout the land were filled with dismay and consternation.

No longer protected by the laws of their country, they were at the mercy of every envious neighbour, of every secret enemy. From that dark hour the fate of peaceful thousands was sealed; henceforth they were outcasts from their homes, fugitives on the face of the earth.

Late on the evening of the 26th, a muffled figure might have been seen hurrying through the dark, narrow streets of the Quartier St. Germain, carefully shunning the flare of a passing torch or the glimmering rays of the horn lanterns hung here and there over a belated stall. It was Madelon Despard who crept so stealthily along under the wall, as though bound on some urgent secret mission, and who never rested until she found herself outside the great bronze gates of the Hôtel Maillebois.

The old woman raised her eyes in keen anxiety towards the sculptured façade of the old palace, which stood out, stately and massive, under the silvery rays of the moon.

"Heaven be praised! They have come back to Paris!" she gasped, half under her breath, for she could see thin shafts of light piercing through some of the mullioned windows.

Thereupon she took courage to ring the great bell in the gateway, which pealed out and woke the echoes, and then swung backwards and forwards, as though it would never rest again. Madelon had not long to wait. Presently she heard heavy steps approaching, a bolt was drawn back, the door creaked on its hinges, and the concierge stood dangling his keys on the other side of the grating.

"Can I have a word with Madame la Duchesse?" was the trembling, eager question.

"It is late to disturb Madame!" grumbled the old man. But he had grown grey in his master's service, and well knew that it was not the custom of the house to turn away any suppliant. Even as he spoke he had unlocked, with fumbling hands, the outer gate.

"Ah, believe me, I have not come without urgent need!" exclaimed Madelon, as she followed her guide to the entrance hall, scarcely daring to believe in her good fortune.

Coming out of the darkness, the light dazzled her, and she shrank back from the group of liveried servants, one of whom asked her name, and then went to inquire if the Duchesse de Maillebois would receive her. She had not long to wait, and was dimly conscious of being led up broad staircases and through great hushed chambers until she stood on the threshold of a lighted salon and heard herself announced. Another moment and a familiar voice sounded in her ear:

"Why, Madelon, dear old Madelon! This is a glad surprise. Do you bring me a message from Mademoiselle de la Féronniere?"

She would have known that clear, ringing voice anywhere, and she looked up, to see the Mademoiselle Gabrielle of bygone convent days, standing before her, a vision of radiant beauty, in a flowing gown of some delicate sheeny silk.

"Ah, Mamselle," she began, "pardon me—Madame la Duchesse, I would say. Truly I have come on behalf of my dear lady, for she is in sore and desperate straits, and cannot even cry to her friends for help."

"Tell me quickly, Madelon!" cried the young hostess, as with a pretty girlish impulse she caught the old woman by the hand and led her to a low couch near the open hearth.

"Come, sit by my side and tell me all. We shall not be disturbed, for by good fortune we are alone to-night; only my husband and Hélène my sister are yonder, playing draughts." And she waved her hand towards the far side of the sumptuously decorated chamber.

But old Madelon only saw through a mist of tears, for in that moment of success, when she had attained the longed-for interview, she must needs find some outlet for her feelings.

"Madame, she is gone. My sweet mistress! They have taken her away—to prison or death! Never shall I see her again!" The words were sobbed out, and Gabrielle caught them up with a cry of despair.

"'They have taken her away—to prison or death!'"

"Gone! Is Yvonne gone? But no, it is impossible! What could they have done with her? Why have I had no news of her all this while, ever since the fête de Sceaux?"

"You have been away from Paris so long, Madame. You do not know how Mademoiselle has suffered, how cruelly she has been treated? And to-day the end has come," was the sad reply.

"Madelon, I must know all," persisted the young duchess. "We will save her, if wealth and influence are of any avail. Ah, Henri, you will help me?" she added, turning to her husband, who had left his game and crossed the room at the sound of her troubled voice, and now stood by her side.

Madame de Chamans' curiosity was also roused, and there was a rustling of satin as she drew near and sank into a deep, carved chair on the other side of the fire.

"Hélène!" cried her sister. "You remember my dearest friend, Yvonne de la Féronniere? Listen to the terrible thing which has happened to her;"

Then Madelon told her tale, too deeply in earnest to be disturbed by any listeners, however illustrious.

"For weeks past Mamselle has been kept a close prisoner in her chamber; but each morning her uncle, M. de Vaudreuil, has paid her a visit, and used the utmost persuasion—aye, and when that failed the most fearful threats—to make her give up her faith. But she has a fine courage, Mamselle Yvonne, and she will never yield. What she has suffered in this latter time, my poor lady! You would grieve to see her, so pale, and thin, and worn, but ever the same bright smile when she speaks. My heart aches for her, far from every friend in her great need, for now she is suffered to see no one."

"Then Mademoiselle de la Féronniere is still a Huguenot?" asked Madame de Chamans in a tone of concern. "Ah, that is a thousand pities, and above all at this present, when the King has declared open war against them."

"But surely, Hélène, you would not have a girl so base as to give up her religion in time of danger and persecution!" cried Gabrielle. "Only a coward would do that. But go on, Madelon; tell us all."

"The worst has happened! This morning, at daybreak, I was restless and wakeful, and heard the sound of wheels in the back street below. Looking out from my barred window, I saw my dear mistress hurried into a coach, and M. de Vaudreuil went with her. I was kept under close watch all day; but I managed to slip away in the dusk, and came here, for I know not where else to turn for help. Mademoiselle Louise believes that her father has a lettre de cachet."

Those words of terror, spoken with bated breath, seemed to paralyse all life and hope, like some deadly miasma. If this should prove true, then, indeed, the victim was doomed beyond all hope of rescue. Gabrielle was the first to break the deadly silence which hung over them like a pall.

"A lettre de cachet!" she exclaimed in defiance. "But it is impossible. It is unheard of that even a de Vaudreuil should make use of such a weapon against an innocent girl! The King must be appealed to at once!" and she looked up eagerly at her husband.

"Ah, my Gabrielle, this is no light matter. You know what it means?" said de Maillebois in a low, troubled voice. "A lettre de cachet is a definite expression of his Majesty's will, and must be at once executed on the person whose name appears within. Disobedience becomes the crime of treason, whereof the punishment is death."

"Gabrielle, my dear; be advised. You must not persuade your husband to be entangled in this. On such a subject the King will stand no trifling!" cried her sister, pale with alarm. "You see that all has changed since yesterday; for now the Huguenots are declared to be outside the pale, enemies of the State!"

"Ah, Hélène, you are ever on the side of worldly prudence, and your cruel wisdom would leave a friend to die uncared for, lest you too might catch the plague!" was the bitter rejoinder. "But that is not the way we understand friendship!"

She paused, overcome by her own feelings, and at this critical moment old Madelon suddenly intervened.

"Pardon me, Madame; I had forgotten. See, this is what Mamselle Yvonne gave into my care when she had cause to fear the worst. She bid me take it straight to you, if the hour of her extremity should come, that you might deal with it as your heart should guide."

There was an instant of breathless expectation as the girl's slim fingers opened the sealed packet; then, with a cry of triumph, she held up an antique Etruscan ring.

"Ah, yes, she trusted me, did Yvonne; she knew that I would never fail her! This ring was given to her by Réné, and was to be sent to him as a token of urgent need. I promised her that it should reach him, and now will I gladly redeem my word. My friend shall have her rightful champion! Henri, we are united in this venture. I know that you will help me?" she added, with joyful assurance, as she bent towards him with outstretched hands.

"Assuredly, my little wife," he replied with a smile; "but remember that I am not behind the scenes, as you seem to be. Tell me the story of this ring."

With a delicate touch, full of lightness and sympathy, she told of the love which had grown up between her brother and Yvonne ever since their first meeting at the Château de Beaumanoir. Then she could not resist one final shaft at Madame de Chamans.

"And Hélène here was quite willing to encourage the match, for she knew that my convent friend had a great fortune in those days, though alas, I fear me, as a Huguenot, she will now be robbed of everything!"

"My dear Gabrielle, it is indeed time that I should bring these heroics to an end, and make you listen to a little common-sense," said her sister, in a tone of cold assurance, as she rose to her feet. "For some time past I have felt that a marriage with Mademoiselle de la Féronniere would be impossible, and would ruin Réné's career. Looking round my circle of friends, I have been able to pave the way for a brilliant match which would secure the future of our dear brother. Madame de Seignelay has a young niece, a charming girl who has not yet left her convent school, and who would be a most suitable wife in fortune and position. It so happens that Antoinette's brother is a friend of Réné, and is about to join him in his expedition to Barbary. Think of it! If he is once connected by marriage with the Minister of State, he will be assured of the highest promotion, and retrieve the ruined fortunes of our family!"

"Oh, Hélène!" sobbed the girl. "This is worse than I ever dreamed of. Would you have Réné such a craven as to forsake his love when trouble comes to her?"

"Be reasonable, dear; it was but a boyish fancy on his part. And surely you must remember that a demoiselle of our class could not so far forget herself as to give her heart before her hand was linked by the marriage bond. I am sure that Monsieur de Maillebois will uphold me?"

"No, no, Henri; you have more romance, you believe in love and honour?" cried Gabrielle, turning impetuously towards her husband. "After all I have told you, can you doubt my brother's devotion? Will you not help him to do his duty?"

"You are right, ma chérie," said the Duke, touched beyond measure by his young wife's appeal. "As a man of honour and chivalry, Beaumanoir is bound to serve Mademoiselle de la Féronniere—aye, even before his King and his country. I will seek a trusty messenger and send the ring at once to Toulon, where it is reported that his ship, La Topaze, is still waiting in port."

"You will send no letter; you will not compromise yourself in any way, Monsieur?" urged Hélène, adding below her breath, "it may never reach him; but, if it does, it will ruin all my plans."

"I am well content if Réné does but receive the ring before he sets sail for the Corsairs' land," said Gabrielle. "It will need no words of ours to hasten his coming home. Meantime, Madelon, you will abide with me, and we will leave no stone unturned to find your mistress. After all, the lettre de cachet may have been but an idle threat, and we may find her hidden in some convent near Paris. Ah, my poor Yvonne," she sighed; "I shall know no peace until we have set you free."

CHAPTER XIX.

"YOU tell me that La Topaze is fully equipped, and that we set sail to-morrow at daybreak, Beaumanoir?"

"Yes, at last, my friend. Jules vows to me that all shall be ready. You cannot be more weary of these tedious delays than I am, but there is no hurrying these port officials. You see, their object is to be rid of all the worst among the Turkish galley slaves, the ruffians who corrupt the others. Now I have ever been of opinion that men of substance and good repute in their own land would serve us better for a change. What say you, Gaspar?"

"They are a cut-throat gang, the lot of them; and, for my part, I see not much to choose amongst these dogs of infidels. Mark my word, you may have to keep them in irons most of the voyage!" said the young Count Gaspar de Seignelay, and as he spoke he lightly flicked some grains of snuff from the embroidered sleeve of his uniform.

The two young men, apparently in the very heyday of health and prosperity, were taking their ease in the guest chamber of the "Lion d'Or" at Toulon, an upper room with dark, wainscoted walls, somewhat mouldy and discoloured, and a low, smoky ceiling. Tall candles, in battered silver stands were flaring and guttering on the table in the fresh evening breeze from the open casement, which looked out towards the harbour.

Mine host knew that these spendthrift young officers were his best customers; for, if somewhat hard to please, they were not wont to stint their gold pieces. They might have been expected to take a rose-coloured view of life, as they sat over their wine and biscuits, these favourites of fortune, for they had supped well on the best which the famous old tavern could supply—sea-bream stewed in Burgundy, fowls stuffed with sweetmeats, and such like delicacies of the period. But youth is ever full of restless desires, and rarely given to peaceful content with the things that be.

"We have no choice, and must obey orders; yet I own that a petty mission, such as this, for the redemption of captives, is but little to my mind," exclaimed Réné de Beaumanoir. "As you know, Gaspar, my former experience of the Barbary corsairs was one of blood and fire, in those good days before France could demean herself to sign a truce for twenty years."

"Ah, yes; we have fallen on evil days," was the languid reply. "But I have the advantage of you in a way, for diplomacy is my forte and not war. You see, I had an old slave woman for my nurse, and she gave me a liking for these outlandish tongues. Then, as I was merely a younger son, my father was quick to see how it might serve me in an embassy to foreign parts. So, thanks to his foresight, here I am with a well-lined pouch and a commission in the King's service as herald and interpreter."

"The good fortune was mine, to have you chosen as my companion," said Réné warmly. "Yet I warrant that you will have no easy task when we find ourselves face to face with that wily old Pasha of Algiers. He will understand nothing which is not to his own interest, and a little timely persuasion from my men-at-arms will be needed to make your honied words quite clear and settle our bargain."

"You are quite right there, my friend. If I am not much mistaken, this business will by no means be the plain sailing which the good people at home expect. You cannot trust those infidel dogs, and the point of the sword is the only logic which will move them."

"So much the better; but we must bear in mind that this time our errand is a peaceful one, simply of barter and exchange; and that, while we are but a handful of Frenchmen in the midst of a horde of barbarians, we have no ships of war with an armed force to back us up."

"Come, Beaumanoir, you may count it good luck to have this spice of adventure, when you remember that deplorable truce signed last August," was the jesting rejoinder.

"I have no quarrel with fortune; the jade has ever treated me well," laughed his friend. "Let us drink to the success of La Topaze."

"This flask of Beaujolais seems scarcely equal to the last," remarked Gaspar de Seignelay, as he raised his glass to the light. "Surely our good host should know our taste and serve us well by this time. Still, on the whole, we might have worse quarters."

At that moment there was a sound of footsteps on the stairs, and the heavy door swung open. The landlord himself, of the "Lion d'Or," stood on the threshold, cap in hand.

"Pardon, gentlemen, that I disturb you; but there is one below who would speak with the commander of La Topaze. I turned him away a while ago, and bid him return later, but this time he will take no denial."

"I will see him at once. It may be some message of importance," said the Chevalier de Beaumanoir, instantly on the alert with regard to anything which might concern his duty.

"At least we might have been suffered to finish our wine in peace," grumbled his companion, as he filled his glass again.

Before he had recovered his composure the visitor was ushered in, and the door closed behind him. The two young officers looked up in startled surprise at the figure before them—an old man, thin and fragile-looking, clad in a suit of rusty black, which evidently belonged to some world unfamiliar to the aristocratic mind. His hair of silvery white formed a kind of halo round the noble head, and the dark eyes, under massive eyebrows, had a glance of calm assurance as of one who knew not doubt or fear. With a courteous salute, he came forward, and addressed himself to the elder of the two young men.

"Have I the honour of speaking to the Chevalier de Beaumanoir, in command of La Topaze?"

"No, I am only the interpreter. Behold his excellency!" and Gaspar turned towards his companion, with a careless shrug of his shoulder, and then returned to his wine with an air of contemptuous indifference. What had he, the Sieur de Seignelay, to do with such beings of another social order?

"How can I serve you, Monsieur?" asked Réné, with grave attention. He was inwardly chafing at this untimely interruption—no doubt one of the constant appeals which were made to him for contracts, or the sale of ship stores, or other petty matters of self-interest.

"I have ventured to apply to you, Monsieur le Chevalier, on the strength of your reputation"—("Ah! that is how they all begin," was the unspoken comment of his listeners)—"and also in the name of a lady who is known to us both. I speak of Mademoiselle de la Féronniere."

The words acted like magic. Scarcely were they spoken when the young man sprang to his feet, all eagerness and excitement.

"Do you know her? When did you last see Mademoiselle? Have you any news, any message? What is your name, Monsieur?" he added, as a sudden light dawned on him.

"You may have heard Mademoiselle mention it. Pasteur de la Forêt, in happier days of the parish of Croisette in La Vendée. I have known Mademoiselle Yvonne from her childhood, but I regret to say that I have no recent news of her since she has dwelt in the house of her uncle; and I am the bearer of no message. My errand concerns myself alone. Have I your permission to explain it?"

As he spoke, his glance turned with momentary hesitation towards Monsieur de Seignelay.

"I have no secrets from my friend, Monsieur de la Forêt. I await your pleasure," said Réné, in a tone of expectation.

"Gentlemen, I throw myself on your generosity, for as a Huguenot minister I am proscribed and condemned, since this last act of the Government—the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Within a week from to-day, if I am found within the realm of France, my life is forfeit."

"Surely this cannot be true!" exclaimed the young commander impulsively. "Our laws condemn no man unheard!"

"You know not what you speak of, Beaumanoir. The King has long been a stern foe to all heretics, but the statute of last Monday proclaims war to the knife against them," said Gaspar abruptly. Then he added, in a lower tone:

"Send the man away, Réné. For Heaven's sake, do not get mixed up with these religious troubles; there is no surer way of losing the King's favour."

"What do you ask of us, Monsieur de la Forêt?" asked the young officer, paying no heed to his friend's warning.

"I am told that you set sail to-morrow for the port of Algiers with a cargo of Moors to exchange for Christian captives. A young sailor of Croisette, Jean Hue by name, was in a fishing vessel carried off from our coast, two months ago, by Barbary corsairs. I pray you to take me with you and leave me there in exchange for the lad."

This astounding request was made in the calmest tone, as if it were the most usual thing in the world, and the two young men looked at each other in blank dismay. Was this some lunatic they had to deal with? But there was nothing to suggest madness in that quiet, thoughtful face. Then surely the old man must be ignorant and a fool, thought de Seignelay, who turned upon him with scathing vehemence.

"Do you know what you are asking for, Monsieur? Have you any conception of what it is to be a slave to those corsairs, those heathen savages? They are faithless and cruel; they have no respect for age or infirmity. Why, I who speak to you, I have seen a man old and feeble set to sell water; laden with chains, he led a donkey about the streets and doled out water from the skin on its back. No labour is too hard, no blows too heavy, for the wretched captives. Some of them have the sore labour of quarrying stone for building, and bearing it down on their heads from the mountains to the shore, in the broiling heat. I have known them goaded and beaten till they sank from exhaustion.

"I have seen a pale stripling sharing the yoke of the plough with a beast of burden! Better, a thousand times, death than such a fate, with all the carking ache of proud hearts and despair of release!"

"I thank you for your warning, Monsieur le Comte, but this is no news to me," was the quiet reply. "Rumour speaks of far worse torture than all this, deeds of darkness and cruelty which the tongue dare not utter. Believe me, I have counted the cost. Once more I pray the Chevalier de Beaumanoir to offer me in the place of Jean Hue. And, as he would be a more profitable slave than an old man like myself, I have here gold pieces to complete his ransom."

"The young man sprang to his feet, all eagerness and excitement."

"I do not understand you, Monsieur le Pasteur!" cried Réné, in amazement at such a sacrifice. "Surely, with that money you might escape to some place of safety? What can be your reason for courting suffering and death?"

"Ah, Monsieur, can you ask me? You who, I doubt not, would gladly give your life for honour, for a friend, for your country?" remarked the old man with a little smile. "And where there is so much suffering, do not men need to be told of the way of peace, of comfort, of heavenly rest? Moreover, as you well know, priests of your own faith have not been wanting in such labours. It is nigh on five hundred years since the order for the redemption of captives was founded, and many have crossed the seas for that noble work."

"True. I have seen some of the Redemptionist fathers at the Convent of St. Mathurin in Paris, clad in their white robes, with blue and red on the breast," said Réné. "But when they go on a mission, they go as a company, ambassadors of our Church, with all her prestige and power to uphold them. You, Monsieur, would go forth alone and friendless, in the lowly position of a slave!"

"Does not that somewhat represent our reformed faith?" asked the pastor, in a low voice. "We have no stately ritual, no great hierarchy to support us, but each soul must stand alone before his God." Then he added aloud, "I pray you, Monsieur, to take me with you on my own terms."

After this there was no more to be said. His request was granted and he was dismissed, to meet the young men on board La Topaze on the morrow.

There was a moment's silence when the door had closed behind him, then Réné turned to his friend.

"Well, Gaspar, what do you make of such noble madness as that?"

"The man is a fanatic, and of all madmen they are the most dangerous. There have ever been such, in every age of the world's history!" rejoined his companion, with a careless shrug of his shoulders.

"Yes, you are right. There have been saints and heroes before, but I count myself fortunate that one such has crossed my path; and I hold that you and I make a poor show by his side."

CHAPTER XX.

IN the fresh dawn of a late October day the good ship La Topaze seemed to awake suddenly from her peaceful slumber in the harbour of Toulon. It was the hour when night and morning meet, and the stars slowly fade at the luminous approach of day, until sea and sky are bathed in a flood of rosy light.

Not alone on board the vessel was there a busy scene of life, but the awakening had spread to the shore. The measured cadence of the oars as boats crowded round on belated errands from the town, the sound of eager voices, the rattling of chains, the ceaseless movement of coming and going, all betrayed the stir and excitement of immediate departure.

The sun had risen when at length the anchor was upheaved, the final orders were given, and the white sails filled out with the freshening autumnal breeze, as La Topaze set forth, in stately beauty, on her voyage.

Then at the last moment she was hailed of a sudden from the shore. All eyes were turned towards the corner of the harbour from whence the signal came. A messenger on horseback had just ridden up in desperate haste, had sprung to the ground, and aiming at the nearest craft was making frantic efforts to urge the sailors that they might row him to the ship. Then came loud parleying through a speaking trumpet.

"What orders, Monsieur le Commandant?" asked the chief officer. "It seems that this man has an urgent message for us. Shall we put back?"

"Yes, Jules, we have no choice," was the reluctant assent. "It might be a command from the King himself."

Nearer and nearer came the rowers, straining every nerve; while all on board waited with unconcealed impatience. They could see that the messenger looked white and haggard, as though utterly exhausted with his long ride, and his news was looked for with breathless anxiety. At length, when the boat was within a few yards, a rope was thrown down from the deck above, and the man, half mad with eagerness, made a wild spring towards it, as one who would clutch his last chance. With one hand he almost grasped the knotted end, but it slipped through his fingers, and he fell back with a heavy thud against the iron head of the rudder.

There was a cry of dismay from the sailors as the unlucky fellow rolled limply into the bottom of the boat.

"Cracked his skull, I'll warrant!" cried one. "He'll be dead as a door-nail!" shouted another.

But above all the hubbub the commander's orders rang out sharp and clear.

"Bring the man on board! We shall learn his errand from the despatches, in any case," he added in a lower voice to his friend Gaspar.

He was quickly obeyed, and by the skilful use of ropes and sail-cloth, the helpless form was carefully hoisted up to the lower deck. There was a gaping wound at the back of the man's head; he was quite unconscious, and to all appearance lifeless.

"Give him room to breathe. Loosen the doublet round his neck!" cried some officer in authority from the poop above.

One of the Moorish captives, who had shown himself very officious in the work of rescue, sprang forward and bent over the prostrate figure. None of the bystanders noticed that, with deft sleight of hand, the young corsair had possessed himself of some small article which hung by a thin cord round the neck of the patient. His slim, brown hands had closed upon it with a scarcely perceptible movement, and the incident attracted no attention.

There was no regular leech on board La Topaze, but Jules, the quarter-master, was looked up to as an adept at surgery. He bound up the deep cut and shook his head gravely, as all his efforts failed to restore any sign of animation. Meantime, all the man's garments were thoroughly examined, but no trace was found of any letter or despatches. There were a few pieces of gold in his pouch, a safe-conduct made out in the name of "François Dangeau," a pistol ready primed, a knife, and a few small articles, but nothing to explain the urgent mission on which he had been sent.

"Will the man recover?" asked Réné anxiously.

"I fear not, Monsieur le Commandant," was the cautious reply; "but we will do our best. He must be watched night and day, and raw spirit forced through his clenched teeth from time to time. Who will take the post of sick nurse?"

There was a pause, for no one seemed very eager to undertake so hopeless a task, when a low, musical voice replied:

"I will attend to the sick man, with your leave, Monsieur. It is in my way, for I have had some experience of illness."

All eyes were turned towards the speaker, and the Chevalier de Beaumanoir exclaimed in surprise:

"How do I find you here, on the lower deck, Monsieur de la Forêt? This must be set right at once. Your place is in the upper cabin, where we may have the honour of your company."

"Permit me to remain with my good friends below, Monsieur?" said the old man, with a smile. "We travel to the same port; and meanwhile I may be of use to this poor fellow, for I by no means despair of his recovery."

"Then you may indeed render me good service, for fortune has played us a shrewd turn in giving us the messenger without his message. It is possible that it may have been of too serious import to be trusted on paper, and that we must wait to hear it by word of mouth."

So the episode was closed for the present, and soon almost forgotten in the excitement and adventure of the voyage; but the good pastor was justified in his hopeful expectation. At the end of the third day, when he was still keeping his patient, weary vigil, there was a slight movement on the low pallet by his side. He turned eagerly, to find the eyes of the sick man fixed on him with full consciousness, while a hoarse cry came from his throat:

"Hola! hola! Stop the ship at any cost! A boat! a boat!"

"Yes, yes, my friend," was the soothing reply. "The ship was stayed, and you are on board. Now tell me the message you bring."

Monsieur de la Forêt was quick to seize the present mood of the awakening mind, which had taken up the thread of sensation from the moment when the accident had abruptly suspended consciousness. But here he was destined to meet with disappointment, for François only stared at him in troubled surprise.

"What ship? I have no message," he blundered out, with gasping breath. "Where am I? What has happened?" he asked presently, as his feeble gaze wandered round the damp, dark hole, only lighted by a cracked earthenware lamp, which stood smoking on a stool.

"You have had a fall," was the quiet answer; "but be at rest, my friend, for now all will be well. You boarded La Topaze in time, and will shortly see the Chevalier Réné de Beaumanoir."

He watched the effect of his words with intense anxiety, but they met with no response. The man looked at him stupidly, understanding nothing; and it soon became clear that the blow had destroyed his memory of all events which had happened before, and had completely blotted out his past. His words, on awakening to consciousness, had been started by the brain before his accident, and were spoken unwittingly.

After that night, François Dangeau began to recover his strength, and made steady progress. He was docile and intelligent, taking interest in all that went on around him, but his previous life and history remained an absolute blank.

It was a very curious and striking case; but Réné could never see those wi tful eyes turned towards him, full of the yearning look of some dumb animal, without a haunting sense of loss and anxiety. What was the message which he was never to receive?

Meanwhile, La Topaze had a prosperous voyage to start with. On she sailed, with a good head wind behind her, across the blue waters of the Mediterranean, sighting the coast of Spain, with its fertile pastures and little vil lages nestling on the sheltered shore. Then came a calm with its encompassing cloud of pearl-grey mist, which shrouded heaven and earth. Through gaps in the fog the sea close beneath was of a milky blue; the sails which hao billowed out with a rustle now hung like dead things; there was no breath of wind, and the stillness was deathlike. Man was powerless, and there was nothing for it but patience.

In those hours of idleness the young commander would send for Monsieur de la Forêt, and have long talks with him as they paced the deck together. There was a wonderful fascination in the society of one who had known Yvonne so intimately from her early years, and whose warm and delicate praise of her was music in the ears of a lover.

He was never weary of hearing about that bygone simple life in Poitou, where château and cottage were linked together by one faith, where joys and griefs were shared alike by all, and the child of the great house was the hope and delight of every soul in the encircling village.

Réné felt strongly drawn towards this man of wide experience and fathomless sympathy, to whom the human soul seemed as an open book. Little by little he told the story of his love, and as for the first time he broke that sacred silence life rose before him as a mystery, only to be solved by deeds of devotion.

For a perfect confidence the listener must be attuned to the melody, and meet the speaker halfway. So it was in this case.

"Mademoiselle Yvonne will prove worthy of her race," said the pastor one day in a tone of conviction. "All the courage and loyalty of the Féronnieres is centred in that frail girl."

"Alas! she will have need of it, with alarm and danger on every side," exclaimed Réné despondently. "She is in the midst of enemies. Her uncle, Monsieur de Vaudreuil, would have her wed his son Adolphe, for the sake of her great estates; but in order to make sure of these they must first compel her to become a Catholic."

"I fear they will be tenfold more urgent now, since the Edict of Protestant liberty, granted to us by Henri Quatre, is revoked. All our property is now at the mercy of the Crown, and Mademoiselle de la Féronnière may be deprived of her fortune at any moment."

"Adolphe de Vaudreuil will never take to himself a portionless bride," said the young man, in a tone of conviction; "yet I shudder at the cruel persecution which may await her. She may be driven to despair."

"Trust me, she will never yield. No temptation or cruelty will shake her faith, or make her a renegade from the religion of her fathers. By the grace of God, Yvonne will fight a good fight, and be faithful unto the end!" cried the old pastor, with strong emotion, and on his upturned face was a look of rapt enthusiasm.

But that cry of religious fervour awoke no responsive echo in the lover's heart. It was not Yvonne, the saint and martyr, who appealed to him at that moment, but Yvonne, the sweet maiden whom he loved so dearly and in whom all his hopes of earthly happiness were centred. No distant worship of ideal perfection would satisfy him. Poor Réné had a very human craving for the real, living, loving woman, a dear comrade in this world, not merely a radiant vision for the hereafter.

"Is all chivalry dead, that Mademoiselle should be left friendless and forsaken?" he cried, with a ring of battle in his voice. "She has but to send me a certain gem, a token that she needs my help, and I vow by the heaven above that I will speed to her rescue, even from the ends of the earth.

"Ah, Monsieur le Pasteur, there comes over me at times a terrible misgiving that I should have remained in Paris to guard her. Last night, in my dreams, I seemed to hear her calling me." He was silent, with thoughts too deep for spoken words.

In the stillness which followed the distant voices of the sailors rose through the mist, and he could distinguish the plaintive refrain of an old song:

> "When we were on the trembling bridge,
> Alas, my God!
> When we were in Saintonge,
> Alas, my God!"

After the pilgrim song of the road, again the deep voices rose in unison, as they chanted the familiar strain of the seafarer's hymn:

> "Our Lady of the Harbour bar,
> Now bring us succour from afar."

As Réné de Beaumanoir listened he asked himself why was there always a note of sadness and longing, even in the passing melody of an idle hour? Was it that the most careless life had ever an undertone of deeper feeling?

The days of his youth had been full of joyful daring, which seemed to crowd out all thought of the unseen; but in this, his first sorrow, etched with such a keen point upon his soul, he dimly realised that he was not alone, but one of a great brotherhood, who should only attain Paradise through the valley of swords.

[END OF CHAPTER TWENTY.]

PERPETUAL DELIGHT.

By the Rev. F. S. Webster, M.A., Rector of All Souls', Langham Place, W.

"Delight thyself also in the Lord; and He shall give thee the desires of thine heart."—PSALM xxxvii, 4.

HERE is the secret of perpetual delight. The whole psalm bespeaks the wisdom and calm of an experienced believer. David has not been soured, but rather quieted and steadied, by his eventful life. The cheerful confidence of his youthful days has deepened. God has become to him a tried Friend, an absolutely reliable and all-sufficient Defender. He is perfectly satisfied with God's management of things. "I have been young," he says, "and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread." "A little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked." "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord: and he delighteth in his way. Though he fall, he shall not be cast down; for the Lord upholdeth him with His hand."

Very different was the view of life that forced itself upon Solomon, David's brilliant but undisciplined son. In spite of good training and an excellent start, Solomon soon gave the reins to his appetites and passions. Unwilling to deny himself any delight on which the vagrant desire of the moment was set, he turned aside from God to eat of every forbidden fruit, and before long, though neither checked by poverty nor blighted by disease, he became the wretched victim of weariness and disgust. Having tried all this world could offer of wealth and wisdom and success and sin, his verdict was, "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity."

These are the two programmes that lie before you. You may walk in the steps of David, and delight yourself in the Lord; or you may walk in the steps of King Solomon, and, by trying to delight yourself in the world, find perpetual vanity and vexation of spirit. God help you to choose aright.

This verse contains both precept and promise, and it is difficult to say which of the two is the more attractive—the pathway or the prize, the exercise enjoined of delighting in the Lord or the reward guaranteed of receiving from Him the desires of our hearts. At any rate, we find three things brought before us—a reasonable command, a delightful exercise, and a blessed experience.

1. It is a reasonable command, because it recognises delight or enjoyment as essential to right conduct. God has made us with a strong craving for enjoyment. No course of religion is satisfactory which ignores this, and offers no certainty of present delight. Of course, duty comes before pleasure, but, human nature being what it is, we can never give ourselves with enthusiasm to any duty from which all prospect of delight is banished. Some measure of delight is generally found in doing anything really well, and we seldom attain to excellence in any pursuit unless we enjoy it. So we never serve God with the highest service until we enjoy serving Him. Our duty to God will be only tamely and lamely performed if it stops short at believing in Him and obeying Him, and does not go on to loving Him and delighting in Him. And yet let no one give up trying to serve God because they have no joy as yet in that service. The early stages of every accomplishment are generally tedious, but those who persevere soon reach the stage of unfeigned pleasure and delight in that which once was so difficult and discouraging. But be sure of this: your service is not what it should be until it becomes a service of delight.

This verse, then, effectually shatters those twin pillars of prejudice on which Satan's power over men chiefly rests, the prejudice in favour of sin as affording wider liberty and more joy, and the prejudice against godliness as depriving men of all gladness or mirth. The people of God are not the sour and unsociable creatures that the world pictures them. How can they be, when the principal of their life is to delight in the Lord, and the interest it yields them is the fulfilment of all their desires?

But this craving for delight, which is an instinct in every heart, can only find full and abiding satisfaction when we delight ourselves in the Lord. There are, I admit, many other natural and innocent delights—our delight in home and wife and children, our delight in the successful following of our daily calling, our delight in music and literature and art, or in any innocent recreation. But all these fail at a certain point. They fail as soon as we give exclusive or exaggerated devotion to any one of them. Moreover, they are all insufficient at those times when we most need help. When overcome with depression or anxiety or ill-health; when smarting under sore defeat, either in the conflict with sin or in the ordinary battle of life; when tortured by a guilty conscience, when weary of the slavery of sin and burdened with the pressure of sorrow or pain, then all earthly delights prove disappointing, their comfort is too cold to cheer our souls or put new life into our fainting hearts

And surely all these natural delights lead us to delight ourselves in God, the Author and Giver of every good gift. Does Nature in her calm, sweet moods exercise a soothing and elevating influence? Do we delight in the heather-clad moor, the vocal seashore, the silent mountain-top, and the peaceful woodland glen? How much more should we delight in the God of Nature, and open our hearts to the peace which passeth all understanding! Do we delight in human friendship, in the innocence and clinging trustfulness of little children, in the devoted love of husband or wife, or in the loyal service of some faithful retainer? How much more should we delight in the Friend that sticketh closer than a brother, in our loving Father in heaven! Do we find satisfaction in duty well performed, in resolutely resisting temptation, in overcoming indolence and selfishness and ill-will? What is this satisfaction but the reflection of God's approval? How much deeper, then, will be our joy and contentment when we learn to obey, not as a matter of duty only, but as a matter of love and delight!

Truly this world is a vast market, and it abounds in many wares. We pass from stall to stall, and possess ourselves of its various commodities. Some are cheap, taxing but little our resources; others are costly, and demand our best energies of mind and body. Some are sweet in the mouth and bitter afterwards; others are bitter in the mouth, but strangely strengthening and comforting afterwards. From some we turn away, soon tired and disgusted; others exercise such a fatal fascination over us that, though we know they are soiling and marring all that is noblest in us, we cannot drag ourselves away from them. But there is one stall, thank God, where the goods, though costly, are so abundant and so divinely satisfying that all who win them are filled with inexhaustible delight, so that never again can they know either anxiety or discontent. It is the Cross of Jesus Christ where we lose our sinful selves (for the goods are costly), and gain, in exchange, the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of peace. Remember this, ye who walk through Vanity Fair, you were created in God's own image, and ten thousand worlds cannot fill your heart, though ten thousand hearts cannot exhaust the riches of His love. It is a reasonable command which bids us stay evermore by this stall, glorying in the sacred Cross by which we become crucified unto the world and the world unto us. It is reasonable that we should delight ourselves in Him Who alone can give us the desires of our hearts.

2. And it is an easy, not an impossible, exercise. All who set themselves to delight in God may learn to do so. Two things are needed. A knowledge of the glory and excellency of God, and the assurance that He is ours. Both these the Holy Spirit will give us. So the art of delighting in the Lord is Spirit-taught. Our sinful nature teaches us to delight in sin, and only through painful experience do we learn the bitterness of the forbidden fruit; the Holy Spirit must teach us to delight in God. He brings us to Calvary, and there implants within our hearts an indelible conviction of the love of God. He reminds us of our sin, and teaches us to delight in the preaching of Christ crucified. He points us to the seals of the covenant, and enables us to draw solid comfort and refreshment from the Lord's Supper. He restrains our wandering thoughts, and teaches us to meditate much upon the beauty of the Saviour. He quickens our sluggish hearts, and causes us to give ourselves continually to prayer. He reproves our sleeping conscience, and drives out of our hearts all that is displeasing to God.

For to delight in the Lord means that we love to be with Him, and to be alone with Him. That is a very poor friendship that cannot bear to be alone with the loved one. So the art of delighting in the Lord is best learnt within the shut door. It is a personal and individual matter, and it includes the whole man. It means such a seeking and finding of God as brings delight to your entire spiritual nature. The eyes of your heart are enchanted with a vision fairer than all the visions of earth. Your ears are filled with a heavenly music which surpasses all the harmonies of earth, silencing the discord within. The sweet fragrance of the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley refreshes you, and, sitting with great delight beneath the shade of the Apple-Tree, you will find

His fruit to be sweet to your taste. Like the beloved John, you lean your head upon the Saviour's breast, and gain the confidence and strength which enable you to be under all circumstances steadfastly loyal to Him. A deep calm and a divine content pervade your soul; you begin to learn the length and breadth and depth and height of the love which passeth knowledge, and realise that, while your Lord is left to you, you are rich beyond degree and nothing can really hurt you.

Such is the easy exercise, the heavenly art, of delighting oneself in the Lord. Of course, there are hindrances to be overcome. The world will seek to divert your thoughts. You cannot delight in the Lord if you continually forget Him. If you make your Sunday like any weekday, save for an hour and a half at church, the pressure of other interests will drive out all thoughts of God, and it will be impossible for you to really delight in Him. All making provision for the lusts of the flesh is another fatal hindrance.

A third hindrance is the superstition and unbelief that Satan stirs up in our hearts. All dread of God's will, all doubting of God's love, the false humility which refuses to accept the offers of His grace, the unbelief which dares not rest upon the promises, the false faith that is ready to fly to any human mediator or trust any visible help, but will not rely upon the sure Word of God—these are serious hindrances. But the Holy Ghost will help you in the conflict. True piety, steadfast and intense, is largely the result of patient continuance and long habit. As you fight the good fight of faith, Christ will so draw near to you through His Word and through His sacraments that your heart will naturally and instinctively, under the pressure of the Holy Spirit, be drawn out to delight in Him.

3. And who shall measure the blessedness of the experience which follows? "He shall give thee the desires of thine heart." This is, as one of the old Fathers explains, out of the error of love. Your delighting yourself in God is no reason why God should give you anything at all. Yea, having found the living God to delight yourself in, you might reasonably be required to surrender all other delights. But it is the blessed error of love that "to him that hath shall be given." When you begin to really enjoy God, He gives you the desires of your heart, and you begin to enjoy every part of your life in Him.

Certainly this promise is no exaggeration. God wants to give you, God can give you, God will give you, the desires of your heart when you delight yourself in Him.

It is, indeed, most wonderful. Look back and consider. Has not unsatisfied desire been the chief cause of unrest in your past life? Vagrant longings, eager, undisciplined desires, these far more than the changing circumstances of life rob us of our peace. But these cease when you learn to delight yourself in the Lord.

Those who have visited Niagara will remember how calm and smooth the water is immediately above the Horseshoe Fall. A few hundred yards above there are numerous eddies and back currents breaking up the surface; but, as the tremendous suction caused by that gigantic leap over the cliffs begins to tell, all these disturbing influences are swallowed up by the overmastering current, and the troubled surface becomes quite smooth. So it is when we learn to delight ourselves in the Lord. Other desires are swallowed up, subordinated to the one desire of knowing and glorifying Him. It thus becomes safe for God to grant us our heart's desires. There will be no unsatisfied desires in our hearts when we delight ourselves in the Lord. Perhaps, as your hearts now are, it would be a curse, rather than a blessing, if God were to give you all your desires. The fever-stricken patient must have his thirst satisfied, not by draughts which would only intensify thirst, but by the removal of the disease. So the Lord first quells the fever of our hearts, and then satisfies our desires.

Let no one think it wrong to desire some particular earthly happiness, but let no Christian seek to satisfy his own longings. Only God knows whether the earthly delight you crave would really be for your good. This is certain: God's love is so real, so tender, so sweet, that even without any earthly delight you can delight yourself perfectly in Him. If the boon desired comes to you in the will of God, rejoice before the Lord because of it; if it is withheld, God still remains, and God is all you need.

Here, then, is a plain precept from God's Word. The command is a reasonable one, the exercise to which it calls you is a delightful one, the experience which it promises you is one blessed beyond all degree. Will you obey or disobey? Will you still try and satisfy your immortal soul with the pleasures of sin, or will you give yourself up to the teaching of the Holy Spirit, and learn to delight yourself in the Lord, that so He may give you the desires of your heart?

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

MAY 15TH.—The Prodigal Son.

Passage for reading—St. Luke xv. 11—24.

POINTS. 1. The sinner's downward course.
2. The sinner turning back to God.
3 The sinner forgiven.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Sinner and God. A burglar, not long ago, rifled an unoccupied dwelling at the seaside. He ransacked the rooms, and heaped his plunder in the parlour. There were evidences that here he sat down to rest. On a bracket in the corner stood a marble bust of Guido's "Ecce Homo"—Christ crowned with thorns. The guilty man had evidently taken it into his hands and examined it. It bore the marks of his fingers; but he replaced it with its face turned to the wall, as if he would not have even the sightless eyes of the marble Saviour look upon his sin. In the same way Adam and Eve, the first sinners, hid themselves at the sound of God's voice.

A Death-bed Repentance. Do not trust to a death-bed repentance. I know that God's mercy is boundless. I know that a man being carried down towards that mighty Niagara Fall may just possibly make one great bound with all his strength and reach the bank. I know he may possibly be saved. But it is an awful risk to run. One was saved upon the cross that none might despair, but only one—that none might presume. Now is the accepted time. Return unto the Lord now, and He will have mercy upon you.

Accepting Pardon. A sick soldier, whose sufferings were so great that he often wished he was dead, being asked, "How are you to escape punishment for your sins?" replied, "I am praying to God, and striving to do my duty as well as I can." "What are you praying for?" I asked. "For the pardon of my sins." "Well now, if your wife were offering you a cup of tea which she had prepared for you, what would be your duty?" "To take it from her, surely." "Do you think that God is offering you anything?" "Oh, yes, sir. He offers pardon to all through Jesus Christ." "What is your duty then?" "Ah, sir," he said with much feeling, "I ought to accept it." And he did.

MAY 22ND (WHITSUN DAY).—The Day of Pentecost.

Passage for reading—Acts ii. 1—11.

POINTS. 1. The descent of the Holy Ghost.
2. The preaching of the Apostles.
3. The conversion of the multitude.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Coming of the Holy Spirit. I am sitting in the shadow of a great elm. Its long branches hang motionless. There is not breeze enough to move them. All at once there comes a faint murmur; the leaves are all in motion, the branches begin to sway to and fro, and a soft, rushing sound fills my ear. So it is with everyone born of the Spirit. My heart is empty, and there comes to it—I know not how—a sound of the Divine presence. I am inwardly moved with new comfort and hope. Sunshine comes around my path, and I am able to go to my duties with patience. I am walking in the Spirit, helped by the help of God, and comforted by the presence of God. And all this is in accordance with God's law. It is by God's law that the strong wind comes stirring the tops of the trees, and it is by God's law that the Holy Spirit moves in our hearts and rouses us to do great things for God.

The Secret of Power in Preaching. A preacher once said that sometimes his preaching was mighty to arouse sinners, and sometimes seemed to be entirely useless. What was the reason for the difference? The results depended entirely upon his own spiritual condition, upon his nearness to, or absence from, God. When he was in close communion with God, the power of the Holy Spirit within him showed itself mightily. But when he neglected to seek the Spirit's aid, and trusted to himself, then his power was gone, his words were useless, his efforts were in vain. To draw near to God ourselves is the way by which to draw others to Him also.

Conversion on a Large Scale. It is told how conversions have been tried by a religious body on a large scale. Their missionaries went abroad, and one of them—a great man, after all, though greatly mistaken—took with him his brush and a basin of so-called holy water, and scattered the drops over the crowd as he walked along the road, and then announced that he had baptised so many thousands.

MAY 29TH.—The Passover.

Passage for reading—St. Matthew xxvi. 17—30.

POINTS. 1 Christ keeps the old Jewish feast.
2. Christ institutes the new Christian feast.
3. Christ foretells His betrayal and death.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Anniversaries. A missionary from the East once said that one of the hindrances to the elevation of the people was that the families did not eat together. Very much of the Western mutual help and love comes from the family gatherings at the daily meals. And what pleasant talks are held then, reminding of events in the family or national life. Especially will this be the case on anniversary days both private and public. We can picture Christ and His disciples recalling once more the tale of the first Passover, with the killing of the lamb and the sprinkling of the blood by which God's people were saved. And now at this last

Passover the Lamb of God is about to be offered Himself "for us men and for our salvation."

Longing for the Lord's Supper. One of the converted Greenlanders, who had that day captured a seal, rather than be absent from the missionary settlement when the Lord's Supper was to be administered, rowed the whole night in his kaiak, or canoe, with the animal in tow, and when his great exertion was mentioned he at once replied, "How could I stay where I was? My soul was hungry and thirsty for my Lord and His communion."

"Jesus invites the saints
To feast around His board.
Here pardoned sinners meet, and hold Communion with their Lord."

The Prospect of Death. When Sir Henry Vane was condemned, and awaiting his execution, a friend suggested his praying that for the present the cup of death might be averted. "Why should we fear death?" answered Vane. "I find it rather shrinks from me than I from it."

JUNE 5TH.—Christ's Trial before Pilate.

Passage for reading—St. Mark xv. 1—15.

POINTS. 1. Christ delivered by the Jews to Pilate.
2. Christ, falsely accused, answers nothing.
3. Christ condemned; Barabbas released.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Enemies of the Upright. A certain honest and God-fearing man at Wittenberg (says Luther in his "Table Talk") told me that though he lived peaceably with everyone, hurt no man, was ever quiet, yet many people were enemies unto him. I comforted him in this manner: "Arm thyself with patience, and be not angry, though they hate thee. What offence, I pray, do we give the devil? What makes him to be so great an enemy unto us? Only because he has not that which God has. If God give thee food to eat, eat; if He cause thee to fast, be resigned thereto; if He give thee honours, take them; if hurt or shame, endure it; if He cast thee into prison, murmur not; will He make thee a king, obey Him; if He cast thee down again, heed it not."

Quietness the Christian Security. During the Indian wars of the eighteenth century a few members of the Society of Friends, residing in Western New York, built for themselves a plain log meeting-house. The military authorities warned them of danger from the Indians, and invited them to come and worship within the fortified camp; but they preferred to continue their services in the usual place. One day a party of armed Indians in their war-paint, and decorated with human scalps, entered during the Friends' hour of silent prayer. A solemn awe seemed to pervade the place, which the Indians felt, and at a sign from one of the elder Friends they sat down and waited till the end. After being entertained at a house close by, the chief of the party took his host aside and said: "When Indian come to this place he meant to tomahawk every white man he found. But when Indian saw white man with no guns, no swords, and all so still and peaceable, worshipping the Great Spirit, then the Great Spirit say in Indian's heart, 'No hurt them; no hurt them.'" Saying this, he led off his war party.

Hatred of Christ. Some of the letters of Voltaire, the celebrated French infidel, conclude with the abbreviated words which indicate his hatred of the Christian religion—"E C R L'I N F" (écrasez l'infame) "crush the wretch," by which he means either the Christian religion or Christ Himself. "Confound the wretch," he says in one of his letters, "to the utmost of your power; speak your mind boldly, but conceal your hand."

JUNE 12TH.—Christ Crucified.

Passage for reading—St. Mark xv. 22—39.

POINTS. 1. Christ crucified by His enemies.
2. Mocked by the chief priests.
3. Acknowledged by the centurion.

ILLUSTRATIONS. No Fear of Death. Fox relates in his "Acts and Monuments" that a Dutch martyr, feeling the flames, said: "Ah! what a small pain is this compared with the glory to come!" He also tells of another martyr who took a faggot from the fire and, kissing it, said: "Blessed be the time that ever I was born to come to this preferment." Of Christ it is said in the Epistle to the Hebrews, "Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame."

Bearing Insult. When Xavier, the Roman missionary, preached in one of the cities of Japan, some of the multitude made sport of him. One man, more wanton than the rest, went to him while he addressed the people, pretending that he had something to communicate in private. Upon his approach, Xavier leaned his head to hear what he had to say. The scorner thus gained his object, which was to spit freely upon the face of the devoted missionary, and thus insult him in the most public manner. The missionary, without speaking a word or making the least sign of anger or annoyance, took out his handkerchief, wiped his face, and continued his discourse as if nothing had happened. By such a control of his passions the scorn of the audience was turned into admiration. The most learned doctor of the city, who happened to be present, said to himself that a religion which taught men such virtue, inspired men with such unshaken courage, and gave them so perfect a victory over themselves, could not but be from God.

Conversion Brought about by a Word. On the last day of 1857 a clergyman met a man in the streets and said to him, "Had not you and I better begin the New Year with a new life?" That simple remark set him thinking, and led to his conversion. The centurion's conversion was brought about by the last of Christ's seven sayings on the cross, viz. "Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit." (See Mark xv. 39, and Luke xxiii. 46, 47.)

A Story for the Little Ones by Flora Schmalz.

"LITTLE did I reckon, when I married you, Jack Lawson, that you'd ever bring me to this! To think there was Dick Moore I might have had, and kept a servant and dogcart, not to speak of a black silk gown to my back on Sundays! And there's Mrs. Moore turns up her nose at me now, she does! Me, who, as mother often says, she couldn't hold a candle to, when we were maids together! Mother's in the right of it when she declares a man that can't afford to keep a wife ought to bide single."

At the wooden table, in his shirt sleeves, sat Jack Lawson, unshaven and unkempt; his comely but haggard face expressive of that dogged despair which stamps the man out of work—the man who is too often condemned for that of which he is guiltless, who begins to look upon his past as a failure, and for whom the future is represented by a blank page. Though apparently callous and impervious to his wife's bitter reproaches, these seemed to put a climax to his wretchedness, and, in truth, cut as deeply as a two-edged sword.

"He's got no business to have children," the young woman continued, bending over the wash-tub, while she wrung out the linen. "It's a staring sin to bring babies into the world that will have to waste away and starve. Ah, my lamb, it's no wonder that you cry!"

She went up to the cradle, in which lay a whimpering baby boy of two months, and, with a despairing kick, set it rocking.

It was a summer day of intense heat, and, although the cottage door stood wide open, the close, steamy atmosphere of the kitchen had become intolerable. The cloudless sky was one blaze of dazzling light; not a breath of air stirred the drooping foliage.

In the slip of a garden outside, which was planted with cabbages and potatoes, Cissy, the eldest born, was striving to keep amused her fretful, pale-faced, younger brother. She was a winsome, loving little maid of six, and her heart already threw out feelers of sympathy and warm devotion to her immediate surroundings. In the midst of her play she caught the sound of her mother's angry voice, which filled her sensitive soul with instinctive alarm. Peeping round the door, she saw her father hastily retire into the inner room, while Mrs. Lawson pursued her evolutions at the wash-tub. After a few minutes he returned, wearing his Sunday coat and hat, and carrying some things tied up in a large red silk neckerchief.

Without a word he slunk out at the door, while Mary Lawson, irate and preoccupied, never once turned her head in his direction.

Cissy ran after him, but he repulsed her roughly, and, passing through the garden gate, stepped out on the white, dusty highway. He slung the bundle across a stick, which he threw over his shoulder, and set off at a brisk pace for the railway station. The country road was exposed to the scorching rays of the midday sun, and for the first mile at least offered no shelter. Then came a tall, honeysuckle hedge, which cast a welcome though narrow umbrage, and was succeeded by a clump of delightful, wide-spreading elms. The foliage was fresh and rich, and from one of the topmost boughs a certain willow warbler was singing a duet with his robin friend below.

Here Jack Lawson paused, and laid down his bundle for a minute, while he wiped the moisture from his brow. He thought he would be just in time to catch the up express for London, and his last savings would suffice to procure him a third-class ticket. It had always been his ambition to travel as far as the great metropolis—that dream-city of golden possibilities and of fairest hopes, too often doomed to grievous disappointment. He was a skilled mechanic, and could, indeed, put his hand to any manual labour. It was only since his employers had left the district that everything had gone wrong with him, even his neighbours assuming that because he had entered the ranks of the Great Unemployed he must necessarily be to blame. But he was young, and came of a healthy stock, and he had determined that in the face of every difficulty he would succeed in the capital. He would find work, and send his earnings to Mary, so that she should have no further cause of complaint. Besides, when he was no longer at home, to be a dead weight and stumbling-block in her path, Mary would meet with kindness in the village. The Vicar's family, he felt sure, would be the first to befriend her. Everyone would think badly of him, for his apparently heartless desertion of her, and for this reason they would be the more inclined to lend her a helping hand. He could not have bid her good-bye, lest he should have broken down in his resolve. And there was the little lass who had run after him! He had flouted her, the poor little lass, who was as the apple of his eye.

Hungry and parched, he pursued his way. The sun beat down on the long reach of shadowless road more fiercely than ever. The man's head and heart were on fire.

Meanwhile Mary Lawson, utterly spent and unfit to complete her task, sank down exhausted on the chair which her husband had so recently occupied. Presently her eye was caught by a slip of folded paper which lay on the table. She opened it, and as the import of these scribbled lines was borne in upon her weakened brain, an irrepressible cry of agony escaped her.

The sound brought little Cissy quickly to her side.

"Why does Mummy cry?" she asked in her weak but shrill treble. "Mummy tell Cissy," she pleaded earnestly.

"Heavens, he's gone!" shrieked the poor, worn-out creature. "Jack's gone and left me. Serve me right—serve me right, too!" And she swayed herself to and fro in a perfect frenzy of grief and remorse. Then, perceiving the child, she continued her lament, as if the only consolation afforded her was to lay bare her heart.

"Daddy's away to the station, to get the puff-puff for London; and Mummy's that done she can't go and hinder him. Her head's in a maze, and her legs won't carry her. And you can't go and stop Daddy either, my sweet, for you're too small and tender. Once he gets to London, he'll be swallowed up in the cruel crowds, and we'll never see Daddy any more. He's been and taken the money out of the strong box that we put by for the rent, and he says he'll soon get more. He swears he'll send me coin, even if he has to 'swing' for it. Surely he could never mean that. Heavens, he'll go and do something bad and desperate! And it's all Mummy's fault, my lass. She drove him from her, with her poisoned tongue. Oh, miserable wretch that I am! Would that I had never been born!"

With a great sob the young wife's head went down on her outstretched arms. At once she sank into a state of semi-consciousness, out of which she was quite powerless to rouse herself.

About ten minutes must have elapsed, when there came a light rap on the door, and the Vicar's daughter, receiving no answer, softly entered the room.

"Poor thing!" she ejaculated, taking a compassionate survey of the prostrate figure, and the air of general desolation in its environment. "How tired she must be to fall asleep in the midst of her washing! And what a pity I can't tell her that we've found a post at last for Jack! He's been out of work far too long as it is, and father was saying only yesterday that he looks utterly cast down. Oh, what a duck of a baby! and fast asleep, like his mother! I suppose Cissy is off somewhere with her father; they are two inseparables. Well, I won't disturb poor Mrs. Lawson. I'll just write the good news on my card, and leave it to surprise her when she awakes."

So pondering, she deposited on the table the basket of delicacies which she had brought, placing the card, with its welcome announcement, on the top. Then she turned and went quietly away, not without a sense of inward satisfaction that she had not permitted the stifling heat to deter her in the performance of this obvious errand of mercy. These Lawsons were an honest, attractive young couple, she told herself, and it was a veritable cause of rejoicing that they need not, after all, leave the parish.

We must now account for the absence of little Cissy, who, obtaining from her mother's broken words some childish inkling of how matters stood, had rushed out hatless, and in her pinafore, at the garden gate. By this time she was speeding along the high road, as fast as her small legs would take her, in the direction she had seen her Daddy disappear. If she could but overtake him, and bring him back to Mummy, then they might all be happy once more. Daddy would laugh and lift her on his shoulder, or he would pop her into the wheelbarrow, and drive her round the garden as fast as any gee-gee could go. They might have jam for tea, and plenty of new milk in their mugs, instead of filling them up with insipid hot water. And when bedtime came round Mummy would kiss them, and tuck them up, as she once used to do. Then, if they had said their prayers quite nicely, she would sing them to sleep. Such was the child's fervent aspiration; such was her conception of the highest attainable earthly good.

The public thoroughfare had been abandoned for more shady byways, and there was no one so far to impede the progress of little Cissy. The sun brought out each thread of golden hair which shone like a halo of protection about her small endangered head. Her blue eyes were dilated with longing and apprehension combined. Her cheeks had become deeply flushed, and her breath came short and quick, so that her lips fell apart.

"'She'll soon come round.'"—p. 730.

And while she ran her mother's words rang in her ears, gaining fresh force, and bringing a deeper realisation of all that depended on the issue of this race with Time. For what if she should arrive at the station only to see the puff-puff bearing Daddy away from them into the great and terrible Unknown? If such a calamity were to happen, it was certain that Mummy would cry more passionately than ever. And for Cissy herself, whose heart swelled at the mere thought of parting with him, what would become of her?

All at once through the sultry stillness there came a sound of rumbling wheels, which grew gradually louder. On turning a corner of the road, the child perceived a large waggon slowly advancing towards her. The waggon was drawn by a team of four horses, and by the side of it walked a carter, who whistled blithely, while at intervals he cracked his long whip in the air.

"Hullo, little one! Whither art bound so fast? Well run—well run!"

He clapped his hands together, and made a feint of pursuing her as she hurried past him. Terrified at the thought of being intercepted in her career, the child endeavoured to increase her speed. Tearing headlong down a slight incline, and overcome by fear, she stumbled and fell, face downward, on the stony road. But in a twinkling she was up again, and paying no heed to the cut on her brow, from which a crimson drop stole insidiously down her cheek, she was once more on her way.

Now she has reached the tall elms, with their friendly arms extended, as if to welcome her. If she could but tarry a few minutes in that delicious shade, and get back the breath that was so certainly failing her! The temptation was a severe one, but it was bravely resisted and overcome.

It is doubtful, however, if our childish heroine could have held on much longer, had it not been for the mysterious intervention of Nature, as it seemed, on her behalf. For quite suddenly through the dreamy summer haze arose a flickering air, which presently sprang into a gentle breeze. Laden with summer scents, it fanned the child's heated brow, as she met it face to face. Murmurous with delicate sound, it refreshed her senses, and spurred her into making a final effort. Whence emanated that revivifying zephyr? Might it not perchance be the beat of an angel's wings, still resonant with heavenly music, and sent to help her onward to the desired goal?

Her pace had all but declined into a walk, when, taking heart of grace, the little feet struck out again. Loosely, it is true, and as if they were running away from each other, but albeit gradually covering the ground. And now her courage and perseverance are about to be recompensed at last. Only a short distance in front of her, out of a cloud of hissing white smoke, rise the red chimneys of the station-house. An engine waiting in the station is puffing and blowing impatiently. Cissy staggers up to the wicket-gate, and succeeds in opening it.

Then there is a whistle, sharp and stunning; it sounds in her ears, like the signal of doom.

Jack Lawson was on the point of stepping into a third-class carriage when he was arrested by a cry that thrilled him, as if he had received an electric shock.

"Dad-dy, dear! Oh, Daddy—stop!"

Horror! it was Cissy—his little lass, who had dropped on to the platform, like a cherub from the skies, and who was now safe in the arms of the kindly porter.

Jack paused irresolutely on the steps of the carriage, but only for a second. Then he jumped down, just as, time being up, the train began to move swiftly out of the station.

"It struck me as being a bit queer, Lawson, that you should be going off to London so sudden-like," observed the portly station-master, who came up to see the young father clasping a limp little form to his breast, while the porter sprinkled her face with water. "There's no need to lose heart, man," he went on bluffly, touched by Jack's despondent aspect "The bairn has overdone herself, but she'll soon come round. See, she's opening her eyes already. Dear, dear, that's a nasty cut! What will her mother say? Of course, you'll carry her straight home, Lawson? Why, she's beat the record, has this little maid. A matter of three miles, is it not? And in how long?"

"I left home at something after two, and the clock has just struck three," said Jack in a choking voice.

"Ah, well; she's got her reward," the station-master concluded, not without a suspicious abruptness, as he turned aside.

For little Cissy, having rapidly recovered consciousness, was now gazing into her father's face with a smile so full of innocent joy that it was almost divine.

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A MAP OF THE PARISH.

A MAP has been sent to us of a small parish in the North of England which contains no fewer than thirty-three places licensed for the sale of drink, and only two places of public worship. One of these churches has a Temperance society, which holds a meeting for adults once a month, and a Band of Hope for juveniles once a fortnight. This is certainly a small bit of counteractive work to the thirty-three drink shops, with their deadly work going on all day long and far into the night all the year round. Perhaps, if every Temperance society had its own parish map carefully prepared on the same lines, the eyes of many Temperance workers would be opened to the great discrepancy between the hours during which the public-houses are at work and the time given to the operations of the Temperance movement.

THE LIVERPOOL COCOA ROOMS.

The origin of the British Workman Public-Houses Company, Limited, the proprietors of the famous cocoa rooms which are such a conspicuous feature in the great seaport, has been often told. The story in brief is that the late Charles Garrett, the Wesleyan minister, suggested in a five-minutes' speech at one of the last meetings at the great mission held by Moody and Sankey, that the Liverpool merchant princes ought to do something to counteract the influence of the multitudinous public-houses. The challenge was promptly taken up, and a company founded which has recently held its twenty-ninth annual meeting. They now own 67 cocoa rooms, 7 cafés, 2 kiosks, and 1 cocoa cart. The takings last year amounted to no less a sum than £86,700 7s. 10d., and a dividend was paid of 6½ per cent. The good work carried on by this company has been an unspeakable blessing to the artisans of Liverpool, and, although it would be an exaggeration to say that the whole of this enormous turnover has been detached from the publicans, there can be no question that a considerable portion of the amount comes within this category.

A POPULAR COMPOSER.

The Bishop of Southwell has recently called attention to the great need for an improvement in the hymns and songs used in Temperance meetings. In the interesting correspondence which has followed in the newspapers the critics of the Temperance workers have, of course, made much of the feeble specimens of song which bulk so largely in our books, and have conveniently ignored any reference to the hymns and songs—not a few—which worthily hold their own with similar compositions ostensibly written in the furtherance of "great causes." If the good Bishop some day finds himself at a Temperance meeting in which some of the inspiriting compositions of Mr. W. H. Jude have a place in the programme, he will probably admit that we have at least one composer whose brilliant gift of melody is combined with that masterly grip of a swinging, catching chorus which a popular audience picks up at a single hearing and hardly ever forgets. Mr. Jude's extraordinary career has made his name a household word. He was born at Westleton in 1852, and as a boy attracted much attention by his musical gifts. When barely fifteen years of age he was appointed organist of Emmanuel Church, Liverpool, and speedily made for himself a great reputation not only as a performer, but also as a composer, of Church music. His subsequent appointments included that of organist of the Blue

MR. W. H. JUDE, COMPOSER OF "FIGHT THE DRINK" AND OTHER TEMPERANCE SONGS.

Coat Hospital, Liverpool, and organist of Myrtle Street Baptist Chapel in the palmy days of the famous preacher, the late Hugh Stowell Brown. As an organist, his performances on the magnificent instrument in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, invariably attracted enormous audiences. In 1890 he took an extended tour in Australia and New Zealand, where he commenced a series of popular musical services, which were extremely successful and useful. After an absence of a few years he returned to Liverpool, and instituted similar services in Hope Hall, Liverpool, which were greatly appreciated. Mr.

MR. HENRY EDMONDS.

Jude has now for some time devoted himself to the work of an evangelist, and his services, under the title of "The Music of the Higher Life," have been very largely attended all over the country. For some considerable time Mr. Jude has been a total abstainer, and he is the composer of several Temperance songs which have become general favourites. The best known is undoubtedly the stirring chorus, "Fight the Drink," which was composed some twenty-five years ago to words written by Mr. Alfred Sargant, at that time General Secretary of the Church of England Temperance Society. This chorus became an instantaneous success, and so far nothing has displaced it from the premier position in Temperance song. Another very fine composition is "The Water Drinker's Song," and, as Mr. Jude is still in the prime of life, we may hope that he will enrich our programmes with many additional Temperance songs and hymns. This is not the place to speak of his work as a composer of organ music and as a writer of ballads. His sea-songs, like "The Skipper" and "The Tar's Lass," are known all over the world, and many of his hymn tunes have found their way into the recognised standard collections of all denominations. His book of tunes, "Music of the Higher Life," consisting exclusively of his own compositions, has had a sale of considerably over half a million copies.

A WELL-WORKED COUNTY.

The county of Kent is undoubtedly, from a Temperance standpoint, one of the best-worked counties in the kingdom. The Church of England Temperance Society, the Band of Hope Union, the Good Templars, the Women's Temperance Associations, all do excellent work; while the Kent County Temperance Federation has recently held its twelfth annual Congress, an indication of stability which says not a little for the earnest and devoted labours of the men and women who are banded together in this federation. The president and chairman of the executive council is Mr. Henry Edmonds, of Tunbridge Wells. To his wise counsel and foresight the work is largely indebted for the measure of success which has hitherto been achieved. Familiar with all departments of Temperance effort, Mr. Edmonds makes an ideal chairman. He has the rare gift of being able to seize upon the vital points of a discussion, and thus lead disputants to fix their attention upon essentials. By his cultured advocacy Mr. Edmonds has won over to the cause many excellent people, among whom a less genial enthusiast would have made no headway.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF BARMAIDS.

One is glad to find that there is a growing tendency to discuss this matter in journals and magazines which do not usually concern themselves with the Temperance question. Thirty years ago the late Canon Hopkins, who was so long prominently known as a leader of the Temperance forces in Convocation, did much by his pen to point out the dangers of the calling, and disclosed many of the disabilities from which the barmaids suffer. In Glasgow and other places a move has been made to do away with the employment of barmaids, and during the last Brewster sessions the subject was brought forward in a way which shows that the public is awakening to its importance.

A VISITORS' NIGHT.

A Temperance society in a suburb of Manchester recently arranged what was termed a "Visitors' Night." Every member of the society was requested to bring one visitor to the meeting, the invitation preferably to be given to a friend not interested in Temperance work. The experiment proved a thorough success, and resulted in the addition of several members to the society's roll. In arranging for such a meeting one essential is to provide a speaker "apt to teach and able to persuade." Visitors are not to be hectored into giving up their prejudices, but a sunny, cheerful, pleasant kind of a speech will often lead men and women to give total abstinence a fair trial. Many of those who are not with us remain outsiders because it has never occurred to them to test the principle of total abstinence personally.

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

Farrar's "Life of Christ" for "Quiver" Readers.

WE have much pleasure in informing our readers that Messrs. Cassell and Company have arranged to produce, expressly for QUIVER readers, an edition of Farrar's "Life of Christ," containing over 700 pages, strongly bound in cloth, for one shilling. Full particulars will be found in this issue of how the work can be obtained. We need only add that such a marvellously cheap edition of a copyright work, which has attained world-wide reputation, is a remarkable example of the power which a magazine like THE QUIVER can exert in extending the circulation of pure literature. As this edition will only be on sale for a limited time, it will be well for readers to make known to their friends the exceptional concession which is made to our subscribers.

"Exchanged for the Good."

IN the year 1803 a blind singing girl was led by her mistress into the hospital of a medical mission at Canton. She suffered from a diseased foot, which had eventually to be amputated. Then leprosy came on, as if the loss of sight and of a foot had not sufficiently handicapped the poor thing in life's race. However, this was a blessing in disguise, for in a leper hospital she found her Saviour, and before she died she had been instrumental under God in bringing to Him as many as seventy other lepers. The name which this blind girl took when she was baptised is significant. It was Un Ho, which means "Exchanged for the good." "I have put off the old and put on the new," she said. "The past has been bad; now I have exchanged it for the good."

Two Visions.

THE great discoverer Edison, to whom our generation owes so much for the results of his genius and his labour, is said to have seriously injured his eyesight from patient and prolonged experiment with the wonderful X-rays. That mysterious light, which has such beneficent possibilities for the future, has not proved a personal blessing to its first explorer. It is far otherwise within the spiritual sphere. Those who have gazed most continuously and most steadfastly upon the Light uncreated and eternal have ended by possessing the clearer and truer vision. We call "X" the symbol of the unknown. "Canst thou by searching find out God?" complacently asked one of Job's comforters beneath the Chaldean stars. And we confess that Zophar was right; but we know that He is found of those who seek Him, and that we can discern as much of the divine glory as it is competent for our finality to comprehend in the face of Jesus Christ. "The more light there is, the better one sees God."

Against Boys Smoking.

ABOUT three years since the Rev. Bernard Lowe, then a curate in Penzance, who was deeply impressed by the physical and moral mischiefs of premature indulgence in tobacco, originated a practical, temperate, and common-sense movement against the practice, which has already grown into quite a considerable organisation. Mr. Lowe has now a small parish of his own at Delabole, Cornwall, and he makes this the base of operations of an anti-nicotine crusade, which his bishop approves, and in the benefits of which he is desirous that Christians of all denominations should share. The groundwork of his simple, but rapidly spreading, structure is philanthropic, but not sectarian, or even distinctively religious, though the spirit of needful discipline inculcated by the Master and His disciples is implicit in his primary idea. When he started his work at Penzance, Mr. Lowe got a number of lads to promise not to use tobacco in any form till they were sixteen years of age. Each boy was expected to do what he could to keep other youngsters from smoking, and was asked to bring at least two or three more recruits, for whose fidelity to their promise the boy who enlisted them would be responsible. In one of his first addresses Mr. Lowe happened to say, "Boys, be *R*eal, be *E*xamples, be *D*etermined,"

and from the initials of those three words grew the title, "RED Brotherhood," as the society, which now numbers nearly one hundred branches in different parts of the country, is called. The method of extension is very simple. Some gentleman (parson or layman) who may feel in sympathy with the attempt (e.g. in Aberdeen, Birmingham, Bristol, where there are branches), writes to the Warden at Delabole, and offers to become a "Chapter Warden," which only means that he will band together, and look after, a company of young non-smokers in his own neighbourhood. So long as two or three rudimentary rules (and among them is one of never appealing for subscriptions) are observed, considerable elasticity of government is permitted to the chapter and district wardens. Several cards, printed in different colours, are lying before us, which are intended to contain the promises of boys not to smoke till they are sixteen, seventeen, or eighteen years of age, as the case may be. It will be noted that Mr. Lowe leaves the question as to the good or evil of the habit of smoking among grown-up people absolutely alone. It is no part of his business, and finds no place in his sensible propaganda. But he is firmly convinced that the minds and bodies of tens of thousands of boys in England are being stunted and depraved by tobacco, and especially by the curse of the cheap cigarette. He gave up his own pipe—a fairly constant former companion—for the sake of example, and there is a touch of human nature (which certainly does not prejudice us against his useful cause) in a confession which he has made to us: "I must say I often want to smoke." The conception and plan of the Red Brotherhood seems sound and salutary, and we hope that the organisation will increase and prosper.

CHINA'S FILTHY LUCRE: "CASH" AND SILVER.

A Symbol of Sympathy.

THAT is a beautiful, old-world fairy tale which tells us how the walls of Thebes arose to the sound of music. The prelude sounded, and, lovely as a marble dream, the walls of the mystic city soared into the rainless air. The strings were struck, and buttress rose on buttress, and plinth beyond plinth, and there welled forth a deep and serious volume as the majestic pillars were upraised which were to bear the weight of ages. Wilder rang the melody as sculptured frieze carved out some battle picture, and the tones were low and thrilling as snowy statues shone through green arcades. Thus in the life of man may some noble work be designed and finished to the music of the sympathy of those he cares for. And to the music of the Gospel, the songs of saints, the voices of those whom he has loved and lost, there rises in his heart the vision of a heavenly Thebes that shall never be in ruins, "a city which hath foundations."

China's Filthy Lucre.

MISS GERTRUDE E. WELLS, C.M.S., Weicheng, West China, writes: "If ever the term 'filthy lucre' was applied fittingly to anything, it was, and may still be, to the brass cash of China. It is the common coin of the land, used always in the continual buying and selling of the people, thrown here and there, stowed away in any dirty corner, and, as often as not, counted out on the ground—particularly when paying the fares of chair-bearers and coolies. In this way it gathers up sufficient dirt to render it only a matter of ordinary cleanliness to wash one's hands after every time of using it. The coin, if good, is about the size of a halfpenny, but it is mixed with inferior coins, and with a liberal sprinkling of actually bad ones, which however, is quite allowable so long as the bad coins are restricted to a certain number! They have a hole in the middle, and should be strung in thousands—in two rows, tied together at each hundred. As a matter of fact, there is scarcely such a thing heard of as 'full cash.' Each hundred is short—one, two, or three cash, according to the custom of the district, but the whole string is always called 'a thousand cash,' and will be received as such everywhere if one pays out the whole string. If paid out in tens or hundreds, however, one has to make up the deficiencies. One thousand cash weighs over three pounds, and is only worth about two shillings, so people do not carry much about with them, and in purchasing things, instead of paying for them at the shop, it is usual to have them brought to the house, and the man who brings them takes the money back with him.

Fortunately, paper money, silver, and drafts on banks, etc., are used ; but the silver is so heavy that those who are accustomed to silver and gold coins find it very cumbrous and inconvenient. Fifty taels of silver weigh four pounds, and at the present rate of exchange is equal in value to about £6 sterling. It is generally used in lumps weighing about three-quarters of a pound each, but sometimes when travelling, for convenience sake this lump is taken to the smith, and halved or quartered ; these smaller pieces can then be exchanged one at a time. The young man in the first of the accompanying photographs holds two lumps of silver in his left hand, and the voucher in his right ; three strings of cash are thrown over his shoulder. In the second photograph the coolie has just brought cash from the money shop and is sorting out the bad coins.

Some New Books.

No one who has had anything to do with little folk and their ways but has appreciated the difficulty of finding suitable songs, alike in words and music, for young voices. Let all those who have felt this difficulty turn to "The Little Folks Song Book," which has just been issued by Messrs. Cassell with a "baker's dozen" of simple and pretty songs, daintily and readably printed, and garnished with four coloured plates. It is just the book for nursery and schoolroom alike.—From Messrs. Longmans we have received two more volumes of their "Simple Guides to Christian Knowledge" series. The first is devoted to "The Early Story of Israel," and is by Mrs. Thomas ; while the second, more restricted in its application, is "The Teaching of the Catechism," by Beatrice A. Ward. Both books are for the use of those who are teaching little children. Messrs. Longmans also send us a volume of helpful meditations, "Reminders of Old Truths," by Hannah E. Pipe.—Messrs. S. W. Partridge send us "Dr. Barnardo : A Record and an Interpretation," by the Rev. J. H. Batt, whose work will appeal to no more sympathetic public than the readers of THE QUIVER, who have always taken a keen interest in the work associated with Dr. Barnardo's name.—A timely work is Dr. Robinson Souttar's "Alcohol : Its Place and Power in Legislation," which has just been published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. While strictly judicial in tone, the book is a very armoury for the Temperance worker.—Miss E. M. Alford has been a frequent contributor of poems to THE QUIVER, and our readers will be glad to hear that they can now procure her verses, neatly bound, under the general title, "Poems," and issued by Mr. Elliot Stock.

"For What we are about——"

A PLEASANT and salutary example comes to us from some Indian mothers, who have been brought to the knowledge and blessings of Christianity. A mothers' meeting treat was arranged by the ladies of the Mission, and the prospect of this unknown Western dissipation caused the greatest delight. On the appointed afternoon the happy mothers took their seats in the shade of a verandah, and spread out their laps, which were filled with the fare generously provided. But then ensued a dead and awkward silence ; nobody would begin the welcome meal. The ladies, who had been bustled and bothered with the novel preparations, could not understand this sudden deadlock in the festivity. At last a mother deprecatingly hinted at the terrible truth. No "grace" had been said, and they felt that it would be wicked to eat without God's blessing. This duty of "grace before food" might often be learnt by the professing Christian from the converted heathen, and by the West from the East.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 640.

61. Jesus was in the act of prayer when His countenance was altered and His raiment became white and glistening. (St. Luke ix. 29.)

62. To increase the faith of the Apostles, and enable them to understand that Christ must needs suffer before entering into His glory. (St. Mark ix. 9–12; St. Luke ix. 31.)

63. The Scribes and Pharisees taught that Elias was to come before the Messiah; thus, to assure His Apostles, Jesus said that Elias had already come in the person of John the Baptist. (Mal. iv. 5; St. Mark ix. 11–13; St. Matthew xvii. 13.)

64. When Elisha sent Gehazi his servant to the Shunammite's house his instructions were, "If thou meet any man, salute him not." (St. Luke x. 4; 2 Kings iv. 29.)

65. The seventy disciples went two and two through thirty-five different districts, yet Jesus afterwards visited all the cities and villages therein and preached to the people. (St. Luke x. 1, 9.)

66. The power to heal and to cast out devils. (St. Luke x. 9, 17.)

67. By showing us that God is much more ready to give us what we need than an earthly father is ready to give food to his children. (St. Luke xi. 11–13.)

68. "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." (St. Luke xi. 9.)

69. It must be earnest and continuous, as shown by the threefold injunction, "Ask, seek, and knock." (St. Luke xi. 9–10.)

70. By comparing the uncertainty of the time of His second coming to that of a thief who would break into a house. (St. Luke xii. 39, 40.)

71. He tells us the reward which shall be given to the faithful servant. (St. Luke xii. 43, 44.)

72. That the reward or punishment hereafter will be in proportion to man's use or neglect of his knowledge and responsibilities (St. Luke xii. 47–48.)

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

IT is proposed to introduce into this magazine a New Department which it is hoped may be found helpful to many Christian people who are from time to time troubled with moral and spiritual difficulties. We do not contemplate dealing with the objections of professed sceptics, but rather with the conscientious perplexities of those who find themselves, either continually or occasionally, faced with some critical problem of faith or conduct. To all such we offer a cordial invitation to state their difficulties (as briefly and as plainly as possible), in order that we may place such statements in the hands of some experienced and sympathetic adviser in spiritual matters, who will, of course, hold all such communications in the strictest confidence.

All correspondents must give their names and addresses to the Editor, as a guarantee of good faith, but their names will not be published. The Editor reserves the right to insert in THE QUIVER any such questions or replies as may appear to him of general interest; but he does not undertake to publish, or even provide replies to, every inquiry made.

As THE QUIVER goes to press several weeks before the date of publication, inquirers will understand that some delay in the publication of answers is inevitable, but those whose difficulties are of an urgent nature may, subject to the provisions above mentioned, and in every case to the discretion of the Editor, have a reply sent to them by post on their enclosing a stamped and fully addressed envelope for that purpose.

CHILDHOOD IN MODERN BRITISH ART.

By Arthur Fish.

IN every chapter of the history of art, childhood claims a large share of attention. Its beauty, simplicity, and innocence have attracted artists of every age and country. It has lured them on with the fascination of a will-o'-the-wisp, and oftentimes their efforts have been as wild and fruitless as those of the benighted traveller to follow and define the bewildering light which allures him with its fugitive and tantalising rays. The attempts of the majority of the early Italian and Flemish painters to portray the subtle roundness of a child's flesh, its delicate freshness of colour, are painfully ludicrous. Look through the pictures at the National Gallery, at the numerous renderings of the "Madonna and Child" and other paintings in which a child figures, and it will be found that the number of successful baby forms is astonishingly small. Beautiful Madonnas there are in plenty; wonderful representations of saints, donors, and angels; all of which testify to the unbounded skill of the artist, but when this same skill is applied to the presentment of a child it proves itself lamentably unequal to the task. Even the great Raphael himself often misses the mark in this respect. And yet he left many exquisite drawings of child forms, which prove that he was determined to master the difficulty. He, doubtless, among the painters of the Renaissance, came nearest to success as a delineator of children.

MY FIRST SERMON.

Later on we have the stately portraits of royal children by Velasquez—charming little figures in rich robes and princely surroundings, who retain all their childlike characteristics in spite of their gorgeous apparel. Velasquez's countryman, Murillo, too, could paint children, the children of the opposite extreme of the social scale to those represented by the Court painter.

But it was left to the English school of painters, commencing with Sir Joshua Reynolds, to cultivate the possibilities of the child in their art. To that artist some of the best and most successful representations of children on canvas are to be credited, and we are fortunate in that the chief of these are enshrined in the National Gallery. "The Age of Innocence" and "The Infant Samuel" are known in every household. The sweet simplicity of the child, its purity, innocence, and springlike beauty, are reflected in these canvases. This is the case also in many of Romney's pictures of children. One especially, which was exhibited at the collection of "Fair Children" at the Grafton Gallery, appealed to me as the finest representation of an infant I had ever seen. It was a "snapshot" in paint. No posing of the model, no attitudinising; merely the head and shoulders of a baby-boy, with all the loveliness of colour and form of the charming original. This it is which, to me, is lacking in Sir Thomas Lawrence's otherwise successful portraits of children. They are all very beautiful in face and pose, but they are so evidently "sitting for their portraits." They are all so painfully neat, and—shall I say it?—clean? True, they are mostly aristocratic children, but surely sometimes even they were mischievous, and not always so smilingly good and tidy?

Coming down, then, to our own time, we reach the English painter of children par excellence—Sir John Millais. Reynolds and Lawrence were, be it noted, both bachelors. Sir John Millais was married, and delighted in his children; lived with them and knew their characters, appreciated and understood them; watched their development from babyhood into intellectual childhood. It made all the difference in his work when he was painting his child pictures. He utilised his own daughters as models, and gave, as a result, character as well as portraiture in his paintings. Their popularity was undoubted, though many of the higher critics were ready enough to sneer at him for the "cheapness" of his art. They failed to recognise the difficulties that beset an artist in the effort to paint the elusiveness of the beauty and characteristics of children. That he successfully overcame the difficulty, and triumphed where so many others had failed is alone sufficient to rank him as one of our greatest painters. Far from pandering to popular taste in these child studies, he was the creator of it. He painted them because he loved children and appreciated to the full the delight and charm of child life.

The two pictures by which Millais is represented in this article were the first of the series by which he became so popular with that great public who find their delight in pictures of homely subjects and sentiment. True he had painted children before this, but in the days when, as one of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, he was looked at askance by artists, critics, and public alike. The "Christ in the House of His Parents" (1850), "Autumn Leaves" (1856), and "The Blind Girl" (1856) had brought him little but abuse from the critics, and they failed to appeal to the public—owing, without doubt, to the lack of appreciation of anything that was new and out of the beaten track of the art of the day. Millais had been elected an Associate of the Royal Academy in 1853, and it was not for ten years that he found his way to the heart of the great public, so quick to respond to anything which it can understand from its own experience. In the Royal Academy Exhibition of that year appeared the little red-frocked girl sitting in church listening to "Her First Sermon." Homely, simple, and quaint, it appealed at once, and with "The Eve of St. Agnes," exhibited in the same year, secured to the artist the full membership of the Academy. For this picture Sir John utilised his daughter Effie (Mrs. James) as model, but that is merely a fact of passing interest. It is the characterisation of the child—impersonally—which attracts us, and the wondering curiosity at her surroundings, the enforced decorousness that is struggling with her natural inclination to ask questions as to what it all means. It may be summed up in the words, "It is all so natural," and on that account, while distasteful to the critic who sees no beauty in anything that cannot be classed as "high art," is beloved by those who believe that that art is the best which is closest to nature.

"My Second Sermon" appeared in the Academy Exhibition in the following year. It was painted from the same model, and it is said, was nearly rejected from the Academy—before the work was recognised as Millais'—on account of its supposed plagiarism of the picture exhibited the previous year.

Here, again, is a true representation of child nature. The awe and wonderment of the first visit to church have passed away. The talk of "the man in the box"—as a child of my acquaintance once described the preacher of the day—has no attraction for her. The sermon is altogether too much for the little member of the congregation; the flow of words has become to her a lullaby, and she yields with all the grace of childhood to its soothing influence.

These two works passed into the possession of the late Mr. Gassiot, under whose will they have become the property of the Corporation of London, and may now be seen in the Art Gallery at the Guildhall.

Sir John Millais continued almost to the end of his career to paint delightful child subjects, which made his name one of the best known and most popular in the country. The chief of them are "The Wolf's Den" (1863), "Red Riding Hood" (1865), "The Minuet" (1867), "Asleep" and "Just Awake" (1867), "A Souvenir of Velasquez"—one of his most charming works, which hangs in the Diploma Gallery of the Royal Academy—"Sisters," his three daughters (1868), "A Flood"—a representation of a swollen river carrying along the débris it has gathered in its rush, the principal object in which is a baby in a cradle, and which is esteemed the most perfect painting of an infant executed by a British artist. This picture hangs in the Corporation Gallery at Manchester. In 1870 "The Boyhood of Raleigh" was shown at the Academy; it may now be seen in the Tate Gallery. "Getting Better" (1870) is a beautiful painting of a convalescent child; and another, very similar, is in the Aberdeen Gallery. "Cherry Ripe" (1874) obtained enormous popularity as the presentation plate of the Graphic Christmas Number of that year; "Little Mrs. Gamp" "Cinderella" (1861), and "Little Miss Muffett" are equally well known from the engravings of the pictures. "Bubbles" (1886), and "The Little Speedwell's Darling Blue" (1892), were the last of the series.

I have devoted this large proportion of my space to Sir John Millais through the fact that he must be regarded as the greatest of our painters of children, and the precursor of the numerous artists who have followed his example by painting incidents of child-life of a popular character. There is no question as to the popularity of the "nursery art"; in spite of the critics' sneers, it attracts the public eye far more than any other style of painting. It may not be "great art"—and perhaps therein lies its attraction.

THE AGE OF INNOCENCE.
(By A. Drury, A.R.A.)

The works of Mr. Fred Morgan, Mrs. Waller, Mr. Elsley, Mrs. Seymour Lucas, Miss Maude Goodman, and Mr. Joseph Clark are perhaps better known than those of most members of the Academy because of the appeal they make to the great outside public, whose admiration and sympathy are aroused by the homeliness of the subjects. So well known are these works that we only reproduce one by the last mentioned artist, to show that it is not only the well-to-do child that finds its place on the canvas. Mr. Clark has painted many works from similar models, taken direct from the streets, and always suggests the pathos, as well as the joyousness of child-life. "Golden Days" represents this fully; there is plenty of fun and mischief in this little assembly of "mean street" children, but that the simple treat they are enjoying should mark the day as a golden one in their calendar suggests the untold dulness, the cruel poverty, of their existence.

XUM

The other artists represented in our illustrations are not generally known as the painters of child subjects, and we have chosen their pictures largely on that account. To Mr. Herbert J. Draper's "Trailing Clouds of Glory" I would draw special attention. It stands in strong contrast to the others in that it is poetic rather than anecdotic; an allegory of childhood, not an incident. It was inspired by Wordsworth's lines:

"Our birth is a sleep and a forgetting:
The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Hath elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar;
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
On trailing clouds of glory did we come
From God Who is our home;
Heaven lies about us in our infancy"

This simple Breton child stands, therefore, as the type of all childhood with its purity of soul and its sublime innocence of heart; the period of life when human nature is most like to God's. Mr. Draper has touched a high level in this picture; it is at once poetic and realistic. Here is "a simple village child," charming and quaint; but at the same time there is the reflection of the soul with its longings, its inquirings, its heavenly simplicity, its solemnity, the possessions set forth for emulation by the great Teacher when He "set a little child" in the midst of the disciples and made him the text for one of His greatest lessons.

Mr. J. Henry Henshall delights in the contrast afforded by extreme old age and childhood, and has used it with great effect in several of his pictures, but in none more so than in the picture on page 742. The innocent whisperings of the child's prayer, prompted in its falterings by the aged grandmother, call to mind Longfellow's word picture of a similar comparison:

"O little feet! that such long years
Must wander on through hopes and fears,
Must ache and bleed beneath your load;
I, nearer to the wayside inn,
Where toil shall cease and rest begin,
Am weary, thinking of your road!"

TRAILING CLOUDS OF GLORY.

(From the Painting by Herbert J. Draper.)

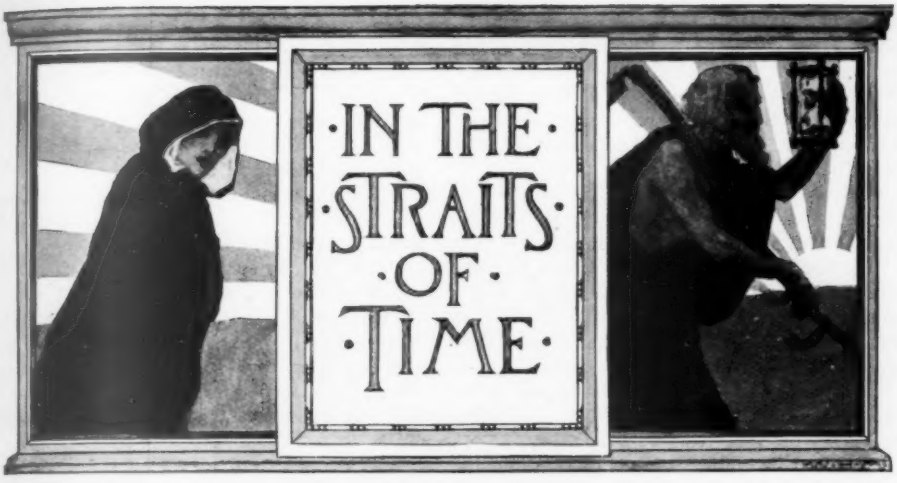
Mr. Edgar Bundy's name is generally associated with pictures of eighteenth-century life in its humorous aspect, but his excursion into the domains of the art of childhood as represented here is a happy one. "Two Years Old To-day" appeared in the Academy Exhibition last year, and, as our illustration shows, is a pleasing picture of youth and infancy.

The picture by Miss Irlam Briggs which forms the frontispiece to this number is one



TWO YEARS OLD TO-DAY.

(From the Painting by Edgar Bundy.)

The representation of child life in modern sculpture has been attempted by several of our well-known sculptors, but by none with the complete success of Mr. Alfred Drury, A.R.A., in the bust entitled "The Age of Innocence" on page 742. It is the embodiment of child beauty and character in marble. The sweetness and charm of the whole work is unsurpassed in English sculpture, but it is in the face of the child that Mr. Drury has put the full force of his skill. This winsome little maiden fascinates us with her delightful naïveté, soulfulness, and freshness of beauty. It is a triumph of characterisation and of the sculptor's art. It ranks with Mr. Draper's painting as a representation of a typical, not an individual, child. It summarises child nature in all its phases and moods, in all its happiness, blithesomeness, and innocence. Wordsworth again supplies us with an apt poetic accompaniment to the artist's effort:

> "Even so this happy creature of herself
> Is all-sufficient; solitude to her
> Is blithe society, who fills the air
> With gladness and involuntary songs."

of the numerous canvases of which the pathetic death of the Princess Elizabeth has formed the subject. Only thirteen years of age when her father, Charles I., was executed, the unhappy Princess and her little brother Henry were afterwards imprisoned in Carisbrooke Castle. She had been ill ever since the death of her father, and on Sunday, September 8th, 1650, she was found dead, with her head resting on the Bible, the last gift of her father on the night before his execution. Deeply underlined, and probably one of the last she read, was the passage in Matthew xi. 28: "Come unto Me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." In St. Thomas's Church at Newport, Isle of Wight, is a beautiful monument to her memory, which was erected by Queen Victoria.

A ROMANCE OF OLD FRANCE.

By Christopher Hare, Author of "Dreams to Sell," Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.–XX.

The story opens in the reign of Louis XIV. Yvonne de la Féronniere, heiress of an old Huguenot family, is being educated in the famous Abbaye-aux-Bois. Her school friend, Gabrielle de Beaumanoir, is married to the Duc de Maillebois, and at the wedding Yvonne meets the young Chevalier René de Beaumanoir. They are mutually attracted to each other, and their friendship ripens into love. They meet again at the Palace of Versailles when King Louis receives the Doge of Genoa. Her guardian, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, abruptly removes her from the Abbaye-aux-Bois to his own house. She lives in an atmosphere of worldliness and frivolity, but receives much sympathy from little crippled Louise. Mdl'e. de la Féronniere is a great heiress, and no effort is spared to make her become a Roman Catholic, and to induce her to marry her cousin, Adolphe de Vaudreuil. She is driven to extremity by the Abbé de Chaylus. Then follows the revocation of the Edict of Nantes and the persecution of the Huguenots. Yvonne disappears. Meantime René de Beaumanoir has sailed from Toulon in command of La Topaze to redeem captives from Barbary. M. de la Forêt, the Huguenot pastor, goes with him to offer himself in exchange for one of his own people.

CHAPTER XXI.

WHEN the morrow dawned, the sea mist had drifted away in thick grey banks, chased by the freshening breeze. Mirrored in the glimmering reflection of the sea beneath, La Topaze sped on her way, with infinite depths of vaulted blue above. Clouds of little birds followed in her wake, homing from chill northern climes to their winter haven of sunshine.

As the day wore on, men's hearts thrilled with eager expectation, for the rumour had spread that they were nearing their journey's end. The Moorish captives on the lower deck crowded to the bulwarks, and strained their eyes to catch the first streak on that far horizon, the haven of their hopes. The afternoon was far spent when at length they sighted a dim coast, with white towns lifting from the violet haze. The golden sands were outlined with a thread of foam, where the translucent sea lapped silently in the sheltered bay, where strange craft, with sails of many hues, rode at anchor.

As they drew nearer to the harbour a shadowy city rose on the hill above, with square towers and turrets frowning on the serried rows of white Corsair dwellings which climbed the slope. On every side were ilexes and feathery palms and orange groves, and olives whitening to silver; and all bore the aspect of peace in this enchanted land. On the right was the Mole, which Spanish slaves had once built out of the ruins of the Spanish fort. Two gates fronted the south and north, the Bab-Ayun and the Bab-el-Wed. Avoiding the promontory of Cashina, the gallant ship, with furled sails, drew up before the low strand, backed by stretches of luxuriant verdure, south of the city of Algiers.

Then suddenly a gun from the battlements above roared forth a challenge. Impatient signals quickly followed, which Gaspar de Seignelay interpreted to mean that the French flag must dip to the Crescent.

XUM

"Never!" cried the young commander defiantly. "Rather shall their guns sink us, and La Topaze go to the bottom with every soul on board, than do homage to the infidel. Why, think of it, Gaspar. The last time I came here with fire and sword, an avenger and a conqueror. Have these paynims so soon forgotten?"

"There are times when it is well to be blessed with a short memory," replied his friend, with a shrug of the shoulders.

Another gun-shot awoke the echoes, and the situation was becoming critical, when orders were given to run up a great flag of truce, in sign of a peaceful mission. Then a messenger was sent ashore to request an audience from the Dey of Algiers for the ambassadors of the most high and potent Sovereign, Louis, by the grace of God, King of France.

But in those southern lands of sunshine and leisure, time is of no account, and procrastination becomes a fine art. There was no renewal of hostilities, and for the moment the envoys were in no immediate danger, but there came no answer to their appeal. Negotiations languished, and there was wearisome delay, with endless diplomacy on both sides. The French officers suspected bad faith, and resolved to keep their prisoners closely guarded on board until such time as all the ninety-seven Christian captives should have been delivered over to them in safety.

Meantime, there was much outward show of courtesy and ceremonial exchange of presents. The Dey of Algiers sent an ox, some sheep, fowls, wax candles, and excellent hot loaves, to which the commander of La Topaze responded with gifts of gold and silver watches, scarlet cloth, and rich brocades. So time passed, until at length the day was fixed for the eventful meeting, which was to be held in full Divan, with all Eastern pomp and circumstance.

As Réné and Gaspar were rowed to the shore in a pinnace, with all the picked men they could spare from the ship, they were not blind to the dangers before them That morning a suspicious-looking craft had taken up a position near them in the harbour, a long galley of the Algerine sort, by the cross-set of its lateen sails, making it look like some great bird with spread wings on the water. This might have been accidental, and no remonstrance was possible; but it could not do otherwise than strengthen their lurking fear of treachery

When they landed at the steps, and passed through a steep, narrow street, with bell-tower and battlement looming darkly overhead, followed meantime, in grim silence, by a hostile crowd, they knew well that peril and death lurked at every corner; but these young men were hardened to such risk, and met it with a gay, bold spirit of adventure.

"Beaumanoir, did you take my counsel, and wear that coat of mail beneath your doublet?" asked his companion, in a low voice.

"No; on my soul, it seemed to savour too much of caution, and, moreover, it was so cumbersome," replied Réné, with a light, merry laugh. "But I thank my stars that you are thus provided, for in that gorgeous habit, as a Herald of France, you would be the first mark for some prick of a Damascus blade."

The words were lightly spoken, but Gaspar's reply took a more serious tone. "Believe me, we all carry our lives in our hands this day. But we are not to blame for wilful rashness; our mariners are all good men and true. They are well primed, and the hilt of a cutlass is not far to seek."

"You mean that if it comes to the worst we will sell our lives dear, though we be but a handful in their midst. Our good Jules on board has his orders if we return not; and he will raise such a clamour that all the nations of the civilised world will combine to burn out these pirates from their eyrie nest," was the significant rejoinder.

At that moment they turned a sharp corner, and came face to face with those they spoke of. It was the Pasha himself, robed in white and mounted on a splendid barb richly caparisoned with precious stones and silk embroidery, who had ridden forth at the head of a brilliant procession, to meet the envoys of his most Christian Majesty. No one would have imagined that this superb ruler had been only a rough Janissary himself, chosen by his fellows for the high post, which he held only at their will and pleasure.

With stately ceremony, and much show of respect and goodwill, accompanied by a deafening noise of drums and fifes, they were conducted to the Cassanabah, the Pasha's grim palace, and found that the hall of audience was a vast quadrangle hemmed in by massive grey walls. It was partly shaded by coloured awnings, but beyond the canopy a relentless sun beat down on the white, dusty space, and glittered on a fountain in the centre, playing from a lion's head. On three sides were ranged, in rows of stone seats, an imposing company of turbaned men, with swarthy faces and long beards, in costumes of many hues and barbaric splendour, with an armed company around them.

In a richly decorated alcove was a kind of throne, where the Dey took his place, with fan bearers on either side, while high, round stools were placed opposite for the commander of La Topaze and his interpreter.

René's keen eye took in the situation at a glance. They were absolutely unprotected in the rear, where a motley crowd pressed forward and blocked the exit. Armed with sabres and long firelocks, they kept watch and ward at every opening. The little band of French sailors had been hustled on one side; but, true to the word of command, they were firmly planted together and well on the alert. He turned towards the dark, impenetrable faces of that serried tribunal, with the clear knowledge that neither justice nor mercy was to be found amongst those who held the keys of life and death.

To his frank, impulsive nature that dead calm was a menace, and the very air seemed heavy with evil thoughts and the brooding of black designs.

What dark crimes, what deeds of cruelty had those grim walls looked down upon? Even now there might be Christian slaves rotting in dungeons around, for be there peace or war, those Barbary pirates still swept the seas with impunity.

Thank Heaven! This audience would be the final ordeal. The conditions of exchange were already settled, the French captives were assembled in readiness for embarkation, and the terms of agreement were drawn up for signature. In these papers it had been clearly stated that Monsieur de la Forêt was not to be treated as a slave, but to be suffered to visit and comfort and relieve all poor prisoners and captives of any nation and any faith. To this ready assent had been given; for with slaves despair was a constant danger to their masters, and one who preached patience and submission must ever be welcome.

The parleying was almost at an end, and the Pasha's seal had been publicly affixed to a formal deed, drawn up in strange characters, on a roll of parchment. With honied words, he was sending fulsome greeting to his dearly-beloved brother, the King of France, when René felt, rather than heard, a stealthy movement behind. Gaspar, who was quite absorbed in his arduous duties as interpreter of Eastern flowers of speech, was leaning forward to listen, all unconscious of the lurking foe.

A bare, brown arm upraised, a flash of glittering steel, and, quick as thought, René sprang forward to the rescue. He would have been too late but for that coat of mail arresting for an instant the sharp point of the dagger, which he seized with a grip of iron. He had just time to catch a glimpse of a swarthy face, distorted with rage, when the would-be assassin, finding himself disarmed, glided snake-like through the yielding crowd.

The whole episode had passed like a flash, in ominous silence; for Gaspar, warned by a significant gesture, had quickly grasped the situation. No cry of horror from the grave spectators denounced the attempted crime; the result was awaited with the ineffable calm of fatalism. As the young commander met, unflinching, the quiet challenge of the Pasha's gaze, for one breathless moment there was a steady duel of the eyes before the wily old ruler of Corsairs knew himself to be vanquished. He was not to have appeared in that impromptu drama, for he chanced at that moment to be under a treaty of peace with France.

But what if some fanatic should poignard the leader of the embassy, and his followers should be massacred in a popular tumult? Who would then dare to blame him? Moreover, France was far distant across the stormy seas, and if La Topaze never returned, who would know the secret of her fate? The ocean has its wrecks, and dead men tell no tales.

Yet, after all, if the plot had failed, and the Franks should escape this time, at least his secret was safe, for the young officer could prove nothing. So, with unruffled dignity, the Dey of Algiers rose to his feet, and at a sign the trumpets sounded, the Divan was at an end, and the company dismissed.

As the two friends made their way from the palace unmolested, they exchanged a few eager words. The first impulse of Gaspar de Seignelay had been to pursue the miscreant, and seize him red-handed; but at the sight of the weapon in René's hand he knew that he was forestalled. A little reflection convinced them that for the present the outrage must remain unavenged. They felt that their first duty was to the captives they had come so far to redeem, and they both agreed that to throw away their own lives before this was accomplished would be futile madness.

"My lord the Dey will miss his precious dagger, which I shall keep as a memento and a warning," exclaimed Réné, as he held it up to his companion's admiring gaze.

The long, slender blade was of tempered steel inlaid with silver, of a perfect balance, and its needle point was like adamant. The six-sided hilt was of massive silver, deeply chiselled, and the round steel guard was engraven in arabesques, with Moorish characters.

As Gaspar touched the delicate point, a curious smile passed over his face, and he remarked quietly:

"My coat of mail would have served me little, if the hand which held this had not trembled, or if it had dared a second thrust. You are right, Beaumanoir. This marvel of Eastern workmanship was owned by no man of lower degree than the Dey himself. It will be at once a witness of his treachery and a trophy of our happy escape."

CHAPTER XXII.

"YOU have seen the dagger with your own eyes, Monsieur de la Forêt, and you have heard our adventure. What say you now? Will that treacherous Dey keep faith with you? Can you trust yourself in his power?" cried the young commander of La Topaze, in eager, vehement tones.

"It would profit him but little to betray me, an old man of small account; and if he be all you say, surely there is the more need of me," was the quiet answer.

The two men were standing on the poop of the ship, and at that moment were joined by Gaspar de Seignelay.

"I trust my friend has persuaded you, Monsieur?" he exclaimed. "Though I doubt if he can paint the fiend black enough; for, indeed, these dogs of infidels are base and cruel beyond conception to all who come within their power. Your man, Jean Hue, has his freedom secured, for he is on the list of those whom we ransom with gold pieces, so that your sacrifice is not needed for him. Be advised, leave this wicked coast with us, and seek your mission elsewhere."

A faint smile lighted the old man's face, as, with head erect, he made reply.

"You are very good to me, my friends; but it is to this work that I am called. You, in your brave youth; you who are wont to face death with a smile and a gay word, should be the last to have me shrink like a coward from the path of duty.

"I speak not in ignorance, for I have spent long days on shore, and have seen misery and oppression, of which the half has not been told you, in these dark places of the earth. Believe me, never was there deeper need of a friend to help and comfort, than amid those wretched slaves, snatched from distant lands, embittered, degraded, without hope in this world or the next."

"Then you are not blind to the deadly peril? You have counted the cost?" asked Réné sadly.

"I have put my hand to the plough, and should count it base indeed to look back."

"I fear me that your crown of martyrdom is near at hand, Monsieur de la Forêt," remarked de Seignelay, pointing towards the shore, from whence a felucca laden with the first band of ransomed captives was pushing out through the low surf to the grey swell beyond.

All turned their eyes to where, above that crescent bay, rose the pirate town in tier above tier, amid narrow, overshadowed lanes, basking in the winter sun. With an amphitheatre of purple hills behind, the rocky promontory was crowned by the grim fortress of the Barbarossas. It was a fair scene and one never to be forgotten, though haunted by dark memories of crime and bloodshed.

The watchers were startled by a sudden tumult of angry voices which seemed to rise from the lower deck.

The commander started in consternation:

"Come, Gaspar, we must have no fighting now, at this last moment before the prisoners are given over. It would ruin everything!" And with that he rushed down the steep, narrow steps, followed by his companions.

All was tumult and confusion, but in the centre he could make out two men grappling together like wild cats, while around some were taking part in the fray, whilst others sought to tear them apart. There was a momentary lull in the uproar at the entrance of the officers, and old Jules, the quartermaster, came forward with upraised hands.

"Ah, mon capitaine, it is well you have come. These cursed unbelievers, who should have been on their knees, thanking Heaven for their coming freedom, must needs spend the last minutes in drinking and gambling.

"Réné sprang forward to the rescue."—p. 747.

Akbar yonder lost all he possessed, and then remembered a ring, which he drew from his pouch for a last stake——"

He was interrupted by a fresh outburst of fierce cries.

"I swear by all the saints that 'tis my ring. I tell thee mine, thou black fiend!" shrieked one of the combatants, making frantic efforts to wrench something from his adversary.

With a start of dismay, Réné recognised François Dangeau, the hapless messenger who had come on board in the harbour of Toulon, and who had lost his memory through the accident of a fall.

"Look you, 'tis as I said!" cried Jules. "We all know how that poor fellow lost his wits; but ever since he set eyes on the ring he has gone stark mad, and vows the thing belongs to him. But Akbar is furious, and gives him the lie, and so they come to blows. The Turk declares it is a talisman, which has been in his family for generations. Anyway, had he found a knife in his waist-cloth, there would have been food for the fishes this day!"

"Bring me this ring," said Réné in a tone of command. "There may be some Moorish inscription graven upon it which will settle the ownership."

He looked up and saw the Huguenot pastor by his side, and a new idea occurred to him.

"Monsieur," he added eagerly, "it was your care which brought François safely through his illness, which you alone understood how to treat. What think you? Is it not possible that after this flash of excitement his memory may return, and he may be able to tell me the forgotten message?"

"It is indeed possible, for such things have been known to happen before," was the grave reply. "I will take François aside, and have speech with him when he is calm enough to listen to me. But this memory is a strange thing, and we must not expect too much."

Meantime, Jules had with much difficulty obtained possession of the ring, and he held it out carelessly in his great brown fingers.

"A poor thing, on my word, and not worth fighting about!" was his somewhat contemptuous comment.

Réné took it from him, and those who watched him would have sworn that it was, in truth, a talisman of evil and full of witchcraft. As he raised it to the light he gave a stifled cry, his colour changed, there was a long-drawn, quivering breath, and the stalwart figure wavered, as from a crushing blow. Overcome with a deep, passionate emotion, the man forgot all but the one central fact of his amazing discovery, and his soul rose to his lips.

"This is the message, Monsieur de la Forêt. Here is the token of which I spoke to you. See; look at this antique ring, with the figure of Egeria cut in a carnelian, which I myself saw dug up from a vineyard in Rome. I gave it to Mademoiselle de la Féronniere; she was to send it to me in the hour of her deepest need, and I vowed to cross sea and land and hasten to her rescue."

The words poured forth like a mountain torrent, but Réné had scarcely yet realised the full extent of his disaster.

"Since then a month must have come and gone!" murmured the pastor, in startled dismay.

"A month!" echoed Réné. "What may not have befallen her in that time? Good Heaven! what cruel fate is this? François, most miserable of messengers, answer me this once, if you never speak again. Tell me, where is Mademoiselle? What is her peril? One word, for the love of Heaven!"

But the poor fellow gazed at him with frightened, unresponding eyes, and no answer came from his trembling lips. That one fleeting gleam of memory, called up by the sight of the ring, had paled and faded away, leaving the past once more a blank.

Beaumanoir turned with a last appeal.

"Monsieur de la Forêt, return with us. Help me to find her," he pleaded.

For one moment there was a sign of wavering on the pale, sensitive face; then the reply came, firm and gentle as ever.

"I am proscribed in my own dear France. There is a price on my life, and I should only bring danger on my friends. Seek for higher aid than mine, Monsieur Réné, and my constant prayers go with you. As my last legacy, remember that saying of Tertullian, that 'love which cannot suffer is unworthy of the name of love.'"

During all this time Gaspar had stood aside, watching his friend with strange aloofness, and his first consternation had settled into a look of cold anger. As Réné became dimly conscious of this want of sympathy there awoke in him a feeling of shame that he should have bared his heart before all the ship's company.

"Ah, my friend, if you knew what this delay, this mystery, means to me!" he said, in a low, appealing voice.

"It will be my duty to call upon you later for an explanation," was the chill reply. "At the present moment your place is on the upper deck, where the exchange of captives needs the full attention of the commander."

Stung by the reproof, young Beaumanoir nerved himself to put aside his private grief and devote all his energy to the task before him.

The scene which met his eyes was striking and dramatic. The shore was crowded with brown men, whose gelabs fluttered like white wings as they ran hither and thither. Women straight as willow wands, draped in white veils, and others wizened and bent with age, had come to welcome their ransomed friends, or to see the last of their departing slaves, as boat after boat pushed out on the blue-green water, tipped with foam. The straight cross-handled swords of the Dey's janissaries glittered in the sun, and their gay colours shone out resplendent; while behind rose the town, white like a chalk quarry, in the dazzling light.

From the shore the noise was deafening. On one side cries of joyous recognition; on the other a doleful wailing for some loved one, looked for with earnest longing, who came not. On board La Topaze men held each other in a close embrace, and wept together for very gladness, and would have kissed the feet of their very rescuers in the first wild ecstasy of assured freedom.

Thanks to the confusion, Akbar the thief, who understood enough to know that he was found out, had slunk away in one of the boats, unnoticed amongst his fellows, with a scowl on his smooth dark face and undying hatred in his heart.

Not until the sun had dipped, and flooded that Eastern world with the glory of his parting look, did the end come. Then orders were given in haste. The anchor was slipped, the sails unfurled, and with a fair breeze from the land La Topaze set forth on her homeward way. The western sky was still painted with long streamers of red and yellow on a background of imperial purple when the hour of reckoning came.

The young commander was standing on the poop, when he started to find his friend de Seignelay by his side, demanding attention with an imperious gesture.

"Now is my time," he began abruptly. "Tell me, I pray you, who is this Mademoiselle de la Féronniere, in whose affairs you take such desperate interest?" There was a covert sneer in his tone; but Réné, secure of himself, was slow to take offence.

"Have I sinned against friendship by withholding my confidence from you?" he asked lightly. "Yet you surely know that there is ever a secret chamber in the heart, closed by bolt and bar against the outer world?" he went on dreamily, with the sunset glow on his face. "Within that inner sanctuary no stranger may enter, save when, as on this day, it is rent asunder with an earthquake shock. In that shrine of my devotion reigns Mademoiselle Yvonne de la Féronniere."

"Come, rouse yourself, man!" cried his companion roughly. "Have done with these visions, and face what is before you. You must know that the matter concerns me closely, for your sister, Madame de Chamans, has entered into negotiations with my widowed mother, and seeks to arrange a marriage between you and my young sister Antoinette."

"Gaspar, what do you mean?" exclaimed Beaumanoir, now thoroughly aroused and driven to bay. "There must be some terrible mistake. My sister Hélène knows of my love for Mademoiselle Yvonne, and surely she cannot dream that I would marry anyone else?

"Ah, now I think of it, she did write me a gossiping letter from Paris, hinting at good fortune in store for me—some marriage with an heiress; but with my heart full of my lady, everything spoke to me of her!"

"Is this true, Réné?" cried the angry man, looking him keenly in the face. "Then how these women have befooled us both. It makes me think of that Moorish proverb which I heard yesterday, 'From the head of a woman and the heels of a horse may the Prophet deliver us!'" and he gave a bitter laugh.

There was a moment of strained silence as the two young men stood side by side in the ever-growing dusk, leaning over the parapet and looking down into the deep blue water below. Réné's thoughts had wandered far away, like homing birds, back to his love and her unknown peril. De Seignelay was the first to speak.

"De la Féronniere, did you say? But surely that is a Huguenot name? Yes; and that was why the old pastor seemed to know about her when you spoke to him?"

"You are right. Mademoiselle is an orphan, but her family is well known in Poitou, and her ancestors have fought for the reformed faith."

"Listen to me this once, Beaumanoir!" pleaded his friend. "I cannot see you cast away your life without a warning. If this lady is a Huguenot, by marriage with her you will lose all claim to your father's estates, you will fall into disgrace with the King, and your career will be at an end. On the other hand, my little sister is the favourite niece of the Prime Minister, who has assured her a splendid dowry, and there will be no post too exalted for her husband."

"Stay, Gaspar!" interrupted his companion. "Say no more, or you may pass the limits of forgiveness. Such baseness does not ring true from your lips. Come; we will pace the deck together, and I will tell you the story of my love for Mademoiselle Yvonne. I will make you see her as she is ever before my eyes, and you shall judge for yourself."

It was a long and serious talk which followed, and when it came to an end the moonlight was cutting the water like a blade.

Before the young men parted that night Gaspar grasped his friend warmly by the hand.

"We have had a narrow escape, Réné; but, thanks to Heaven and your frankness, we shall not be bound to slay each other in a duel of honour. My first duty on landing in France once more will be to explain the whole affair to my mother. As for little Antoinette, in her convent school, let us hope that no breath of this scheme may have reached her. Poor child! She is so young and light-hearted. May she find someone to love her for herself, and not alone for that which she brings in her hand. So will she have no need to envy Mademoiselle de la Féronniere!"

CHAPTER XXIII.

NO homebound sailor was ever more full of hungry longing and eagerness to arrive in port than the young commander of La Topaze. But seafaring in those days was at the mercy of wind and wave, and knew no haste; while the first lesson of those whose bread is on the deep waters is to learn how changing and full of treacherous moods they can be.

Those rough autumnal seas had an ill repute; for although the Corsairs themselves were well acquainted with the coast, and knew where to find shelter in a storm, vessels from the ports of Europe were too often wrecked upon those inhospitable shores. Early in her voyage La Topaze had to weather a fierce gale, for she was driven by a Greek Levanter to the roads near the island of Majorca. There she cast anchor for the night, setting sail again at daybreak, when the storm had spent its fury and somewhat abated. The pilot had shifted his course in the hope of shelter by nearing the coast of Spain; but after beating up and down a night and a day without seeing any sail, he found that the vessel had drifted southward out of her course.

Not until the morning of the third day did the weather improve, but it still remained a slow and tedious voyage.

In the dim watches of the night, when the ship lay drifting under the stars, Réné's thoughts would seem to crowd around him like sheeted ghosts. An ever-haunting fear chilled his life-blood. How had Yvonne fared all those long weeks of delay, since she had sent her silent message? There must, indeed, have been desperate need ere she could thus claim his promise and summon him from his duty and the command of his ship. Hers was no light, frivolous nature which might love to put her power to the test. No; in his inmost heart he was well assured that it was nothing less than some deadly peril to liberty or life.

He knew that Monsieur de Vaudreuil would leave no stone unturned to bring about his son's marriage with Yvonne, if by so doing he could make certain of securing her fortune. But the very fact of her sending the ring was a token that she was loyal to her troth, and that her will was unconquered still.

The girl came of a knightly race, who knew not fear, and her lover would stake his life on her courage and fortitude. Yet he shuddered at the thought of the persecution, the suffering, the indignities, which the tenderly nurtured maiden might have to endure.

He remembered, with fresh dismay, that since the recent revocation of the Edict of Nantes a Huguenot was beyond the pale of the law and could not even lay claim to common justice. With an aching heart, he pictured his Yvonne already immured in some convent of strictest discipline, or cast into some secret dungeon, buried for ever beyond the reach of help.

It was maddening to be so far away, so helpless; but all his strong young manhood rebelled in vain, and the tedious voyage seemed to drag on in never-ending weariness to his burning impatience.

During that time of dreary waiting Gaspar de Seignelay showed a generous respect for his friend's anxiety, and, with rare delicacy, he never alluded, by word or sign, to the confidence which had been wrung in a moment of despair from an overburdened heart. He was capable of admiring a devotion and sacrifice which his ambitious spirit could not understand, and neither man spoke on that theme again.

In the long, silent hours of that lonely ordeal René learnt much, and his spirit grew. Those stern words of other days echoed in his ears with a ring of conviction :

"Love which cannot suffer is unworthy of the name of love."

Dimly he realised, in that moment of insight, that true love is a forgetting of self, a sacrifice of the Seen to the Unseen, not for time alone, but for eternity.

As the young knight of old kept fast and vigil ere he donned his armour, so did the Chevalier de Beaumanoir make ready, in body and soul, on the eve of his great quest.

Yet there arose in some measure within him the feeling of a pilgrim travelling to an unknown shrine, for the Yvonne he went forth to seek was not the Yvonne whom he knew of old. That was a fair young girl, with sunny eyes and radiant smile, as he held her mirrored in his memory—one who took the pleasures of life with simple joy as they met her on the way. She had seemed in her rightful place, alike on the terrace walk of his own ancestral Beaumanoir and amid royal festivities in the stately gardens of Sceaux and Versailles.

But now the scene was changed. Another image rose up before him, and his inward eye saw a pale face marred with tears and worn by trouble and emotion. Yet to him it was dearer than ever, and he knew that his love was for life and death.

Notwithstanding the tempestuous breezes, it had been, on the whole, not otherwise than a prosperous voyage for the time of year, already late November. Morning broke once more, and as the sea mist drifted away in floating grey clouds, the ransomed captives crowded on the forecastle and far away to the north a dim coast lifted before their hungry gaze and spoke to them of home and freedom.

Then a great cry of joy uprose to heaven, for at length their trials were at an end. No longer would they have to endure the sharp pang of hope deferred, and the sufferings of the past would be blotted out in the mighty happiness of the present.

For many days there had been anxious watch at Toulon for the coming of La Topaze, and when she sailed into that beautiful harbour of Provence an eager crowd was gathered together to welcome the ship whose precious freight was of more value than all the gold of the Indies. Like phantoms from another world they stepped ashore, those gaunt captives, so pale and grisly were they for the most part, with hair and beard unkempt, and their clothes in rags.

Strong men burst into tears, strangers clasped hands and wept; many a weary wanderer found a glad haven in the arms of wife, or child, or friend; but sad, indeed, was the fate of those who had none to meet them, none to rejoice at their home-coming.

The city welcomed with acclamation the rescued and the rescuers. From every church tower the bells rang out in triumphant peals, and a solemn procession was arranged, to return thanks in the great cathedral of St. Marie Majeure. Escorted by the priests in their robes, the choristers singing a triumphant "Te Deum," and the city magnates, the company of the ransomed marched through the streets of Toulon, each one bearing on his shoulder a chain as a token of his escape from slavery.

Réné de Beaumanoir had counted on setting forth at once for Paris; but his soul was fretted by endless delays, as the ship's company was expected to take part in all the rejoicings. Only when he had attended every ceremonial, and taken part in every banquet, was he able to resign his command, for the present, into the hands of Monsieur de Vermandois, General of the Galleys of France, who, by good fortune, chanced to be then on duty at Toulon. At length he was free to take the road, and, in the hope that familiar scenes would recall the messenger's vagrant memory, he chose François Dangeau as his travelling companion.

By this time the man had fully recovered his physical health, and he proved an untiring rider and most valuable servant. In those days much depended on the groom's knowledge and care of the horses, on his perfect honesty and loyalty to his master, and his discreet conduct; for in the wayside inns of old France, where customers of high degree rubbed shoulders with rogues and bullies and gamesters, there was always danger from a drunken brawl or a midnight attack; and it was never quite certain that mine host himself might not be in league with the worst of cut-throats.

On this occasion, however, the travellers had but few adventures, and they sped so well that on the eighth day after they set out on their journey their horses' hoofs were clattering through the streets of Paris.

The murky darkness of a winter evening had closed in upon the city, and it was no easy task for the horsemen to find their way by glimmering rays through the casement of some belated apprentice, and the dim light of lanterns hung here and there, where the signboards creaked and groaned in the breeze But now that the end of his journey was almost within reach the young officer was not to be baffled by so small a matter, and ere long he was rapping with the handle of his riding-whip on the door of the Hôtel Maillebois.

Again he knocked, more loudly, and was growing impatient, when presently a small grating was pushed aside and a gruff voice demanded:

"Who goes there?"

"It is I, the Chevalier de Beaumanoir. Open at once!" was the imperious command.

There was the rattle of a chain, a creaking of bolts, and slowly the massive door swung open; but when the portly concierge held up his torch aloft, and it flashed upon the unkempt figures of the two men, splashed and stained with travel, he gave a start of dismay.

"Why, Jacques, my good fellow, have you grown so sleek in the Duke's service that you would disown us for our hungry looks?" cried René, with a laugh.

"Ah, Monsieur le Chevalier, there is no mistaking you. Ever a merry jest on your lips. And a glad day will this be for my mistress, who pines for news, and but for her brave spirit would mourn you as lost."

"Then lose no time, my man, in setting her mind at rest," was the impatient rejoinder, for the old porter stood motionless as an image and blocked the way.

Still he never moved, for his eyes were glued upon the serving man, who held the horses behind with a frightened, incredulous stare.

"By all the saints, surely it is never our François standing there, whom we never thought to see again? Nay; it must be his ghost come back to plague us!" he gasped, and drew himself, shivering, against the wall.

"Why, man," he added, with chattering teeth, "the Duke told us all that you must have fallen into the hands of cut-throats by the way, and he made sure you were dead, as you gave no sign!"

With a sudden, sharp cry, poor François threw up his arms in the air, and then rushing forward, he gripped old Jaques in a close embrace.

"The Duke!" he cried, as a flood of memory came over him with overwhelming force. "Ah yes, it was Monsieur de Maillebois who sent me off post-haste to find the Chevalier at Toulon before he sailed, and to give him the ring as a token that he was sent for in urgent need, and was to come home at once.

"Jacques, you remember?"

ON AN AFRICAN GLACIER.

By Mrs. A. B. Fisher.

CROSSING THE MUBUKU.

NEAR the base of that mighty mountain range that lies as a western boundary to our Uganda Protectorate, feeding the Albert Edward Nyanza on the south, and the Albert Nyanza on the north, have we, for over two years, from our home in Toro, been gazing up to the eternal snows that have for all ages on their impregnable mountain strongholds effectually defied their powerful opponent, the Equatorial sun.

MRS. FISHER.

The reports brought to us by those who had ventured to partly explore these heights only increased our desire to attempt that which we anticipated would involve some tough climbing. One can scarcely live out in these districts for any length of time without in a measure anticipating what awaits those who dare to trespass upon the loneliness and silence of these great mountains, for everywhere are hills and swamps, and very few of our roads are better than sheep tracks among long elephant grass from 8 to 12 feet high.

It was in January of last year that Mr. Fisher sent in a message to the Rev. A. L. Kitching, who is stationed some thirty miles from us, telling him to quickly pack up essentials, if he would be willing to accompany us on our snow trip. The following day found us three busily getting together all our warm garments, that had for long remained as mere shadows of English winters; laying in a stock of rough blankets for our men from a little Indian store ; and having a drum beaten to rally our porters. We had secured the services of the guide who the previous year had accompanied Sir Harry Johnston's party. He cut a curious figure with a large wide-awake hat many sizes too big (evidently a perquisite from one of his previous mountaineering expeditions), from the depths of which there only seemed to appear two eagle eyes, and these surmounted a wiry, agile frame. Our route for three days lay in a south-westerly direction, bringing us to the foot of the snow crests, from which point climbing would begin. On the first day's march the elements were very fractious ; but we pushed on through a wet, driving cloud that resembled in feeling and effluvium a homelike London fog, and we arrived in camp through a sharp downpour of rain that made us grateful for a dry tent and beef cutlets. Opposite our tent door stretched the vast intersected range, while immediately in front several recent rents on one of the lower limbs pointed to the landslip that had occurred quite lately, burying some of the people who had built their huts under the shelter of its brow.

The third day brought us to the banks of the mighty river Mubuku, which in wild fury comes dashing down from the precipitous heights of snow that seem to act as sentinel to its offspring, as it empties itself into an arm of the Albert Edward Lake. It was not quite an easy matter crossing this swift river, with its bed of rock and stone boulders ; but by means of a hammock and about twenty bearers we managed to reach its opposite bank, with no further mishap than the immersion of a bed sack, which effected a thorough wash-out of blankets and pillows. We then followed up the course of this river for a distance of seven or eight miles, getting further and further into the mountain fastnesses, till we were completely shut in by impenetrable forest heights. From thence we experienced our first bit of real climbing, which took us through a tiny Bakonjo village, consisting of three huts of plaited wattle and thatch. Here we were first introduced to our future travelling companions, for we were obliged to exchange our Batoro porters for the strong and hardy mountain folk, who, by their customs of living, are inured to the cold and other difficulties. One's first impression was of the physical superiority and energy that characterise this tribe. The fatigues of an ordinary climber are quite unknown to them, as with a firm, springing gait they master the steepest paths. With the minutest loin cloth they manage to resist the biting cold and rains, fasting or feeding as their chance occurs of trapping the "conies" upon which they principally live. Having no means of making a little grass hut for themselves, as is the native traveller's habit when night falls, they seek the shelter of a rock or tree, kindle a fire which they carry tied up in leaves or bark during the day, and then squat round in a circle, supporting themselves by interlacing their arms, and thus fall asleep.

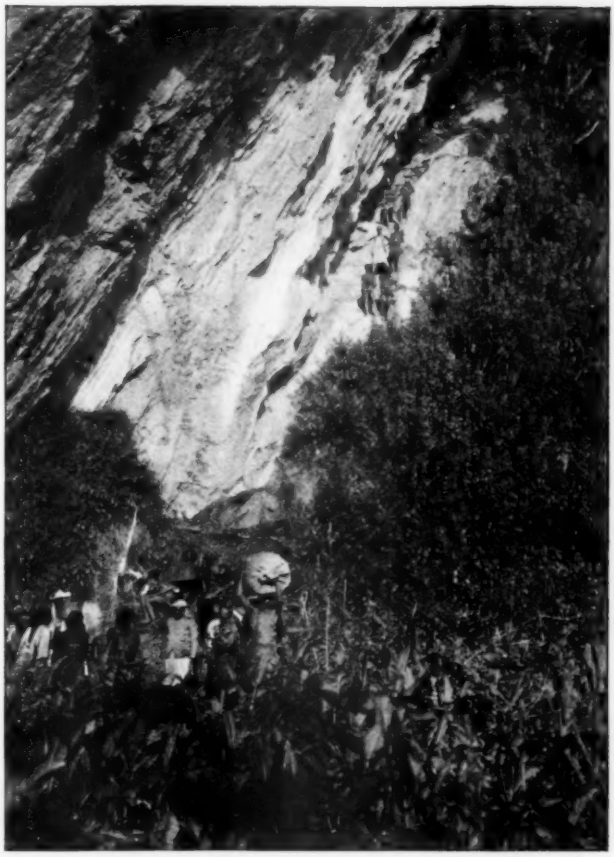
On striking camp we had to set to work packing the barest necessities in the smallest loads to take with us on our future marches. Our more commodious tent had to be left behind, as we were warned that camping space would only be found for the two tiny ones—one for ourselves, and the other for our serving boys. This allowed me to be the only one privileged with a bed, the gentlemen managing as best they could with a ground sheet and blankets. I reduced our food appliances to three plates, three forks, spoons, and knives; but on reaching the next day's resting-place, we discovered that our boys had judged some of these superfluous luxuries, and reduced us to the plates, two forks, and one penknife. Heavy rains overtook us here, and made the path very greasy next morning for the first hour's steep descent. I had a broad strip of brown calico slung round my body, and two sure-footed Bakonjo hung on behind; so by sliding, stumbling, and hanging thus, we reached the picturesque forest that lay before us. Here we found the most beautiful varieties of moss, orchids, and ferns, from the ordinary male-fern to the tall Australian tree-fern.



Emerging from the shade of the forest, the sun broke out in relentless force, as we plodded up a long bracken-covered precipice which rose like an eye-tooth between two river-beds. There was not a scrap of shade, for the only trees were a few bamboos that, having strayed from their home to an altitude of 8,000 feet, looked very sorry for themselves, and had become almost withered up as the result. Very wearied, we reached the cool projecting rock that was to form our shelter for the night. It needed a great deal of ingenuity on the part of the gentlemen to erect the tent in this small, low space. The ropes had to be secured to big stones, as pegs could not be driven in, and, as the poles could barely stand upright, our "home" offered a distinctly flabby appearance. Although the sound of rushing water was clearly heard, it was more than an hour away, so we decided to put up with one pailful for drinking, cooking, and washing purposes. Never have I been so begrudgingly offered a teacup of water for a bath!

As the next morning we reached the bamboo forests, we could reckon that we had accomplished 8,000 of the 13,500 feet to the snow-line. It was something like trying to push one's way through a box of matches; these tall, straight, bare stems, with their heads of grass, hold exclusive and absolute possession of the mountain sides, with the exception of a few timid ferns and mosses that, half apologetically, creep round their roots or venture up their stems. The men went on before, slashing down with their knives to form for us a path; but the knack those fallen trees had of tripping one up made it evident that they were determined to dispute the right of way up to the last. From this forest of "sticks" our path now lay for over one hour through a morass, the bed of yellow moss hiding from view the thick black mud that lay beneath nearly one foot deep—this was being constantly nourished by the encircling mountain torrents. As the water was almost entirely glacial, the sensation when plunging through right away before the sun had risen was freezing, and one's boots became like ice packs. This was certainly responsible for the condition of their leather when we struggled to get into them next day, and for the fact that before many hours had elapsed we were gradually getting out of them, for they burst in every direction.

A waterfall with almost a sheer drop of about 500 feet roared and tumbled to our right as we stood contemplating the terrible stiff bare rock-mountain that had to be scaled. The porters were all ordered to go on well before, as it could only be done in single file, and one slip might end in disastrous results to those following. We had to crawl up on hands and feet, while a man acted as prop behind. In one spot a rough native ladder constructed of bamboos, the rungs tied on with tree bark, helped us up a stretch of 20 to 30 feet. It was certainly a hard bit, and fearsome. A sodden patch of soil about 15 feet square was introduced to us as camp. We tried to look cheerful as torrents of rain swept down upon us, and with the evening came also penetrating cold. All night long the rain pattered down upon the tent, till it began to slowly ooze through the canvas. Seven blankets and an eider-down quilt were quite inadequate to impart warmth, and this was still the case even, when in the morning, owing to the angle of the tent, I discovered that my mattress had gradually found its way from under, and had worked up over me with the constant drag of the blankets. The whole of the following day we were kept prisoners inside our blankets, as the rain persistently fell.

Out of regard for our porters, we had reckoned books as dispensable property, so we could not rake up one between us (excepting a pocket Testament) to while away the weary hours. Mr. Fisher made a noble effort to unearth some Irishisms, but I doubt whether anyone, even from Ireland, could hold out for long under such circumstances. At 4 p.m. the rain really ceased, and a walk was suggested; but on reconnoitring, it was found that five yards north or south would land us in mud pits, and three steps in the other directions would find us some 100 feet below on jagged river beds; so we had to turn back, and called for food. The storms again serenaded us as the candles were lit; but at dawn only the tears from the trees reminded us of yesterday's grief, so we once more set off.

"THE BARE ROCK-MOUNTAIN THAT HAD TO BE SCALED."

Vegetation from this point assumed its wintry appearance—the only trees were tall, scraggy heathers completely draped in whitish lichen, which gave the whole surroundings an unreal and almost prehistoric effect. These trees apparently spring from moss and old tree-trunks that have fallen across rocks; it was certainly a case of slowly dragging one's way over tree tops; to slip (which was a frequent occurrence, in spite of being held up by two men) was to find oneself sinking to the arm-pits or knees; never do I remember striking terra firma. After about two to three hours of this, we came out into a river basin surrounded by mountains which, almost without exception, emptied out into it sheets of water. This made walking very tiring and laborious; only one steep waterfall was seen pouring down from a projecting rock under which we rested to gain strength for the formidable climb that awaited us. If it had not been the staircase to camp, I wonder if I should ever have reached the top! It was truly terrible. Tired out with heavy marching and climbing, our boots weighed down with mud from the river basin, each step was a real difficulty; but hearing from above the "halloes!" of our porters who had reached their destination, and the praises from the gentlemen from beneath (I did not stop to consider whether these savoured of sarcasm or sincerity), the feat was accomplished, and with joy we hailed the rock shelter that was the only halting-place between us and the snows! A magnificent panorama of glaciers stretched before us; snow lay resting in the crannies of all the surrounding peaks, while the ice-bound crests glistened in the light of the setting sun. The temperature, which three days previously had registered 105°, here fell to 35°.

As we started off in the morning, passing frozen puddles, icicles, and stray snow patches, the invigorating, tingling sensation of the old-fashioned English Christmas with snowball battles seemed resurrected from the far past. Passing round the side of a bare mountain, we reached a mossy gorge, which was frozen and crisp, until only rocks divided us from the glacier for which we were making. Finding ourselves hemmed in by a narrow defile of two converging rocks, roofed in by a carefully balanced boulder, we had recourse to ropes, one of which we found had been left by Sir Harry Johnston. This was slung round our bodies and held by men above, whilst the other rope was secured to the boulder, and with this we managed to pull ourselves up. Twice was this operation effected, shortly after which we were standing on one of Africa's glaciers.

It seemed as if Nature could do nothing on a small scale in this country, for here the mountains of ice extended far, far back, where no one could attempt to reach, stretching out their arms to peaks beyond view; and everywhere one looked on vast regions of unexplored snow. We could not ascend to any greater height, as alpine appliances or substitutes were quite unprocurable. This particular glacier was in the form of a huge cave, the roof and sides of which were of dazzling iridescent whiteness of gigantic proportion, while from its mouth issued what afterwards becomes the rushing Mubuku River, which we must have crossed and recrossed no less than twelve times in our ascending. Here the ice was covered (more or less) with a black deposit, washed down from the higher regions, and formed a striking contrast to the scene above. As we stood at the mouth of this huge glacier we could not keep back the Doxology and a ringing cheer for Old England, and it was rather invigorating to one's nerves to receive the congratulations of being the first woman to reach Ruwenzori's snows.

GLACIER IN THE FORM OF A HUGE CAVE.

"FAITHFUL IN ALL HIS HOUSE."

(HEBREWS iii. 1–5.)

By the Rev. R. F. Horton, D.D., Hampstead.

THE Reformation of the sixteenth century was not merely a change in doctrine or in church politics; it was a change in the idea of religion. The mediæval notion of religion was of the kind which made the priesthood religious and the laity secular. It went further: the monastic orders assumed a monopoly of the name, and the ordinary clergy were stigmatised as secular because they were in the world. A "religious" was—and is still in Catholic countries—a monk or a nun. That single fact is a revelation. Life in the world—the life of parents, of husbands and wives, of business men, artisans, statesmen, farmers, buyers, and sellers—was intrinsically profane. Incapable of being redeemed in itself, it could only be compensated by the "religious" acts of the Church, and by the implicit obedience of the laity to the requirements of the Church. Mediæval religion had drifted from the primitive truths of Christianity; it had become, under the same name, another thing.

Luther, with his firm grasp of the Gospel, his intimate knowledge of St. Paul, and a colossal common sense, struck a deadly blow at this conception of religion. The outcome of his teaching was that religion must be expressed in the common duties and engagements of life, that there was no essential distinction, for the Christian, between clerical and lay, between religious and secular. It was the purpose of Christianity to make all men kings and priests unto God, and to make all the necessary and lawful occupations of life religious.

It is true rude hands tore away the veil from the monastic life, and showed that the imagined sanctity of the cloister was worse than the profanity of the market and the street. But Luther's argument did not rest on the abuses of the monastic system; it rested on the original principle of the Christian faith. Christ knew nothing of clerical and lay, of sacred and profane. He came to make all clerical—for what is "clerus" but the lot and inheritance of God, a holy priesthood and kingship of lowly and reverent souls? He came to make all sacred, a kingdom of God upon earth.

That thought of the Reformation made the modern world. The sailor began to cross the ocean, the trader to sell in the market, the labourer to work at the plough, the housewife to watch the home, the statesman to guide the State, the soldier to lead the army, with a solemn sense of responsibility. They were all in precisely the same sense ordained, consecrated, called to holiness, as the preacher of the Gospel, or the priest who served the altar. It would be idle to say that the great thought of the Reformation has advanced unchallenged. The counter-reformation has run side by side with it all along. Clericalism has never been eradicated; sacerdotalism has always been watching its opportunity. Among ourselves the plain truth of the Gospel is more threatened than in any other European country. Let us try, therefore, to grasp more firmly the great Lutheran, which is also the apostolic, doctrine. And we cannot do better than adopt that term which Ritschl, the most creative of modern Lutheran teachers, has given us as a touchstone of Christian living, "fidelity in one's vocation."

We may state in five propositions the leading lines of the idea which is at once the most practical issue of the New Testament doctrine and the most striking feature of the Reformation.

(1) Human life, as it is lived and must be lived in this world, requires an immense variety of functions and activities, making and producing, exchanging and conveying, thinking and teaching, governing, organising, healing, improving, amusing. Without this diversity of operations society would degenerate or cease to be. (2) Just so many as are the necessary operations of social life must the vocations of God be considered to be. For in a Kingdom of God there can be no work, service, or endurance to which God does not appoint the appropriate agent. To fill each post someone is called. The boatswain of a ship is as much "called" as a prominent statesman; the driver of a cab is as much "called" as a minister of the Gospel; the mother of a family is as much "called" as a sister of mercy. (3) Christianity is realised not so much in the nature of the calling, which is indifferent, as in the fidelity which is shown in the calling. In a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth. The wooden trencher on which the bread stands is just as important as the Dresden china on which the dessert is served. To be a Christian miner is every bit as valuable in the sight of God as to be a Christian coal-owner. (4) The Incarnation of the Son of God is an example of perfect fidelity in vocation. The significance of Jesus for us is that He touches human life, as such, and gives to every grade and every variety of it a sanctity of purpose. To imitate Him in His vocation is not possible, for there can only be one Saviour of the world; but we illustrate His saving work the best when we show in our vocation the fidelity which He showed in His. (5) Christianity is a religion of the Spirit. The Holy Spirit has great diversity of operations, only a few of which are mentioned in Romans xii. or 1 Corinthians xii. His work is co-extensive with life, and includes, therefore, not only the functions of the Church, but equally those of the family and the State. We must not, therefore, suppose that, if we are all filled with the Spirit, we shall all quit our callings and enter the ministry, or go out as missionaries. The result might conceivably be quite the opposite. The Spirit might bring many bad ministers to an honest trade or handicraft; but a change of calling is not contemplated. "Let each man abide in that calling wherein he was called" (1 Corinthians vii. 20).

I. Look at this social network which forms human life. None of us can live to himself; our dependence on one another is pathetic. I sit down to my table; everything I eat is there through the labour of others; the newspaper which puts me into contact with the world's life represents a hive of busy toilers; my books are all the work of men and women; the order and security of my life are due to the Government; the business of the day depends on others; all the recreation and refreshment which I require I must owe to someone else's help and labour. In this intricate machinery of life there is the worship of the Church, the teaching of the ministry, the direct service of the Gospel, the attempt to convert the indifferent, to teach the ignorant, to help the suffering. What could be more godless and unbelieving than to conceive the Kingdom of God as only these few specialised functions which are called religious work? If religion is only to be what is called religious, there can never be a Kingdom of God on earth at all. That specialised idea of religion banishes God, and is essentially irreligious. What a libel on the conception of a God Who is wisdom, love, and power, to suppose that the priest who carries on the routine of religious services is more religious than the workman whose toil keeps him and the priest alive! How absurd to think that the preacher, whose happy task it is to study and expound the things of God, is more religious in God's sight than the merchant who has to plunge into all the currents and whirlpools of commercial life! I am writing a sermon, my cook is preparing my meal, and my housemaid is keeping my house clean. What an idea of God to imagine that He regards me with more favour than them, or counts my work religious and the cooking at the stove or the sweeping of the room secular! No; in the complex life of society there may be functions incapable of being hallowed, and they ought to be eliminated. But whatever is necessary to the organism, whatever is allowed by God, must be treated as part of the purpose of God, and claimed as under the law of God.

Those who toil with the hand, who produce and make; those who toil with the brain, who invent, organise, inspire; the governing class; the purveying class, the class which amuses us; the shopman, the servant girl, the errand boy; they are all to be included in the religious life, not merely in the sense that they must all have a religious faith, worship in church, engage in some religious duties, but in the far wider sense that they must all do their special part in the world's life for God and unto God. No religious observances will be of the least avail unless the ordinary observances of the personal life, of home, of business, of the State, are religious. The greatest part of the religious life is to do ordinary things, not considered religious, in the spirit and power of religion.

II. From this conception of society as the organiser of the Kingdom of God, it follows that each person who is needed for the social well-being is "called" of God to his or her particular post. It seems to be generally admitted that a man is, or must be, called to the ministry. But in just the same sense another is called to medicine. There is no intelligible way of claiming that the Archbishop is called and the Prime Minister is not. Human influences operate in each case; but the Divine influence is decisive in both.

Many miss their vocation; but there are not, perhaps, more lawyers and doctors who miss their vocation than there are clergymen who miss theirs. Some are called to serve, others to command. It may be that we light on a man in a humble post who was by nature, or by God, called to command. We frequently find men in command who were clearly designed only to obey. That is missing the vocation. But the truth holds that they who are called to serve, and serve well, are every whit as important as they who are called to command and command well.

In a great liner the captain on the bridge seems immeasurably more essential than the stoker in the hold. But it is not so; the stoker is equally essential. The welfare of the ship depends on the captain doing his part, and on the stoker doing his, efficiently. It is so in the whole ship of State, in the whole organism of society. Whatever has to be done demands the doer, and the doer is called to do it. It is a bold saying that "all service ranks the same with God." It is almost impossible for us men to realise that "honourable" is a merely conventional word. But it stands to sense that our differences as men must be perfectly insignificant to the Divine eye, as unimportant as the grades in an anthill are to us.

The scavenger in the street is as valuable to God as the mayor of the borough. That Indian civil servant, generously and humanely administering his district, caring for the people, entering sympathetically into their life, is on precisely the same footing as the missionary—the one teaches the doctrine, the other exhibits the practice of Christian civilisation. The soldier, brave and unselfish, who in cheery endurance of hardship faces death or wounds or disease, must rank with the City missionary, or with the heroic captain in the Salvation Army who faces missiles and insults, and wears out the body in the passionate effort to win souls. The vocation to what is called definitely religious work is more honourable, is a greater privilege, in the sense that it brings with it more satisfaction and comfort. And woe be to those who have set aside that sweet and divine calling! But when the calling is quite distinct to another of the manifold functions and duties of a life in the broad Kingdom of God, obedience to that calling is equally blessed, and the discharge of that function is for that man equal to an Apostle's discharge of his duties.

III. A real Christianity expresses itself in a complete fidelity to the particular vocation. The presence of Christ in the heart, and the spiritual exercise of the common function, mean diligence, a sense of honour, unselfishness, pride in efficiency, a dignified recognition of the part which this function plays in the great whole, and, above all, the sense of acting under the great Taskmaster's eye. This is what we must understand by fidelity.

Let me suppose you are in business. You employ hands, you serve customers, you invest money, you manage a company. There is no greater mistake than to think that you can do all these things as you please, if only you discharge your specific religious duties: That was the fatal error of mediæval religion. No; your religion must necessarily express itself in that which forms the great part of your life, fills six days out of the seven, and the thought of a large part of the seventh. Each of these things can be done with a conscience or without; everything can be ordered in the light of ideals or by mere expediency. There lies the issue. Christianity means that the "hands" you employ are to you not "hands," but souls, precious human beings, whose interests are to be considered in all that is done. I noticed the other day that the managers of the Krupp works in Germany avow that the interests of the workmen are put first. It is odd that in making the engine to destroy life that essentially Christian principle should have been conceived and put into practice! But it certainly is an essentially Christian principle. Nothing you make can justify the marring of men. No profits are other than losses, if men are lost. And the first point of fidelity in vocation must be the just and generous treatment of all who serve us.

Then selling, wholesale or retail, is wholly a matter of conscience. If the one object is to make a pile of money—if that is to be allowed to determine the course of the transaction—it is impossible to be a Christian. Truth, fairness, unselfishness must come in here, or they are useless elsewhere. The investment of money, the promotion of companies, all the operations of business—the exercise of your profession, the training and use of any faculty which you possess—all come under the same principle. Fidelity in all these things, fidelity to God, and to men for His sake, is what constitutes the Christian life. The vocation is the call of God ; to Him accounts are rendered. And in proportion as your particular work in the complex whole is honestly and faithfully done, you have a right to rejoice in the work as a whole, and to feel the thrill of the Kingdom of God. McAndrew's hymn, however rudely expressed, strikes a true note. Surely every engineer who drives a ship across the ocean, or a train along the line, or who supplies the motive-power of a factory, has a right to rejoice in his post of duty and usefulness. The engines of the world's life and progress are hidden away. Few think of the men who work them. The absorbed passengers ride in ship or train as if the great vehicles moved themselves. But everywhere the safety and welfare of society depend on these obscure and forgotten workers. If they are faithful in their calling, well ; if not, disaster is imminent. It follows that our duty is to make sure of our calling, to find out as conscientiously as we can what part God means us to play, hidden or seen, hard or easy, in the vast machine ; and then to Christianise it, to do all, not with eye-service as unto men, but in view of the Cross.

In the archivolt of the central door of St. Mark's, at Venice, the fourteen arts and trades by which the Venetians lived are represented in lively sculpture. The keystone of the arch is Christ. Was it the thought of the sculptor to suggest that all these common functions are to be sanctified by Christ ? That is in harmony with the pre-Catholic thought of that beautiful church. It is the truth which the New Testament itself impresses upon us. Let Christ come among us, and the judge decides, the counsel pleads, the doctor prescribes, the nurse nurses, the manufacturer makes and the merchant sells, the baker bakes, the artisan uses his tools, the thinker thinks and teaches, the poet sings, the preacher preaches, and all live and act under the eye of Christ, seeking to serve Him best by doing the day's work most conscientiously.

IV. Christ was absolutely faithful in His high vocation. He came to redeem the world, and to offer the sacrifice of unflinching obedience. It is that fidelity in vocation, and not the vocation itself, which we are called to imitate.

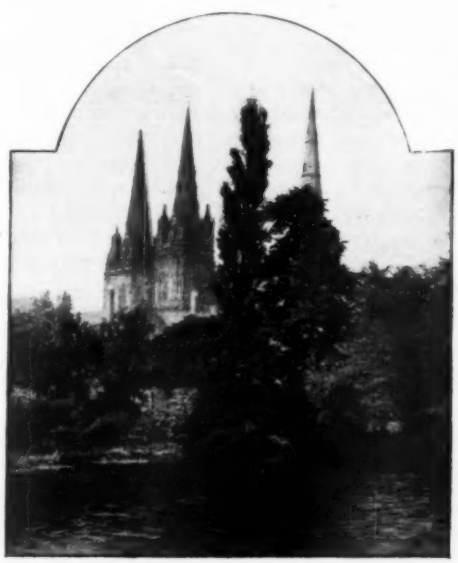
Much harm has been done by implying that the imitation of Christ means to follow Him in the course which He pursued. No ; if all the world did exactly what Christ did, human society could not hold together ; there would be no crops sown or reaped, no books written or read, no cities built or states formed—in a word, there could be no Kingdom of God on earth, because the conditions of earthly life would have ceased. What we are expected to do is to follow Christ in the absolute fidelity of our service, in the particular part of the world's life which is apportioned to us. Ours is not to save the world—He alone availed for that !—but to live in the world the life of salvation which He has made possible.

To follow Christ does not mean for all of us, like St. Francis, to leave duty, family, society, and to become mendicants. That was his personal vocation ; and, so far as he fulfilled it, he restored the lost Christian spirit to the thirteenth century. But when he summoned scores and hundreds of men and women to do the same, he blundered. The Franciscans by the beginning of the sixteenth century had become mendicants of the most dangerous kind. They exhausted the wealth of the country ; the land could not bear them. Now and again a man is called to be a Francis and to receive the stigmata. Some of us are called to be Puritans, to spurn delights and live laborious days, to endure a voluntary austerity, to surrender things legitimate in order to gain better things, which cannot in other ways be gained. But the vast majority of men do not receive these exceptional calls. They are called to follow Christ in the strenuous fidelity of their common tasks. The captain of industry, the financier, the journalist, the soldier. the lady in society—they are all called to follow Christ. Each of these has a function assigned ; it must be discharged with the same reference to the Heavenly Father, with the same self-sacrifice, with the same bearing of the Cross which gave to Christ's life its perfection.

I wish we could issue a new tract and put it into the hands of all the flaneurs of the clubs, the drivers of cabs and omnibuses, the artisan, the housewife, the little child. I am convinced they largely misunderstand : they think that the Gospel means them to quit their calling, to believe in Christ means to leave all and follow Him. So it does, but in the Spirit ! The tract should be headed, "Let each man abide in that calling wherein he was called." The Cross and the Saviour demand that you make your calling faithful, acceptable to God, a true service. To do with your might what you have to do, to do it with a conscience, to do it of faith—that is Christianity.

XUM

V. Generally we narrow the functions of the Holy Ghost in order to deepen them; but we ought always to widen them again, retaining the depth. Bear in mind how the Spirit works in the Church, with the several gifts and graces which make up the religious life in the narrow sense; and then go out to observe that the Spirit works also in the world, and in the universe, and what we have learnt in the school of the Church is to be applied to the whole. John Owen argued from the text in Job xxvi. 13—



> "By His Spirit He hath garnished the heavens;
> His hand hath formed the crooked serpent"— that it was the work of the Holy Spirit to make the exquisite order of the heavens and to sow the stars of the Milky Way. The Spirit brooded over the primitive chaos and made the world. The Spirit was in Bezaleel and Aholiab to make them good craftsmen. The Spirit came on Samson and other judges to deliver their people. The Spirit has worked in many who were by no means holy and obedient. Saul prophesied, and Balaam the heathen prophesied too. Jehu was driven by the Spirit to a great act of justice. Solomon received the wisdom of the Spirit, and yet fell grievously away. It seems, therefore, that some are faithful for an occasion, for a special service, though not faithful on the whole. Many are faithful on the whole, though their service is of the humblest and most obscure order.

The work of God proceeds; the organism of Humanity is developed. Those who are "faithful in all His house" seem comparatively few. But the faithfulness in the few, or fitfully dispersed among the many, is what accomplishes the lasting result. I suppose many will hear the "Well done" with unaffected surprise, because they were not aware of their own fidelity. What had struck them most was their failure! Some will find that they were faithful in all His house, not knowing that it was His.

These reflections surely simplify, as well as dignify, our human life. To find your work, and to do it; to accept manfully the place, great or small, and to resolve to make it great, by the zeal and earnestness with which you fill it; to recognise the intrinsic value of any and every function in a body of God's making; to bring a religious spirit to the most ordinary duty, to be willing, if He calls, to preach, and equally willing at His call to merely live; to be prepared to sit at the keys of the organ as a master, or to perform the obscure duties of blowing the bellows; to make a duty, a sacrifice, a service of everything which comes to your hand, at the bidding of God, in the light of the Cross—this is what is meant by Christianity.

Whatsoever is not of faith is sin. But whatsoever is of faith is sanctified; it is sanctified by the Word of God and prayer. It may be given to us all in our place and degree to be faithful.

A DINNER OF HERBS

A Complete Story by E. Burrowes.

"Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox, and hatred therewith."

AS one man, the village shook their heads when pretty Violet Strange defied parental permission and married young Doctor Mallory, who, though a hard-working and undeniably clever man, was yet at the bottom of the great ladder of success, the climbing of which to him meant nothing but a ceaseless grind and indomitable perseverance, for he had little or no interest, and hardly enough on which to live. He thought twice—nay three times — before asking the squire's daughter to share his humble life; but as they were both young and full of hope, and filled with the belief that a dinner of herbs where love is is infinitely better than the most recherché dinner, they courageously set out on the journey of life together, with hardly more than two hundred a year and a tiny cottage in a distant provincial town.

Squire Strange was furious. He had other and distinctly higher views for his pretty daughter, who had gone through all the gaiety and glory of a London season and come out of it scatheless as far as her heart was concerned. Perhaps that had always been in Geoffrey Mallory's keeping, for they had known each other for some years, though their friendship had only ripened into something dearer and nearer in the last year. From her father young Mrs. Mallory had no expectations; she had made her bed, and so she must lie upon it, and at first she found it a delightful experience, for novelty was as the breath of life to Violet Mallory. To order the goings of a single maid of all work, to sally forth every morning to do her own marketing, were both new and delightful occupations, and at first the entire novelty of the thing pleased young Mrs. Mallory. It was only later on, when the hot summer came, and the pavements which she trod seemed daily to scorch her feet as she walked, that she began to look back with wistful longing on the past, in which she had driven her own pair of ponies and looked with pity on those unhappy mortals who were obliged to trudge along through the heat with weary, lagging steps, whether they liked it nor not. Of course, Geoffrey made up for all these drawbacks amply; yet he was out a good deal, immersed in his profession, in which he was slowly—very, very slowly, it seemed to her—getting on; and a day came when she caught herself wondering whether this game of love, which she had commenced with such joy, was worth the candle.

By an unkind twist of Fortune's wheel it was just at this very juncture, when the doubt and discontent were fresh within her, that Lady Valerie North glided up to the door of the doctor's pretty creeper-covered cottage in the very latest thing in automobiles, and ringing violently at the little door set open in the sunshine, asked for Mrs. Mallory.

"Dearest Violet!" she said, with outstretched hands gloved in the softest, most fragrantly scented suéde, "I could not pass by without looking you and your dear, handsome husband up. How well you are looking! So love in a cottage agrees with you?"

She followed Mrs. Mallory through the tiny hall into the scarcely larger room, which was dignified by the name of drawing-room, with a rustle of silken-lined skirts and a faint perfume of violets. Her tall figure, in its perfectly cut gown; her golden hair and radiant face, looking strangely out of place, so Mrs. Mallory thought, amid such small and humble surroundings; and yet once Valerie North had been her bosom friend.

"How good it is to see you again!" she said, and then she sighed, and Valerie—clever Valerie—laughed an amused laugh.

"That sounds as if you hankered after the flesh-pots of Egypt, my dear?" she said gaily. "But I must not accuse you of that yet. How do you support life in this dead-alive place? What induces your husband—your clever husband—to spend the best years of his life in drudgery here, when he could surely get something much better, say, in London, where you would not be exiled from all your friends?"

Mrs. Mallory shook her pretty head.

"Geoffrey believes in this country practice," she said, "and he will make it grow, I am sure. Still, it is slow, and it seems a pity. But let us talk about something else. You will stay to lunch, won't you? Geoff is out, and I do want to hear all the news. What have you been doing with yourself?"

"Nothing much beyond promising to marry Roger Lestrange. Yes; I have actually taken the fatal leap, my dear Violet—and I will stay to lunch with pleasure. My man can take the car to the inn round the corner, and we'll gossip to your heart's content."

"My dearest Valerie, I am glad! Isn't he the millionaire? I thought so. And—do you love him?"

Valerie North laughed gaily. She was unpinning her veil with fingers that gleamed with jewels as they moved in the sunshine.

"You dear little person, you think the whole world is bounded by love? There are other things, though you have not found them out—yet. I was never built to exist on love in a cottage and a dinner of herbs, and all that sort of thing; so I am taking the gifts the gods have set before me, and am truly thankful. Don't look so shocked!"

"I can only give you cold beef and salad, and cake and strawberries," said Mrs. Mallory with gravity. "Perhaps you would rather not——"

"You dear simpleton, it will be a delicious relief from the menu which Roger's chef has been setting before me every evening during the past week. Mamma and I have been staying with him to superintend the doing up of the ancestral mansion for my special benefit. You must come and pay me a visit in the winter when I am settled there as monarch of all I survey. It won't be such a bad bargain, my dear, for, as men go, Roger is nice enough. Faint praise, you think? Ah, well, we can't all compete with your Geoffrey!"

Mrs. Mallory looked at the brilliant, laughing face, and sighed again. This was such a new atmosphere to her. She had lived on love in her cottage for so long, that anything else seemed desecration, and yet—the sunlight glimmered on the diamonds which ornamented the future bride's white fingers, and played with the marvellous colouring of her gown and Paris hat.

Violet Mallory had never found herself and her cottage so bourgeoise.

By the time Lady Valerie North had betaken herself off in her wonderful automobile—the envy of all beholders—and one of the numerous costly gifts which the millionaire had showered on his beautiful prize, Mrs. Mallory's discontent had grown to alarming proportions.

Love in a cottage and the dinner of herbs were all very well, but——. Visions of all the glories of the world, which might have been hers under other circumstances; dreams of idle pleasure and surfeit of adulation filled her mind and clouded the brightness of her pretty eyes.

What did it matter that the sun shone warm on her pretty home, on the garden in which she and Geoffrey strolled together after their frugal supper, when the work of the day was done. She was sick of it all, sick of the daily round and the common task; sick of the humble, happy sheltered life, bounded north, south, east, and west by love. Sick, sick, sick!

Could light-hearted volatile Valerie have foreseen the mischief she was to do by her brief visit to the Mallory's cottage, it is quite possible that she would have sped through the town without calling on her dearest Violet. But who shall foresee such things?

Until the evening Mrs. Mallory nursed the winter of her discontent, and when her husband came home he found her strangely silent.

Tired out with a long day's work in a distant village, where the patients were many and the fees only nominal, he looked with much satisfaction on the daintily-spread supper table, with its modest repast of cold meat, new bread, and country cheese, and fruit and coffee to follow.

"Hungry, Violet?" he said.

She shook her head.

"I—I don't want anything, Geoff; I'll have coffee afterwards."

"Goodness, child, what's the matter with you? Lost all your appetite?"

"Valerie North has been here to-day," said she irrelevantly, and Geoffrey looked up sharply, with comprehension in his eyes.

"Oh! she has, has she? And what had she to say for herself?"

"She is going to be married in the autumn to Roger Lestrange, the millionaire," said Mrs. Mallory listlessly. Her discontented eyes fell on the light curtains, which billowed in the breeze, and then wandered to the simple appointments of the tiny room which till to-day had seemed such a dear, happy little spot.

"Poor soul!" said Geoffrey, cutting at the beef before him with energy. "Poor soul! And does she expect to be happy?"

"I don't know. She seems very pleased. She will have everything in the world, and——"

"Well, everyone to his own taste. Give me this and our dinner of herbs rather than the life she will have to endure. Eh, Violet?"

"Of course. I wouldn't change this for anything in the world, Geoff; but don't you think we might someday get something better? Perhaps a practice in London or somewhere? You are far too clever to waste the best years of your life in a provincial town, and it does seem a pity that you should have to work so hard for so little."

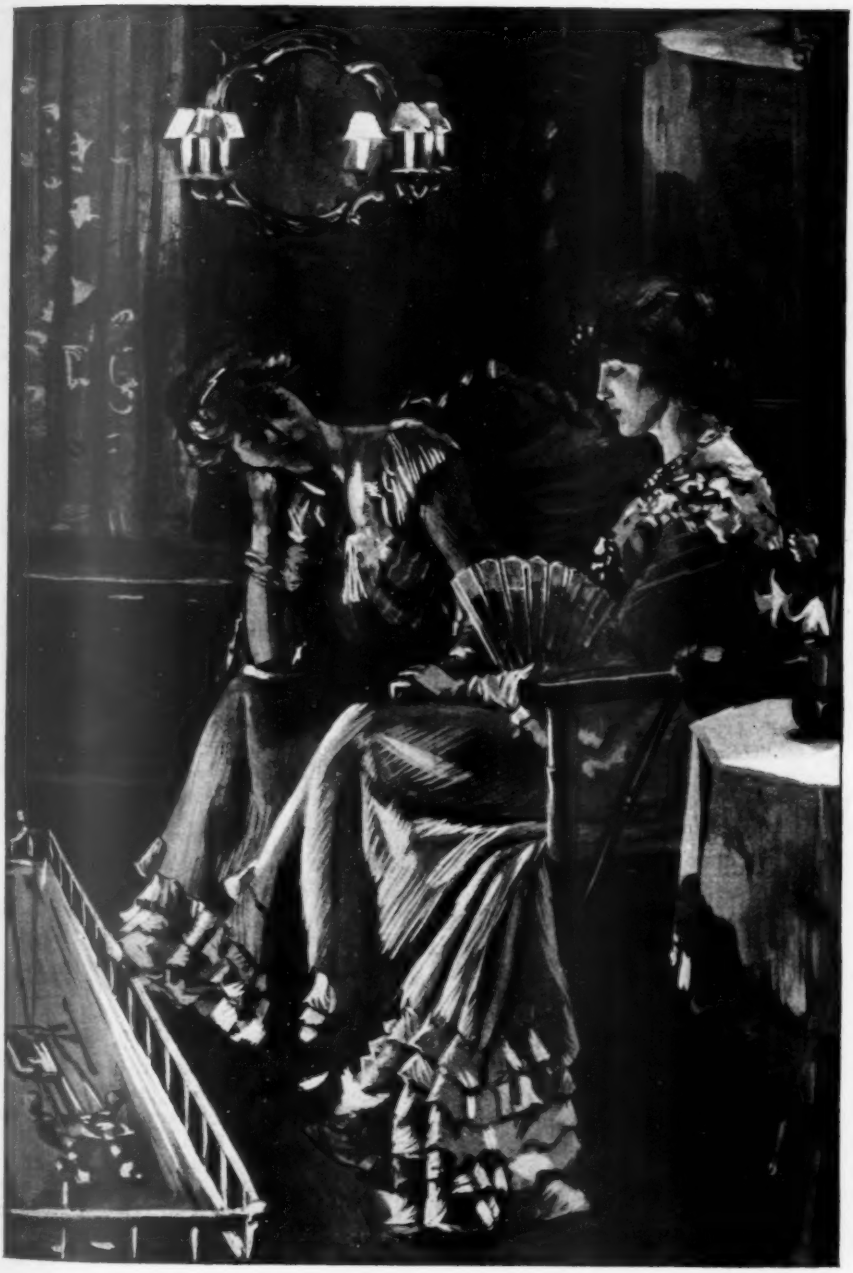
Geoffrey looked across at his wife, with a smile in his eyes.

"So Valerie has been making you shrink from your dinner of herbs, darling?" he said. "Didn't we count all the cost long ago, and have we ever repented? As to your idea of a London practice, dear—well, for my part I am quite content here. There is work and experience to be got out of even these humble surroundings, and later on—well, sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof; and as long as we are happy and content, dear heart——"

"I know, Geoff. I am horribly silly, and—let us go into the garden. The roses are simply lovely."

But as the year wore on and autumn grew into winter, and the papers said their say about the most brilliant wedding of the year, when the lovely Lady Valerie North was transformed into the wife of the treble millionaire, who confidently expected to be raised to the peerage at no distant date, a little rift within the lute might have been perceived in the Mallory household. It began on that summer day when Valerie paid her unlucky visit to Violet and fanned the flame of discontent which had sprung up within her. And though Geoffrey saw it, and did his best to combat the evil which had been wrought, it grew as such weeds will, apace, until it threatened to burst into a terrible tree bearing all the bitter fruit of its kind. And so the months slipped away and November faded into snowy December, and one day, when the frost lay like glittering diamond-dust on the trees and hedgerows, Mrs. Mallory bade a chilly adieu to her husband, and with a surprising array of boxes, set forth on her journey to a distant county where Lady Valerie Lestrange was entertaining a large and smart house party, to which she had insistently invited her dearest Violet.

"It will make such a change to the poor little thing," she said to herself, as she penned the few lines of invitation, "stuck down in that hole, in her cottage, with hardly more than bread and cheese every day of her life. Not but what it is amusing to live on the proverbial herbs for a day or two, but I should not like it for a continuance. And yet——"



At that juncture the beautiful mistress of millions laid down her pen and looked out wistfully over the expanse of quiet park land lying hidden under its snowy covering of newly-fallen snow.

"Was this game on which she had set her heart from earliest youth worth the candle, after all?"

She shrank from answering, even to her own heart, this question. It was one which, in the few hours of solitude which she could call her own, became more increasingly aggressive. And it was only in the constant whirlpool of life, as the word is understood by the votaries of never-ending pleasure, that she could drown the faint pangs of regret and remorse which threatened to undermine her superficial happiness. The very thought of that dinner of herbs, that atmosphere of peace in which Violet Mallory had seemed wrapped when she last saw her, brought a sigh to her lips. Had she just missed happiness?

It was late in the afternoon that Violet Mallory arrived at her destination. To be met by a carriage and pair, to be whirled swiftly through the winter darkness, with her toes on a foot-warmer, and this delightful sensation of warmth and luxury, born of the soft, furry rug which the footman had wrapped round her with such deference, was delicious. If only Geoff could, or would have come, too.

"'Val—I did not know, dear. I thought you so happy.'"—p. 771.

But he had been in such a queer mood for several days now; ever since she had received this invitation, in fact. He did not want her to accept it at all, and when she asserted her rights as an independent married woman he had merely given in silently and looked the disapproval which he would not speak. It was very disagreeable of him, but of late he had been just like a bear with a sore head, and the dull monotony of Violet's life in the cottage had nearly driven her mad. It was selfish of him to grudge her a few days' amusement when she got so little at home, and Mrs. Mallory had departed in high dudgeon, hardly responding to his good-bye kiss, yet feeling just a little conscience-stricken when she thought of certain bills which would probably come in to him during her absence. One cannot go and stay at a smart house with smart people without sufficient clothes to maintain one's self-respect, and Mrs. Mallory had found it necessary to supplement her trousseau dresses with various additions, which had run into a ten-pound note with horrible rapidity. Still, Christmas was near at hand, and that might bring them a cheque from some kind relative—old Uncle Ben, for instance—and Mrs. Mallory, as the horses drew up at the brightly-illuminated house, with its background of snow-laden trees, outlined against the dark sky, thrust from her mind all these unpleasant thoughts and alighted, fully prepared to enjoy life while she had the chance, and prove to Geoffrey that a little change was a most excellent thing for her.

But as the days filled with gaiety slipped by, Geoffrey faded more and more from her thoughts. She barely answered his letters; she was always "just going out," or "skating by torchlight," or "there was no time for letters," etc., etc., etc. She found herself set up as one of the loveliest women in the county. People had heard, of course, of the lovely Miss Strange, who had made such a miserable marriage; and it was a matter of congratulation, so it was inferred by her flatterers, that she had emerged at last from her seclusion and taken her rightful place as that most fascinating of creatures—the young and beautiful married woman.

This and other insidious flatteries did their work only too well, and the weeks fled, and she made no attempt to return home, yet she had promised Geoffrey that she would be back for Christmas.

It only wanted two days to Christmas now. Snow had fallen heavily, and amid much laughter tobogganing had been the order of the day. Now that the short, cold afternoon had drawn in, the house party, hot and tired, returned to the hall, where tea was laid on tables near the hearth.

The hostess had excused herself from the game of the afternoon, urging letters as an excuse, and it was in her boudoir in the wing of the mansion specially dedicated to her use, that Mrs. Mallory sought her later on in the evening.

Never before had Lady Valerie allowed the mask to fall in the presence of her old friend, but she had an object in so doing to-night.

She turned round from the fire, into which she was gazing idly, and the light from the lamps overhead showed her face, white and worn, with something which might have been despair. Yet, was it possible that she, of all women on earth, had trouble, misery, hidden sorrow?

"Violet," she said. "Come and sit here for ten minutes with me. One has hardly a moment for a quiet chat with a perpetual crowd in the house."

"A very amusing crowd," laughed Violet, comfortably settling her toes on the fender. "But you don't look well, Val. Is anything wrong?"

"Is anything right?" said the other, with new bitterness in her voice. "But it is not of myself I want to talk to you, Violet dear. It is about you and—yours. You looked so happy when I saw you last summer in your cottage, and yet somehow it has dawned upon me that all is not as it should be with you—now. Am I right?"

"What can you mean, Val? I am happy enough. Of course, love in a cottage is not everything, and—and one is apt to get tired of it, still——"

"Tired of it! The very thought is like a breath of Heaven to me! No; let me speak, Vi dearest. You—I know your state of mind so well. You have to blame me for the rift which has crept into the lute of your happiness. I know it perfectly well. Oh, I have learnt so much during the last few months, and one of the many things I have been taught by the cruel hand of experience is that money, and power, and all the trappings of gilded slavery which you see about me here are not to be spoken of in the same breath as—what you married for—love. Don't despise it, Vi; it's worth more than all the world and the possessions which you envy. I have watched you, and reproached myself a thousand times for having disturbed your peace. Still, perhaps, it is all for the best. You will appreciate it the more for having had this glimpse of—dead sea fruit. Don't think me crazy, dear; it's—it's deadly earnest. Oh, my dear, better indeed is a dinner of herbs where love is than a stalled ox and—hatred therewith!"

There was a long silence.

Mrs. Mallory slipped her hand into the elder woman's, and so they sat while the clock ticked its way on the mantlepiece, and in the distance a tinkle of laughter floated up to them from the hall where the rest of the party were lounging and flirting away the time before dinner.

"Val—I did not know, dear. I thought you so happy."

"You are not the only person who thinks so Violet. And now, what about Geoff—your dear, good Geoff?"

Mrs. Mallory started up. There were tears in her eyes. It was as if a veil had been rudely torn from before them.

"I must go back to him," she cried. "Oh, I have been away too long. He must be wondering why I don't come back, and—wanting me so. Dear Geoff!"

"You shall go when you like and how you like. Only tell me the hour. And forgive me, dearest, for having been the innocent cause of your unhappiness, for you have looked unhappy. I have watched you. I knew exactly what was passing within you. You were blinded for the time, as I was. You thought that all this wealth and gaiety and show was the reality, and love the shadow, and instead of that it is just the other way. Oh, happy, happy Violet! For you have, at least, the real to fall back upon, and I—I have nothing. Only the memory of what might have been!"

"All in the dark! Good gracious, Val, you are like an owl. The lamps turned so low and the fire smouldering. Do you know it is nearly dinner time?"

Roger Lestrange paused suddenly, his eyes falling on Mrs. Mallory.

"And we have been gossiping all this time!" said Valerie lightly. "Hurry, Violet, or we shall both be late, and you will tell Symons about your packing, dear? She will do it for you."

That evening it was known that Mrs. Mallory, who had been the life and soul of the house party, was leaving suddenly for home. But they who heard the announcement with regret—real or feigned—did not know that this was to be her last appearance in their world as the smartest and most fascinating of grass widows.

The train, express though it was—at least, it said so in the time table—seemed to Mrs. Mallory's feverish mind to crawl through the snowy country. She sat back in the corner of her third-class carriage and passed in mental review all that had happened from that day when Valerie, in all the arrogant beauty and pride of happiness, had disturbed her happy dreams of love in a cottage, and roused the demon of idle discontent within her. Yet it was Valerie herself who had brought her to her senses, and she thanked Heaven in her heart; she had already thanked Valerie—poor, unhappy Valerie—with tears in her eyes. Now it only remained for her to make it all up with—Geoffrey.

He had borne with her tempers, her discontent, her ill humours, and all the time he was working for her in loneliness, all these past three weeks. Oh, she must make things quite straight now; she must never turn out of the narrow way into that broad road which sooner or later leads to destruction. She would run in on him and surprise him. He would hardly expect her now. She had said she really could not tell when she would be coming back. So she mused and meditated until the journey came to an end. It had seemed an endless journey, but it came to an end at last, and Christmas Eve was waning into darkness when Mrs. Mallory hurried up the little garden path, leaving her boxes to follow her more leisurely, with an outside porter.

There was no gleam of light from the doctor's room. Perhaps he was still out on his long, weary rounds of unlucrative work; the house looked strangely dreary; not a sound but the singing of the maid in the kitchen. Mrs. Mallory rang the bell loudly; her hand trembled as she lifted the smart brass knocker.

The maid looked at her with amazement as she opened the door.

"Master's gone away!" she said. "He said as you wasn't coming home, ma'am, he'd be away for Christmas. He left yesterday."

Mrs. Mallory murmured something in reply to this astounding intelligence; she hardly knew what. But her head whirled round madly as she sank into the first chair she could find.

Geoffrey gone away! Without a word to her, or a message in case she returned! Where had he gone? And why? And——"

Anger supervened upon her dismay. She swallowed back her tears. If he chose to go off at a tangent like this—well, let him go! But the thought of a Christmas spent without Geoffrey was a terrible one.

If this was to be her punishment, she found it much in excess of her fault.

* * * * * *

Rat-tat-tat!

A pile of letters and parcels greeted Mrs. Mallory's eyes on Christmas morning. She turned them all over with eager fingers, and then a hot colour flew to her cheeks. There was a letter from him!

Black lines, telling of a miserable, sleepless night, ornamented her pretty eyes; the sound of the happy, chiming bells only added to her misery. And his letter:

"DEAREST VIOLET,—As you are having such a good time, and show no signs of coming home yet, I am going away for Christmas. It's dreary alone at the festive season, so I have accepted an invitation to spend three days with Gervis and his sister at Grangemore. Hope you're having fine weather and plenty of skating. Let me know when I may expect you home again, and believe me, your affectionate,

"GEOFF."

That was all!

She looked at the envelope. It bore her address at the Lestrange's, and had been sent on to her from there. And Geoff was spending the festive season with Gervis and his sister. She remembered her well—a tall, handsome girl, with blue eyes and dark hair, who had once been a great friend of Geoff's; while here she was—alone!

"It's dreary alone at the festive season." That was what Geoff thought, and yet——"

This was awful! Worse than she had ever anticipated. She was—to use an old expression—hoist with her own petard with a vengeance.

In after years Mrs. Mallory looked back on that memorable Christmas as the most unhappy period of her life. Never had three days dragged so horribly; if this was what three days of loneliness meant, what, then, must have been Geoffrey's three weeks? Her conscience, thoroughly awakened, pricked her cruelly, but wholesomely.

The evening of the third day after Christmas Day Mrs. Mallory looked—with all the eagerness of a modern Sister Anne—out of the window, which commanded a full view of the distant high road. It was dark, but she thought she could at least see the bright light of Geoffrey's bicycle lamp as he sped along the road homewards. Then—what a surprise awaited him. She had been too angry to answer his letter, but now——

A bell tinkled in the distance; a bright light came skimming down the road, stopped at the gate, came up the little gravelled path, and Mrs. Mallory let the curtain fall. He was coming in. She heard his voice at the door—the little squeak of the hall door as he shut it behind him, the tread of his feet in the narrow so-called hall, and then his hand on the door. It flew open, and, blinking like an owl, in the sudden blaze of warm light, he looked in.

"Violet!"

"Geoff!"

And then, somehow, they both forgot to be angry. There was a long interval of halting explanation and confession, and then broken fragments of apologies and promises, and then:

"I'll never leave my dinner of herbs again!" she said stoutly from the safe shelter of his arms. "Oh, Geoff, I was such a goose!"

"And I was as surly as a bear with a sore head," he confessed. "I never spent such a horrible Christmas, even though the Gervises were kindness itself. But it shall never happen again, eh, darling?"

And it didn't.

PECULIAR PULPITS.

By W. H. Knowles.

TWIN PULPITS, WALTON-LE-DALE CHURCH.

WHEN one enters a church or other place of worship one's attention is very speedily drawn to the pulpit, for it is in the pulpit that much of the interest of a place of worship is focussed. Pulpits, as a rule, are much alike in design, and when one comes across a variation in the appearance of a pulpit it is usually striking and interesting.

The old-time three-decker pulpit, which in days gone by used to be considered the right thing in a church, is fast disappearing from places of worship, and an example of one is now rarely come across. That seen in the photograph gives a good idea to those who have never seen the three-decker pulpit what these ponderous-looking objects were like. The clerk, with his deep bass voice, occupied the lower portion, the curate would use the second or middle desk for reading the prayers; while the vicar would ascend to the topmost storey to deliver his sermon. There is a good story of a three-decker pulpit similar to this, in an old Lancashire church, which is worth recalling. On one occasion the clerk, who had never had a holiday for years, determined to have one, but could only persuade the vicar to allow it on condition that he found a substitute to take his part on the following Sunday. The sexton had great difficulty in finding anyone willing to do the "clerking," but at length he prevailed on the village blacksmith, an elderly worthy who was stone deaf. The difficulty was how to make him hear, when at the end of a collect he was expected to lead the congregation in a loud voice with his "Amens." Not to be outdone, the clerk provided the vicar with a bag of peas, and persuaded him to have them on his desk, and drop a pea on to the deputy's head in the desk below him every time he wanted him to say "Amen!" Sunday came round, and much curiosity was aroused by seeing the sexton's substitute in the desk, below the parson. However, all went well for a time, the minister adroitly dropping the peas one by one at the end of each collect, and the deputy-clerk responding promptly with his "Amen!" But suddenly two peas dropping, the new clerk considered it his duty to sing a double "Amen!" and when this was repeated a little later the interest of the congregation was naturally aroused. Becoming nervous at this, the vicar unwittingly let the mouth of the bag hang over his desk, and the peas began to drop in a shower on the poor old blacksmith's head. "Amen! Amen! Amen! Amen! Amen!" he roared at the top of his voice, sending out a perfect volley; but this was too much for the minister, who, saying "Amen!" himself, abruptly closed the service.

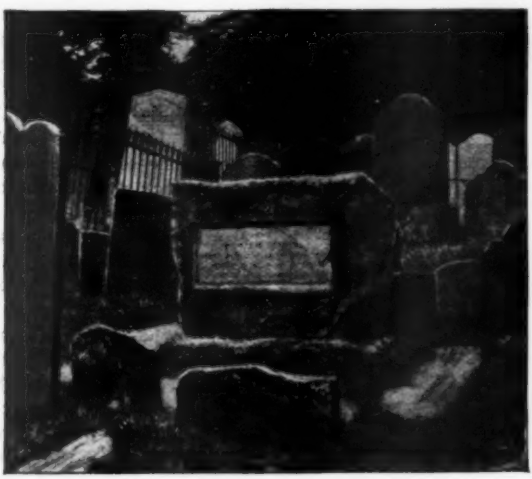
THE PULPIT IN YARMOUTH CHURCH.

No such contrivance as this could be used in the type of pulpit shown in the first photograph. Here are two pulpits exactly and precisely alike—twin pulpits—and, moreover, they are, as it were, suspended like gigantic wine-glasses in mid-air, at opposite sides of the chancel, and can only be reached by a lofty and steep flight of steps. One is used for the prayers, the other for the preacher, and this unique arrangement is found in the 700 years' old church of

THE PULPIT ROCK, CUCKLETT DELL, EYAM.



Walton-le-Dale, near Preston, where the battle of Preston was fought. As the church is about to be "restored," it is possible that these quaint pulpits will disappear and give place to the orthodox pattern.

Of quite a different type is the pulpit shown in the next picture. Of great size, beautifully carved, and bearing striking figures of the twelve apostles, it was designed by Canon Venables, and is to be seen in the fine old church of St. Nicholas at Yarmouth. It is so constructed that in this vast church, the largest parish church in the kingdom, every member of the congregation can see it, which is a feature often lost sight of in many places of worship. Its cost was £600.

Every member of the congregation can also see the pulpit shown in the picture below, which is as plain as the previous one is elaborate. It is, in fact, a pulpit of stone—merely a block of stone—in the centre of the famous churchyard of Kirk Braddan, in the Isle of Man. Every Sunday, in the summer season, thousands of visitors flock to this old-world church, and the service is held in the churchyard, where the time-worn graves serve as seats for the worshippers, and the minister propounds the gospel from this natural pulpit. On the first Sunday in August as many as 10,000 people assemble round this pulpit to join in the service. The stone is now inscribed with the words, referring to the previous vicar :—

"Here WILLIAM DRURY,
40 years Vicar of Braddan,
Preached the Word of God."

Another natural pulpit, but one of quite a different character, is also shown on this page. It is to be found in an out-of-the-world part of Derbyshire, some little distance from the ancient village of Eyam. It is known as the Rock pulpit, because it is formed out of the natural rock at the head of the Cucklett Dell, and the associations connected with it are imperishable. During the time of the great plague every house in the village of Eyam was stricken. The vicar of the old church, William Mompesson, worked night and day to alleviate the suffering, was the means of isolating the village from other places in the district, so that the plague should not be spread, and generally, by his sympathy and practical help, lessened the terror of the visitation incalculably. So that the people who were able to attend should not be entirely deprived of the means of grace, the church being closed, he collected them Sunday by Sunday in the Cucklett Dell, where, sitting some distance apart from each other, they listened to the words of comfort, consolation, and exhortation

The magnificent pulpit shown in the next picture is found in the fine old church of St. Thomas at Newport, in the Isle of Wight. Above the preacher's head, carved in deep, clear lines, is the brief admonition, "Lift up thy voice like a trumpet!"

The beautiful pulpit in Giggleswick old church, dating from 1680, is richly carved, and on the front of the reading desk attached is a quaint inscription in bold relief.

THE CAPITULATION OF WILLIAM.

A Complete Story.

HE was probably thirteen when he joined the Boys' Club, small-sized (like most of the dwellers in Pilgrim Square), thin, wiry, red-haired — a typical street larrakin, as sharp as a day's search would yield, and as uncleanly. He wore a scarlet shirt and corduroys, and the rest of his attire was fragmentary.

I was, rather wearily, taking the attendances as the Club members came in, when a stampede and a sheep-like shuffling made me look up suddenly. I met the gaze of a pair of greenish-grey eyes.

"You're a new boy?" I said.

"Not pertickler noo as I knows on," was the encouraging reply.

"What are you called?"

"Corl'd? Luv yer, it 'ud tyke orl night ter tell yer. Ask us anover!"

I did. "What is your name?" I said.

"There's a tidy few er them tue!"

"I can't waste time talking to you," I said.

"George," he exclaimed theatrically, wiping his eyes on the cap of the boy in front of him, "kerry me art, I ain't used ter bein' torked to unkind."

I tried another tack, knowing that patience and politeness will nearly always win the day.

"Do you wish to join the Club?" I asked.

"Yus; 'ere's me brarn."

"What name shall I put down?"

"Take yer chice, me lidy—William, 'Enery, Chorles——"

"Don't sorce the lidy, yer fool," came a gentle suggestion from the rear. "'E's Bill Shand, Missus, no gammon."

I directed him to a row of chairs reserved for new members; he selected one with the air of a connoisseur, and, turning to George previously addressed, said: "Lend us yer wipe; mine's at the lorndery, and I ain't goin' to spile my noo cords wiv no dusty cheers, not 'alf."

Upon the chair he sat, wide-eyed and observant, during the hymn and prayer which began the evening's work. It was a drill night; the workers were in uniform, and the appearance of the Captain especially provoked his derision, and a running fire of comment, for my benefit, was poured into the ears of George.

"Ain't he a buster? Look at 'is little bonnet. Why don't they git 'im a noo un; 'e've got too big fer that 'air. Diddums then? Look at old Andy Smif. Ain't 'e a corker, Don't 'e fancy 'isself now 'e's a corperil?"

"New members come forward," ordered the Captain.

"Take me 'and, Gorgy, an' don't leave me," entreated Bill, in piteous tones, as the new boys filed forward.

Bill came last, the other four, orderly for the time being, and overawed by the newness of their present experience, answered very meekly the questions put to them. Not so Bill.

As George fell to rank, Bill very solemnly took two steps forward and stood on his head!

"How dare you do that, sir?" inquired the Captain sternly.

"'Tain't difficult," he replied innocently, as he righted himself; "I thinks best that way, guv'ner!"

"Stand up straight," said the Captain.

The lithe young body stiffened at once.

"Hold up your head." Which he did by grasping his chin firmly in both hands.

He was put, more or less quietly, through his paces, and told to fall in, it hardly occurring to the Captain that the command would be so literally interpreted as it was.

XUM

He was not turned out that night, but on several successive evenings was required to leave after a very brief attendance.

"No vice, but unlimited mischief," was the general opinion, and from the babe-like innocence of Bill's face it was difficult to tell whether the sudden turning off of the gas at the main, putting squibs in the crack of the door, running a pin into the long-suffering George during prayer, really did not occur to him as being legitimate forms of diversion.

For a few days he would give little trouble, but when his improved behaviour and sufficient attendances had almost won him the coveted Club uniform, he broke out again.

The Captain, in the vigour of drill, sent his cap flying. Bill fell out, saluted, restored the cap with a loud-voiced inquiry, "Shell I nip art an' git one er me auntie's 'at pins, sir?"

He was ordered out, and left, and many days passed and he did not come again.

I met him a week later, leading a dissipated looking baby by the hand. Before the lad saw me his care for the baby was extreme and most gentle; when he caught sight of me he put his hands in his pockets and began to whistle. Yet his attitude was not hostile, and though he would have passed me by on the other side I crossed the road. "Who is this?" I said rather feebly, indicating the baby.

"Our youngest—rum little kipper—like ter 'av 'im?"

"You couldn't spare him."

"Bust me ef I couldn't; we've got plenty more at 'ome, no errer. 'E's a twelve monf come nex' Toosday, an' the one before ain't two, an' they runs up ter me like that. Kum an' see if yer like. The old man's been knockin' me muvver abart this week, so she've got two black uns, but she's used to it. Wish 'e'd got a wooden ulster,* I do! Kum on."

He plunged up a dark entry, and I was fain to follow.

The details of that sordid place of abiding, in no sense a home, where ten children, father, and mother herded in three rooms, are too familiar to any who know of the life of the London poor to need description, and have no part in this story, and they did not surprise me. What did was the poor, tired mother's brightening look as Bill came in. The jaded face took a new light as Bill caught her round the neck with, "'Ere y'are, mate; ere's our lidy!"

* A coffin.

I stayed long enough to hear the sad story—for the reticence of happier days had dropped from her as a garment—gave what help I could, and came away with a new thought from the mother's last words.

"Ef it wern't fer my Billy I'd a been gorne long ergoe—e's my comfort, 'e is."

I took Bill by the shoulder. He wriggled away, with a decisive, "'Ands orf!"

"Bill," I said, "you love your mother?"

"I don't mind 'er," was the cautious reply; "but yer should see 'er dressed fer a funeril, no one couldn' look more of a torf."

"Bill, I believe if you could make your mother happy, you would." I pursued the subject firmly.

"No errer; but I ain't no bloomin' ferlantherpist, mind yer!"

"You can help her if you like," I said.

"'Oo yer gittin' at?"

I then explained, by careful stages, the bearing of his good behaviour in a return to the Club and a submission to rules, upon his mother's happiness and her prospective pride in the cap, belt, and haversack that might adorn her Billy, if he would.

"You ain't a-kiddin' us? Orl right, yer see——"

From that day Billy was less difficult—abounding in mischief still, daring, restless, active, ignorant, but more teachable, and learning, with many slips backward, something of the great life-lessons of patience and self-control that worked by slow degrees into the heads and hearts of the Club boys. Now and then he broke into rebellion, impelled by that restless motive power born of his life in the street, never quite at one with us till an eventful November day.

He had just left school. He had begun the world with an eight shilling wage and the prospect of a rise "ef I keeps on stright." With a wisdom beyond his years that eight shillings was expended by Bill before it could fall into the hands of his drunken sot of a father. So the sad mother's lot was somewhat ameliorated. Now and then Bill's Club place was empty, and the Captain and I grew to know that that meant that the lad was staying at home for his mother's protection.

One night came word by the hand of "Pegs," aged thirteen, Bill's recognised "gal," that Mr. Shand had "got 'em very bad," and would the Captain come at once. The Captain went at once, and afterwards I heard what happened.

The father was gone after more drink. Bill and his mother awaited a fresh onslaught, too stunned to resist it. The greenish-grey eyes were very bright and hard under the red hair, as Bill mopped a cut on his mother's brow. The Captain had hardly entered, when the father returned, and Bill tells the rest of the story in his own inimitable way.

"'E's plucky, our Kepting, but 'e's a cock-sparrer 'side 'im wen drunk, or not, long of 'is 'aving been a prize-foighter onct. He goes fer Kepting, Kepting falls flat. I goes for 'im, kops 'im a wunner, an' ee goes flat, forling over a cheer. Door hopens, in comes copper, says to 'im, 'e says, 'Hup yer gits,' and takes 'im orf. Kepting comes rarnd, an' I tells 'im the story of 'ow I saved 'is loife!"

How far Bill did save the Captain from injury to life and limb is not quite clear. Probably his debt to the boy is not small, and it is joy to Bill to think himself a hero. Since that day his attachment to the Captain has been as faithful as it has been dumb.

How Bill became the stand-by of the Captain and officers, became a corporal, and then a sergeant in the Club; how his father, for seven years under the control of the civil authorities for certain episodes in his career, came under their notice, and ceased to trouble them; and how on his release Bill and his family were gone from Pilgrim Square is another story. The secret of his loyal service to the Captain was perhaps most revealed by his own words:

"Wot was the good 'er savin' is loife ef I was ter be the plague of it?"

"His attitude was not hostile."—p. 779.

MAKERS OF MODERN CHRISTIANITY

GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS
THE THEOLOGIAN

By the Very Rev. H. Donald M. Spence, D.D., Dean of Gloucester.

PART II.—THE GREAT PREACHER.

THE marvellous discourses of the "Anastasia" were the great work of Gregory of Nazianzus's life. As a Church ruler he was scarcely a success. Simple and unassuming in his life, an austere monk, a lover of retirement, a devotee to work in his closet, he failed to make a favourable impression on the "world of Constantinople," which looked for something more from their archbishop than a somewhat sombre and austere monk could give them.

The great scholar, too, was no reader of human nature. He was easily deceived and imposed upon, and in one memorable instance cruelly disappointed. He had given his countenance and friendship to a certain impostor named Maximus, and that publicly. Maximus used Gregory's influence for a while for his own ends, and then endeavoured to supplant him as the Archbishop of the capital city. To all intents and purposes, Gregory, though he had not as yet assumed the title, was filling the important post, and was only waiting for the arrival of the Emperor Theodosius formally to take possession of the great dignity. Maximus, however, secured a hurried and illegal consecration, and then asserted that he was Archbishop. His claim was soon authoritatively put aside, and the sorry hero of the episode at once vanished into obscurity, whence he had emerged. But Gregory's ill-advised friendship and support of the unworthy pretender in earlier days seriously injured his reputation, and made not a few, with some reason, to doubt as to his fitness for the dangerous and difficult post of bishop of the great see.

But for the present all went well. His detractors and enemies were silenced by the opinion of the majority, who, although displeased with his shrinking from the pomp and circumstance of his great position, were, with good reason, proud of an Archbishop who was universally considered the leading theologian in the East—it might even be said in the whole Christian world, for in the Western Empire there was no scholar comparable to the friend of the dead Basil.

The Emperor Theodosius treated Gregory with respect and deference; and at the suggestion of Gregory, before formally enthroning him, summoned the Arian Archbishop Demophilus and his clergy to subscribe to the articles of the Council of Nicæa; but receiving, as was expected, a peremptory refusal to subscribe, the Arians were at once banished, and the Arian incumbents of the city churches, thus convicted of deadly heresy, were commanded to leave those churches.

It was after this that with great pomp and ceremony the Emperor, accompanied with a military escort, conducted Gregory to the Church of the Apostles, where reposed the precious remains of Constantine, the founder of the city, and on the following day the illustrious scholar and preacher was induced to take his seat on the episcopal throne of Constantinople.

The Emperor Theodosius' will was quickly carried out in all parts. The Catholic Bishops, quietly and without opposition, were generally reinstated. The great religious revolution which swept away Arianism out of the Eastern Provinces was accomplished without bloodshed, even without violence. It seems clear that Arian opinion, so long dominant, had made but little real impression on the hearts of the people, and that Arianism was rather a political than an earnest religious movement. It had been supported for various reasons by all the weight and influence of the Emperors. And as soon as their all-powerful assistance was withdrawn public opinion swung back again to the doctrines taught by Athanasius and Basil, and lately set forth with so much power and ability by Gregory of Nazianzus, whose gentle spirit, backed up as it was by great learning and splendid eloquence, was admirably calculated to win over even those who were originally opposed to the doctrines he preached with such matchless ability.

With the full concurrence of Archbishop Gregory of Nazianzus, Theodosius summoned to Constantinople a General Council composed of Bishops of the provinces of the Eastern Empire, authoritatively to settle the affairs of the Church, now purged from the intruding Arian prelates and teachers. This Council is reckoned as the second General Council of the Church. The principal work which was before this important assembly was to confirm anew the articles of faith decided upon in the great Council of Nicæa in A.D. 325, and at the same time to reconcile, if it were possible, the semi-Arian Bishops who seemed now willing to accept the Creed of Nicæa. In only one point were the semi-Arian leaders still wavering or in open opposition—on the question of the divinity, or, to be more definite, the personality, of the Holy Ghost. Here the original Creed of Nicæa without definition simply asserted the belief of the Church here in the simple words, "I believe in the Holy Ghost." For some time, however, the responsible Catholic teachers seem to have added to the Nicæan formula certain explanatory definitions of this last clause; we find them, for instance, in the "Anchoratus," a widely used dogmatic work of Epiphanius of Salamis, the friend of Basil.

From what was stated at the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, it appears that these definitions were discussed at the Council of Constantinople, and that they were eventually embodied in the Creed, which finally assumed the form in which we use it now. Some believe that the explanatory clauses which follow the declaration of belief in the Holy Ghost were added at Constantinople by Gregory of Nazianzus himself or by Gregory of Nyssa, a brother of Basil, who was a great and respected theologian, and was present at the Council of Constantinople. The authorship, however, is doubtful, as far as Gregory of Nazianzus is concerned, as the official discussion of the point in question seems not to have taken place until after Gregory of Nazianzus had left the Council, although it is highly probable that this most important question had previously been debated at the Council's earlier sessions.

But what we more immediately are concerned with here is the strange, sad adventure which befel the subject of this little study, Gregory of Nazianzus, in the course of this Council.

The President's seat in this venerable assembly was occupied by a singularly lovable man—Meletius, Archbishop of Antioch, who for some twenty stormy years had wisely ruled the Church of the great Syrian city. By turns admired and persecuted, with a dangerous schism ever dividing the thinned ranks of the orthodox Antiocheans, Meletius had held his own, and had won the love and devotion well-nigh of all the Christian citizens of his turbulent and mighty see. In the year of the Council, A.D. 381, his popularity was at its height. Chrysostom, who knew him well, tells us how his portrait was worn on the rings of the luxurious and wealthy citizens. It was painted on goblets, it was a favourite ornament in the gorgeous rooms of Antioch; it could be even seen painted on the walls of many a bedchamber. Gregory of Nyssa, who preached the beautiful and pathetic funeral sermon when this true saint of God passed away, reminded the sorrowful congregation of the beloved Bishop's sweet calm look, of his radiant smile, of the kind hand seconding the kind voice. Meletius was the dear friend and loving admirer of Gregory of Nazianzus, and one of the first acts of the Constantinopolitan Council was the formal recognition of Gregory as the Archbishop of the capital of the East. In the Council all was going well, reconciliation was in the air. The whole influence of Meletius and Gregory was in the direction of peace, and forgiveness of past errors and mistakes. The powerful Emperor Theodosius was captivated by the goodness of the Bishop of Antioch, and impressed by the winning eloquence and learning of Gregory, when, alas, Meletius of Antioch, worn out with years of struggle and weary care, suddenly sickened and died.

Naturally, Archbishop Gregory of Nazianzus took his place as President of the august assembly. But Gregory's splendid, even matchless powers, as we have already remarked, lay not in the skilful discharge of the many duties belonging to his high office. He was no born ruler of men. Sensitive to a fault, he could not bear even the shadow of reproach, and men complained—and perhaps with some reason—of his simple, austere way of living, of his dislike of all state, of his shrinking from the splendour and dignity which necessarily accompanied the great position to which he had been called.

Some time before leaving Antioch for the Council Meletius had put an end to the long-drawn-out schism in the Church of Antioch, by arranging that his competitor for the see, his rival and opponent for many years, Paulinus, who had a small but powerful following in the city, and who was a man of unblemished orthodoxy and high and stainless character, should, if he survived him, be his successor in the Antioch archiepiscopate. Gregory, in the Council, before whom the matter was brought, was urgent that the compact made by his dead friend Meletius should be carried out in its entirety. Others, though, were averse to Paulinus succeeding one so justly famous and loved as Meletius had been, and of whom he had been for years the bitter opponent and rival.

The influence of Gregory with the Council was not sufficient to carry his point, which he had deeply at heart, thinking that the honour of the dead Meletius, who was pledged to Paulinus, was at stake; and the Council, setting the arrangement of Meletius aside, sanctioned the elevation of Flavian, a well-known presbyter, to the see of Antioch. Gregory was deeply wounded at finding how little weight his earnest wishes carried.

He had some enemies, too, in the venerable assembly, notably among the Egyptian bishops, who were deeply annoyed at the pre-eminence now awarded to Constantinople, over all the sees of the East, including even Alexandria, which was once virtually supreme; were jealous, too, of the acknowledged surpassing greatness of Gregory of Nazianzus, who occupied the see which had been lately raised to the loftiest rank. His grievous mistake in the matter of the infamous Maximus was raked up anew, and murmurs were soon heard in the assembly that, after all, Gregory was no lawful Archbishop. The murmurers quoted a decree of Nicæa, practically obsolete, which forbade the translation of any Bishop. "Was not," so urged these jealous ones, "Gregory already Bishop of the obscure Sasima, to which long before Basil had nominated him?"

The real business of the Council was neglected in view of these carping and querulous suggestions, and less and less grew the influence of Gregory. His health, too, gave way; everything seemed against him. The very grandeur and dignity of his position weighed him down. A morbid idea disturbed him that he, and he alone, prevented the assembled Bishops from settling once and for all the grave and disputed doctrine concerning the personality of the Holy Ghost; that he alone stood in the way of their reconciling the wavering semi-Arians, and so restoring peace to the long-distracted Church. "Let me depart," he said; "let me return to my loved solitude and my studies. I will play the part of Jonah; throw me overboard, and so preserve the ship of the Church from shipwreck. Let me resign." His arguments prevailed, perhaps to his disappointment. The Council listened to him sorrowfully enough, but scarcely endeavoured to turn him from his too generous purpose. To their everlasting shame he was suffered to resign the great office, of which, with all his shortcomings, he was the distinguished ornament; and thus the most famous scholar, the noblest orator in the Christian world; one of the purest, noblest, most generous of the sons of men was suffered, with scarcely a voice raised to dissuade him from his sad purpose, to go into voluntary exile.

Before he left Constantinople the famous orator expressed his wish to speak a public farewell to the Council he had presided over, and to the flock among whom for a while he had been the chief pastor and teacher. In the great Church of St. Sophia there gathered together a mighty congregation assembled to hear the farewell of the most distinguished orator in the world. It was a remarkable gathering for among the huge congregation, made up of all that was best and most thoughtful in the capital of the East, in one corner sat a notable group consisting of the fathers of the second General Council of the Church—Bishops and theologians not a few of whose names have come down to us, names distinguished in the long-drawn-out Arian contest. Many a one that day was grieved at heart that they had treated with such scant consideration, with such a lack, too, of human wisdom, the famous white-haired warrior of the faith; grieved that for such trifling reasons they had driven away the great athlete of God from his high post of honour and responsibility.

Sick—some thought well-nigh unto death—disappointed, disillusioned, never perhaps in his long life had the old man preached as he preached that day before that famous auditory, though at first the silvery voice was weak and wavering.

The theme of the memorable discourse was not doctrine this time, as it had been when he spoke before urbi et orbi, to Constantinople and the whole Christian world—words clothing high and sublime doctrine, words the echoes of which have gone down the fifteen centuries which have elapsed since he spoke them. It was simply a farewell, but such a farewell as perhaps no human ear had ever heard before.

He painted the flock of the queen city of the East as he found it when he gathered the poor persecuted remnant in the little "Anastasia" hall, and he compared it with that brilliant and packed congregation assembled there in the great Church of St. Sophia, and he pointed with emphasis to the august company of Catholic fathers of the faith in one corner of the sacred building. To whose work, to whose words, he asked, was the gathering of such an assembly owing? And yet, as his guerdon, they had driven him into exile! After all, what a stupendous change had been worked! Then, with great power, he alluded to the Catholic party, victorious all along the line. How had they behaved towards the vanquished? Who had been punished, who had suffered? It had been a bloodless victory; a strange vengeance, indeed, had been exacted from the vanquished. Peace, pardon, forgetfulness of the sad past, reconciliation, were the results of the great victory in which he had been the guiding influence. With what crimes, he asked, "has your pastor and teacher been charged? Only with wearing plain and simple garments, only with denying himself the luxuries men think belong to an Archbishop!"

Gregory ended somewhat in this fashion: "Farewell, then, dear Church of the 'Anastasia,' monument of our great victory over error; farewell, splendid and mighty church where we are now assembled; farewell, episcopal throne of Constantinople, coveted and dangerous honour; farewell, Council of Bishops; farewell homes of the city, where so many have welcomed me, weak and ailing though I have been; farewell, loved people, who have listened so often to my words; farewell, great city—friend I feel you are of Christ; farewell, Eastern and Western world, for whose souls' health I have fought the good fight. . . . O Guardian Angel of the Church, farewell. O Angel, who art watching o'er me now, and who will guard me, too, in exile. And Thou, O blessed Trinity, my constant thought, my glory too, may this people rejoice for ever in Thy presence among them. O Blessed Trinity, save them, and only let me know, when far away, that they—my people—are moving ever onwards and upwards in wisdom and in virtue. . . ."

Then he left the city he loved, quietly, sorrowfully. At once he went to Cæsarea, to the grave of his friend Basil; and in Basil's church he preached what was the funeral sermon of the great dead—a holy duty, unavoidably, as we have seen, long delayed—a sermon of wonderful power and pathos; we have it still.

From Cæsarea he went to his native Nazianzus, and thence to the neighbouring village of Arianzus, where he still possessed a little house and garden, the poor residue of the very considerable inherited possessions he had long ago given to the poor. It was in this quiet and comparatively humble home that the Archbishop, the illustrious orator and scholar, spent the last six years of his life, apparently forgotten and neglected by the world in which he had played so distinguished a part. In those evening hours of life, coloured with the sombre hues of constant sickness and suffering, he wrote many of his more striking poems. In this little story of portions of a striking biography we have said nothing of this side of a great life, nothing of his power as a poet.* He wrote many poems, some of them of a very high order, and not a few critics consider him the greatest of the early Christian song men. It has even been said that his chief title to honour will ever be his pathetic and soul-touching verses. This curious estimate of his influence will, however, scarcely be endorsed by the Church, which, while not forgetting his real and striking ability as a poet, prefers to think of Gregory of Nazianzus as one of her foremost theologians—perhaps the greatest of them all.

A strange, sad, earthly lot was the portion of the two friends. Both of them endowed with talents far greater than are usually bestowed on the sons of men; both of them theologians so distinguished that their writings have for ever crystallised for the Church doctrines of the highest importance which before their time, although accepted, were scarcely formulated. Their words, their clear-cut sentences, have been the framework of the credenda of a thousand churches, and will surely live in the homes and hearts of men "till He come." Both of them were preachers and orators of the highest power, men on whose utterances thousands hung with rapt attention. One of these, an organiser of strange and unusual ability, who may be fairly said to have founded that world-wide institution of monasticism which so powerfully influenced Christianity for a thousand years; who traced out the first plan of the organised charity and love, which ever since Basil fell asleep has been the strength and glory of Christianity. The other a poet—perhaps the greatest of early Christian poets—but, above all, a theologian of far-reaching influence, whose thoughts and words have largely fashioned and moulded the teaching of the Catholic Church. Both of them in their turn called to the highest position in the Church, which, after their own way, with their peculiar gifts, they filled with distinguished ability; so that in their day in succession they were emphatically the leading Christian prelates of the world, the foremost defenders of Catholic truth, in an age when Catholic truth was exposed to the sorest peril which has ever endangered its work and progress.

And yet both of them were called to a career in which sadness was the dominant note.

Basil, the restless, tireless toiler, ever doing his high, grand work in weariness and painfulness. While sick nigh unto death he often did his noblest tasks, and finally, in suffering and anguish, passed away, still comparatively young, only a very short time before the grand and unlooked-for triumph of the cause of Catholic truth, for which he had spent his beautiful life.

Gregory, the quiet, retiring scholar, called in late life to the loftiest position which the Church has to offer, but often fails to offer, to her most gifted sons, after filling the great office with a rare distinction for a period brief indeed, but still long enough to leave upon his Church and throne a light and a glory such as no man before him, no man after him, has left, not even the great Chrysostom—was driven into a premature, sorrowful retirement by the intrigues and shortsightedness of men most of whom were unworthy to loose the latchet of his shoes. Gregory died in solitude, comparatively unknown and unhonoured. O God, "how unsearchable are Thy judgments, and Thy ways past finding out"! We shall know the reason of all these strange, sad things one day, when we are with Thee, but not here, not now!

"WHEN I AM DEAD."

"WHEN I am dead," Belovéd, think and feel
I am alive! On me Death hath not fed;
For Christ in me is resurrection's seal!
I have risen to a higher life instead,
I am not dead!

"When I am dead"—and cold this earthly clay
From which my spirit, purer grown, has fled;
Think I have flown to th' eternal day!
Whither God's light and love my soul hath led—
I—who seem dead!

"When I am dead"—I am not lost to thee;
For love, that cannot die, to God is wed.
Eternal, invisible, it lives to see
And love thee still, while thou the earth may tread—
Where I am dead.

"When I am dead"—oft nearer shall I be
Than when in life together we were led Through joys and tribulations; for with thee
My soul shall blend, to comfort thine that bled—
Thinking—I was dead!

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—V.

The story opens at Castle Hill, where Mrs. Keith lives with a young relative, Giles Randolph, who was left an orphan in childhood. Her own son, Colin, returns from a long stay on the Continent, and proposes to begin a career as a sculptor, to the mother's obvious but unexplained annoyance. Giles goes to Yorkshire to arrange, if possible, for his second cousin, Phyllys Wyverne, to pay a visit to Castle Hill.

CHAPTER VI.

OF A STERN CHASE.

WITH half-concealed rapture Phyllys heard of the promised visit to Castle Hill in less than a month, and nothing was further from her expectations than to set eyes on Giles again before that date. She hardly even wished to do so. There was so much to do, so much to think about, during the next three weeks.

But with Giles it was otherwise. He found himself unable to rest without another glimpse of her.

He did not yet definitely say to himself that Phyllys might be more to him than a charming cousin. He only knew that he could not get her out of his thoughts; that no sooner was he away from Midfell than he wanted to get back. He was haunted by recollections of the curling lashes, the mischievous blue flashes, though, of course, underlying this was a wish to know Phyllys better.

For five days he held out, determined not to act upon impulse. Then a member of his host's family fell seriously ill, and visitors kindly took themselves off. Giles had a shooting engagement in the Highlands, nearly a week later, and nothing between. He promptly resolved to spend the intervening time at Midfell, asking no man's leave. The grandmother and cousin might not be altogether delighted, but he would risk that. So long as he had a welcome from Phyllys, what other folks might think mattered little.

Having so decided, he posted a line to Mrs. Wyverne, stating briefly what had occurred, and remarking on the pleasure it would give him to improve his acquaintance with his relatives.

The letter brought dismay. Mrs. Wyverne said nothing to Phyllys, being still in the habit of treating her younger granddaughter as a child, but later she consulted with Barbara. Both recognised that nothing could be done. Giles had as clear a right as any human being to put up at the village inn if he so chose, and to study the country. Mrs. Wyverne might demur, Barbara might frown, but they could not interfere.

"But, of course, you will not have him in and out all day long, turning everything upside down," the latter said with disgust. "Phyllys will be completely upset. There is nothing for it but to get her out of the way this afternoon, so that you can have a few words with him, and make him understand. You will have to be firm!" The speaker set her teeth grimly. "I will make an errand for Phyllys, and we had better say nothing to her about him, or she may refuse to go. You see, he intends to call here directly he arrives."

Mrs. Wyverne offered no objection, and Phyllys, somewhat to her surprise, was asked by Barbara to take a long walk to an outlying farm known as "Thacker's," where she loved to go, but was not often permitted. She had been only once without a companion, and the idea was charming. Barbara seldom suggested anything so much to her taste. A warm shawl had been left there some little time before, and to fetch this was the ostensible motive given. Phyllys laughingly remarked that she would have a good "forenoon drinking," the local colloquialism for a mid-morning lunch, and would get something further to eat at the farm. Barbara objected, not wishing Phyllys to get back early. After "dinner" would be best, she said. The days were long, and Phyllys could then do her morning tasks.

"All right," agreed the girl cheerfully. "I shall have a nice rest there, and come back by the moor. It will be great fun, won't it, Wiggles?"

Wiggles wagged an appreciative tail.

Not till Phyllys had left the house did Barbara note an ominous thickness upon the surrounding moor-fells. It occurred to her that she ought to have observed it sooner, and to have warned Phyllys to return by the road. Now it was too late; so she said nothing to Mrs. Wyverne, and dismissed the weather from her mind. After all, Phyllys was old enough to be sensible.

Early in the afternoon, as Barbara had predicted, Giles Randolph walked in.

He greeted his great-aunt kindly, his cousin politely, and his eyes at once went in search of someone else. "Where is Phyllys?" came soon, and Barbara thrust in her reply before Mrs. Wyverne could speak. "Gone for a walk on the moors," she said, wording her information vaguely, under a shrewd suspicion that he would wish to follow.

She over-reached herself. "The moors—today?" he said, a note of something more than surprise in his voice. "With whom, may I ask?"

"Phyllys goes everywhere. She is used to it, and there are no ill-disposed people in this neighbourhood," declared Barbara. "The dog is ample protection."

"You do not really mean that she is alone?"

His manifest concern annoyed Barbara. "Of course she will not go too far. Phyllys knows what she is about. She merely meant to cross part of a hill on her way back."

"From where?"

He had to put the question a second time, and facts were dragged out with difficulty. "'Thacker's' Farm," he repeated. "Yes, I know the direction. It was pointed out to me the other day. I will try to overtake her. The moors will be thick with fog."

"A touch of mist." Barbara spoke in vexed accents.

"It will be more than a touch of mist in an hour or two."

"The child is so fearless," murmured Mrs. Wyverne.

"I had better start at once. Perhaps I may reach the farm before she leaves it." Giles had not much hope of this, having already in his mind a clear view of distances and times; but he did not wish to give the old lady an anxious afternoon. "You may trust me to look after her," he said, standing up. "Perhaps I may meet her coming back along the road; and if not, I shall find her on the moor. The fog is not much now, but it will thicken."

One or two inquiries in the village as to the route made all clear, and he was off, clearing the ground at his best pace—a pace which few men could rival. By road the distance was considerably over five miles; and he made little of it, spurred on by observations of the grey-capped fells. He knew enough of moorland to be aware that a fog, exceptional in density for the season, was gathering on the heights, and he wished to intercept Phyllys at the farm. But when he arrived, he found that she had started some twenty minutes earlier; and since he had not met her, she must have gone the other way.

He wasted no time, and was off again, following the direction pointed out. A rough lane, besprinkled with stones, led to the edge of the moor; after which he had only a grass track to guide him. It led sloping upward, crossing a somewhat high spur, and shortening the distance to Midfell by more than a mile.

No mistake here about the "mistiness," as Barbara called it. With every ten yards the air grew thicker, as he widened his distance from the moor edge.

That Phyllys should not have turned back on finding the state of things perplexed him. Yet, had she done so, he would have met her. He wondered, was she one of those people who, once they resolve on a course of action, stick to that course unreasoningly, whatever happens? He would not have credited her with unreason or with obstinacy. He did credit her with unusual fearlessness, which might be a sufficient explanation.

The track, though faint, was distinct; chiefly visible through different shades of colouring in the turf, caused by the passing of many feet. It was more clear than many such moor-tracks, being used a good deal in fine weather by people going to and fro between Midfell and a large village on the other side of the fell. Here and there it was broken by a rough out-crop of rock; but despite the fog, Giles had no difficulty in picking it up again beyond the breaks. And Phyllys was accustomed to such walking. She might have thought it wiser to keep steadily on, rather than to retrace her steps and to go all the way round by the road.

It was very still. No voice of man or beast, no twitter or buzz of bird or insect interrupted the silence. No stir in the air moved the heavy white curtain which hung on all around, shutting him in a little narrow circle which moved with him as he walked. The great moor-billows stretched away, he knew, for interminable miles, but he could not see them. Landscape and sky were blotted out. It was a pervading white darkness, pressing upon the solitary figure which traversed it.

And Phyllys was out alone in this! He walked rapidly, more and more anxious to overtake her, expecting each minute to descry a slim figure ahead. Not far ahead, for beyond a very few yards he could make out nothing Now and again a shadowy form heaved into view, raising his hopes; and each time it grew into a furze-bush, dank and wet.

More than once he stopped for a brief cogitation, on noting what looked like a possible short cut to the lower level over Midfell. No track was apparent, but he knew the lie of the ground. Phyllys might have ventured on some such short cut. Yet, no; being acquainted as she was with the country, and understanding the risk of quitting her path in such a fog, she would not have ventured. The farm folk had assured him that there was but the one way. He thought less of one or two faint side-tracks, branching off at right angles, leading to upper heights. These plainly went away from Midfell, and would not have tempted Phyllys.

Still no signs of her. He pressed on, faster and faster, in deepening uneasiness; and at length, sooner than might have seemed possible, he reached the verge, where a steepish descent led to the top of a lower hill immediately behind the village.

"He found that she had started some twenty minutes earlier."

Here, being nearer the moor-edge, the air was clearer, and he could see some way. But no Phyllys was visible.

She could not so far have distanced him. The consciousness came upon him strongly. No girl, even with the start she had had, could have failed to be overtaken by him at the pace he had come. With a sickening sense of dread, he realised that she was still upon the moors, that she had left the track, that she was lost in the fog.

"Nonsense!" he said, pulling himself together. "Too soon to be sure. She is very active; she may have come faster than I imagine; or she may have missed the track, and be waiting near till somebody comes."

He turned and retraced his steps. If indeed she had advanced so far as this, she was all right, and would easily make her way home. His business now was to make sure that she had not failed to do so; and even while he encouraged himself his heart failed him anew.

To be lost on the moor in a dense fog! Too well he knew what that might mean. Fifty men, searching for her, might search in vain while it lasted.

Walking now more slowly, he called at intervals in his strong bass voice, betweenwhiles listening intently, with the hope that she might respond.

No sound, no whisper, reached his ears. It was deadly still. As he went farther up, the fog again grew dense—more dense even than before, since the afternoon was far advanced. The dank white curtain closed him in on all sides.

He made up his mind to return most of the way, shouting at regular intervals, for the chance that she might be within earshot. Then he would again traverse the path to Midfell, and would see whether happily she had reached home. If not, a party of men, including himself, would scour the moors until she should be found.

For this, those who knew the moors were necessary. To leave the track now by himself, with nothing to guide him as to her whereabouts, would only mean losing himself also, and being powerless to help her.

Yet if indeed she were here, alone on these desolate moors!—the very idea of leaving her thus, were it but for an hour, was all but unendurable.

He felt this keenly, as he paced the track, raising monotonously his cry of "Phyllys! Phyllys! Are you there, Phyllys?"

How familiar, how dear the name seemed! He could hardly believe that ten days earlier she had been nothing to him or he to her. Was he anything to her now? Perhaps not—yet. She had appeared ready to like him as a cousin, as a friend. He glanced the notion in the face, and put it from him. Phyllys and he would not in the end be "friends" only. They would be much more or much less.

On the lonely fell, deserted and fog-robed, he seemed to be growing intimate with her, to be learning to know her, as he might not have learnt in weeks of common acquaintance. He was shut out from all the world besides by a dank enclosing curtain. But not from Phyllys, for she too was here. Though apart, they were together, both out on the wild moor, she needing him, he bent on helping her. He did not now say that "perhaps" she was there. It had grown to be a certainty.

Were their spirits in touch, though bodily they were separate? He was not an imaginative or a sentimental man. But looking at the white wall, he saw her face vividly—not smiling or mischievous; full of distress, imploring him to go to her.

He made a forward start, and stopped, half distracted. She was on the moor. She was lost. And how was he to know which way would take him to her?

"Phyllys! Phyllys!" again he shouted, with the full strength of his powerful lungs.

Something clammy touched his hand.

"Wiggles!" he exclaimed, with an immense revulsion of joy. Where Wiggles was, Phyllys could not be far off. She might be very near, yet invisible.

"Where is she, Wiggles? Phyllys, where are you?"

No human voice made reply. Wiggles whined, jumping on him, licking his hand, and taking hold of his trousers.

"Where is she, Wiggles?" he asked, every nerve in him tense with dread. There could no longer be any question but that she was on the fells. She would not have left Wiggles behind. That Wiggles should have left her seemed singular; but Giles was not intimate with Wiggles' ways. He might be a dog prone to wander. He might—this flashed up as a possibility, when Wiggles again laid hold upon his trouser—have come to find help for Phyllys.

"You must take me to her, Wiggles," he said, gravely addressing the dog as he might have addressed a child. He stooped low, bringing his gaze to bear on the dog, who wagged an uneasy tail. He drew a cord from his pocket, and passed it through the collar.

"Now lead," he said authoritatively.

Wiggles seemed uncertain what to do. He sniffed the air, and whined afresh. Was it that he did not know Phyllys's whereabouts? Or was it that he was stupid? Many affectionate little dogs are not brilliant in an emergency.

Giles put matters to the test. He set off at a resolute pace, as if for Midfell.

That settled it. Wiggles refused to go. He struggled, protested, howled, and sat down. He might be dragged, but he would not walk. Giles ceased to pull, and Wiggles moved in a new direction, gaining confidence and speed as he found that Giles went with him. He led away from the track, straight across the turf, and Giles followed, urging the dog on, trying also to keep note of his bearings, though without much success. That troubled him little. If he could reach Phyllys, all else was of small importance.

"Phyllys! Phyllys!" he called again.

And out of the dead stillness, the blank whiteness, rang an agonised cry. He knew the voice.

"Phyllys, I'm here! Where are you?" he shouted.

"Oh, save me! save me!" she screamed, her bell-like tones for once thin and shrill with horror.

He dashed headlong in the direction from which the sound travelled.

CHAPTER VII.

OF MR. DUGDALE'S OUTSPOKENNESS

ABOUT a mile and a half from the pretty village of Castlemere flourished a country town of some pretensions, Market Oakley by name; and just outside Market Oakley stood Brook-End Grange, the home of Mr. Dugdale's daughter, Kathleen Alyn, a young widow with one child.

She stood on the lawn motionless, her gown flowing round her in a fashion peculiar to herself. Whatever she wore flowed, and did not hang or drag. The gown was perfect in make, and her soft hair was perfect in arrangement.

Mr. Dugdale and Mrs. Keith were walking up the path, the former, as usual, bland, neat, precise; the latter somewhat excited.

"How do you do, Kathleen? I have left the carriage outside. Your father was just coming in, so I got out to walk with him."

"And I've been giving a word of advice to Mrs. Keith about Colin's modelling."

"Messing about with wet clay!" impatiently interjected Mrs. Keith. "Such ridiculous nonsense! Four huge packing-cases have come from Italy, with casts that he bought there. I can't imagine what first put the notion into his head."

"Nature," spoke Mr. Dugdale at her side. "It is inborn."

She turned with a sharp nervous movement of her hands, as if repudiating something.

"I never had the smallest taste that way. Nor any of my family, or of my husband's."

"That may be. Sometimes a genius is a family freak—not to be accounted for by ordinary rules of heredity. No doubt traceable, if one had the means of tracing it, to some distant progenitor. Under present circumstances you ought to be thankful for Colin's gift, no matter how he came by it."

She asked: "Why?" her fine eyes going swiftly to his face, as if in search for some submeaning. She was a far handsomer woman than Kathleen Alyn; yet the greater charm resided with the younger of the two. There was a lack of repose in Mrs. Keith which spoilt her. She seemed to be perpetually on the watch for something to controvert, perpetually expectant of something with which she could not agree.

"At the least it is a harmless occupation, and he needs something to do. Desk-work, of course, is out of the question."

"I don't see it, now he is stronger. Besides——" She stopped, and clenched and unclenched her hand.

"He will never be strong enough for tough head-work. I don't mean strength in the muscular sense. His brain wouldn't stand the tension. You were going to say—Besides, what?"

"There is no need that he should work."

"I don't agree with you. No self-respecting man will consent to be a burden on another."

"Colin is not a burden." Her eyes flashed resentfully. "It is Giles's delight to give him a home."

Kathleen made little danger signals from behind Mrs. Keith, but Mr. Dugdale failed to read them. Although himself a man prone to take offence, he was very apt to say the wrong thing, thereby giving offence to others, and he never could imagine why any offence was taken.

"My dear lady, it may be Giles's delight to support half the neighbourhood. He is generously disposed. But half the neighbourhood has no right to be supported by him. Neither has Colin. The two are not even related. And if they were, I should still say he ought to work for himself—Eh, Kathleen? Yes?"

Mrs. Keith drew up a haughty head.

"I suppose you consider me to be living on charity too," she said coldly. "Certainly not. That is different," Mr. Dugdale interposed; but she went on, refusing to listen. "I am extremely obliged! All those years that I practically lived for Giles do not count. Not in the least. Good-bye, Kathleen. It is later than I thought. I must go on."

"That settled it—Wiggles refused to go"—p. 791.

Mrs. Alyn made no protest. She signed to her father to remain where he was, slipped an affectionate arm within Mrs. Keith's, and walked with her down the carriage-drive, passing out of sight. Presently she returned, moving in her slow and graceful fashion, a slight smile on her lips.

"Now you have put your foot in it, father," she said, with mild reproach.

"Eh? Have I? My dear, I merely spoke the truth. I merely suggested what everybody is saying behind her back. Colin ought to be doing something. I should have thought, with her proud nature—Proud! Yes, a pikestaff isn't in it beside her!—I should have thought she would be charmed at the prospect of Colin making his own way in life. I'd have staked my credit on that view of the question as hers. But not a bit of it. All she wants, apparently, is to keep her son in blissful idleness, and to let Giles pay his way for him ad infinitum. Can't understand it, for my part. I imagined I knew something of women. But they are a riddle and a delusion to the end of the chapter."

He spread forth deprecating hands; then made a new start:

"'Practically lived for Giles!' Nonsense! She lived for herself and Colin. Took care of Giles by the way, and was very well paid for it too. The allowance made to her by James Randolph was absurd! It has been a paying concern for Mrs. Keith from first to last."

"At any rate, she did her best for Giles."

"Mrs. Keith knows on which side of her bread lies the butter. I don't blame her for that. There are advantages in worldly wisdom—for its possessor. But when she talks in the high-falutin' style of all she has done, as if, forsooth, she were the family benefactor, and Giles her humble debtor—no, I can't stand that. Some day I shall speak out what I think."

"You never did appreciate Mrs. Keith. She really is a very fascinating woman. And as for Giles—all one can feel is that her devotion to him has made her at times almost unfair to her own son. I suppose she has reasoned that, since he is her own, no question can ever arise as to the reality of her affection for him, while that for Giles has to be shown."

"She has had an object all through, unquestionably. Mrs. Keith does nothing without a definite object. She is not a prey to mere whims," declared Mr. Dugdale. Then he turned to inspect a large hairy caterpillar, reposing on the grubby palm of his little grandson Gordon.

Mrs. Keith, driving to the station bookstall and home, smoothed her ruffled plumage as best she might. Mr. Dugdale had a knack of ruffling her, sometimes intentionally, sometimes by accident. He and she often fretted each the other.

When Giles's mother died, and he was given over into the care of Mrs. Keith, a young newly-made widow with one baby-boy, Mr. Randolph undertook to pay her, so long as she should have charge of his child, a yearly income of five hundred pounds. On the death, soon after, of the father, the boy's guardian continued the payment; and Giles himself, since coming of age, although she could no longer be reckoned in "charge" of him, had made her the same allowance. These facts were known to Mr. Dugdale, and Mrs. Keith knew it.

She did not really suspect him in this instance of having meant unkindness, of having even referred to her allowance. She had lost her temper because his manner ruffled, her and because she saw things as regarded Colin from a totally different point of view from his—a point of view transformed by certain facts, of which he was in complete ignorance. But since the last thing she could ever have desired would have been to place him at her own point of view, her anger was unreasonable. Reviewing the past scene, she recognised this fact and regained her self-control, which was considerable, though subject under stress to abrupt lapses.

Vexed though she had been, she knew that Mr. Dugdale had only "voiced" what everybody would think. In almost any case a young man should endeavour to make his own way in life; not to be dependent upon another. She had been unwise to set up opposition. Mr. Dugdale did not know those circumstances, which, had he been aware of them, would have put a different complexion on the whole question. He never would know them, she said to herself, with a resolute closing of her lips. And, of course, she too wished Colin to do something, to find some pursuit, even though she knew that it was Giles's greatest pleasure to provide for him!

Some pursuit. Only—not modelling! not sculpture! Anything else, rather!

CHAPTER VIII.

OF A MOORLAND DEATH-TRAP.

PHYLLYS could hardly be termed obstinate; still, she had a preference for carrying out her intentions; and though on her way to Thacker's Farm she saw a thickness clothing the fells, it made no great impression on her mind, which, indeed, was much pre-occupied. From morning to night at this time she thought of little but the promised visit to Castle Hill.

After a hearty tea and a gay chat with the farmer and his wife, she was off, having said good-bye to the old pair indoors. Rather by a mechanical movement than of deliberate intent, she turned towards the moor, carrying over one shoulder the heavy shawl.

Not till she was actually upon the lower slope of the fell did she note the grey pall which hid the heights above. As yet she touched only the dragging fringes of that pall; but she had to ascend, following the grass track, and it was now getting on for five o'clock. She knew that the fog would thicken as the evening advanced.

But as Giles had said, she was fearless. She found the shawl heavy, and she would have to retrace her steps to the farm before beginning upon the long round by the road. What did a little mist signify? She had only to keep to the track, and when she reached the other side, in descending towards Midfell, she would soon leave it behind.

Having once decided, she pressed forward, not again raising the question, only rather surprised to find how much farther the way seemed in fog than in sunlight.

Still, she was on the path, and it was all right.

No view could be seen, though the fog was at first not so dense as when, somewhat later, Giles turned back to retrace his steps It was quite dense enough to be unpleasant, and more than once she regretted not having gone home by the road.

She met no human being, and heard no sound of any voice except her own. Occasional dim outlines of small bushes dawned upon her as she advanced, and disappeared again. She walked quickly, and presently, growing used to the gloom, she fell into a prolonged muse upon the coming delights of Castle Hill.

Giles would be there, and to know more of Giles would be charming. She liked him immensely. He was so kind and cousinly; just the sort of friend she wanted; caring for the things she cared for ; ready to hear, and prompt to understand, whatever she chose to say. Then there would be Mrs. Keith and Colin, about both of whom she was curious. She might not like Colin so well as Giles ; still, the very fact that Giles thought much of him proved that there must be some good in Colin. About Mrs. Keith she was more doubtful. Giles had been reserved and cautious, but Phyllys was keen-sighted, and she had detected a nameless something in Giles's manner when Mrs. Keith's name came up, which suggested a lack of admiration for her.

However, she had wanted Phyllys to go to Castle Hill, and for this Phyllys would be ever grateful.

It would be such a change—such an escape ! She would be in a new world. She would be free to see with her own eyes, to hear with her own ears, to form her own ideas, to observe, to learn, to feel, without the home-trammels. She would be no longer in a stiff little groove, where everybody was expected to think precisely the same as everybody else, under penalty of severe condemnation.

How dense the fog was growing ! Absorbed in her own thoughts, her bright anticipations, she had not for some time noted surroundings particularly, but had followed the track in a mechanical fashion. Now she began to realise that it was time for her to have reached the brow of the fells, where the air ought to grow clearer.

Wiggles drew her attention. He was keeping close to heel, not running freely about as was his wont ; and when she looked back, he sat down, as if reluctant to go farther.

" Why, Wiggles—you are not tired ? "

She went on a few paces, and he followed as before, then again stopped and sat down, with a slight whine.

Phyllys knew that in keeping to the track she was all right, fog or no fog. She had but to go on. But a doubt assailed her. This was the track, of course—this shadowy faint line upon the grass by which she had been guided ? She bent to look at it more closely, and stood up, grave in face.

It was not the right track. She knew that instantly. This, at most, was no more than a sheep-track, probably leading towards the top of the fell. In sheer absence of mind she must have quitted the path which went to Midfell—perhaps at one of the rocky breaks occurring at intervals—and have turned along another instead. But for the confusing state of the atmosphere and the preoccupation of her mind, she could not have failed to discover her mistake earlier, if, indeed, she could have made it.

Vexed at her own carelessness, she began hurriedly to retrace her steps, following the feeble little line. In no long time she was brought to a standstill. The track died out, and she searched in vain for a continuation of it. The ground here was stony, and doubtless a continuation did exist, but she failed to find what she sought.

Phyllys kept her head. She stood motionless, trying to realise where she was, striving to grasp her situation.

No easy matter, to the most experienced man, in such a fog, all landmarks near and distant being blotted out. She did not understand the full extent of the difficulty, or of the risks involved. Had she done so, she would less easily have persuaded herself that she could succeed. If only she had felt more afraid, she might have let Wiggles act as her guide, and might then have regained the lost track. But she was naturally independent and confident, and the idea did not so much as occur to her.

Wiggles, apparently satisfied that she was no longer aiming for the summit of the fell, awaited her pleasure.

" All right," she said cheerfully aloud, having, after a short cogitation, made up her mind whereabouts she stood. She pictured to herself the way that she had—that she must have—come. She placed the hills mentally, localised Midfell, and decided which direction to pursue. Then she started off briskly, and Wiggles followed, consenting to be led, as she did not appeal to him. He hung back still, keeping close, yet half-stopping often, as if not happy.

No sign of the vanished track appeared, but she went on in good spirits, fully convinced that she was nearing the ridge behind Midfell, expecting each minute to find the path which she supposed to lie between it and her. According to her reasoning this was a practical certainty. If the top of the fell lay there, and the village of Midfell there, then the track passing along the hillside must cut across somewhere just in front of her.

She failed to guage the momentous character of that small word " if."

That she should have absolutely lost count of the true positions of hilltop and of village ; that north and south and east and west should be all as one to her consciousness ; that in the fog she should not know whether she was going uphill or downhill, or on the level ; that when she supposed herself to be following a straight line forward, she was in reality describing a half-circle, which brought her, indeed, within half-a-mile of the lost track, but in a totally unexpected position, and to a part of the fell which, beyond all others, ought to have been avoided—all this was far from her imagination.

It did occur to her as curious that the fog should thicken, instead of becoming less dense as she—according to her belief—neared the moor-edge. But the rapid advance of evening might account for this. The track must now be very close, and she hurried on at a good pace, despite the enveloping fog, which with its clammy touch made her shiver. The heavy shawl still hung in thick folds over her left shoulder. She lifted the front folds, and flung them over her right shoulder for warmth.

No sign yet of the track. She was growing anxious, and because she was anxious and would not give in to the feeling, she hurried on yet more recklessly.

Ah! here was a bit of "soft" ground. "I must keep clear of that," she thought, being well-used to boggy patches on the moors. Many a time she had crossed them, springing from root to root of heather, avoiding deftly the insecure parts between.

A yelp from Wiggles made her glance round. Nose in air, he had been sniffing; and in a moment he was off, full pelt, regardless of her recall. Probably he knew that it was an occasion when disobedience became a duty.

Phyllys hesitated, but she could not follow him, for he was out of sight, swallowed up in the white curtain. She supposed that he had caught sight of some small wild creature, and had started in chase. He would be back in a few minutes, and would find her without fail.

She scanned her limited circle of visibility. In front and to her right lay an expanse of green—bright green, so far as anything could be bright in such an atmosphere. It was mottled with red and yellow, variegated moss-hues, and dotted by occasional tufts of rushes. Here and there grew the white-tufted cotton-grass, and wiry bog-grass of an olive-green, with red tintings, might be seen in abundance. Despite the dulling fog, these colours, which in sunshine would have been ominously brilliant, suggested to her a need for caution.

She could not see far. She did not recognise or suspect that this was no mere shallow patch of boggy soil; that a wide reach of treacherous slime, with only a thin outer coating of moss and grass, a death-trap for the unwary, lay partly around her, within reach of her foot. On a clear day, and with a less pre-occupied mind, she would have read tokens of her peril in the very brightness of colouring, which alike concealed and revealed the deadly danger. But though she had been in sunshine to this place, and had been warned of the trap which that fair surface offered, she never dreamt, in her girlish confidence and amid the bewildering fog, that she had wandered unknowingly to its verge.

It was just a bit of "saft" ground, as they call it in Scotland, and she was not troubled. She went on again, even more swiftly than before, eager to cross it, and then to wait for Wiggles. One moment later she would have heard Giles' voice shouting—but——

A false step suddenly, and she plunged in; deep over both ankles. It took her by surprise. The effort to save herself might have proved successful had she been going cautiously. But the impetus of her run made it impossible to stop; and as she tried to leap to what looked like a firm spot, she caught her foot in a slight tangle of rushes.

She fell far forward spread-eagle fashion, sliding on with the struggle to save herself, down into the horrible slimy bog, which yielded beneath her.

Phyllys was a girl of high courage, not readily frightened; but in that moment, in the terrible helplessness and sinking, the soft sucking sticky grip upon her limbs, and the sense of nothing to cling to, nothing to hold by, nothing to pull against, brought a sickening agony of terror.

CHAPTER IX.

OF DIREFUL REALISATIONS.

SHE knew what it meant. Thought at such a time is rapid; and as she went down, as she slid forward, as she felt the horrible black slime rising around her, she knew that she was in a quaking bog, that bog upon the fell against which she had been often warned; that bog which, had she been questioned one minute sooner, she would have averred to be at least half-a-mile away, in the most unfrequented part of the moor.

And she was in it, lying face downward upon its treacherous surface; the bright deceptive green moss giving way like paper under her weight; the dark half-liquid peat covering her limbs.

Had this been winter, had the accident happened after any spell of heavy rain, no hope for Phyllys could have existed. At such seasons the whole swamp was a lake of foul liquid mud, in which she would have sunk as in water; and from the first plunge nothing more would have been seen or heard of the hapless girl. Strong men, lost on the moors after dark, had met their end thus; and as Phyllys fell she remembered the last—a traveller who had inadvertently leaped upon the green smooth surface, and had disappeared from sight.

But the weather lately had been dry, and the peat-mud was in a semi-liquid, tenacious condition, capable of bearing up a prone body for at least several minutes.

One other pressing peril was met. Phyllys, falling thus forward, might have met with immediate suffocation, but that her heavy shawl, thrown from the front over both shoulders, had dropped upon the bog outspread just below her face, guarding nose and mouth from the smothering grip of the mud.

At the first moment, as she realised what had occurred, she fought wildly, desperately, to escape. But she had gone too far, sliding beyond reach of firm ground, and she had nothing to hold by. She was powerless to drag her feet from the gripping black stuff. She had nothing to grasp, nothing which would give her a purchase, and each effort only sent her deeper. It seemed to her that she was being slowly and surely dragged under.

She tried to shriek for help, but her voice was gone. Breath and strength failed with the horror of her position. Again she struggled to raise herself, and again she sank lower. She knew then that her only hope lay in keeping still.

As she lay, prone and helpless, every nerve was alive, every faculty wide-awake. Thoughts flashed like lightning, one upon another. She strove to be calm, to pray for help. She knew that death meant life beyond, and she was conscious of a definite clinging to the One Great Name, which alone has power in man's last extremity. She tried to think of re-union with the father and mother whom she loved. But she was so young; and life in this world held much of promise; and she shrank from such a passage as this. Suffocation, alone in a horrible bog, mantled over by the white fog-pall, was ghastly.

"O God, save me! save! save!" she panted.

A shout reached her ears. Somebody was coming. She tried to call in answer, and it seemed to her that her voice went no distance. If she could keep up till help came! But the slime was creeping higher. Soon the shawl would be sucked under; and then the mud would reach her lips; and then—nobody would know what had become of her.

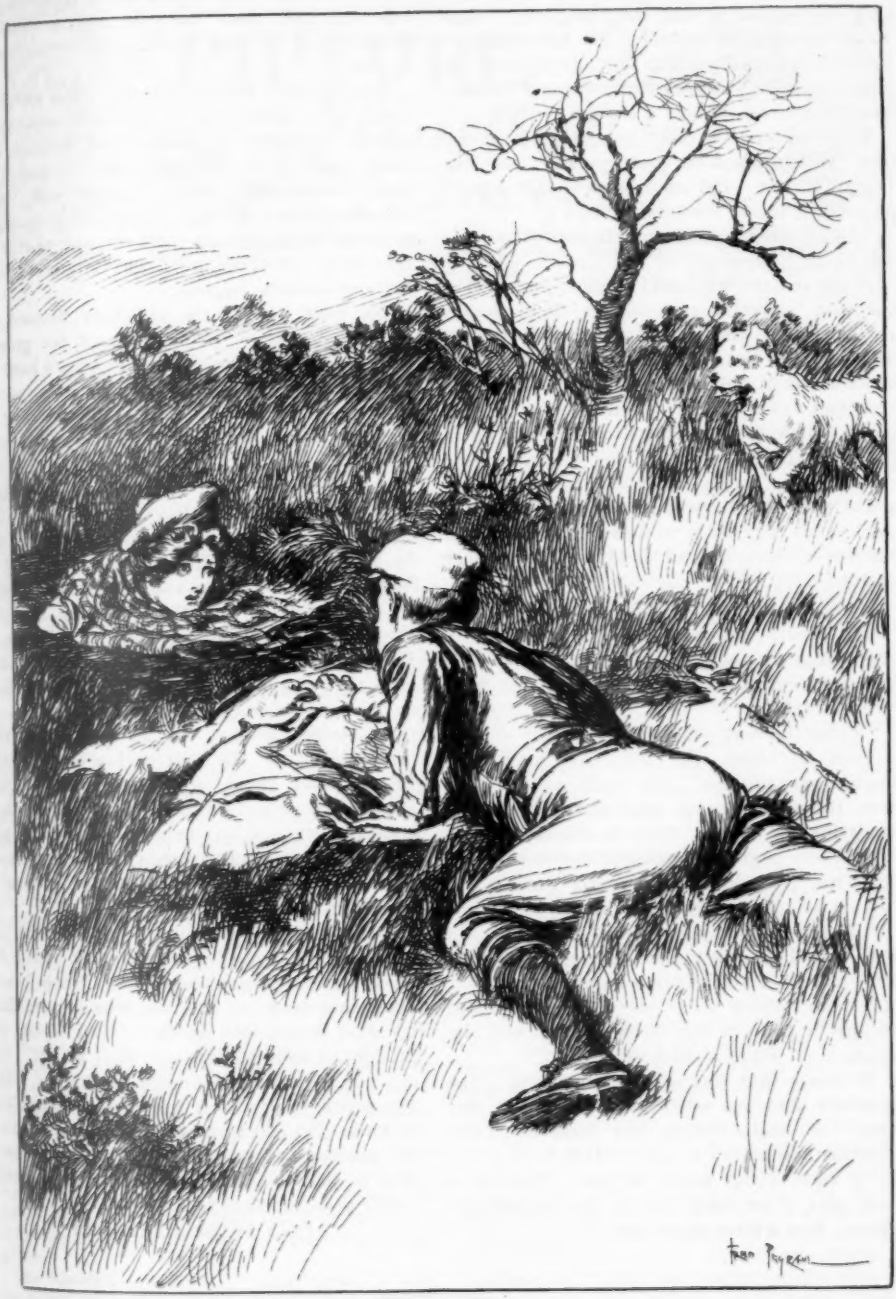
Would Giles be sorry? She thought so, and she sobbed a little. It was so chill and desolate lying there, with nobody to help, not even Wiggles to look on. The man whose voice she had heard must have passed on. It seemed hours since the sound had reached her. Had she been told that not five minutes had elapsed since her fall she would have counted the words wild.

The voice again! It roused her from despair. She called in response: "O come! O save me!"—for a slight effort to look round sent her deeper, and the mud began to pour in a slow stream over the shawl.

Led by Wiggles, Giles was aiming straight for the swamp, and suddenly Phyllys recognised his voice. Her courage revived. If anybody could save her, Giles could.

"Where are you?" he was calling.

"In the bog. Take care! Don't get in too!" she cried.



He had to approach with care, but soon he made her out dimly, lying nearly submerged, only the head and shoulders visible above the dark surface, her face supported by the shawl, already partly sucked under.

Had he not been compelled to give his whole mind to the problem of rescue, the horror of her position would have overwhelmed him. He realised to the full how awfully critical it was, how great was the need for instant action. But he also realised that to rush recklessly in, to get himself submerged, would be fatal for her.

"Keep still! Don't move!" he urged. "I'll have you out. Don't be afraid."

He measured the space between with his eyes, and tested the boggy earth with his stout stick, to find some spot which would bear his weight. Whatever he felt inwardly, he was composed outwardly; and she now made no sound, but lay motionless on her loathsome bed, waiting. The white brave face went to his heart.

Two or three steps, taken in a direct line, would have brought him within reach of her; but those steps were impossible. He had to look elsewhere. A few feet farther on he found a narrow tongue of firm ground jutting some little way into the bog, and this brought him, slowly and with care, closer to where she lay.

"'Keep still, and trust yourself to me'"—p. 798.

Not yet within touch; but so near that a single long step would do the business. He sought vainly for standing-ground. She was sinking—visibly—and his dread was that any moment she might go under. Few though the moments were since his arrival, he saw a change.

The mud here was drier, less soft than farther out. He pulled off his coat, spread it upon the boggy surface, and went down full length, creeping gingerly towards Phyllys.

"Don't struggle. Keep still, and trust yourself to me," he said.

Never in after-life could Phyllys forget what the first powerful grip of his hand meant to her, after the past interminable horror. She obeyed him, and did not struggle—at what a cost of will she alone knew. For still the slime was all around, and during one terrible moment it seemed to her that Giles was going down into it, that her last hope was vanishing.

But slowly, gently, he drew her towards himself; then, with exceeding caution, he somehow worked his way back to firmer ground, where his feet rested; and as he went he pulled her with him.

He was on it at last, kneeling, deep sunk in "saft" earth, but not drawn under; and he still had grip of her. Another moment and he had regained his feet; another, and they were on firm turf.

"Come this way—farther," he said.

Then he stood still, breathing hard, and Phyllys said nothing. She could not speak at first, the awfulness of what she had escaped rendering her dumb. She was a mass of black mud, every part of her except the head; and Giles was partially clothed in the same. But neither had yet begun to think of appearances.

"Thank God, I was in time!" he at length said, and the break in his voice made her look up. She wondered at his paleness.

"I can't thank you," she tried to say, and because a lump in her throat choked her, she laughed. "What a state we are in!"

He knew that this was not lightness. She trembled, and was ashen white. "'Come this way," he said, leading her farther. "The question now is how to get to Midfell."

"I know about where we are. There is a path near, if we could find it, leading straight there. And a farm on the way."

"Where we may make ourselves presentable. A good plan. Suppose you try to make Wiggles act as our guide. He brought me to you."

This proved a diversion, and she was soon her usual self, except for a touch of unwonted gravity. Wiggles again showed himself reliable, and in no long time they reached the farm, where they gladly parted with their encasing masses of mud. A man was despatched to bring clean clothing for both, and to relieve the minds of those at Burn Cottage, where extreme anxiety reigned.

On their arrival the old lady listened in agitated gratitude to the tale of her grandchild's narrow escape. She held Giles's hand in her withered palm, tears in her eyes, words faltering on her lips. She folded her darling in a close embrace, and prayed and wept over her. Phyllys too was in tears, realising how dear the old grandmother was to her, despite former rubs and misunderstandings.

This event put the presence of Giles at Midfell on a new footing. The cousin to whom Mrs. Wyverne owed Phyllys's life could not be held at arm's length. He had earned a right to come in and out as often as he chose. For once, Barbara was powerless to move the old lady. Her thankful joy was too deep not to find expression.

So during the week that he remained at the inn Giles made the best of his opportunity. He contrived to see a great deal of Phyllys. He and she walked together and talked together endlessly, though in such talks hers was the lion's share, and he acted chiefly the part of charmed listener. He was not at any time a man of many words.

Those days of close intercourse settled the question for him. Before the week ended, he loved Phyllys, loved her with his whole heart, knew that he loved her, and was assured that he never would love another. But he had no thought of showing in haste what he felt. He did not yet make it known to Phyllys. His attentions to her were simple and cousin-like in kind. So guarded was his manner that no one guessed the true state of things. He knew that he had to win her, and that the winning might prove no easy task.

Scripture Illustrations & Anecdotes

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

JUNE 19TH.—Christ Risen.

Passage for reading—St. Matt. xxviii. 1—15.

POINTS. 1. The devotion of the holy women.
2. Their worship of the risen Saviour.
3. Their joyful message to the disciples.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Following Love. It is told in the annals of the Ottoman Empire that when Amurath II. died suddenly, his son and destined successor, Mohammed, was about a day's journey distant in Asia Minor. Every day of interregnum in that fierce and turbulent monarchy is attended with peril. The death of the Sultan was therefore concealed, and a secret message was despatched to the prince to hasten at once to the capital. On receiving the message, he leaped on a powerful Arab horse, and turning to his attendants, said: "Let him who loves me follow." This prince afterwards became one of the most powerful sovereigns. He had a numerous following of loving and devoted friends. And they who showed their courage and loyalty by following him in this critical moment of his fortunes were magnificently rewarded. "If any man serve Me, him shall My Father honour."

Worship of Christ the King. A celebrated minister of the Gospel was preaching on the offices of Christ, Whom he presented to the congregation as Prophet and Priest, and then as the King of saints. He marshalled patriarchs and kings, prophets and apostles and martyrs of every age to place the insignia of royalty upon the head of the King of Kings. The audience was wrought up to the highest pitch of excitement, and, as if waiting to hear the anthem peal out the coronation hymn, the preacher commenced singing, "All hail the power of Jesus' Name!" The people, rising as one man, sang the hymn as perhaps it never was sung before.

The Foundation of Hope. "Gentlemen," said the dying Dr. McCall to his medical attendants, "I am no fanatic, but I wish to say this, which I hope you will forgive me for uttering in your presence. I am a great sinner, and have been a great sinner, but my trust for pardon is entirely in Jesus Christ, 'Who died for our sins and rose again for our justification.' Upon this as the foundation of my hope I can confidently rely now that I am sinking into eternity." This is the word which by the Gospel is preached.

JUNE 26TH.—Christ's Farewell to His Disciples.

Passage for reading—St. Mark xvi. 15—20.

POINTS. 1. Christ meets and instructs His disciples.
2. Charges them to preach to all nations.
3. Promises His presence and help.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Instructions Repeated. It is said that the mother of John Wesley was obliged to tell her son the same thing over many times. One day his father inquired why she told the boy the same thing over and over again, nineteen or twenty times, since he failed so continually to remember it. Her patient reply was, "Perhaps he will remember it the twentieth time." Christ many times gave the same command to His disciples. "Go out and compel them to come in." "Make disciples of all nations." They fully grasped the idea after the martyrdom of Stephen, and went everywhere preaching the Word.

Work of Missions. I have seen men work in the stone quarries of Wales. A miner is suspended by a rope half-way down the side of the quarry. There he begins boring a hole in the rock, and after much care and toil and time in boring the hole to a sufficient depth, I have seen him fill it with black dust, and if I did not know what power was lodged in that dust, I should say, "How foolish to bore a hole and then fill it up again!" But I know that that black dust is powder with wonderful explosive power in it. And when he has applied his fuse and lighted his match, he flees to a distance by climbing up the rope again. That is what our missionaries are doing among the rocks of heathenism. They are preparing the way for the power of the Gospel. They are cutting a hole into the very rock of heathendom and filling it up with the powder of Divine truth.

What is wanted is fire from heaven to touch it. And God is doing this. He is preparing the people by His messengers.

Presence of Christ. When the Duke of Wellington on one occasion rode up to his retreating army, a soldier cried out: "There is the Duke, God bless him!" and the army nerved itself afresh and went forward and drove the enemy away. Christ, unseen, is always at the head of His army. We know He is there, and He inspires us to meet the foe. In every place where His soldiers are ready to march against the enemy, His voice sounds, "Onward, onward," even to the end of the world.

JULY 3RD.—The Kingdom Divided

Passage for reading—1 Kings xii. 12—20.

POINTS. 1. The King's overbearing spirit.
2. The design of the Lord fulfilled
3. The revolt of the ten tribes.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Arrogance. "You tell me that I ought to bow down to the civil power, that I ought to submit to the King of Italy, and that from him I am to receive instructions as to the way I should exercise the civil power. I say that I am liberated from all civil subjection, that God hath made me the subject of no one on earth, king or otherwise; that in His right I am sovereign. I acknowledge no civil superior. I am the subject of no prince, and I claim to be more than this. I claim to be the supreme judge and director of the consciences of men; of the peasant that tills the ground, and the princes that surround the throne; of the household that lives in the shade of privacy, and the legislature that makes laws. I am the sole, supreme judge of right and wrong." So spake a recent occupant of the Papal Chair of Rome.

Providence and Man's Greed. I remember that terrible accident which occurred on the Thames a few years ago—the sinking of the Princess Alice steamer. It appalled everyone, and was called "a mysterious providence." It was said in the newspapers at the time that when the collision took place the boat "cracked and crumbled like a matchbox." Why did it do so? Not by a special providence, but because it was built like a matchbox—as flimsy and slim. And the providence that ended so fatally was, as usual, not the providence of God, but the reckless greed of man. So Rehoboam, grasping for more money, was allowed by God to lose hold of the greater part of the nation.

Lost from Neglect. A man who had charge of a swing-bridge opened it one day just to oblige a friend, who said there was plenty of time for his boat to go through before the train of cars came along. But a moment after the express train came thundering on, and dashed into the dark waters below. The bridge-keeper, whose neglect had caused the disaster, lost his reason, and has spent the rest of his life in a madhouse. The only words he uttered when the train leaped into the open chasm were, "If I only had," and he has gone on ever since repeating over and over again the vain regret. Surely Rehoboam must have often felt the same after refusing to lessen the taxes.

JULY 10TH.—Jeroboam's Idolatry.

Passage for reading—1 Kings xii. 25—33.

POINTS. THE KING'S DEPARTURE FROM GOD BY
1. Idolatry—the golden calves.
2. Profanity—making himself a priest.
3. Disobedience—appointing his own festivals.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Folly of Idolatry. A missionary in India made a company of Hindoos one day ashamed of their idol-worship by a very simple device. When travelling through the country he came one day upon a number of people waiting near an idol-temple. He went up to them, and, as soon as the doors were opened, went in with them to the temple. Seeing an idol on a pedestal, he walked boldly up to it, held up his hand, and asked for silence: He then put his finger on its eyes and said: "It has eyes, but it cannot see; it has ears, but it cannot hear; it has a nose, but it cannot smell; it has hands, but it cannot handle; it has a mouth, but it cannot speak; neither is there any breath in it!" Instead of being offended, the natives were all surprised and ashamed, and an old Brahmin was so convinced of his folly by what the missionary said, that he cried out: "It has feet, but it cannot run away!" The people raised a shout, and, being ashamed of their stupidity, left the temple and went to their homes.

Obedience Better than Sacrifice. A young brother in a monastery complained to the abbot that only bread and salt had been served on the table for a long time. The abbot went into the kitchen, where he found the cook plaiting mats. "How is this?" exclaimed he. "What is there for dinner to-day?" "Bread and salt," replied the cook. "But the rule," said the abbot, "commands vegetables and soup." "My father," said the cook, "many of the monks deny themselves everything except bread, and it is such a trouble preparing the vegetables and salads, and so disappointing to see them come away from the table almost untouched, when I have spent so much time in getting them ready, that I thought I could employ my time more profitably in making mats." "And, pray how long has the table been without vegetables?" "Some two or three months." "Bring all the mats thou hast made, and show me them." So the cook, with no small pride, produced them, and piled them up before the abbot, who plucked a brand from the fire, and set them all in a blaze. "What?" said he, "withdraw from some of the monks the opportunity of denying themselves, and from those who are sick the necessary delicacies, and from the young their needful food, because it gives thee a little trouble, and because thou didst think to serve God in thine own way?" "To obey is better than sacrifice."

"NO, we haven't any sitting-down job," the superintendent said drily.

"S-s-s-pose ye will have 'fore long?"

"No, I do not think so."

The man shuffled from one foot to the other, looking embarrassed and troubled. He was powerfully built, being fully six feet high and broad and well made in proportion. Evidently he was very strong and muscular. But it was equally evident that his mind was slow; and his speech—perhaps on account of its impediment—was exceedingly difficult for him to enunciate. Twice his lips opened and shut, and his brown, anxious eyes seemed trying to do service for them. The superintendent looked impatient.

"We haven't anything," he repeated shortly.

"Then I'll w-w-w-wait," the man stammered.

The next morning he presented himself again at the office, with the same inquiry, and received the same answer. When the superintendent went out at night he found him sitting on the steps.

"Any op-op-openin' yet?" he asked.

"No."

The next day he did not enter the office, but he was on the steps when the superintendent went out at noon.

"Any y-y-y-yet?" he inquired respectfully.

"No."

By the sixth day it was becoming monotonous. Once each day, morning, noon, or night, the man waited at the steps, his face becoming more troubled and anxious at the curt repetition of the same answer. And on the sixth day after his impatient "No" the superintendent turned to him squarely.

"Look here," he said brusquely, "there's no use in this. Why haven't you gone to work? There's jobs outside."

"Y-y-yes, I know," the man answered; "I'm d-d-d-doin' some of 'em every day."

"Glad to hear it," sarcastically. "Well, I can give you a good steady inside job now, if you want it. But it will be standing up, and hard work. One of the firemen in our boiler room is going to leave, and we need another to fill his place at once. Your shoulders look strong enough to shovel coal ten hours a day. Will you take the job?"

The man shook his head.

"N-n-n-no, I can't," he said. "I d-d-don't want a steady job. You see, it's th-th-th-this——"

But the superintendent had passed on with a short, "Just as you like."

The man stood looking after him with troubled eyes, his lips still moving inaudibly, as though striving to add or explain something.

The next morning he was again at the steps, eager, humble, deprecating, but insistent.

"Ain't they really no ch-ch-ch-chance for a s-s-sittin'-down job," he pleaded.

The superintendent ignored him completely, and before the sentence was finished the office door had opened and shut. The man stood for some moments gazing at it stolidly, then he raised his big, muscular hand and brushed a tear from his cheek.

That noon, when the superintendent went home, his wife met him at the door.

"I've hired a man to clean up the lawn, Henry," she said, "and he's been doing it splendidly, and is just as careful of the flowers and plants as you would be. But he wants to see you about the pruning."

"The pruning! Hadn't you better leave that for me, dear? They are choice trees, you know."

"Yes, I know. But you're so busy, Henry, and it's time such things were done."

"That's so," thoughtfully, "and I couldn't possibly get around to it under several weeks. Work in the office is crowding us now. But I hate to entrust those trees to anyone else."

"This man has done the yard very nicely, and seems to be careful. But you'd better see him yourself. He's out there waiting. It's hard work to talk with him, though, he stammers so."

"Oh, does he?" The superintendent's brows came a little closer together as he went down the steps and around the house toward the back yard. His first thought was to dismiss the man summarily; but as he crossed the lawn and noticed how neatly and intelligently everything had been done, the refuse and litter cleaned out and taken away, and not a plant or shrub disturbed in the operation, his feelings underwent a change. A man who did work like that would doubtless be equally careful with his pruning, and it was time the trees were attended to. But in spite of his satisfaction with the work, his voice was curt when he accosted the man.

"Oh, it's you," he said. "Well, what about this pruning?"

"Do ye w-w-w-want it hard or m-m-moderate?"

"Hard; the trees haven't been cut back for three years. I want the pruning to be as severe as will be safe. For instance, this limb may be cut back to, say, this knot," placing his hand upon the limb in question, "and the rest of the tree proportionately. I want the pruning to put the trees into good shape as well as good condition. Can you do it?"

"I g g-guess so. I've done prunin' afore. But about th-th-th-that sittin'-down job. Ye d-d-d-don't——"

The superintendent was striding back toward the house. "Do the work as well as you can," he called over his shoulder, "and Mrs. Davis will pay you."

When he came home from the mill that night he went directly to the trees. They had been pruned with the care and skill of an expert, and were in the best condition for a strong, healthy growth another year. And their shape was all that could be desired. When he went into the house his face showed his satisfaction.

"Was the pruning all right?" his wife asked.

"Yes; he made a very good job of it."

"I thought it seemed good," she said. "Anyway, I've asked him to come back tomorrow and finish sawing our wood. There's a cord or so of hard oak and ash knots that the boy said were too tough for him. This man is so strong I thought he would be just the one to do them."

Her husband laughed.

"I'm afraid he'll fall short in this job," he said. "He's looking for sitting-down work," and he told her of the man's persistent applications for a job. His wife looked surprised.

"That doesn't sound a bit like his looks and the way he works," she observed.

"Not like to-day's work, I admit; but tomorrow's job will be a better test. Did you pay him?"

"No; he said wait until he was through."

The next night the superintendent returned later than usual. His work had detained him at the office. It would have been dark but for a moon and a clear sky. As he entered the yard he heard the sharp, rasping hiss of a saw gnawing its way through hard wood.

"Your man's still at it," he said to his wife a few minutes later.

"Yes; he's been at it like that all day. You said this morning you'd give him three days to finish the pile, provided he held out that long. Well, he's got it all done now, excepting a stick or two."

"Whew! you don't mean it. The fellow has worked then, certainly."

"Indeed he has. I never saw a man work harder or more steadily. But suppose you go out and pay him, Henry. He must be nearing the last stick."

The superintendent took some money from his pocket, counted part, which he rolled into a wad, and replaced the rest in his pocket. Then he went out. The man was just straightening his shoulders from the last divided knot which lay on the ground in front of the sawhorse.

"Hello! finished, have you?" commended the superintendent heartily. "Well, you've done a big day's work. Now, how much—for the two days, I mean?"

"One d-d-dollar—fifty cents a d-day."

The superintendent threw back his head.

"Oh, pshaw! pshaw!" he exclaimed. "Regular work is worth a dollar and a half a day, and you've put in extra time and extra exertion. Here's four dollars, and you've earned it every cent. I hope you haven't been asking such ridiculous prices at other places."

XUM

"W-well," apologetically, "they wanted to know what I ch-ch-charged, an' I told 'em, an' gener'ly they p-p-p-paid jest what I said. That's what I earned back where I come from."

"H'mph! time you came here, then. But how is it you work like this, and are willing to accept fifty cents a day for your work, and yet refuse a steady job in the mill at good pay that would not be so hard?"

"It's c-c-c-c-cause I can't stay here steady, an' I w-w-wouldn't like inside work nohow. I've always lived out d-d-doors, an' I can't seem to breathe good under cover. 'Sides, I m-may not be here more'n two or three days longer."

The superintendent looked perplexed.

"And yet you beg me for a sitting-down job," he said. "Do you want it for one day or for two days?"

"'T-t-tain't for me," eagerly. "I've b-b-b-been tryin' to tell ye that r-right along, but my p-p-pesky tongue's onreliable, an' ye was always in such a h-hurry, it kept me flustered. L-l-law, sir, I couldn't do no sittin'-down work. I'd d-d-die. I want to be stirrin'. It's for Melissy."

"Can't you come in to dinner now, Henry?" came Mrs. Davis's voice from the door. "Sarah says the things will be getting cold. Perhaps Mr.——" pausing inquiringly.

"B-B-B-Brown, ma'am—M-Moses Brown."

"Thank you. Perhaps you will come in, too."

"Thanky," promptly. "I b-b-b'leeve I will. I'm m-mighty hongry."

As they came in, the superintendent looked at his wife with an odd laugh in his eyes, which she returned. Moses Brown was the least embarrassed of the three. He had accepted the invitation with the same promptness and heartiness that he would have given one at his own home, added to which, perhaps, was a natural desire to see how these people lived. At the table he hesitated only through his infirmity and lack of knowledge, and not through any feeling of inferiority.

"Funny the d-d-different ways people have," he said. "Up my way it's supper 'bout this time; here it's d-d-dinner. I s'pose it's on account o' keepin' l-l-l-later hours. When d'ye have s-s-supper—midnight?"

"No; this is our last meal. But you were going to say something about Melissy. Who is she?"

"My g-gal. She's the odd bird. I've got four, but the others are home b-b-bodies, like me. Melissy's the only one who's got wings."

"And she wants a sitting-down job?"

"Y-yes, sir, for a while, if ye d-d-don't mind." Moses Brown's heavy face had grown animated and eager, and into his wistful eyes had come a sudden appeal. "Ye see, Melissy's s-s-seventeen, an' has been wantin' to do something sence she was t-twelve. She borried a b-book here and there, an' hunted up some old newspapers, an' p-p-p-picked out letters an' words an' learned a l-lot by herself. Then she got set on schoolin', an' began to work an' s-s-save money. She's been pickin' berries an' drivin' c-cattle for stockmen, an' cuttin' wood for 'bout three years now, an' she's s-s-saved forty dollars. Then a wild bull ch-ch-charged her an' smashed her foot."

"Badly?" asked Mrs. Davis, who had become interested.

"Yes'm, p-pretty bad. It was six months ago, an' she c-c-can only jest manage to get round with a stick now." He checked himself, turning to the superintendent hastily. "But she's strong an' spry, an' jest as able as me to work, 'cept for that f-f-f-foot," he added, "an' she's a good deal more willin'. She can do any kind o' work, no m-m-matter how hard, long's it's sittin' down. An' later she'll do better. We ain't no reg'lar d-d-doctor up our way, but we've a man who knows b-b-b-'bout horses an' cattle, an' he said Melissy's foot never w-w-would get so she w-w-wouldn't limp, but that arter another three m-months she could walk without a stick. It won't be so bad then. Course Melissy felt p-p-put out pretty bad at fust; then she heered as how gals could work in a m-m-mill an' make money, an' that some o' the jobs was settin' down. Arter that she kept at me to b-b-bring her, an' at last my wife said I'd better do it to oncet, or Melissy 'd fret herself sick. So I took our w-w-wheelbarrow an' rode her down to the aige o' the village, then she got out an' limped in. She didn't want f-f-folks to see her in the kerridge," grinning. "She's w-w-workin' in the fust house we stopped at, sewin' on clothes for her b-b-board. Melissy couldn't live without doin' s-suthin', an' she couldn't bring herself to spend a c-c-c-cent. Soon's she gets two hundred dollars she's goin' off to a s-s-school. She seen in a p-paper 'bout a place where it costs that."

"Why don't you move your family down here and obtain employment?" asked the superintendent bluntly. "A strong fellow like you ought to be able to support his family and give his daughter an education without her working any. Melissy need not go away. We have good schools right here, both day and evening."

"I rode her down to the village."—p. 803.

"Yes," added his wife with unusual spirit. "It doesn't seem as though you ought to let a lame girl earn her education, Mr. Brown, and you so strong and healthy."

The patient brown eyes of the man looked from one to the other.

"Does s-s-seem that way," he agreed. "But I c-can't stay, an' I can't move down, an' I c-c-can't take no reg'lar job. My wife's ailin' an' has b-b-been so most all her life. I have to carry her from one room to another. I'm afeared she's b-b-b-been havin' a pretty hard time," the habitual look of anxiety returning to his eyes. "None o' the children are b-b-big an' strong enough to do m-much. I thought I'd w-w-wheel Melissy down one day an' get back the n-next, an' here I've b-b-been all this time. But my wife said I m-mustn't go back an' leave Melissy on no account till she was all s-s-settled. She w-wouldn't be satisfied for me to do that, no matter how she needed me."

"Well, why don't you bring your wife down here so you can all be together?" asked the superintendent impatiently. "It doesn't seem to me that you arrange things very judiciously. Your wife would be near a doctor here."

Moses Brown shook his head.

"'Twas a doctor t-t-told her to go," he answered. "I used to be down this way, workin' for a n-n-nurseryman. That's where I learned 'bout p-prunin'. But my wife was ailin', an' a doctor said that if she was t-t-took high up in the hills, in the woods, she might live, but that she couldn't here. I've been t-t-tendin' to her close ever sence, carryin' an' watchin' her, for she's l-l-liable to be bad any minute. I ain't been from her more'n an hour or so at a time in t-t-ten year. I ought to be there right n-now, only she said for me to wait an' settle Melissy."

Mrs. Davis looked at her husband.

"Can't you find some sitting-down job, Henry?" she asked.

He had been thinking, and he smiled an affirmation to her question across the table.

"Yes; I think I can arrange it," he answered. "The Stanton girl is in the finishing room, and she wants to go into the weave shop to learn weaving. I haven't consented to the change because I had no one to take her place. I wouldn't wonder if Melissy could do it all right. It's a job of drawing cloth over rollers," to Moses Brown, "and is very pleasant sitting-down work."

"An' can Melissy h-h-have it?" his eyes shining.

"Yes; I will let her commence in the morning."

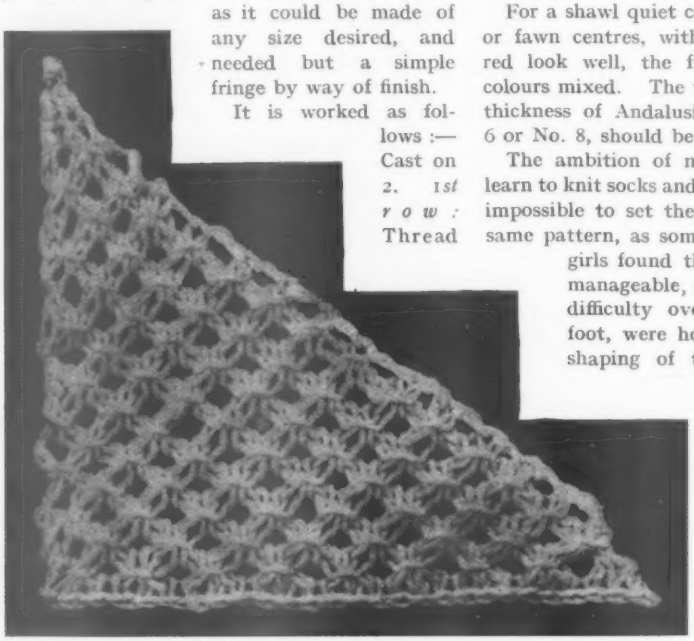
Moses Brown rose quickly.

"Then if ye d-d-don't mind I think I'll be goin'," he said. "My wife must be n-n-needin' me. I'll jest stop an' tell Melissy, an' then hurry on. 'Tain't but t-thirty miles, an' I can get there by mornin'. Ye'll look out for Melissy some?"

"Yes," promised the superintendent, also rising, "and you may tell your wife that she will receive five dollars a week, and that the work will be easy."

"And tell her from me," smiled Mrs. Davis, through misty eyes, "that I will advise Melissy about the schooling, and will get her into some of the evening classes at once."

"Thanky, thanky," huskily; "it's k-k-kind of ye to do so much; but I must be g-g-g-goin' now. I'm in a h-hurry."



As his hasty footsteps sounded around the house and down the walk toward the street, Mrs. Davis turned to her husband.

"He's going to 'tend to his wife," she said softly.

MY DISTRICT KNITTING CLASS.

THE chief difficulty in managing my knitting class arose from the fact that the workers were not all equally expert. Another point that I had to consider was that all the members wished to make some article or other at once; they were not satisfied merely to learn new stitches and patterns. I soon found that even the little ones could be taught to make brightly-coloured reins for gifts for less fortunate mites who spend their days in orphanages and schools. These reins consist merely of a front section of plain knitting hung with bells, which sets across the child's chest and holds the long strips of plain knitting which serve as reins. A little help was wanted with the armpieces, which are made up over cord.

Some of the more skilful workers were able to occupy themselves with making shawls. The three-cornered pattern, of which a detail is given below, proved a universal favourite, as it could be made of any size desired, and needed but a simple fringe by way of finish.

AN EASY PATTERN FOR SHAWLS.

It is worked as follows:—Cast on 2. 1st row: Thread forward, purl 2. 2nd row: Knit 3 plain. 3rd row: Thread forward, purl 3. 4th row: Knit 3, thread forward, knit 1. 5th row: Thread forward, purl the rest. 6th row: (the pattern is now begun): Knit 2 plain, thread forward, knit 3, draw the first of these three over the other two, thread forward, knit 1. All the return rows begin with thread forward, and are simply purled; there is no need to mention them again. 8th row: Knit 4, draw the second of these stitches over the third and fourth, thread forward, knit 3, pass the first over the second and third, thread forward, knit the last stitch plain. 10th row: Like the 6th row, repeating the pattern till only one stitch remains on the left-hand needle; then thread forward, knit 1. 12th row: Like the 8th row, repeating the pattern till only one stitch remains on the left-hand needle; then thread forward, knit 1. The pattern of the whole shawl is made up of the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th rows worked alternately, and the knitting is continued until the shawl is large enough. This pattern is easily kept right because the hole in one row must always set over the middle stitch of the preceding star.

For a shawl quiet colours are best, and grey or fawn centres, with a border of rich dark red look well, the fringe being of the two colours mixed. The wool should be about the thickness of Andalusian, and bone pins, No. 6 or No. 8, should be employed.

The ambition of most of my girls was to learn to knit socks and stockings. It was found impossible to set the whole class to knit the same pattern, as some of my less experienced girls found the four needles quite unmanageable, and others, who made no difficulty over the leg and straight foot, were hopelessly puzzled by the shaping of the heel. The younger members were set to work with two needles only, and they began by knitting the self-fitting or bag socks shown on page 807. These have the leg all in ribbing like a cuff, and the deep toe in plain knitting is gradually decreased to a point.

When sewn up and put on the foot, these socks take shape, and as the wearer's heel comes in a different part of the knitting every time the socks are put on, holes and consequent darning are of comparatively rare occurrence.

For bag socks for a man we cast on 96 stitches with 4-ply wool and needles No. 15.

PORTION OF BAG SOCK.

These, with suitable wool, made excellent bed-socks for invalids. For a child from three to four years of age, the work being done with Andalusian wool and needles No. 17, 76 stitches are required, and lady's stockings of medium size can be made with Rutland yarn and needles No. 14 on a foundation of 104 stitches. Hosiery made in this way requires to be larger and more elastic than when ordinary knitting is used. For two needles the work is done as follows :—1st row : Knit 2 and purl 2 alternately all along. 2nd row : Purl 2 and knit 2 alternately. These two rows are repeated until, for a sock of average size, the leg is about eighteen inches long. The toe is then worked off thus :—1st row : Knit 2 together and knit 6 alternately ; work five rows alternately purl and plain. 7th row : Knit 2 together and knit 5 alternately ; work five rows as before. 13th row : Knit 2 together, and knit 4. Work three rows as before. 17th row : Knit 2 together, knit 3 ; work three rows as before. 21st row : Knit 2 together, knit 2 ; then three rows as before. 25th row : Knit 2 together, knit 1. 26th row : Purl. 27th row : Knit 2 together all round. Cast off and sew up the leg and toe of the sock.

My best workers, to whom the making of cuffs and bed-socks presented no mysteries, wished to knit stockings for their own wear, and I encouraged them as much as possible, for it is pleasant, easy work, that can be done in odd moments, and economical into the bargain, as home-made hose, if well-fitting, are strong and lasting wear. I therefore planned out all our socks and stockings by the Creeve rules, and from experience these proved both simple and satisfactory. These are they, in brief : I. (for top of stocking) : Knit as many rounds as there are stitches cast on. This is exclusive of the ribbed, or hemmed top. II. (or calf) : Divide total number of stitches by 9, and the answer gives the number of narrowings. III. (for ankle) : Knit the same number of rounds as there are stitches on needles after narrowing the calf. IV. (for heel) : Put half the stitches, and one over for seam-stitch, on heel needle. Knit the same number of rows as there are stitches. Narrow till half the stitches on heel needle, exclusive of seam stitch, remain. V. (for instep): In picking up stitches along sides of heel, increase one in every three stitches. Narrow till there is the same number of stitches as before the heel was commenced. VI. (length of foot): Knit as many rounds from heel to toe-narrowings as there were stitches on needles after narrowing at calf. VII. (for toe): Narrow till the third of the stitches remain. Socks we generally ribbed, and this gave us no trouble with the shaping of the legs.

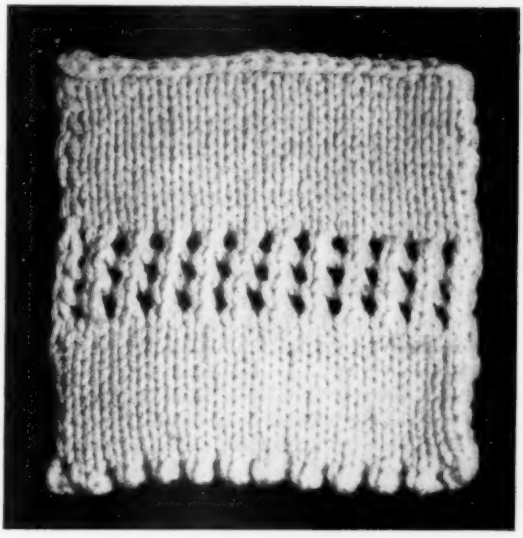
Those workers who were much troubled over the shaping of the heels were correspondingly cheered when I showed them the heel illustrated which is particularly comfortable in wear. Very few knitters are long content with the easiest heel of all, in which the top of the flap is divided on two needles, from which the stitches are knitted off together, thus making a hard and uncomfortable seam.

The better-shaped heel is worked off thus: Having finished the ankle, put half the stitches, the seam stitch in the middle, on to one needle, and knit and purl alternately as many rows as there are stitches on the pins. Leave the rest of the stitches untouched for the present. Then, beginning with a knitted row, knit as far as the seam stitch (the middle stitch on the heel pin), knit it and the next together, knit 1, turn the work, slip 1, purl 2 together, purl 1, turn, slip 1, knit 1, knit 2 together, knit 1, turn, slip 1, purl 2, purl 2 together, purl 1, turn, slip 1, knit 3, knit 2 together, knit 1. Continue this, decreasing in every row by taking together a stitch before and a stitch after the hole made by decreasing in the preceding row, till all the stitches of the heel are worked off. Setting the heel proved so interesting that the little extra trouble it gave was soon forgotten.

The picking up of the stitches down the side offered but small difficulty, for, when the heel had been evenly worked, the stitches to be raised were seen lying down the side like a regular chain. Every third stitch is purled as well as knitted.

OPEN-WORK PATTERN FOR STOCKING



The front of the foot is knitted on the next pin, and on a third as many stitches are picked up and knitted up the second side of the heel flap as were raised down the other side of it. On this third pin half the stitches on the top of the heel are also to be knitted. The rounds now begin from the middle of the back of the foot (or heel); if there is a seam-stitch it must be got rid of by knitting it in with the next stitch. We managed the decreasing for the foot thus:—1st round (1st needle): Knit till 3 stitches remain, knit 2 together, knit 1. 2nd needle: No decrease. 3rd needle: Knit 1, decrease, knit the rest plain. Continue to knit in this way, knitting every other round plain till there are as many stitches left as there were before the heel was begun, and work round and round without any decreasings for the foot.

The toe can be worked off as in the bag sock; but, as stockings and socks are usually made on four needles, the rows between the decreasings must all be plain, no purled rows being made.

Stockings having open-work legs and insteps (see detail above) were very popular amongst our most advanced pupils. The principal difficulty with these—if difficulty it may be called—lay in so learning the pattern that the decreasings down the calf of the leg throw out the stitches as little as possible. This can only be managed by thoroughly understanding the pattern so as to restore the design, as it were, directly after every intake.

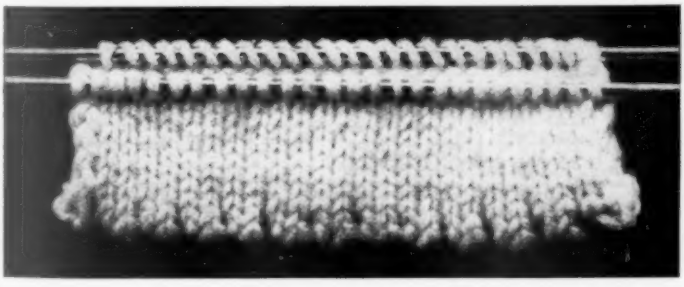
This is one of the prettiest of the open patterns that my workers manage, and it is very easy. After the ribbed top is finished—in such stockings this is better than a hem—work thus :—1st round : Thread forward, knit 1, thread forward, knit 2 together, knit 1, knit 2 together ; repeat all round. This pattern requires a number of stitches divisible by six. 2nd round : Plain. The entire work consists of these two rounds.



DETAIL OF HEM FOR TOP OF STOCKING.

The learner must note that there is a single knitted stitch running down the work, having a hole on each side of it. The wider stripe is made by the " knit 2 together, knit 1, knit 2 together " of the above directions.

The favourite hem top is that shown finished above and in process of making. below. For this an even number of stitches is required, so the seam stitch should not be raised until after the hem is completed. The first few rounds are knitted plain, the number depending upon the width of hem required ; from nine to eleven rounds are usually made. For the next round thread forward and knit 2 together ; continue thus all round. Now knit as many plain rounds as were made at the beginning:—Take some extra pins, and with them pick up each of the cast-on stitches in turn ; fold up this part of the work so that it lies against and at the back of the portion that was knitted last. Work a round, and with each stitch take in the corresponding loop on the extra pin, knitting the two off together. This forms the hem (above), and the tiny indented edge is provided by the holes made after the first band of plain knitting.

Such are a few of the directions, in brief, that I found of the greatest use to my small body of knitters. As regards the wool, I took care to purchase it in large quantities. Before instructing my workers in any fresh pattern, I took care to have a thorough grasp of it myself, for questions were asked in the course of the lesson of which I should never have dreamed, and I had to be as ready to explain away imaginary difficulties as to face all those actual troubles that arose in the natural course of events.

METHOD OF MAKING THE HEM.

IN TIME OF TEMPTATION.

A Story of the Far West of To-day by Emma E. Hornibrook.

THE prospect might have daunted a brave spirit. When the train backed out of the frame shed, called by courtesy a depôt, five of the half-dozen passengers it had brought to Weheegan were gone. The sixth, tall and straight as the native pine, braced her lithe body against the swirl of rain that swept the small platform.

Jean Lindsay's clear eyes, peering through the mist, could discern lumber, soaked and dripping, lying in masses or loaded on trucks around the station, completely obstructing further view. They were very steadfast eyes which met this unpromising vision of a new life. The fortitude that had led her forefathers to covenant and die among their heather-clad hills was a grand inheritance. That the mouth was tender and sensitive enough to quiver a little Jean owed to her beautiful Irish grandmother. The same line gave her finely marked brows, and lashes so dark that the grey eyes, when lifted, were a surprise.

She drew a breath of relief as a tall man, with slightly stooping shoulders, hurried towards her.

"Miss Lindsay, of course!" he exclaimed, holding out a cordial hand. "This must seem a poor welcome, but a Chicago buyer came in just as I was leaving the office, and there's no shunting a Chicago man—sticks like a burr. Come right along; my buggy is here. I'll send for your baggage later."

Jean smiled at the hustling Western hospitality, which was bringing back a little genial warmth to her heart. James Holden breathed a sigh of thankfulness at sight of her strong frame.

"Not scared, eh?" he said. "That's good. Sunshine to-morrow will brighten things up, and my wife will be a real sister to you."

The owner of three lumber mills, and a comparatively rich man, Holden's happiness had been marred of late by the conviction that under the care of five children and other duties his wife's health was declining. Jean was the outcome of an advertisement for a "mother's help" in an Eastern paper. The usual inquiries and high references had proved satisfactory.

"If we can only keep her," he thought, as he glanced askance at the girl tucked under the wrap beside him. "Why wasn't she plain, or even ordinarily good-looking? Then there'd be some chance."

It was an agreeable surprise when, at the turn of the road, Holden pointed the handle of his whip towards a large, well-built, well-sheltered frame house. It had an air of comfort and even refinement, and just now seemed a haven of rest. Jean's quick glance took in the fine growth of trees at the rear, the garden drinking in the rain after a long season of drought, the trim fences, and lawn. This was not the rough-and-tumble place she expected to see. All was promising.

A pale little woman received her with a motherly embrace.

"Come in, Miss Lindsay. What a day it has been!—but good for us in some ways; most things are. James, give me that bag. I shall take this dear girl to her room at once."

Left alone for a brief rest, Jean surveyed the chamber. It was large and comfortable, while the snowy whiteness of linen and draperies appealed to her fine taste. She clasped her hands in thankfulness, for had she not come hither relying on her mother's God? She could scarcely tell when she had begun to trust Him for herself; it was as far back as she could remember. The child of pious parents, she learned to depend on the love of the great Father. No arguments were needed to prove His existence; the proof was in her daily life. Even when her parents died she did not give way to despair, but, clasping her arms round a younger sister, sobbed out, "God will take care of us." Also, in the present venture she had sought to follow His will, for it was the only way that opened. James Holden was a cousin of her mother's, and said to be a God-fearing man. If all went well and the venture succeeded, she would send or come for her sister Lily, who was left at home with friends.

On entering the sitting-room with Mrs. Holden, Jean was introduced to a tall, fair young man, Mr. Ellis, her hostess's brother.

"You will find Weheegan banishment after New York," he began.

"I am not a New Yorker," Jean replied. "I spent the past year there, but my early home was in Grant, a mining town in Canada."

"Then it will not seem like the back of creation to you, as it did at first to me."

"You are not a Westerner, then?"

"Rather. I have lived in the city—Chicago."

"There's nothing small about Jack. You'll find that out, Miss Lindsay," Holden said, looking up from his paper.

"What did you tell me about Chicago men?"

Holden's appreciative laugh filled the room.

"Going out to-night, Jack?" he inquired later.

"I think not," was the rather emphatic reply.

The master of the house frowned. It was a bad beginning. At the opening of a door his brow cleared a little.

"That's Morgan," he said.

In a minute or two Jean was being introduced to a fine dark man of erect bearing, whose clear, honest eyes met hers almost with surprise. She was conscious of the same gaze more than once as Ellis tried to engage her in conversation, but it was never obtrusive.

"Morgan Kane is my brother-in-law's partner," Ellis said. "Your humble servant is book-keeper at the mills. Everyone in Webegan is connected with lumber in some way. Ours is a sort of wooden existence."

"I thought it was exciting."

"So it is at times. Wait till you see a boom come down the river."

If he had an uneasy consciousness that at no great distance a certain fair-haired little girl watched even then for his coming, he stifled it in the new-found pleasure of talking to his sister's beautiful "help."

When Morgan Kane rose to go, the girl, according to Canadian custom, extended her hand. The warm, strong clasp in which it was taken thrilled her in some mysterious way, and seemed as the seal of good comradeship.

Once in the street, the man walked on aimlessly, almost without reflection, yet with a strange, new sense of being. All the thirty-five years of his life had been singularly lonely and repressed. Much of it was spent in lumber regions among men with whom he had little in common. To-night, when Jean's gracious presence rose before him, something which had bound his heart for years seemed to give way. His blood even now throbbed in his veins at the remembrance.

The next day Jean took up her new duties. Mrs. Holden urged a longer rest, but found that in a quiet way of her own the girl was sharing responsibilities. From that time she became a member of the family. Morgan Kane called in the evening, but failed to see her, and when a reasonable time elapsed, and he had nothing further to say to his partner, was forced to leave.

A few days later he was more fortunate. Taking a short cut through the woods to his boarding-house, at the rear of the Holdens', he came upon her sitting in the midst of four children. For a moment he dared not advance, but, as she turned, took a step or two forward. The opportunity was too good to lose, and though their greeting had been restrained he seated himself without invitation on a convenient log.

"You are tired," she said, as if it needed excuse.

"No," he replied, with characteristic directness, "I am never tired, unless of my own company, and never lonely in the woods. At first the isolation and hush were oppressive. I was like an old soldier longing for the crowded battlefield, for I had been fighting every step of the road against odds in a great city. Then a way opened, and I came here to meet new difficulties. The free, fresh life appealed to me, the many voices of the forest spoke to me, and I thought myself content."

"And you are not?" The question was involuntary.

"I am, and I am not," he rejoined evasively. "The region has been much improved. Civilisation has looked in upon us through lines of rail. Still, there are greater possibilities, and it pleases me to consider them. We need a greater uplift."

Jean was conscious of a guardedness in the speech, and it recalled her to a sense of the situation. She half rose, and Kane was not slow to take the hint. To cover the retreat, she held out a book.

"Emerson!" he exclaimed, and began quoting:

> "And when I am stretched beneath the pines,
> I laugh at the love and the pride of man,
> At the sophists' schools and the learned clan."

"I cannot altogether make those words my own," he said, as he turned away, laughing a little at her pleased surprise to find a lumberman quoting poetry.

Some days afterwards Jean was taken to see a boom come down the river. Kane advanced, hat in hand. Together they watched the men spring from log to log as the huge mass of timber swung slowly along.

"It must be dangerous!" she cried breathlessly. "What if they should part?"

"They often do, and become as unmanageable and contrary as human beings. But those fellows are as agile as monkeys. See that one jump!"

"Have you done that?"

"Many a time."

She did not know the admiration her eyes expressed as she looked up, but Morgan drew a deep breath. In truth, he was fast becoming a hero in her sight, this man with his strong personality and love of nature, yet with a daring equal to any of his fellows. So different from her conception of the rugged beings to be found in lumber camps. She did not know then how his influence told for good, how many a poor fellow he had lifted out of the mire and helped to keep straight. Now his character preached.

"Morgan gasped and tried to rise."

Kane was not one to take advantage of her excitement at the river, and, as if in self-defence, she busied herself with the children.

A few evenings later, however, he called. The sitting-room door was open, and he paused in the hall, for Jean was singing. Jack Ellis stood beside the piano.

"Sometimes, between long shadows on the grass,
The little truant waves of sunlight pass;
My eyes grow dim with tenderness the while,
Thinking I see thee smile.

"And sometimes in the twilight gloom apart,
The tall trees whisper heart to heart;
From my fond lips the eager answers fall,
Thinking I hear thee call"

Jean rose suddenly. Did some instinct tell her of an unseen listener? Morgan saw Ellis bend his head to hers, but did not hear the whisper, "Tell me, does that mean anyone in particular?" Nor the stifled answer, "Oh, it does—my sister!" It was, in truth, a love ditty, but not as either man supposed.

In another minute Morgan was in the open air, panting and dazed as by a sudden shock.

"Oh," he breathed. "have I tasted this new, strange sweetness only to lose it?"

He pulled himself up and walked slowly to and fro, thinking hard. That Jack Ellis was unworthy of the girl he knew. Gambling was carried on to a great extent by the mill hands and farmers around, who had little to vary the monotony of their lives. That Ellis indulged in it and was heavily in debt had come to Morgan's knowledge. The innocent girl, who so bravely cast in her lot with them, must be saved, at any cost.

Like a flash, a way occurred to him. A large sum had been paid in to the firm that afternoon. It would be easy to transfer a portion to a drawer where Jack could not fail to see it in the morning. He was in sore straits, and the temptation would be irresistible. After all, it would only be accelerating matters, for there was nothing before him but exposure and flight. It would not make him worse than he was already, only show him up in his true colours—and save her!

As he walked toward the mills he repassed the Holdens' house. A light shone from an upper window, which he knew was Jean's. All at once he became conscious of a strange, subtle influence, pure and strong, meeting the evil within himself, gaining, overmastering it. It was like the exorcising of an unclean spirit, the "Peace be still!" of Power mid the rush of the storm. Involuntarily he bared his head to the cool night breeze. He had come to himself.

Ah! Jean Lindsay might never be his, but he would not, even to win her, now stoop to treachery. He could at least merit her confidence and regard, and retain his own self-respect. Was his integrity, his consideration for others who had fallen even as Jack Ellis had fallen, only to be maintained when it cost no personal sacrifice? His naked soul, stripped of sophistries, cried out in protest.

* * * * * *

"Are you sure the boss got the money?"

"Certain."

Kane, who had held on his course without reasoning, crossed the big lumber yard, on the thick sawdust floor of which his steps were inaudible. The voices were distinct to an ear practised to distinguish sounds mid the whirl of the mills. One was that of a Southerner known by the euphonious name of Syd Mortimer, who had lately drifted to the place, the other Ellis.

"Then come on. Have you the key?"

"Yes; but the money is in the safe."

"Pshaw! I tell you I can open any safe. Do you want to fool round until the watchman gets back?"

The answer from Ellis was a bitter curse.

"I was honest until I got into your toils," he said.

"Then I conclude the game's up?" was the cool rejoinder.

"Don't you do it, Jack!" rang a voice out of the darkness, as Kane stepped forward and laid a detaining hand on the intruder's collar. "As for you, Mr. Sydney Mortimer, or whatever your true name may be, I have a suspicion that the officers of law in these states of ours would like to locate you."

There was a quick movement of the stranger's arm. Ellis's warning was drowned by a report. Kane reeled back against the wall, a hand pressed to his shoulder.

Half an hour later Jean was roused by the sharp ringing of a bell. She found Mrs. Holden, pale and shivering, at the head of the stairs.

"Is it another fire?" she called.

"No," Holden answered; "but there's been some trouble at the mills, and Kane is hurt. They're bringing him here."

Jean, suddenly sick and faint, took hold of the railings for support. She heard the sound of wheels, and dropped to her knees, a hand on her heart. A little sobbing breath escaped as Morgan's voice reached her from below.

"It's too bad to rout you all up, Holden. It's really nothing—a pin-prick. Doc' here will have me all right in no time."

The men passed into a sitting-room on the ground floor, and laid their injured comrade on a couch.

"How was it?" asked Holden.

"Oh, that fellow Mortimer found out about the money. He is an expert safe-opener."

"Where did Jack come in? Lucky he did."

"Yes, lucky he did," Kane replied quietly, with a look at the younger man which promised and enjoined reserve.

Was it "a woman's love for love" which prompted Mrs. Holden to ask Jean to carry a message to the room of their injured guest next morning, even though it might entail loss to the family? Holden had just left it. When the door was opened in answer to his ready response to the knock, Morgan gasped and tried to rise. Jean put out a protesting hand.

"This is too good—oh, so good!" he exclaimed. "Jean, don't stay me, or I'll be in a raging fever from trying to keep it back. I love you. You don't know what you have done for me, but I will tell you some day. Give me that hand, as I say I love you."

"It's just what I expected," Holden said to his wife that day. "Now, what's to be done?"

"Jean says she knows her sister will come to us, and she herself will not leave for some months."

"You don't know Morgan," laughed her husband. "Well, Jean is a brave lassie, and deserves to get the best man in lumber land. I only hope her sister won't follow suit in a hurry. My! we'll all have to live up to our best when Kane gets a wife to help in his work of reform."

THE SPIRIT BEARING WITNESS.

"The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God."—ROMANS viii. 16.

MY desire is to remind you of the convincing help which we get from the fact that, when once our face is set towards God by faith in His Son Jesus Christ, then in countless ways the Universal Spirit of goodness reminds us that we are on the same side as God Himself, that we are daily influenced by Him, that it is by Him that we are kept from sin and evil, and that we are in the truest sense His children.

That the Spirit of God is in the world is not a matter of doubt. Those who have reduced religion even to its very narrowest limits point out the fact that there is a Power, not of ourselves, that makes for righteousness. Righteousness and all good things are permanent and unshaken; wickedness and evil tend unquestionably to ruin, dissolution, death, and extinction. Bad things depart, good things remain; it is the law of progress that every statesman depends upon. And more than that, we are ourselves conscious of a power which appeals to us constantly to choose the good and avoid the bad. It is not merely the bias of the laws, or the effect of public opinion, or the force of example. It is something more than all that. It is an unseen, an unanalysed, influence which compels us to recognise an ideal higher than has ever yet been attained by man, and to acknowledge a perfection after which every being must strive if it is to fulfil its end. This influence has a kindling, transforming, and effective power which proves it to be something more than human, and, indeed, is the sign of the Divine Essence.

The Spirit of the Eternal, which had breathed for ever and ever through all the glittering hosts of heaven, marshalling them in their divine order, their rhythmical harmony, their universal purpose, their one majestic, uninterrupted cadence, was to be felt in the moral sphere as well as the material. The design for man was that he should be upright, honourable, pure, just, true; capable of loving whatsoever things in nature and in character are lovely and of good report. Every gift which man had, every quality which would make him beautiful and good for the eyes of God to see, all would come from that one and the self-same Spirit, moving in his soul in the sphere of morals as He had moved from all ages and was still moving in the laws of Nature—for God is the essence and source of all goodness and excellence whatever. Without Him nothing was ever strong or holy. Whenever any man was ennobled by a true thought, by a pure love, by a grand action, by a good deed, so far he was sharing in the very nature and essence of God, for without the nature and essence the deed could not even have been conceived. The subtle effulgence of Omnipresent Deity was ready to guide each of God's human offspring into truth and goodness. Only let him open his inmost soul to the light; only let him recognise the still small voice that in his secret self would impel him to refuse the evil and to choose the good; only let him see God in everything around him—in Nature, in daily duties, in the heavens, and in his home—then would his whole life advance from day to day in a harmony as true and splendid as the perfect music of the spheres; then would he go on from strength to strength, as radiant a son of God as the bright bridegroom of the sky rejoicing to run his course. Then would the whole earth be full of the goodness of the Lord as the waters cover the sea.

We know, alas! that sin has prevented this ideal state of things which God intended. Man has, indeed, fallen short of the glory of God, and it was necessary for the Son of God to come and bring him back to the Almighty Father, and make the way clear for the Kingdom of the Spirit. It was only here and there outside the Chosen People that a man gave himself to the leading of the Spirit of God, and rose above his surroundings. Perhaps the greatest of such was Socrates. In the midst of the evil city of Athens, at the time when her riches, luxury, culture, and refinement, her thoughtless admiration of mere physical beauty, sapped away the strength and vigour of her early morality, and the foulest practices were sanctioned alike by the most approved taste of the highest Athenian society and by the best writings of the greatest Athenian men, there was at least one who heard the still small voice of the Spirit of God telling him to refuse the evil and to choose the good; who saw the glimmer of the true light shining in darkness, and knew that it was no flickering marsh-flame capriciously flaring, but the steady fire of God within his soul; who gave himself to follow the hand that led him on, showing him that God is true, and in Him is no darkness at all, and teaching him of the immortality of his soul, and of the things of truth. "Socrates said that there was a spirit in him, not himself, which guided him all the way of his life." The Sophists around him might teach their weary creed that man is the measure of all things, and that each individual may do that which is right in his own eyes, that there is no right and no wrong, but only what is pleasant and what is painful. Socrates saw around him the dreary result of such a system of life, and proclaimed with all the vigour of intense conviction that the principles of morality are unchangeable as the laws of the universe. And he found within him the clue to life, and to that clue he was faithful even unto death.

So did the Spirit strive with man. In many a golden sentence of pagan philosophy, in many a noble deed of many a generous hero, we see the light of the Spirit shining, and hear His omnipresent voice. Do you not read Him in every page of history, making the good triumph, and bringing the wicked to destruction? Do you not find Him in that seasoning of healthy morality which kept the world from becoming altogether abominable? In the justice of Aristides, in the magnanimous self-devotion of Regulus, in the purity of a Roman matron, in the truthfulness of the Persians, in the disinterested patriotism of Cato, and in the consciousness which enabled their contemporaries to appreciate all these great qualities, do you not recognise the divine operation of that unseen Presence, Who, when earth was chaos, moved upon the face of the waters? And yet, further, in the preparation of the world for the coming of our Lord by the Hebrew worship of one God, by the Hebrew law, and by the splendid visions of the Hebrew prophets, do you not find the visible traces of the Essence of Truth? Do you not read His divine thoughts in the general expectancy of the world at the time of our Lord's coming, that attitude of suspense and hope which Tacitus and Suetonius have described, of which one of Virgil's most beautiful poems is an example, and which taught the Eastern sages to watch for the dawn of that star which led them to the cradle of Bethlehem?

When our Lord came, He not only reconciled man to God, but He opened the Kingdom of Heaven, the Kingdom of the Spirit, to all believers. Thenceforward it was not necessary for men to grope after God, if haply they might find Him, but He was plainly revealed in all His power and glory; thenceforward it was not merely one man or woman here or there that was great and good, but righteousness, virtue, and peace through faith became possible to the humblest as well as the highest, to the simplest as well as the wisest, to great multitudes throughout the ever-expanding area of Christendom as well as to choice spirits whose nature prompts them to goodness. Christ showed where and how the Spirit of God was to be found, and what was the character of His power and influence. By His revelation men have learnt that the knowledge of the Personality of the Holy Spirit of the Father and the Son is to be able to address Him, to approach Him, to talk with Him as friend talks with friend. It is to be conscious of the Spirit dwelling in the inner chamber of the human consciousness, and leading the soul on from righteousness to righteousness. Such divine fellowship and communion is to feel the heart warmed and purified with no transient enthusiasm, no foolish heat of superstition, no imaginative ecstasy of unreasoning devotion, no wild exaltation of weak sentimentalism, but with the profound assurance that God is on our side. To you, my brothers, as Christians it is given to be confident that, however limited may be your faculties, however faulty the disposition which you have received by nature from your ancestors, whatever imperfections you may find within yourself of temper and of intellect, nevertheless, as long as you have faith, you are ever being born again by the very Spirit of the Eternal. You know that as long as your soul thirsts after the living God, as the hart pants after the water-brooks, you may be sure of finding within yourself a well of water springing up into everlasting life. To you alone as Christians is granted the satisfaction of believing that the stains on your life will be no more remembered against you because of the forgiveness of sins. Other faiths, having an element of truth, may hold out a dim hope of a change or of happiness hereafter, but in some it is faint, and in others its ideal is sensual and material. The creed of our Lord alone tells you in clear, authoritative words, "We know that we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is."

Thus it is that where in other religions, which are but a faint and erroneous copy of the King in His beauty, there have been here and there a few who have come up to a high type of character, and yet the whole mass has become feeble and powerless, or else impure and corrupt. On the other hand, in the true faith there have been numberless lives of almost complete goodness, numberless characters of almost perfect beauty, numberless examples in every generation of a reasonableness of conduct unknown elsewhere, numberless deeds of heroic self-sacrifice, purer, more enlightened, more effectual, than we can find in scattered instances in other histories. For we know the Spirit of God, for He dwelleth in us and is amongst us.

The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God. This is no hyperbolical language, describing in beautiful metaphor a vague religious feeling; nor is it a far-off description of some higher state which the souls of such men and women as we are, among the trifling cares and monotonous ties of our daily life, are unable to appreciate, or measure, or even to desire. It is a truth of which each of us can discover the reality for himself. Have you never, in your daily occupation, or in the book that you have been reading, or in the train of thought that has been passing through your mind, felt the flash of the Spirit kindling in you something nobler than was there before? When you have been looking at some exquisite landscape, or musing over some picture of high thoughtfulness and marvellous beauty, or losing all thought of yourself and of your petty surroundings in the heavenly harmonies of some pure and true music, have you never seen the Spirit pass by? When your whole being has been filled with admiration and delight at some deed of courageous unselfishness, or at some character of conspicuous wisdom and generosity, or at some life that is more godlike than the lives of most men and women, have you not heard the voice of the Spirit calling out all the warmth of the love of the better part of yourself? Or when you have gone forth from yourself in prayer to your Father, Who seeth in secret, in the morning, or in the evening, or in the daytime, as you are about your work, or in the church where men meet to worship God, have you not come back into yourself calmed, strengthened, purified, feeling the light dawning upon you, and the shadows fleeing away, and have you not realised with awe that the Spirit of the Father and the Son had been with you? Or when, in some acute grief or bitter disappointment, you have not known at first where to lay your head, where to bury your sorrow, where to get rid of the numbing load of pain that seemed to be crushing all the life out of you; and then, as you still looked dumbly towards God, something quiet and tranquil has taught you patience and you begin, after a long time, to look forward as well as backward, to hope as well as to regret, and to think that after all your life is not so wholly broken off from all that made it bright and happy in the former days—at such times have you not been sure, with an undoubting security, that the Spirit of God knoweth our downsitting and our uprising; He understandeth our thoughts afar off; He compasseth our path and our lying down, and is acquainted with all our ways?

There are other ways, some more direct even than these, in which the Spirit bears witness with our spirit. Perhaps we have for a time been careless and indifferent about religion, and the faults and imperfections of religious men and women have made us impatient of the very thought of it. And then something has made us serious again, and caused us to see the reality of what we had despised. There was the Spirit of God.

said, and done things which in our better times we should have abhorred. Once more, we know not how, by some word spoken in season, by some powerful reminder in thought or in reading, the drug has been removed, and conscience has once more become powerful, has spoken, and been obeyed. Sensuality and selfishness are the two great enemies of our souls, the two great powers of darkness that rule the natural man; and these have given way once more to the accusing and reminding voice within. There was the Spirit of God.

We have at times been careless about the realities of the spiritual life, and the future reward has seemed remote and unattractive. Something has drawn our minds more nearly to the thought of our immortal destiny, and the value and interest of the promises of our Lord have become plainer to view. We have considered them with more earnestness, and they have had more effect on our daily life and conversation. There was the Spirit of God.

Nothing can be more reassuring than to find the cares and anxieties about our worldly affairs gradually becoming of less importance, and the force of old temptations and evil propensities, if not altogether extinct, at any rate dwindling away before a sense of principle and duty. It is good to realise day by day that our self-government has been maintained, and that when there has been any interruption to it then we have seen it immediately, have deplored it bitterly, and have soon recovered it. It is the greatest comfort that we can have to prove to ourselves that sin has been rejected and repelled, and that we have been able to decline its offers. There, again, the Spirit of God has been at work.

It is not so much an increase of confidence in our own strength with which we have encouraged ourselves, for that would be a delusion. The real hope for us is when we rely more on the helping grace of God. If we see that we are really touched with the love of all that is meant by His glorious Name; if it is a satisfaction to us to be reminded of Him in His worship; if some thought about questions of faith and duty is of real interest and importance to us; if we are consciously happier when we are good than when we fall below the standard of conduct which we acknowledge; if we value any increase in firmness, strength, and resolution, and in kindliness and sympathy towards those with whom in various ways our lot is cast, then we may without superstition or excitement, but in the calmest and most reasonable manner, praise God for His undeserved goodness, and believe that the Spirit has been bearing witness with our spirit that we are His children.

This witness is never complete in this life. In some it is weaker and more intermittent; in others it is stronger and more continuous. The measure of it is given in proportion to the sincerity and earnestness of our own prayers. We have to ask for it, to co-operate with it, to lay ourselves open to it, never willingly to do anything that would diminish its influence, or that might land us in states of mind which would be incongruous with that settled and happy condition. St. Augustine, the most fervent, thoughtful, and experienced of all the men of faith, knew this, and he prayed thus: "O Holy Spirit, Love of God, Who proceedeth from the Almighty Father and His most blessed Son, Powerful Advocate and Sweetest Comforter, infuse Thy grace, and descend plentifully into my heart! For in whomsoever Thou dwellest the Father and the Son come likewise, and inhabit that mind which is honoured with so glorious a Guest. O come, Thou cleanser of all inward pollutions, Thou healer of all spiritual wounds and diseases! Come, Thou strength of the feeble knees, and raiser up of them that fall! Come, Thou star and guide of them that sail in the tempestuous sea of this world; Thou only haven of the tossed and shipwrecked! Come, Thou glory and crown of the living; Thou only stay and shield of the dying! Come in much mercy! Come, and make me fit to receive Thee! Amen."

DEAN FARRAR.

GREAT preacher, successful teacher, and powerful Temperance advocate as he was, it is as the author of "The Life of Christ" that Frederick William Farrar is best remembered by many thousands of admirers, who knew nothing of him as schoolmaster, and never or seldom came under the spell of his wonderful oratory. The story of his life must have been a difficult one to tell, and his biographer son, Reginald Farrar, has only succeeded in giving a comparatively slight picture of the busy life in the compact volume which has just been published.*

He has not relied upon his own recollections or on such correspondence as his father—

* "The Life of Frederick William Farrar." By his son, Reginald Farrar. London: J. Nisbet & Co.

always a busy man—preserved, but has welcomed the assistance of relatives, old pupils, and former colleagues of his father. Those who only remember the late Dean of Canterbury in the successful years of his later life will be interested to hear of the struggles of his youth. His father, who had been a missionary in India, where he was working when the future Dean was born, was only a curate in England at the time that the son's Cambridge career began, and Mr. Reginald Farrar says :

"In October, 1856, my father went up to Trinity College, Cambridge, as a 'sizar,' and supported himself at first entirely on the income derived from his sizarship and King's College scholarship. His father, being only a curate, was a very poor man, and the son took a legitimate pride in the fact that from the time he entered at King's College, and throughout his career at Cambridge, he paid the expenses of his own education entirely by scholarships and exhibitions, and, as he has often told me, his education never cost his father a penny. So poor was he, and so rigid was his self-denial and his resolution to spare those struggling parents in London the least farthing of expenditure on himself, that during his early undergraduate days at Trinity he refused himself the indulgence of tea for breakfast, and drank only water."

For twenty years Dr. Farrar was a successful schoolmaster, first as assistant master at Marlborough and Harrow, and afterwards as Headmaster at the famous school, where he succeeded Dr. Bradley, who was later Dean of Westminster, when Farrar was Canon and Archdeacon. As a teacher he was very successful, for—

"He was, as Dr. Thring, of Uppingham, pithily said of him, 'not a mere knowledge-box with the lid open, but a true guide and teacher, able and willing to help, inspirit, and lead the way.'"

His influence over the boys was an excellent one, and the biographer quotes with effect several touching letters from men who had been under him at Marlborough or Harrow. It was of the happy days at Harrow that one old scholar wrote :

"'I was with him for nearly two years in the "Remove," and I never heard him say an ill-natured thing or an unkind thing about a living creature, except to a boy who had lied to him. Very few fellows, however, tried a falsehood with your father, for we others, idle, lazy, or whatever we were, would not stand that, for he possessed a faculty for making everybody who came in contact with him remember that he was a gentleman ; so in our form it was considered the height of blackguardism to "deceive Farrar." I only wish we had all followed out his teachings in after-life. You must excuse the abnormal length of this letter, but your father is a theme upon which I have great difficulty in restraining my feelings. . . .'"

And it was of his Marlborough days that another ex-pupil was thinking when he recalled another reminiscence which we quote :

"'The following authentic story shows how he appeared to a small boy who regarded him as nil mortale : "I was never in the Sixth," he explained, "but Dr. Farrar came to review the lower school form in which I then was. As he came in, in his silk gown, with that stately form, oh ! I did feel small ! 'Go on' he said to me. I went on and got through it. When the review was over, he stopped and talked to us, among others to me. 'Where were you born ?' he asked. 'In India, sir,' I replied. 'Ah ! I was born in Bombay myself.' We had quite a talk, and then he shook hands. I was proud of myself. I didn't wash that hand for two days. I never got into his form ; but when he was installed Dean I took a holiday and went to Canterbury ; and when he died I went there to the funeral service. We never allowed a word to be said against him at home."'"

Being thrown so much among boys, and seeing so much of their reading, it was only natural that Farrar should turn his attention to the writing of healthy stories for boys, and his biographer tells the story of his beginnings in literary work very concisely :

"In 1858 he may be said to have begun his public career as an author with 'Eric, or Little by Little,' published by request, and founded on reminiscences, partly autobiographical, of his old school in the Isle of Man. This was followed in 1859 by 'Julian Home,' a tale of college life, of which the local colour is derived from Trinity College, Cambridge. 'St. Winifred's, or the World of School,' was not published till 1865. 'The Three Homes' was originally published under the pseudonym 'F. T. L. Hope' (derived from Tennyson's 'faintly trust the larger hope'), and the authorship of the book was not publicly claimed till 1896. It first appeared as a serial in THE QUIVER, and since its publication in book form more than thirty thousand copies have been sold."

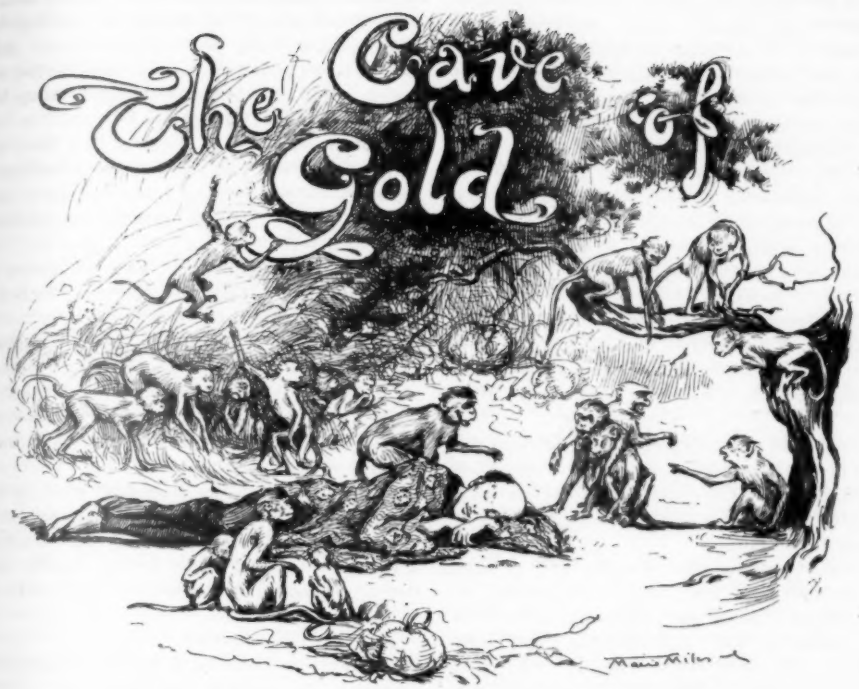
It is interesting to recall that the connection with THE QUIVER thus pleasantly begun was continued to the end of Dr. Farrar's life, and one of the last pieces of literary work which he did was the writing of those studies of "The Child Wonderful" which were published in the Christmas Number of this magazine in 1902. And even now that he has been taken from us, and new works from his busy pen may no longer be expected, the association of Dean Farrar's name with THE QUIVER is still maintained, and our pages this month contain references to the special offer which is made to readers of THE QUIVER of an edition of the ever-popular and helpful "Life of Christ."

How he came to take up this work Farrar himself told in the preface:

"The work was undertaken at the request of the publishers, who 'wished to place in the hands of their readers such a sketch of the Life of Christ on earth as should enable them to realise it more clearly, and to enter more thoroughly into the details and sequence of the Gospel narratives.'"



When the book was written, its author was Headmaster of Marlborough—although he was at Harrow when he began the task—and one of his daughters contributes to the biography a touching reference to the difficulties which surrounded the work:

"It must not be forgotten that this gigantic task, which would have been a notable achievement as the outcome of years of lettered leisure devoted to no other object, was with my father a παρεργον, accomplished in the spare hours of a busy schoolmaster's life between the years 1870 and 1874. Engaged often in teaching and other routine magisterial duties from seven o'clock in the morning till nine o'clock at night, with many letters to write and frequent sermons to prepare, 'months,' he says, 'have often passed without my finding time to write a single line; yet, even in the midst of incessant labour at other things, nothing forbade that the subject on which I was engaged should be often in my thoughts, or that I should find in it a source of peace and happiness different alike in kind and in degree from any which other interests could either give or take away.' But leisure, with him, meant ever change of occupation—not smoking, or chatting, or a game of whist—and after a day's work in school his steady lamp would burn far into the night; while he valued his holidays chiefly for the privilege they gave him of working thirteen hours a day at his beloved book. Which of his children does not remember the ponderous and solidly constructed 'book-box,' with its fifteen cubic feet of formidable tomes, mostly German theology, the working-tools of my father's literary craft, which accompanied the family to the seaside on every successive summer holiday?"

Mr. Reginald Farrar quotes many letters from readers of the book unknown to its author, expressing their appreciation of the work, which is the eloquent Dean's truest and best memorial.

In the pathetic picture of the Dean's closing days his son quotes some passages from Canon Mason's sermon preached in the cathedral at the time of the Dean's death, and with one or two sentences from this we must close this reference to a book which is a loving tribute to the many-sided devotion of a great father:

"'If I may dare to say what appeared to me to be the case, I think the Dean himself was happier during the last two years or so than I ever knew him before; and I am sure that he deserved to be so, for the presence of the Spirit of God shone out more and more conspicuously from his wasting frame. That busy right hand lost its cunning, till he could not so much as turn the pages of his sermon for himself, but had one of the King's scholars beside him in this pulpit to turn them for him; then that wonderful voice, which used to set the hearts of thousands vibrating as he spoke of righteousness and temperance and judgment to come, became husky and feeble, and he was compelled even to give up reading the Lessons. But he never murmured. Not even in his utmost privacy did he complain. All impatience, all fretfulness, were banished.'"

A Story for the Little Ones by Myra Hamilton.

SOO TOME walked in his garden and sighed bitterly, for he had nothing to do; he was really a man to be pitied, for he had no work to employ his hands, no thoughts even to occupy his mind; therefore he found the days very long and dull. He glanced at the melon plants with which he was surrounded, and wondered to what use he should put the fruit when it ripened, but suddenly a good idea came to him, and he clapped his hands with pleasure.

"I will cultivate the melon and the corn so as to provide food for the monkeys and apes who need it," he cried with great determination. "My dear wife and children are dead, so it is not necessary that I should labour for them, and yet I am too young a man to dwell in idleness, especially when there are those around who require my care. Well, I remember how the monkeys starved last year, for the people guarded their melons and their corn so carefully that the poor things never had a taste all the season. But sooner than do nothing, I will work in my garden and give the product of the earth to the monkeys."

So this kind-hearted man, Soo Tome, laboured daily on his plot of land to provide food for the little creatures that chattered to each other in his trees, and when his neighbours cried one to another, "See, Soo Tome must be mad! He lets the monkeys devour everything he grows," he shook his head, for he knew it was right he should do the best he could to assist the weaker creatures that were not able to help themselves, and it gave him true pleasure to share his abundance with them.

One day, after working particularly hard in the garden, Soo Tome lay down in the shadow of a tree to rest, but the heat of the sun was so strong that soon he fell into a heavy slumber, from which he did not even arouse when the monkeys arrived for their feast.

"See," said the eldest monkey sorrowfully, pointing at Soo Tome, "our best and really our only friend is dead. No doubt he has killed himself through over-work. Have we not all noticed how diligently he has tended his garden so that we might feed? Alas! our kind friend is no more. What shall we do now?"

And the monkeys sat lamenting round the sleeping form of Soo Tome, who had no idea of the distress he was causing through slumbering thus peacefully.

"Surely," remarked the youngest monkey, "if our benefactor is dead, we ought to bury him. It would prove we are not ungrateful, and I think it is the very least we can do. Let us bear him to the Copper Cave, and there leave him in peace."

"The Copper Cave!" shrieked another, indignantly. "Certainly not! That is not nearly good enough for one who has been so generous to us. He must lie in the Silver Cave."

"No," said the eldest monkey, striking his paws firmly together. "No. Soo Tome must be carried to the Cave of Gold. No other cave will do. I am sorry we have not one of diamonds for him."

A shout of delight proved how pleased all the monkeys were at the suggestion, so they raised Soo Tome between themselves, and tenderly bore him to the place arranged. As they moved along, Soo Tome woke up, but when he discovered who his companions were he closed his eyes again, and determined to wait and see what would happen. At last they reached their destination, and with the utmost gentleness they laid the man down within the Cave of Gold, and then, terrified by the glittering brightness of the place, they scampered off, each eager to enjoy a good feed of melons.

When the last monkey had disappeared, Soo Tome sat up and gazed around in rapture. On every side of him he saw gold that would mean a fortune to him, and buy every possible thing he might desire. So he arose and filled his pockets, his boots, his cap, and even the sleeves of his shirt with this newly discovered wealth, and then he ran home as fast as he could, afraid that he would be robbed on the way.

Very soon, to the astonishment of the neighbours, Soo Tome began to build for his own use a fine large house, which he filled with servants; then he bought wonderful horses and carriages, rich silken clothes to wear, and glittering jewels to adorn himself with—in fact, in every way he showed that he had become a really wealthy person, instead of the poor lonely gardener he used to be. A false friend of Soo Tome's was so curious to know the origin of these possessions that one day, as the latter drove along the road in his carriage, he held up his hand and stopped him. And though Soo Tome had become rich, he had no foolish pride, and was just as glad to see his friend as he could possibly be.

"Jump in and sit at my side, Paw Yan," he said, after they had exchanged affectionate greetings. "It is long since we have met and had a chat. My building has occupied me so much lately."

"It has," replied Paw Yan, in rather a pointed way. "It has taken up all your time; and, I should think, all your money too."

"Money," said Soo Tome, lazily shrugging his shoulders. "Well, yes, I have spent a good deal, but not half as much as I have. I could afford to buy ten houses if I wanted to, but, as I can only live in one at a time, what is the good?"

"Ah!" echoed his friend, "what is the good? I am so surprised," he went on, for he wanted to find out all he could without asking a direct question, "that you, a humble gardener, should have had such a rich relative to leave you his money."

But Soo Tome shook his head.

"I have no rich relatives," he said simply; "there is no money in the family that is likely to come my way."

"My poor friend," said his inquisitive companion, "I am so grieved to think how hard you must have had to work to have saved such a sum. If I had seen you at your labours I would willingly have helped you. It was cruel of you to do it alone."

"I did not work," replied Soo Tome. "I doubt if I could. I have led such an easy life always; but, listen, my friend, and I will tell you my secret, for I am sure you will never rest until you know it, and, indeed, I should like to share it with you."

So into Paw Yan's eager ears Soo Tome poured the whole story of his kindness to the monkeys, and the generous way in which they had rewarded him by placing him in the Cave of Gold when they feared he was dead.

And when Paw Yan learnt all he could about the Cave of Gold he stopped the carriage and got out, for now he had discovered his friend's secret he did not want to waste his time driving with him.

"What a fool Soo Tome is really," Paw Yan said to himself as he sat down to make his plans. "I have a scheme in my head to get to the Cave of Gold also, but I shall not trouble to toil in the garden beneath the burning sun, so as to earn the monkeys' compassion and gratitude. They are such silly creatures, they will never know the difference. If they find me lying on the ground, pretending to be dead, I shall easily deceive them, and I am sure they will carry me at once to the cave."

So Paw Yan entered the garden one day when he knew the melons were ripe and growing in great numbers, and he lay down in a shady spot and waited for the monkeys and apes to come for their usual feast of fruit.

And just as before the little creatures gathered round to bemoan the death of the man who lay motionless on the ground, and after a certain amount of tears they tenderly raised him and carried him out of the gardens along a road Paw Yan did not ever remember seeing before. Though he pretended to be dead, he peeped out beneath his drooping eyelids, for he wanted to take good note of the direction in which he was being carried, so he would be able to visit the cave as often as he liked afterwards. He was most impatient to arrive, and his head was full of plans by which he could secure as much of the gold as he could. "I will fill everything I can," he told himself, "and I will make my arms hold as much as possible, and then what I cannot carry I will put in a bamboo basket and drag home."

But while Paw Yan was hurriedly making his plans the monkeys who were carrying him reached a place where four roads met, and there, to his dismay, they stopped to argue. And as Paw Yan listened he was pained to find they were discussing which cave to take him to. "As though there should be any question about it," he said haughtily to himself. "Only the Cave of Gold is good enough for a Paw Yan to rest in." But the monkeys evidently thought very differently. Some recommended the Cave of Silver, only a very few advised the Cave of Gold, but a great many were in favour of the Cave of Copper. "I never heard such nonsense," said Paw Yan to himself, longing, as he lay supported by the little monkeys, to jump up and kick furiously. But he decided to keep quiet, and hope for the best.

The discussion went on for a long while, but at last the eldest monkey waved his tail three times as a sign for silence, and when all the others were listening he spoke gravely and seriously, but in a manner which proved to Paw Yan that his word was law.

"This man is a stranger to us," said the monkey, "so why should we honour him as we honoured our dear good friend, Soo Tome? I quite agree we should give him a burying place in one of our three caves, but let it not be the Cave of Gold. I command, therefore, we bear him to the Cave of Copper, and there leave him in peace."

But when Paw Yan heard this his disappointment was too great for him to bear in silence.

"No, no!" he shouted; "take me to the Cave of Gold! I will go there, I say!"

But with a yell of terror the monkeys dropped the man heavily upon the road, and then bolted off, far too scared even to look behind them and see what had startled them.

Paw Yan picked himself up, all cut and bruised, and then he shook his head sadly as he attempted to brush the dust off his clothes.

"I don't think I shall be rich, after all," he said, as he prepared to limp back to his home. "I thought I could have deceived those monkeys so easily, but they are cleverer than I supposed. I shall give up being deceitful and see if I shall be luckier then. It is not a good thing to try to cheat one's neighbours. I have proved that. For the future I will work and do my duty. I am sure that is the best thing in the world after all."

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

MRS. A. J. STUART.

A LADY WORKER.

MRS. A. J. STUART, of Folkestone, has for many years been a most earnest and helpful Temperance worker. She was born at Vellore, in the Madras Presidency, her father being Major-General Stevens, an officer in the Indian Service. Mrs. Stuart joined the C.E.T.S. in 1882, and became a member of the total abstinence section of the society in 1890. During her residence in Folkestone she has helped to start several branches of the society, and as a member of the Folkestone Temperance Council has taken an active part in opposing licences. One special department of Mrs. Stuart's voluntary labours has been the delivery of addresses to the children of the middle and upper classes in the many large private schools of the town. She is a Poor Law Guardian, and was elected to the Board of Elham Union without opposition. Mrs. Stuart has written ably and well on Temperance topics; and her little book, "Things to be Added," a volume of addresses for mothers' meetings, fills a useful place in books for workers. At the recent Congress of the Kent Temperance Council Mrs. Stuart contributed a valuable paper on her practical experience as a Poor Law guardian.

LABOUR YARDS AND HOMES.

The work in the police courts has abundantly proved that there is need for the provision of labour yards and homes in which men and lads discharged from prison may be temporarily employed until permanent work can be procured for them. Unfortunately, owing to lack of funds, very few labour yards are in existence. Liverpool has a firewood and mat factory, which gave employment to 176 men last year. Portsmouth home took charge of 108 men, and the London Boys' Shelter Home housed 168 lads; whilst the Rochester Boys' Home, a South London institution, sheltered 112 boys. At the Winson Green Coffee House, Birmingham, some 3,550 free breakfasts were given to discharged prisoners. All these practical efforts to give a helping hand to poor folk to make a new start in life are the direct outcome of Temperance work, and are a sufficient answer to the cheap sneers of those who look upon the Temperance movement as a mere "fad," without any real results.

A CONTRIBUTION TO TEMPERANCE LITERATURE.

Dr. Robinson Souttar, M.A., D.C.L., has just issued a small handbook, which should be of great use during the discussions on the new licensing proposals. It is entitled "Alcohol: Its Place and Power in Legislation," and is based upon a dissertation which the learned author presented to the Faculty of Law at Oxford University, when qualifying for the degree of Doctor of Civil Law. Dr. Souttar traces the history of licensing in England from the year 1495, and also takes a survey of the liquor traffic in America, Canada, Russia, and other foreign countries. The vexed questions of compensation to publicans and magisterial discretion are passed under review, and public-house trusts and the scheme for the municipalisation of the liquor traffic are criticised. The care of the habitual inebriate, alcohol in relation to society, and alcohol in relation to morals are among other phases of the subject ably dealt with, and in summing up his argument Dr. Souttar says, "The disease is in the heart of man, and the only cure for it lies in the regeneration of the individual. Hence, whilst the value of good legislation is great, moral suasion, personal dealing, and Gospel preaching are of paramount importance in Temperance work." We may add that Dr.

XUM

Souttar represented Dumfriesshire in Parliament from 1895 to 1900, and while in the House rendered great service to the promotion of Temperance legislation. He was born at Aberdeen in 1848, and graduated first class in Civil Law at Oxford in 1889. He has been an associate member of the Institute of Civil Engineers, and gained the Telford Prize for a valuable paper on street tramways. He is an eloquent speaker, and has rendered great service to the Temperance question by his public addresses in all parts of the country.

INEBRIETY AND INSANITY.

Many years ago the good Lord Shaftesbury called attention to the remarkable connection between intemperance and lunacy, and now Dr. Robert Jones, the Medical Superintendent of the London County Lunatic Asylum at Claybury, has stated that out of the 116,000 cases of insanity at the present time detained in asylums there are probably no fewer than 11,000 males and 6,000 females whose insanity is directly or indirectly caused through drink. The statistics of the London County Asylums for the ten years 1893–1902 showed that of 35,916 persons under treatment no fewer than 5,727 owed their insanity to drink alone. Such figures as these tell their own tale, and the pity of it is that men and women cannot be brought to think upon them and act upon them in their sober moments. How many homes there are from which a dear one is missing owing to mental infirmity; and what untold misery lurks in the array of figures brought forward by Dr. Robert Jones!

A NOBLEMAN'S TESTIMONY.

The Rev. the Marquess of Normanby has for many years taken an active part in Temperance work. In a speech recently given at Whitby he said: "A great change had come over English society in respect of Temperance, even within the last thirty years, and he was proud to say that he threw his interest into the Temperance cause some years ago—he was rather young at the time. When he first started on that course the movement was not universal, and its supporters were not regarded with the acquiescence with which they were received at the present day. The Temperance question was now recognised on all sides as an important question, and Temperance work was recognised as an important and necessary work. What was more, it was looked upon as being properly personal work." In the same speech the Marquess recalled a very striking opinion of the late Sir William Jenner (one of Queen Victoria's physicians), who had said to him: "I look upon alcohol as a poison—a very valuable poison, but still a poison; and I never order it for any patient of mine, and never use it myself, except it is measured carefully."

"SPEED THE PRESS."

Few living men have been more active in the distribution of Temperance literature than the veteran worker, Mr. A. E. Eccles, of White

MR. A. E. ECCLES, GRAND CHIEF TEMPLAR 1882, GRAND TREASURER 1884.

Coppice, Chorley. During the last quarter of a century this gentleman has at his own cost put into circulation millions of tracts, pamphlets, and books primarily in promotion of the Temperance movement and the anti-tobacco crusade, although other good causes have also received a considerable share of his attention. Mr. Eccles was born at Over Darwen in 1830. He was educated under Mr. George Edmundson, who founded Queenwood College, of which Professor Tyndall was a tutor, and Professor Fawcett and the Right Hon. Sir William Hamilton were both students. When a young man of twenty-five Mr. Eccles read a copy of Dr. Grindrod's prize essay, "Bacchus," and at once became an abstainer. He immediately threw himself with great activity into Temperance work, and did very much to reform the character of his own neighbourhood. He joined the Good Templar Order in its earliest days, and has held many offices in the organisation. He was for years a member of the executive of the United Kingdom Alliance, and is a vice-president of the Manchester Diocesan C.E.T.S. In 1873 he gave evidence before the Lords' Committee on Intemperance, illustrating the advantages which his own village reaped from prohibition. Mr. Eccles is the president of the Temperance Ironsides, so it will be understood that his attitude to the cause is "thorough." He belongs to a family that has been engaged in the staple industry of Lancashire for over a century, for his father built the first cotton mill in Darwen, and his grandfather manufactured cotton cloth for the first Sir Robert Peel to print. Mr. Eccles married Miss Annie Fothergill, of Darlington, and this lady is a life abstainer, and has done very much to further the work by the promotion of Christian Bands.

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

Painful Ignorance.

A CLERICAL worker amongst boys in London was bringing some of them to Euston Station on their way to Canada. In the railway carriage, before arriving, the clergyman said: "Boys, we may never see one another again. Let us kneel down and say the Lord's Prayer together." Not a single boy of the party knew the words. This ignorance seems as strange to us as that of the dying Frenchman who remarked, when his wife read the Lord's Prayer, "What a beautiful prayer! Who wrote it?"

A Horse Ambulance.

IT was Ruskin who once wrote, "He who is not actively kind is cruel." After reading such words it is more than gratifying to note the consideration and kindness that are now shown by the public to domestic and other animals through that admirable institution, Our Dumb Friends League. This society has established branches all over England, and is doing a great work, encouraging young and old to be kind to their pets. Its latest achievement is the placing of four new horse ambulances upon the streets of London. Strictly speaking, only one car is in operation at the moment, but the three others will follow shortly, as soon as the necessary funds are forthcoming. A very good idea of this interesting conveyance may be gathered from our photograph, showing the car now stationed at Clerkenwell and intended for use in that neighbourhood. Its object is to go to the assistance of any horse or animal that may meet with an accident or fall sick, and remove it to the stable or hospital. A gong in front is sounded as soon as the ambulance is on its way. The police give every facility by clearing the road. There are side coverings which are kept rolled up when the ambulance is not in use. They are unrolled when the waggon is carrying a patient. Two cranks, one on each side, are used for slinging the animal. The ambulance has a sliding floor on which the animal is placed, and which is drawn into the vehicle by means of a rope round a windlass worked by a crank on the outside.

THE REV. A. N. COOPER, M.A. "THE WALKING PARSON."

"The Walking Parson."

THE Rev. A. N. Cooper, Vicar of Filey, Yorks, has rightly earned the title of "The Walking Parson" by his wonderful pedestrian feats. In 1886 he walked to London from Yorkshire, a distance of 200 miles. A year later he walked to Rome, a journey of 743 miles, and in the three succeeding years he walked, respectively, across Ireland, from Hamburg to Paris, 487 miles, and from Filey to Buda-Pesth, a distance of 610 miles. Other long walks have been across Belgium, through Spain, and to Venice. Mr. Cooper travels at an average rate of thirty miles a day, and this pace he can keep up for weeks. While making the journey across Europe to Rome, Mr. Cooper often exceeded thirty miles aday, on one occasion covering forty-eight miles between breakfast and supper-time. While on these tours he carries no luggage, except that which can be crowded into a knapsack and slung across his back. He even tears up the letters he receives while upon tour so as not to be burdened with any unnecessary encumbrance. Before setting out he studies the language of the country through which he intends to travel, as this is absolutely essential to obtain the necessaries of life in out-of-the-way villages and towns. This passion for walking Mr. Cooper acquired while a clerk in London, when he was obliged to tramp, through force of circumstances, four miles every morning to his work, returning home by the same means of locomotion at night. He has found this ability to walk long distances, without getting the least tired, of great help in his parish work at Filey.

The Truth of Truths.

THERE is one recollection which those of us who have ever been so fortunate as to spend a holiday in Switzerland can always bring away. We have gazed upon a wide landscape of sublime Alpine splendour. It takes many hues to complete the glorious picture. There is the flush of the rose-red granite, the shimmer of gold upon the lake, the whiteness of the dazzling snow, the exquisite purple of the shadows against the intense glare. All these colours are but manifestations of the one pure and uncoloured sunlight; and however many and various be the truths of religion, it is the vital, essential truth that "God is love," which informs and transfigures all. This thought will lead us higher than the Alps.

Fruit They Could Reach.

MANY a "storied urn or animated bust" has not recorded an epitaph so touching and so honourable as may be read, amid the moss, upon an old slab in the graveyard at Rowley. The inscription commemorates the Rev. Ezekiel Rogers, the first minister of that town, who died, aged sixty-nine, in 1660. The simple tribute ends as follows: "With the youth he took great pains, and was a tree of knowledge laden with fruit, which the children could reach." Would that more of those who teach and preach could learn good Ezekiel's secret! Their fruit may be good, but for children, whether in years or in character, it often grows too high up.

The Buddhist Guardian Deity.

CHINA, the "Glorious Land," the "Land of Flowers," answers to many different names. The "Land of Contradictions" might be added to the number. What other nation has so highly cultivated the arts of peace, or developed the faculty of turning even refuse into articles of commercial value? Yet the marvellous intelligence of Chinamen disappears when they wander into the regions of superstition. The idols of their own manufacture are a bundle of contradictions. They combine an unlimited strength and an ungrateful disposition to injure their worshippers with absolute weakness to defend themselves. Therefore they need the image of a guardian deity to stand, armed cap-à-pie, as sentinel outside temples and monasteries. Having provided a fearsome and gigantic protector, the devout Buddhists might claim the privilege of leaving the gods and their treasures in his keeping with a quiet mind. But reason asserts itself, and tells them that a living dog is better than a dead lion. So they require a priest to act policeman day and night over the deities—guardian and all. In spite of showing the idols all this attention, and accepting their extortionate demands for offerings as a matter of course, the Chinamen's treatment of them is not always strictly respectful. They set up god-constables, for example, and see that one is on duty in every yamun (mandarin's court). Woe betide that constable if anything goes wrong within the precincts! It is the mandarin's painful duty to bamboo the protector of the public peace. An idea prevails that in Tartarus the god-constable must answer for any trouble amongst the spirits, and the city-god of Hades may have him beaten with 106 strokes. Such are some of the articles in the creed of a nation who in the days of the Pharaohs turned into porcelain the ground which they trod under foot; who taught worms to spin for them, converted mulberry leaves into rolls of satin, and produced from tea plants a beverage of world-wide fame. Verily the world by wisdom knew not God.

"Is that the Star?"

WE were walking one evening lately with a boy, seven years of age, who had been greatly fascinated by the story of the Epiphany. "Is that the star the wise men went after?" he exclaimed, pointing to a tiny golden orb of fire which had just begun to tremble over the horizon. Was there not an unconscious wisdom in the child's question? The Epiphany was no mere episode of Bethlehem. The star is always there, if we will look for it; and the lights of conscience, of revelation, and of experience are always waiting to lead us to the humility and the humanity of the Divine Child.

"A Thousand Years as One Day."

How did we spend our February 29th this year? Did we remember, on that Monday, that it was eight years since an extra twenty-four hours had been added to our normal twelve months? It will be four hundred years before such a phenomenon as a leap year missed can occur again—a date which any of our children's children's children can hardly be alive to see. What drops are these four centuries in the ocean of God's eternity; but how much is one day to us, who will all be dead long before 2000 A.D.! The real measurement of time is by its effects, rather than by its duration. How much can happen to us in one day! In a day we were born; in a day we shall die; in a day many a prodigal has returned; in a day many a saint, like Saul of Tarsus, has been converted.

"Three in One, and One in Three."

IT is remarkable that well-nigh the most explicit and unmistakable mention of the Trinity in the whole of the New Testament should be in the form of a benediction (2 Cor. xiii. 14). It is a formula dear to the hearts and to the lips of all Christians, and is to be heard in the services alike of Anglican and of Nonconformist. The blessing with which the doctrine comes may teach us that it is given us in love, and ought to be accepted with love, rather than to be doubted or wrangled over.

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

THE following is a list of contributions received from March 23rd, 1904, up to and including April 29th, 1904. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

QUESTIONS.

85. What words does St. Matthew use to show it was not a man who rolled away the stone from the sepulchre where our Lord's body was laid?

86. What proof did the women who visited the tomb give of their belief in the resurrection of Jesus?

87. By what message did the risen Lord seek to comfort His apostles, who had so shamefully deserted Him?

88. What does St. Matthew say was a common report among the Jews concerning the resurrection at the time he wrote his Gospel?

89. What was the final charge given by our Lord to His apostles before His ascension?

90. By what special signs were the early Christians to be known?

91. What was the object of the important deputation which waited on Rehoboam at the death of King Solomon?

92. Who was the leader of the people at that time?

93. What was the cause of the revolt of the ten tribes who formed the kingdom of Israel?

94. What was the great sin of Jeroboam?

95. Why did Jeroboam set up golden calves as objects of worship?

96. As God had commanded the Jews to keep the three great festivals of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles at Jerusalem, what did Jeroboam do to prevent this?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 736.

73. The Prodigal was sent "to feed swine," the basest and most degrading of all occupations in the eyes of the ancients. Herodotus tells us that such men were not allowed to mix even with the most abject poor. (St. Luke xv. 15.)

74. "When he came to himself," sin being looked upon as madness and folly and opposed to all wisdom. (St. Luke xv. 17; Proverbs i. 20–24.)

75. The restoration to freedom and sonship; captives in olden time having their shoes taken from them and restored when they were set at liberty. (St. Luke xv. 22; Isaiah xx. 1–4; 2 Chron. xxviii. 15.)

76. They had come up to keep the feast of the Passover. (Acts ii. 5.)

77. About three thousand became Christians. (Acts ii. 41.)

78. St. Peter and St. John were sent to Jerusalem to meet a man bearing a pitcher of water, who led them to an upper room furnished and prepared. (St. Matthew xxvi. 18, 19; St. Luke xxii. 8–12.)

79. Our Lord said, "He that dippeth his hand with Me in the dish," which most probably refers to the dish of bitter herbs, which were eaten with the lamb at the Passover feast. (St. Matthew xxvi. 23; Exodus xii. 8.)

80. The institution of the feast of "The Lord's Supper." (St. Matthew xxvi. 26-30.)

81. Because the power of the Sanhedrin was limited to offences against the Jewish religion, and the charges brought against our Lord were "perverting the nation" and "forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar." (St. Mark xv. 1; St. Luke xxiii. 2.)

82. The title of "King of the Jews." (St. Mark xv. 2; St. John xviii. 33–37.)

83. That He had boasted He could destroy the Temple and build it in three days, and that He said He was the Son of God. (St. Mark xv. 29; St. Matthew xxvii. 40–43.)

84. All the people were deeply affected, and the centurion in charge of the Roman soldiers acknowledged Jesus as the Son of God. (St. Mark xv. 39; St. Luke xxiii. 47, 48.)

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

It is proposed to introduce into this magazine a New Department which it is hoped may be found helpful to many Christian people who are from time to time troubled with moral and spiritual difficulties. We do not contemplate dealing with the objections of professed sceptics, but rather with the conscientious perplexities of those who find themselves, either continually or occasionally, faced with some critical problem of faith or conduct. To all such we offer a cordial invitation to state their difficulties (as briefly and as plainly as possible), in order that we may place such statements in the hands of some experienced and sympathetic adviser in spiritual matters, who will, of course, hold all such communications in the strictest confidence.

All correspondents must give their names and addresses to the Editor, as a guarantee of good faith, but their names will not be published. The Editor reserves the right to insert in THE QUIVER any such questions or replies as may appear to him of general interest; but he does not undertake to publish, or even provide replies to, every inquiry made.

As THE QUIVER goes to press several weeks before the date of publication, inquirers will understand that some delay in the publication of answers is inevitable, but those whose difficulties are of an urgent nature may, subject to the provisions above mentioned, and in every case to the discretion of the Editor, have a reply sent to them by post on their enclosing a stamped and fully addressed envelope for that purpose.

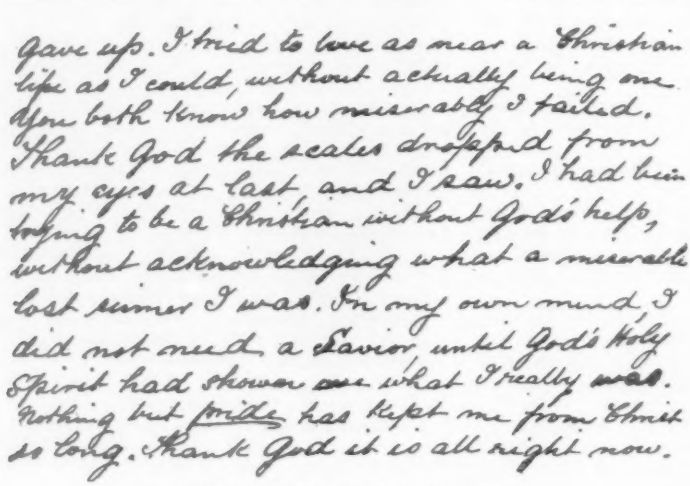
"OTHER LITTLE SHIPS."



MORE ABOUT "THE QUIVER" MISSION BOATS.

"There were also with Him other little ships."—ST. MARK IV. 36.

"BOAT ahoy, there!"

The cry, straight from the chest of a stalwart fisherman, resounds across the grey waters of the Tyne.

"Boat ahoy, there! Aren't you coming on board?" This invitation comes from another vessel of the fishing fleet anchored on the northern shore of the river.

gave up. I tried to live as near a Christian life as I could, without actually being one. You both know how miserably I failed. Thank God the scales dropped from my eyes at last, and I saw. I had been trying to be a Christian without God's help, without acknowledging what a miserable lost sinner I was. In my own mind I did not need a Savior, until God's Holy Spirit had shown me what I really was. Nothing but pride has kept me from Christ so long. Thank God it is all right now.

A SAILOR CONVERT'S "GOOD CONFESSION."
(Photographed from the original letter.)

"Boat ahoy, there! Have you any letters for us?" There is a tone of anxiety in the third voice. Wants hidden under many blue jerseys awaken to consciousness with the shouts.

A rowing boat, flying a dark blue flag with a white angel, is the object of all this flattering attention. Friendly greetings are welcome, but when so very numerous, and accompanied by demands on time, they are apt to become embarrassing. She carries letters here, books and magazines there, sells Bibles on a smack in another direction, and lets strangers and foreigners know where to find a friend and a home whilst they are in port. But the best intention and the most willing oars cannot enable one dingey, lent to the Missions to Seamen, to do the work of the three which have been worn out by hard labour in rough weather. So men who have spent months in the North Sea, and are hungering for the news of sweethearts and wives and children, and would be grateful for comforting words and comfortable "woollies," must sail away, perhaps never to return, without any response to their cry. For time and tide wait for no man, not even for the chaplains and readers. Besides, these friends of seamen have duties to fulfil elsewhere. They are wanted in the busy dock, in the third largest port in the Kingdom, whilst in twelve miles of the navigable part of the river ships lie in tiers, closely packed together. Only the rowing-boat can go amongst them; there is no space for her big sister the steam launch.

Now the cry, "Boat ahoy, there!" which awakens the echoes on the Tyne, can be answered more fully and more frequently. A boat bearing on her prow the name Quiver No. 1 will, in all probability, have been launched before these pages reach our readers. She is the most complete and suitable for the purpose that can be procured, and it is hoped will be only the first of a dozen similar boats, the gifts of the younger readers of this magazine. Why are they required? What good are they? The questions are right and reasonable. Let the men afloat answer them in their own words. Their letters to chaplains, readers, and institute keepers have stories to tell.

A NORWEGIAN LAD'S STORY.

He was only one of hundreds of Scandinavians who land at Par and Falmouth. The grand harbour shelters between 4,000 and 5,000 vessels each year, and a Missions to Seamen rowing boat takes invitations to the institute for their crews. A warm fire, friendly care, and a comfortable meal have their attraction to men who know what it is to spend a fortnight at a time in snow, varied by sleet and wind, without the comfort of a dry thread of clothing; who sleep in a space hardly larger than their coffins will be if ever their bodies should be laid in the earth, and whose rest at night is apt to be broken by the cry, "All hands shorten sail! Look alive!" One young Norwegian who came to the Par Institute woke there to the sense that his own wrong-doing (especially intemperance) had brought trouble upon himself and his own people. He signed the pledge, and then, like the runaway Onesimus, he found a friend to write to his home and intercede for him. He had not to wait long for an answer.

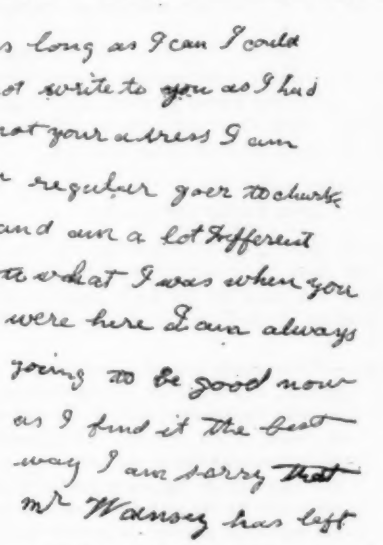
Letter from the Norwegian Father to the Chaplain at Falmouth.

"I had your letter of February 23rd. I see you had a chance of a talk with my son. I know you have given him plenty of good words, which he ought to have. I do very well understand that the boy would like very well to come home. To my big sorrow, he has not saved anything of his wages, although earning such good money, and when he knows that he has a father who for fifteen years has been sick and unable to work, and further that his dear sick mother has gone home to her God about two years ago, and his eldest sister last year, I ask him to come to God while He may be found and call upon Him while He is near.

"The boy knows which home he has, and that at all times it is standing open for him. But to come home now and have nothing is impossible, so I prefer that he take the chance; and if it is, as the minister says, not only that he has become a teetotaller, but is sorry for his earlier life and condition, then God will bless him, and he can be God's child and a blessing to himself and us.

"God bless you, minister. God bless everyone who works for sailors' salvation. Live heartily well."



A home and a father's heart wait open for many a sailor lad who has yielded to temptations—temptations which landsmen fail to realise—to forget his duties to God and man. A letter from another young Norwegian, written to the reader at Par, tells how he came to himself at this same institute, and arose and went in penitence to the Father of all wanderers, whether afloat or ashore.

A Norwegian Seaman to the Reader at Falmouth.

"I have the pleasure of writing you a few lines just for to let you know how I am getting on. I am wery thankful to say that I am in good health, and I hope that you and your family is the same. Well, as I promised you to let you know when my wedding day is coming off, it will be next Sunday, please God. . . . There is another thing that I know that you will be glad to hear. You remember that lady who was staying with you, and the service she had the last time I was there. I shall never forget it. It is tra [through] her that I found happiness. I ment to tell you before, but it have been put off day after day; but to-night I could not keep it in any longer, and I knew you would be so glad to hear it, as you have always been so good to me. I shall never be able to pay you back for all your kindness to me. But now, dear Mr. Wyatt, I have not any more to say at present, so I must close with my best love to all of you, and God bless you."

Young seamen, who get a taste of home life in the institute at Par, show their appreciation by beginning letters to the reader and his wife as "My dear Father and Mother." One of them, writing from Oporto, says:

"I am longing to see your dear faces again. I could not love you more if I were your own son. Oh, how I praise our dear Lord Who led as long as I can I could not write to you as I had not your adress I am me to know you, and best of all God using you to point me to the Saviour. Yes, my dear Mother, I never rested after I left Par that night. I could not make out what was the matter with me; but after I received the letter you and Father wrote I saw it was Jesus I wanted. . . . As I am writing this, you are holding your service in the institute. I can just fancy I hear you and Father praying for us. May God strengthen and keep us, and bring us back to those we love."

Another sailor lad in the same ship writes to his "Dear Father and Mother":

"My heart was aching when we lost sight of the dear old country, and it is now, and always will until we get back again. . . . It is glorious to feel that God's eye is watching over us and guiding us. . . . I think I have been half a Christian for a long time. I have watched the seas in heavy gales, and wondered at their magnificence and their beauty, and knew that it was the work of God's hand, yet would never acknowledge it. No one has grander opportunities of seeing the works of God than a sailor. God called to me quietly long ago, but I took no heed. . . . I tried to live as near a Christian life as I could without actually being one. . . . In my own mind I did not need a Saviour until God's Holy Spirit had shown me what I really was. Nothing but pride has kept me back from Christ so long. Thank God, it is all right now. Christ is my pride and my hope."

There is a well-known picture by Sant called "The Soul's Awakening." The artist's ideal might be realised by an awakening such as this young sailor describes. It is like the early light gladdening the eyes with the consciousness that a new and glorious morning has succeeded the night.

The correspondence at sixty-seven institutes under the Missions to Seamen offers variety as great as that of the character, position, and education of the writers. One chief engineer, for instance, collects money on board ship for a fund to supply a new institute for Swansea, and writes to the reader and his wife: "God will bless you both in your noble work for the seafaring population. No doubt there are times when you are very much troubled and the way is dark; but the cause is good and noble. Look to Him for strength, and you will come out more than conquerors."

In the days when our Lord trod the shores of the Sea of Galilee He spake to His disciples that a small ship should wait upon Him because of the multitude. At Falmouth, with its forty thousand seamen in the year, and at many other ports, the Ruler of the sea still needs the service of a small ship. It is by such means that the voice of the Lord may be heard on the waters.

NOTE.—We earnestly hope that our readers are helping on this great enterprise with their sympathy and prayers, and that they are endeavouring, by means of the collecting cards supplied in our last issue, to enlist the practical aid of their friends in providing the launch and boats so urgently required for the work of the Mission. We would again call attention to the special announcements in the advertisement pages of this magazine, in which many suitable inducements are held out to our readers, and especially to the young people, to enter into this work with enthusiasm. More collecting forms are gladly at the disposal of such as may wish for them, and will be supplied at once if a stamped and addressed envelope be sent to Messrs. Cassell and Co., Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, London, E.C.

The year's at the spring,
And day's at the morn;
Morning's at seven;
The hill-side's dew-pearled;
The lark's on the wing;
The snail's on the thorn:
God's in His heaven—

THE SUNSHINE MAKERS.

A DESCRIPTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL SUNSHINE SOCIETY.

By Elizabeth L. Banks.

A BRANCH OF LITTLE SUNSHINERS IN TOTORU, JAPAN

"Have you had a kindness shown?
Pass it on.
'Twas not given for you alone—
Pass it on.
Let it travel down the years,
Let it wipe another's tears,
Till in heaven the deed appears—
Pass it on."

IS there any mother in England who has not put by a little shoe, a tiny frock, a broken toy, for the sake of remembrance of the child that was?

Happily, perhaps, the child has outgrown them, and so does not need them. Sadly, perhaps, the child is dead, and thus their use is past.

And in either case the left-off things are wrapped away in a chest of drawers, and because they have become useless to their original possessor they become and remain useless for ever.

For they are not useful, even for sweet remembrance sake. The child that has to a woman grown—shall her mother forget her babyhood? And the child who, while yet a child and in his lisping days, has been tenderly laid to rest under a green mound where flowers blossom and birds sing an evening lullaby—shall he be forgotten, though the baby slipper and the little white frock be not folded away, for ever empty?

By the law of the International Sunshine Society a new commandment is given unto you mothers of England, whether you rejoice in the young womanhood or manhood of your one-time little ones, or whether in tears you mourn for them. That little shoe, that frock, that rocking-horse—quite as good as new or almost—and in passing it on you will help to scatter sunshine, and so fulfil the law of Christ.

During my present return visit to the United States I have been thrown into contact with the woman who started the International Sunshine Society, Mrs. Cynthia Westover Alden, of New York City. It is only recently that a London branch was organised, and it is with the double purpose of describing the great good accomplished by the Sunshiners of America, and telling about the work begun and the work that it is hoped will be done by the English branch, that I write this paper.

And, in the very beginning, I will tell what are the fees for membership as a Sunshiner. The fees are merely good deeds, so no one need stay outside in the dark and away from the sunshine because of a lacking penny.

Mrs. Alden's story of how she thought of starting the Sunshine Society is very pretty and interesting. The beginning was like the traditional grain of mustard seed. Mrs. Alden, who is not only well known as the author of a delightful child-book, "Bushy," but as a writer for magazines and newspaper contributor and editor, was one day after Christmas going through the many Christmas cards which had been sent her by her friends and co-workers. She was pleased at the receipt of them, not only because it showed how well she was kept in remembrance, but because of their beauty. Yet, it seemed to her that, having accomplished their mission so far as she was concerned, they ought not to be put away in a drawer, which is the usual fate of Christmas cards after the holidays are over, and she began to go through them to see how many of them bore the names of the senders. Then those that had no names upon them she put in envelopes and sent away to certain friends who, she thought, would also enjoy looking at them, saying in each instance that she herself had so enjoyed them she thought the enjoyment ought to be passed on.

From one bedridden friend she received this note:

"I so enjoyed the beautiful card you sent that I thought of old Mary ——, and I sent it on to her to look at. I told her to pass it along to anybody else she thought likely to enjoy it."

I have forgotten how many persons enjoyed that one Christmas card, but I think Mrs. Alden told me that at least a dozen different persons were made happy by it, and that was what gave her the idea of starting a society the sole business of which should be to "pass things on."

So the Sunshine Society started with a thought, and now it has one hundred thousand members. Old people, middle-aged people, young people, and young children make up the membership. There is not a town in the United States which has not its branch, and it is hoped that very soon there will not be a town in Great Britain—or on the continent of Europe, for that matter—that will not also have one. This sort of sunshine has spread to India, China, Japan, and many of the Eastern countries. It is probably the most cosmopolitan society in all the world. Its members speak every language, they clothe themselves in all kinds of national costumes, and their methods of scattering sunshine are divers and interesting.

In Arizona, the Indian territory, Idaho, and other far western states sunshine has been carried to the American Indians, many of whom have become members of the society. In Japan a number of little Japanese boys and girls scatter sunshine. And not only may little children become members of the society. Dogs and cats and horses have also been made honoured members. Indeed, one of the most prominent and useful members is a New York dog named Spot, who taught a little cripple child how to walk. He was a poor little boy of three years of age, and there was something the matter with his legs, which even the physicians of Bellevue Hospital could not cure. So

Mrs. Alden induced the owner of Spot to make the dog a member of the Sunshine Society, and as Spot became a Sunshiner he had, of course, to begin at once to pay his dues in good deeds. Sunshiners took the dog and the child to the country, and at first Spot watched by the crib in which the child was tied. Then the child was placed on the grass, and, lest something should befall him should he become separated from Spot, Spot's long strap was fastened about the boy's waist. For a few days Spot trotted slowly about, the boy crawling after him; and Spot would look up and say with his eyes, "That's not the way. Watch me walk!" Then Spot would put out first one paw, then the other, eyeing the boy meanwhile, till one day the boy put out one of his feet. Two months later, after a daily lesson from Spot, the boy was walking. Nobody knows just how Spot did it, and Spot keeps the secret. Indeed, there are those who say that Spot is not a proper Sunshiner, else he would "pass it on"—the secret. The boy, being interrogated, answered merely, "Me not know. Doggie doned it!"

The great charm of the Sunshine Society is the fact that any person in any class of life is admitted as a member if he or she will agree to pay the dues of kind deeds. A New York slum cripple child and Spot, the dog, are members. So also was Queen Victoria a member, and she accepted the little Sunshine badge (price, five cents), the same as that which marks the humblest member. Indeed, I believe the Good Queen became the first English member of the International Sunshine Society.

MRS. CYNTHIA WESTOVER ALDEN, FOUNDER OF THE INTERNATIONAL SUNSHINE SOCIETY.

In order to describe just the sort of good deeds that are done by Sunshiners, I think I cannot do better than tell something of a branch which flourishes in Los Angeles, California, in which town I spent last winter, and from which place I send this paper to England.

California, as everybody knows, is the land of sunshine. Never a day in the whole year, so Californians tell me, but the sun of heaven lights up this land; and never a day, I am thankful to be able to record, but the other sunlight—that of the Sunshine Society—makes glad and happy the inhabitants of this city and the surrounding country. Los Angeles is a town where sick people come to be made well by the warm climate of the winter months. Many of those who come here for this purpose are rich. Many also are poor. In the winter months the walks and parks abound with wheel-chairs, or what we in England call bath-chairs, and they are expensive articles.

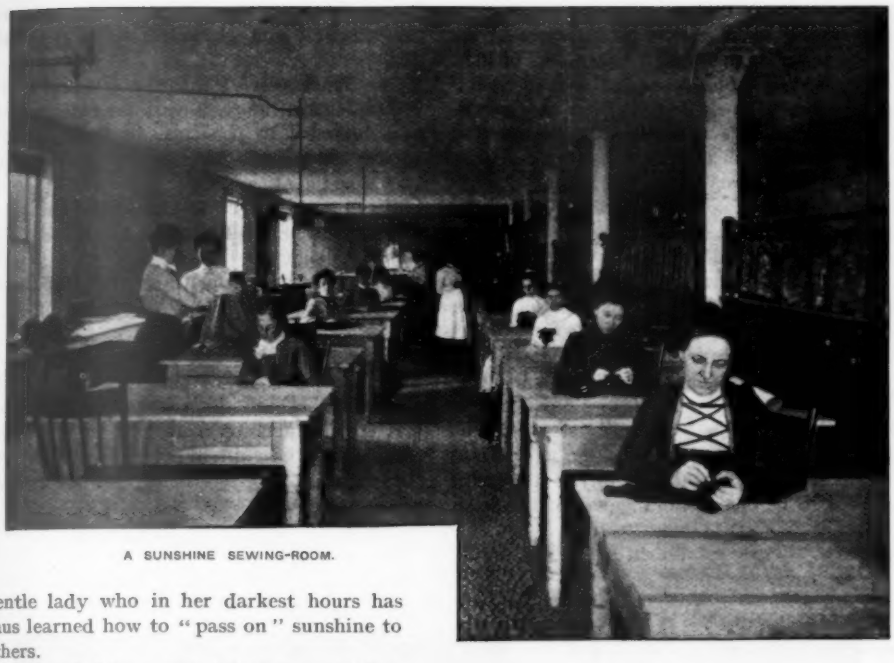
Now, the local president of the Sunshiners knew of a poor invalid who needed and could not afford a bath-chair. She knew also that there were many one-time invalids who had wheel-chairs which were now useless, so far as the former occupant was concerned. How to reach them and explain that some rich man or woman must "pass on" that chair and get it out of the box-room where it merely encumbered the floor? So an editor of a Los Angeles paper was consulted, and in the columns of his newspaper he made known the need of a wheel-chair, and the miracle happened—that is to say, the chair was "passed on."

SPOT, THE SUNSHINE DOG WHO TAUGHT A LITTLE CRIPPLE HOW TO WALK.

The other day the local president told me of a poor old couple, both over seventy years old, who were in great need of a comfortable mattress, and the problem was how to get it.

"I'll get it!" I exclaimed.

"I won't allow you to. You can't afford it, for you would have to buy a new one, not being a housekeeper and having no others about!" exclaimed she.



But I am thankful to report that I did get that mattress. I wrote an article about the Sunshine Society in a paper published in Los Angeles, mentioning incidentally that a mattress was needed, and a woman reader who wanted to scatter sunshine sent on a clean, comfortable mattress for the use of the old couple.

And, speaking of writing for the papers, I should state that in every town and village in the United States efforts, mostly successful, have been made to induce the editor of one of the papers to become a Sunshiner to the extent of giving a little space, weekly or monthly, to a report of the doings of the society and a recital of things needed for passing on. A journalistic Sunshiner is, therefore, a very valuable recruit; and it is by means of this "Sunshine Column" in the various papers that so much of the good work is accomplished.

The Sunshine Society, however, has its own paper, edited by Mrs. Alden, in New York—The Sunshine Bulletin. It is published monthly, and is full of all sorts of interesting things, as well as regular Sunshine news. Here is one of the Sunshine requests in a late copy of the Bulletin:

"Will somebody send some knitting cotton for Mrs. ——, an old lady, aged eighty-three, who has to earn her living by knitting stockings?"

I doubt not that long ere this the old lady got her cotton, for hundreds of women having knitting cotton lying about idle read the request. A distinguished Sunshiner, by the way, who also knits, is Mrs. McKinley, the widow of the martyred President. Mrs. McKinley is an expert knitter, and knits beautiful bedroom slippers. She knits many pairs of slippers for the benefit of the Sunshine Society, they being sold by herself or the society for the benefit of the fund. Sometimes they bring high prices, and there are grown-ups and children who have reason to bless the gentle lady who in her darkest hours has thus learned how to "pass on" sunshine to others.

Although I have stated that the only fees required are good deeds, I would not wish it thought that good deeds may not take the form of money if one desires. Money runs the Sunshine Farm at Hillcrest, New York, where the buckwheat and other products are sold for the benefit of the society work. Money makes the bread waggon at Darien, Connecticut, to go round and round on its wheels and distribute bread to the poorer and needy Sunshiners. Money is always gladly received. It pays for the thousands of postage stamps required for the correspondence which is necessitated by the coming in of the great bags of Sunshine mail which the New York postman delivers at the head office, at 96, Fifth Avenue. Money is always wanted for Sunshine work, just as it is wanted in other work. But those who have no money need not delay to become members. The little child that plays, all unwatched and untended, in Hyde Park may be a Sunshiner just the same as the little girl who goes there daily with her nurse and costly playthings, and the children's respective mothers may also both be members.

And now let me tell something of the London branch. It has been organised a little over a year, and, though its membership is still small, it is doing a good work. The Sunshine plan having originated in America, it was, perhaps, but natural that in London the first women to begin the work there should be Americans. There was an idea that American women in London were not sufficiently identified with the local charities, and that idle hands were needing useful employment. Mrs. John E. Milholland, wife of a prominent American business man in London, became president of the new London branch, and Mrs. Alfred Stead secretary, and during the year they have been untiring in their efforts to scatter sunshine and secure members. Mrs. Milholland's house, at 4, Prince of Wales' Terrace, Kensington, is the "depository" for Sunshine gifts by people who want them "passed on" to the needy; but the giving away of things is not the only good work in which the London branch is engaged, and Sunshine work is never given the name of "charity work," since then it would defeat its most important object. For instance, it may come to the knowledge of the London president or some member of the society that one woman would be able to make her own living if a number of housekeepers could be induced to buy all their cakes from her. Another can decorate tables. Another creates wonders in pickles. These women would not accept charity or money unless the latter be as payment for value received. Members of the society agree to take their cakes and pickles, and have their tables decorated, and to recommend them to their friends, and the gentlewomen are soon established in businesses that bring them in sufficient incomes.

It becomes rumoured about that a poor American girl in London is living on one meal a day because she cannot get work at her profession, singing and reciting at afternoon "at homes." Sunshiners tactfully arrange to make her acquaintance, invite her to sing and recite, tell their friends about her, and soon the girl is making a name in London.

Another young woman could earn her living if she had a typewriting machine, and it transpires that some Sunshiner has a machine that is never used. The machine is "passed on," and, no matter that the day of its receipt happens to be one of the foggiest of London's December days, the sun seems to burst out all beautiful and glorious for the typewriter girl.

The Sunshine work that is now being started in London, therefore, is very far-reaching, and it is intended to penetrate to the slums and to the cheap back-room of the genteel West End apartment house.

I will end by giving the agreement which anyone wishing to become a Sunshiner is expected to sign:

"I wish to join the International Sunshine Society, promising to pay my initiation fee in the form of some one act carrying sunshine into another life within one month from date. I also promise to pay annual dues, each in the form of a kind act. I agree to report the nature and circumstance of these acts to the branch president, who will report directly to the General Office, object being to scatter sunshine. (Signed)."

NEW YORK POSTMAN BRINGING MAIL TO THE SUNSHINE OFFICE

JOHN THORNTON'S HOLIDAY.

A Complete Story by Rita Richmond.

I.

"MY dear fellow, it simply comes to this: if you don't take a holiday immediately—and by immediately I mean within a week from now—I won't answer for the probability of someone having to pay the expenses of your funeral."

It was a grave-looking medical man who spoke, and who, having thus delivered himself of a final decision upon the case of the patient before him, now stood frowning down upon the face that bent over the table in the centre of the richly-furnished but gloomy-looking big room, a room that seemed to have more of the atmosphere of the counting-house and place of business than of the restfulness and comfort which one expects to find in a home. And no wonder. The room might well bear the impress of the many schemes elaborated there, schemes by which John Thornton had built up the fortunes of the wealthy firm of Thornton and Bradley, for John Thornton was a man who carried his business and its interests tight hugged to his breast, and who seemed to have no other life object but the one of money-making. Like all other one-idead men, he had gained that object, if John Thornton's bank balance was any gauge of success.

Whether he had lost more than he had gained in life was a question which even now flitted swiftly through the mind of the rich man's friend and medical adviser as he watched, with keen, half-pitying eyes, the face of the man who sat at the table surrounded by business papers and letters and open ledgers.

"A holiday!" repeated John Thornton, passing a thin hand over the tense and nervous lines upon his brow. "Why, man! I've just had a holiday!" he said wonderingly.

"H'mph! there aren't many of my patients would recognise influenza under that name, and when I last saw you tossing and groaning, and pretty nearly delirious, you didn't seem to consider it much of a holiday either, my friend."

"No; I confess I had a pretty bad spell," conceded the other, absently jotting down figures on the back of an envelope before him. "All the same, I can't afford the——"

"See here!" interrupted the doctor rudely, almost roughly, as he strode forward and brought his hand heavily down on the shoulder of his friend. "See here, Thornton; if you don't take my advice there'll be such a breakdown of your system, taxed as it has been with influenza and want of a holiday—by the bye, how long is it since you had such a thing?" He paused and eyed the white, strained face keenly.

"I have had several Saturdays to Mondays," began the other.

"Pooh! Who's talking of Saturdays to Mondays?" cried the doctor impatiently. "A rush somewhere on a Saturday afternoon in a crowded train, and a rush back at some unearthly hour on Monday morning, enough to knock a fellow in your condition up for a week. I mean a decent holiday of two or three weeks?"

He paused again, and with some reluctance and hesitation the answer came.

"I think—I believe some eight years ago."

"I thought so," grimly; "and I suppose you'd go on for another eight years or so. See here, Thornton; I tell you plainly that if you don't put on the brake in time, and now is just barely in time, I warn you a month from now will assuredly see you in your coffin or in the asylum."

"Am I as bad as all that?" questioned the other, looking up surprisedly.

"Look at yourself in the mirror," said the doctor briefly.

The tall, loosely-made figure, with the stooping shoulders, rose from the table and walked across the room to where a mirror hung above the mantel, and there deliberately scrutinised his appearance with a coolly curious yet detached sort of interest.

Worn and grey, the face of a man who had thoroughly outspent his strength and was drawing riskily upon his nerve forces and will power for endurance, such a face looked back at him and spoke with silent conviction to the truth of the doctor's words.

It was a fair sample of Nature's revenge for the outrage this man had put upon her.

XUM

Year out, year in, he had toiled his brain and his body almost to death, in the pursuit of success and wealth, and as he surveyed himself now deliberately in the glass, he could not but allow that the face looking back at him was the face of one who had paid a ransom price for his gains.

"Yes; I need a rest," he said, turning round abruptly, as though the reflection had aroused unpleasant enough conviction.

"I'll take the holiday, since you make a point of it."

"You need it, sure enough," returned the other drily, picking up his gloves preparatory to departure. "Excuse me saying so, Jack; but you've stuck too closely to the money making; you've kept your nose too tightly to the grindstone, lost your health, missed the best things of life, and for what? If you'd had a wife now——"

The worn, lined face that turned itself suddenly upon the doctor had an expression upon it that acted like a full stop to the other man's eloquence.

"I have gained what I bargained for," said John Thornton doggedly. "A man must pay the price of his bargain."

"And the price has been pretty high in your case," reflected the doctor shrewdly, but aloud he merely said:

"Take your holiday as soon as you can, old fellow, and spin it out as long as possible; that's my advice to you." And then he moved towards the door, and a minute later John Thornton stood alone in the big, gloomy, business-like room, staring dreamily into the heart of the fire, while strange memories, roused by the doctor's words, rose like a mist before his mind's eye. Memories of things that might have been; memories of things left undone that he ought to have done, of vows broken; memories of youth foregone and love sacrificed to the pursuit of success and wealth; memories of a certain sweet, dewy-lipped face with soft reproachful eyes, the eyes of the girl he had left behind him when he had first set out upon his gold seeking, the girl who should have been his wife now had he not sacrificed her to his worldly scheming.

His brain wandered into a long train of thought, as he paced the silent room restlessly, and for the first time for years he put the question to himself that the doctor had suggested.

What had he gained in return for his lost youth, for his lost love?

What had he gained, said John Thornton to himself moodily; and though he paced the silent room far into the night, revolving that same question, no satisfaction came to him upon the point.

"I must be going to be ill," he said to himself at last half irritably, as he turned out the gas, "or such morbid fancies would not grow upon me. It's plain I need a holiday—yes, a good holiday will set these notions at rest, I am certain."

II.

"OH, please miss, what in the world are we to do, miss, if you please? The gentleman who took the room above yours yesterday has fallen in a faint or something, and we thought, miss, knowing you were a nurse, that you might——" The landlady of the pretty little rose-covered boarding house paused apologetically and smoothed her apron agitatedly at the door of Miss Marston's sitting-room. That lady, who was seated sewing in a comfortable easy chair, and who had raised a pair of very soft, interrogative grey eyes to her landlady's face, flung down her seam and started to her feet instantly.

"Certainly!" she cried briskly and cheerfully as she rose, smoothing her pretty brown hair and giving a touch to her lace tie. "Of course I'll come, Mrs. Burton."

"It does seem a shame to thrust the shop as it were on you, miss, the moment you come for a holiday, miss, but——"

"Nonsense! A nurse is like a doctor, Mrs. Barton; she's at the mercy of the public, holiday or no holiday," returned the other good-humouredly, pushing the landlady out of the door and tripping after her downstairs.

A little group was congregated at the foot of the stairs, round the prostrate figure lying upon two chairs in the hall.

"Make room!" said Mrs. Burton, bustling forward, "this lady is a nurse, and will see to the gentleman."

The little group fell back at once with a respect for the professional, and revealed the figure of the man who lay limp and ghastly faced in their midst.

For one brief moment, the moment in which the face flashed upon her sight, Mary Marston stood perfectly still, holding her breath; the next she was down on her knees beside the man, composedly giving orders for water, a room to be got ready, and a doctor sent for.

"It's more than an ordinary faint," she said quietly a moment later, looking up with a face almost as pale as that of the unconscious patient's. "He is ill, I believe. Send as quickly as possible for a doctor." And then she bent again, loosening with fingers that trembled like leaves in the wind the collar and tie of the prostrate man, while her heart beat like a hammer over the task, for Mary Marston had recognised the man who had once been the lover of her youth, the man who had broken his vows to her for the sake of gold.

John Thornton's holiday had, indeed, come rather late to avert the revenge of the Nature he had slighted. Had it come just in time to deliver him over to the revenge of the woman to whom he had been false?

* * * * * *

The sun was shining warmly and gaily into the room in which Nurse Marston's patient lay, shining so strongly, that fearful of its irritating him, unconscious as he was, she stepped softly forward to lower the blind. But the blind was stiff, it stuck, it jerked, then it fell with a rattle all its length down the window.

And then, dismayedly, the nurse looked round to find that for the first time for four days the eyes in the worn, grey face were open and conscious, and fixed upon her own, staring as though they saw some apparition of the spirit world, for in truth John Thornton believed that he was a victim of a strange delusion, or that he was indeed looking upon a spirit presence.

"Mary!" burst from his dry lips almost involuntarily, as he tried weakly to sit up in bed. "Mary!"

"I am your nurse," returned Mary coldly, seeing the moment for explanations had come, and had best be faced soon as later. "I was staying here when you arrived ill——"

"A nurse?" exclaimed John Thornton bewilderingly. "Then you are not—not a ghost," he stammered.

"No." She was determined to be cold, laconic to the utmost, though her heart was pleading with her to speak to him more softly, to look at him with gentler eyes. "I am a nurse in the Royal Infirmary in Glasgow, and I am here on holiday."

Thornton lay back on his pillow faintly, and closed his eyes. He could scarcely grasp the meaning of her words, weak as he was. The strange room, the strange weakness that was on him, the shock of seeing really before him her whose reproachful eyes had looked upon him from many a dream, was almost too much.

He could not grasp it yet. Presently, however, the meaning of it all struggled slowly and with difficulty through his brain, and he opened his eyes upon her again.

She was sitting knitting with apparent composure by the window, and, as he looked over at her, it seemed to him as if the years had scarcely made the change of a line upon the face he had once loved so well.

How strangely pleasant it seemed to him to rest his eyes on that face; what a sense of comfort and peace stole over him as he watched the busy fingers flying and the soft brown head bent over them. And yet how dared he face this woman whom he had treated so ill? How could she sit there so calmly tolerating him? And what was it she meant by talking of nurses? A sweat broke out upon his brow. Was he to dream, to imagine that Mary Marston had nursed him?

"How does it come that I am here?" he faltered out, almost trembling to address her, in her cold and righteous silence.

"You are in the rooms you wrote for at Rockliff," she replied in calm, clear tones, knitting very fast. "You were taken ill at once on arriving—a nervous breakdown caused by overwork. You have been ill four days, and——"

"You have nursed me," broke out John swiftly, as she paused.

"I have done my duty to a patient in the house I am staying in. No nurse would have done less," said Mary Marston composedly.

John Thornton fell back on his pillow, a curious pang of disappointment striking through him. She had done her duty; there was no lingering sentiment on account of the bond, the betrothal promises that once had been between them. How could there be? he asked himself scornfully, as he lay silently watching her calm and placid face; and yet how he wished, how he longed that she would lift her soft, grey eyes and give him but one look such as he had used to receive from those eyes in the far back days of love and youth, give him but one glance of forgiveness? It suddenly flashed across him that he would give a good deal of his wealth just to hear her say "John!" to see her smile at him, to know that he might clasp her hand only in friendship again.

"Oh, what a fool I was!" suddenly groaned John Thornton inwardly as he lay. "What a fool I was to throw away my happiness for money's sake!"

And as he slowly grew to convalescence in the days that followed, the more he knew his folly, the more he knew all that he had thrown away in casting aside this woman's love. The years that had passed over them had only enhanced her value, it seemed to him.

"For one brief moment Mary Marston stood perfectly still, holding her breath."—p. 842.

She was handsomer than ever she had been in her earliest youth; there was a graceful dignity about her every movement that enchained his eyes, almost as they had not been in the days of his first love for her. He began to count the moments that would bring her to his side day by day, to look forward actually to the medicine draughts which forced her to hold the glass while he took it slowly from her hand. And yet all the while she treated him as coldly as he scarcely could have believed a woman could treat the man she had once loved.

And then at last the day came when her duty to him as patient was at an end.

He was on the fair way to health again, and now John Thornton knew indeed how much dearer to him than all his wealth was this nurse of his. On the day following, as she had herself coldly informed him, she was leaving to take up her duties in Glasgow again.

John Thornton was reading a certain urgent telegram from his partner in business, when she had spoken of her departure next evening, and he had tossed the imperative summons carelessly aside to talk with her on what seemed to him now a far more important subject.

"You are going to-morrow evening," he said, looking across at her with eyes full of passionate, remorseful longing.

"By the last train to-morrow night," she answered composedly, busily packing up some books she had had with her. "I start on early morning duty next day."

Not a tinge of regret in her voice, on her face. This parting had nothing of sadness in it to her, said John bitterly to himself; while he —what would he not give to prolong, to put off the parting. A sudden resolve to put his chance of forgiveness to the touch suddenly rushed almost recklessly on him in the midst of his pain.

"Mary!" he said hurriedly, rising and moving nearer to where she stood calmly regarding him out of clear, cold eyes. "Mary, for pity's sake give me a word of forgiveness before you go—just a look even. I cannot believe you have turned so cold, so hard. If you knew how I repent, if you knew how gladly I would sacrifice all I have to win your love again."

His voice shook, the thin beseeching hands he stretched out to her trembled.

She would not have been a woman, and the woman she was at heart, in spite of the mask of coldness she had protected herself with, had she not been moved.

She was, indeed, moved so much that for a moment she hardly dared speak; then at last she answered, more gently than she had yet spoken to him, almost pityingly.

"You speak as though I were in fault. Is not the barrier of your own building?"

"It is true! it is true! But there is forgiveness for all things. Mary, is there no hope of my being able some day to wipe out the past? Will you not give me one chance?"

His eyes, his voice were eloquent. Almost Mary Marston could have flung her pride to the winds at that moment, but she hardened her heart again.

"You have your wealth; that should suffice you," she said, bitterly, turning from him again.

"I would lose it all, if by losing it I might gain your love back again," he cried impetuously.

Mary Marston laughed scornfully. "Words, words!" she said. "You would not lose a fraction of your wealth for my sake."

John Thornton's face grew suddenly bright. "If I could prove to you that I am willing to lose a great deal of money, not even for the reward of your love, but only for the sake of some hours longer of the sight of your face, the sound of your voice, would you believe me?" He eyed her eagerly, and she turned and looked back at him incredulously.

"But you couldn't," she said at last, almost wistfully, he fancied.

For answer John Thornton picked up the crumpled yellow paper on the table and handed it to her.

"If I don't obey that summons calling me back to town to-night, I lose a venture involving more than a large fraction of my wealth," he said quietly.

She looked up at him amazedly.

"But you will go," she said quickly.

"I shall go after you leave," he replied steadily.

"And that will be too late?" she questioned breathlessly.

"A man's last hours of happiness are more to him than money," replied John.

For a moment she stood gazing dumbfounded at him, then a sudden light broke like a wave upon her face.

The practical proof had convinced her as no high-flown rhapsodies could have done, and in a moment love had wiped out the rankling wrong of years. All the love that pride had forced her to hide was in her eyes as she looked up at him, and John Thornton knew it.

"Am I forgiven?" he whispered, bending towards the upturned face. "Has the loss of the paltry gold actually won me such happiness?"

"If by happiness you mean me," said Mary Marston, half smiling through misty eyes, "why, I think, John, you have paid too big a price for it."

A TRIP TO TEMPERANCE ISLE.

By Our Special Commissioner.

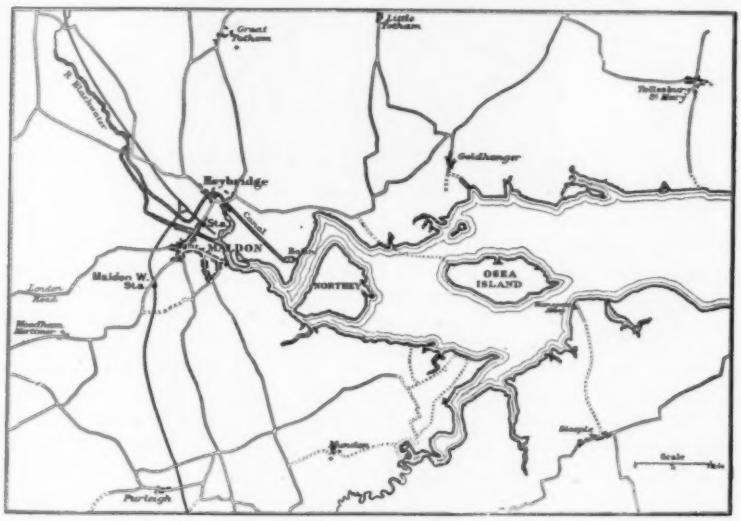
THE glorious sun is westering. The quiet Bay of the Blackwater basks in his rare, sweet smile—for it is an afternoon of late October, in the weeping year 1903. I stand on an island where every prospect pleases, and not even man is vile. The air imparts a relish for the prospective old-fashioned tea. Is it possible that less than an hour ago my appetite was only equal to half the luncheon spread before me in picturesque Maldon? The Sabbath-like stillness is favourable to further queries and contrasts. Eight hours ago I rose amid London's conventionalities, accepted the attentions of well-trained, well-capped, well-aproned maidens, and then all seemed as it should be. This afternoon I walk abroad with bare head, bare hands, in grand emancipation from the bondage of custom. My lungs expand with life-giving air, which fills even the roots of my hair. Why, cries Nature with a voice that finds echoes in body, mind, and inclination, ever go back to the restraints of the mainland? This morning I looked down on City 'bus horses running soberly in couples, and, like them, my aspirations ran according to the limits of the daily round, the common task. This afternoon, though only forty miles from the Royal Exchange, I watch kangaroos fold their short arms akimbo and leap with joyous springs from their hut to meet their beloved keeper. Free and unharnessed, they sit up on their noble haunches, prick their sensitive ears, and stretch out their black paws for bread, or nibble a vegetable in their attendant's hand. A timely warning prevents my following him through the wire door to stroke the sleek, gentle heads. The kangaroos are not quite so tame as pet hares, as the first glance would lead one to suppose. One of them has been known to spring upon the back of the lord of the isle, whose friendly intentions it failed to understand.

"They would rip up that dog if he got inside," says their keeper, whilst they accept his jurisdiction without hesitation and with an air of mild satisfaction; "they have a claw like a hook on their hind feet."



Here they are not mewed up in cages with no room to leap and display the utility of a highly developed tail. Novel experiences in Osea Island do not end with the kangaroo run. Near the shore which faces the direction of the kangaroo's native land, boats of various kinds lie at anchor, sails—red, brown, and white—appear and disappear in the silvery autumnal mist. They can land whether the tide is high or low on this, the south side. The water is from twenty to twenty-two feet deep, and the firm sand and shingle are as well adapted for embarking and disembarking as for bathing.

A small craft of uncommon construction rests moored on the beach. There is just time to scrutinise it, and wonder regarding the end and aim of its existence and special characteristics, when the owner appears, accompanied by a lady dressed like himself in nautical attire. They have visited the solitary farm, surveyed the view—north, south, east, and west. The artesian well answers the purpose of an observatory. From its platform, beyond the belt of water, islands and headlands, flats, and the modest highlands of Essex, may be seen for twenty miles. Here a church, there a ruined priory, elsewhere a flagstaff indicate signs of human habitation. Now they seat themselves on the wooden embankment which protects this part of the coast like a miniature sea-wall. From my more exalted position on a green slope which rises to a height of fifteen to twenty feet above sea level, I venture to express my genuine admiration for the neat little vessel, and curiosity about its peculiarity.

"If you will come down, I will show it to you, and tell you all about it," replies the courteous navigator. "I made it myself from my own designs," he continues, as I avail myself of his invitation. "It is just large enough for two persons. It cannot sink, for it is built on the principle of a lifeboat. It is, like the new ironclads, painted grey, to be as much as possible the colour of water, so when used for shooting, the birds are less likely to notice it. Those are lugger sails. I only use one in rough weather. We go out in all seasons."

He is familiar with the Blackwater Bay, or "The Pant," as it used to be called, and loves it. The air has meant life and health to him. "At one time I was said to be in consumption," he remarks; "now I don't know what it is to feel my lungs. I am a teetotaller, and I am delighted with Mr. Charrington's scheme for making Osea a temperance island. I think this is charming," he adds, pointing to the neighbouring green headland, where the trees form a procession to the water's edge, as though they purposed taking a dip. "Have you seen the small circular lake on the other side?" he inquires, and proceeds to tell a story of the brave old days of chivalry. The lake, a maiden whose fair face it mirrored and refreshed, the bold sailor who invaded the island, and a brother of the priory visible across the water, all figure in the scene. I ask for the foundation of this charming legend. He touches the region of intellect, and answers: "Here, and nowhere else."

We part, with mutual hopes to meet again, but with no notion of each other's names. As the pair sail off, it is easy to compare their little vessel, with its two white wings and grey body, to a gull. All the surroundings tend to eerie impressions. The glints of sunlight make tracks of gold to mysterious shores beyond the calm face of the water. The sailor's story, born in a poetical flight of imagination, is as credible as the local legend of St. Osyth, which helps to draw visitors to the interesting priory near Clacton-on-Sea. The graceful heroine of Osea and her favourite lake form a far pleasanter picture than that of the martyred saint carrying her decapitated head in her hands to the site of St. Osyth's Priory, and giving everyone there a "turn" by staining it with her blood. It would be easy to found another legend on the facts already quoted, and tell how an unknown knight and lady, borne between the white wings of a gigantic gull, landed on Osea Island; how they planted the native tamarisk—that graceful plant rarely found elsewhere in its English variety—and how, after their disappearance by the same way that they came, the land yielded to advanced cultivation. For this year, indeed, the island is on the threshold of a new era in its history.

The facts of the case are these. Osea Island has possessed from time immemorial the picturesque charm of Essex pasture land. Since the days when the East Saxons struggled to defend it from Danish invaders, it has been rich in historical associations. The sites of their conflicts are still recognised. After William I. invaded England, Ovesia (as it was called in old days) became the possession of his nephew, Hamo, Dappifer (or steward). Ruins of abbeys and monasteries exist to tell of religious aspirations. The craving to retire, at least for a time, from the world with all its ambition and struggle for life is human, and belongs to every age, however it may find expression. Those days when men fled for refuge from temptation to the religious houses of Osea were days of strife. The chronicler records that whilst the Scots were triumphantly crowning Edward Bruce King of Ireland in 1315 this little island belonged to the Earl of Gloucester, and that in 1418, the year famous for the first manufacture of gunpowder in England, it was in the possession of Sir Hugh Stafford. Again it changed hands, for Henry Bouchier, first Earl of Essex, was one of its owners.

MR. CHARRINGTON.

Now it is the property by recent purchase of Mr. Frederick N. Charrington, and traditions of the past are of less account than possibilities of the future. Mr. Charrington bought it in order to carry out a long-cherished scheme of making it a holiday resort with "all the latest improvements — including the exclusion of drink." The idea arose from his discovery that an island near New York had been taken as a safe retreat for inebriates. But this is not, like one or two other places, intended for the sole occupation of dipsomaniacs. It will be open to all seekers for health and enjoyment. Every effort will be made to provide it with all that is likely to make rest and recreation pleasant, but, at the same time, to exclude any licence to sell alcohol.

From Danbury, which looks down from a height of 620 feet on Maldon lying five miles off, the Blackwater may be seen on a sunny day like a sky-blue ribbon intersecting the flats. It flows for forty-six miles, and at last forms a broad estuary, taking several islands into its embrace, Northey, Osea, and Ramsey being the largest. Osea lends itself to the purpose of thing intoxicating. During the season of 1903, until October 24th, it plied backwards and forwards between Hythe Quay, Maldon, and Osea, once or twice a day, according to the tide.

"Never," as one of the sailors said, with pardonable pride, "had she failed to keep an engagement. The engines had proved true, the weather had never proved impossible." Single fares were fourpence, return tickets sixpence, whilst the Annie varied her programme by extra long sea trips or moonlight trips. The cheap method of importing supplies by barge from London is not yet established in working order: she brings cargoes of coal and domestic luxuries. I watched her discharge some of the accessories for building and a company of workmen engaged in making a model village.

a retreat from the temptation of the public-house, as well as a place for convalescents. A mile of water girdles it round. Maldon, the nearest town, is five miles off. The twin-screw steamer, Annie, licensed for 150 persons, is the only regular means of communication. It belongs to Mr. Charrington, and provides refreshments, but, like the island, eschews any-

Mr. Charrington has stipulated that all cottages and bungalows shall be built on the lines of the old English style of timbered architecture. They are to stand round the village green. Already a barge at anchor is unloading bricks, and an increasing pile in a field and workmen's huts mark the place where a more important building is projected. Dr. Moore, of Hastings, has bought the site, and has erected an institution for inebriate ladies and gentlemen. Here, at least, the patients will be beyond reach of cruel temptation, and can enjoy the air, laden with ozone, which flows across the island. That substance of at present unknown nature delights to sweep gently the surface of this region.

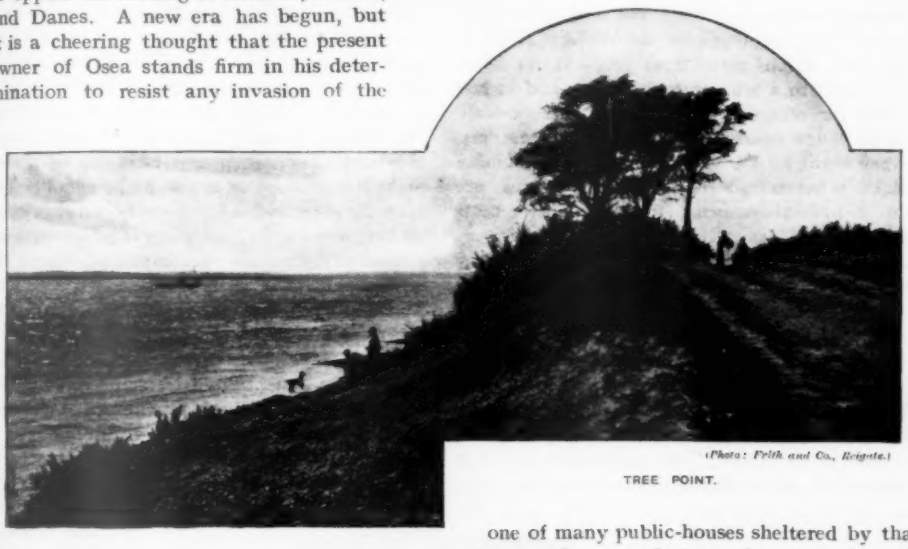
Until lately, Osea has been little known. It is only four miles round, one mile and a half in length, half a mile across, and covers some 350 acres. At the last census, the inhabitants numbered eight, and comprised the farm bailiff and his family and lodgers. For three hundred years it has been in the hands of one family. The moss-grown tiled roofs and dormer windows of farm labourers' cottages, and the gabled outbuildings, are old enough to be picturesque. A new house in modern antique style is already occupied. This solitary spot of scarlet in the very centre of the island is the first lodging-house with the village shop beside it. It is also the first object visible in approaching the island from "The Hard." "The Hard," a connection with the mainland on the north side, is covered at high tide to a depth of eight to ten feet. As the Blackwater recedes, the heads of stakes three or four feet high, trimmed and tasselled with brown seaweed, show themselves, and lead off in a sinuous procession to the island. Their appearance is the gauge of safety for those who would cross to it by "The Hard." On each side of this firm gravel road lies the flood, or else soft clay or mud, dangerous or impossible for wheel, hoof, and human foot. The green, billowy marshland, known locally as "The Salts," on Osea's northern coast, has a beauty of its own. In spring it clothes itself in lilac and gold, blue and brown, for marine shrubs and wild flowers abound in profusion. All the year round it is the haunt of wild birds. Kingfishers and snipe dart over the runlets; gulls cry with shrill voices to each other, or direct their remarks to the fleet sand-runners below.

"Those birds are peewits; some persons call them plovers," said the stalwart owner of two boats, pointing lovingly to some feathered friends. "And those are tukes, and those are Oxfords."

What some other persons call "tukes" and "Oxfords" did not transpire. He knew no other names for them, and said modestly that he was no scholar. This did not prevent his being worthy of taking his place beside one of Whittier's relations, whom the Poet of Freedom describes with his accustomed grace:

> "Our uncle, innocent of books,
> Was rich in lore of fields and brooks;
> The ancient teachers, never dumb,
> Of Nature's unhoused lyceum."

This man of Osea and his "missis" had lived all their lives in the neighbourhood, and now they wish for no home outside the island. The air suits them. They like to gather the fresh watercress and samphire, and enjoy a handkerchief full of winkles and other native produce. But boatmen and yachtsmen have more ambitious sport than periwinkles. Fish is plentiful in the Blackwater—whiting, codling, dabs, plaice, soles, bass, and mullet are the harvest of the net. Salmon are caught now and then. Dolphins, porpoises, and whales sometimes disport themselves within view of land, whilst rather lower down are the oyster beds of the Mersea Company.



For the present, Dame Nature rules supreme. Goldfinches and other shy English birds dart out of the hedges at the sound of wheels. Larks fill the air with music. Sea-birds nest in the grasses and boldly challenge the right of intrusion. They have been known to attempt an attack on the farmer's dog with their beaks. The wild creatures whose haunts have been left undisturbed for generations are as powerless to resist the incursions of modern seekers for space and fresh air as ever were ancient Britons to oppose the landing of Romans, Saxons, and Danes. A new era has begun, but it is a cheering thought that the present owner of Osea stands firm in his determination to resist any invasion of the enemy, Intemperance, which threatens to unmake the Empire in its centre, whilst patriots are engaged in making it at its uttermost parts. The question how and why the scheme for erecting a fort against a tyrant sin, more to be feared than the wildest of vikings, came into existence, carries one back to a life-story begun thirty-three years ago.

TREE POINT.

Evening closes on the squalid neighbourhood of Mile End Road. The garish light of a public-house pierces the darkness of a poor street. It flashes on the passers-by, who are happy enough to be tramping home. It lingers seductively on the weary, homeless loafers. It glances on the rarer forms of men and women who have forsaken home and comforts to seek and to save the lost. One of this number, alert with the full energy of youth and conviction, is arrested by the spectacle of a poor woman who pushes open the swing door from the outside with timid desperation, and stands on the threshold.

"Jack," she cries to her boozing husband at the bar; "give me some money; the children are crying for food."

Jack would give her something. He came out, and with one blow he struck her down, and she lay in the gutter. The ardent worker for God, still comparatively unfamiliar with the ways of slum life, took notice that the public-house was called "The Rising Sun," above that he read his own name, in that of a firm of brewers. "The Rising Sun" was but one of many public-houses sheltered by that name, the scene but one in a tragedy only too often repeated. Intemperance reigned with a sway which might have been prefigured by the hydra-headed monster of mythology. Its victims of all degrees cried for champions to deliver them. Mr. F. N. Charrington made a solemn resolve: "In the Name of God our Father and Christ our Saviour, something must be done, and, God helping me, I will do what I can." He withdrew from the brewery, and relinquished all interest in it. When the family lawyer looked through his father's will and at all the circumstances, it was discovered that he had sacrificed one million and a quarter. The will, made some years before his decision to renounce all part in the trade, directed that a share in the brewery should be offered first for his acceptance, with an alternative of a sum of money sufficient to produce an income to maintain him for life. On his deathbed, his father, who with the rest of the family had been grieved at the course his son had chosen, acknowledged that he had done well and wisely.

For thirty-three years Mr. Charrington has fought in the forefront of the battle with evil in the East-End of London. His work began in a night school opened in an empty hayloft over a stable in the Mile End Road. It would be interesting to study how many missions have had a similar beginning, and how much blessing has started from a lowly stable since the day that there was no room for the Lord of Heaven in an inn. It would be equally interesting, but impossible, to calculate how many forces have worked together to change the face of the East End. One of them is the Tower Hamlets Mission, which grew from hay-loft to tent, from tent to a temporary building and at last found its centre in the Great Assembly Hall, which holds nearly 5,000 persons. It is open every night all the year round, and on Sunday nights it is often so well filled that hundreds are unable to find entrance. The regular attendants at the Hall, drawn from the extremely poor, contributed upwards of £300 to the building fund. The frontage buildings comprise a spacious coffee palace, which is self-supporting, whilst on the three upper floors are numerous club rooms and offices. A Sunday School of 1,600 children, congregations that run into thousands, enterprises that grow and multiply themselves, make up the wide-spreading organisations of the Tower Hamlets Mission, which is supported by voluntary contributions. Experience of the special needs of the East-End had a great share in formulating the idea of seeking some health resort secure from the temptations to drink. The purchase and adaptation of Osea to this purpose is Mr. F. N. Charrington's own private venture, undertaken on his own responsibility. The local authorities of Essex are keenly watching the result, believing that it will increase their prosperity. Numerous inquiries have reached the new owner respecting available sites for building. Yachting men want to secure accommodation because the island provides safe anchorage, doctors want to secure sanatoriums, because it provides pure air. Other persons are alive to the advantages it offers for fishing, shooting, botanising, and the study of Nature generally. Possibilities of the future include a new railway, which will make it more easy of access, and a small landing stage for steamers. It is to be hoped that before all the projects for perfecting it as a health and pleasure resort are accomplished facts, the scheme will have so far justified its existence, that Osea will be the pattern of many other forts erected to protect England from Intemperance. The strife in old days for possession of the right little, tight little island in the Blackwater Bay has long been only known as a subject for an epic or an interesting event in history. It is now an abode of peace, and promises to become a blessing.

OSEA ISLAND, SOUTH SIDE.

The Pride o' the Morning

By Agnes Giberne

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—IX.

The story opens at Castle Hill, where Mrs. Keith lives with a young relative, Giles Randolph, who was left an orphan in childhood. Her own son, Colin, returns from a long stay on the Continent, and proposes to begin a career as a sculptor, to the mother's obvious but unexplained annoyance. Giles goes to Yorkshire to arrange, if possible, for his second cousin, Phyllys Wyverne, to pay a visit to Castle Hill. Her elder cousin Barbara and her grandmother, with whom they both live, are not anxious for the girl to see more of her relatives, but they have no good reason for refusing the invitation, which is accordingly accepted. Meanwhile Giles, attracted by Phyllis, pays another visit to the village of Midfell, where she lives, and is instrumental in rescuing her from a bog on the moors into which she has wandered in a mist.

CHAPTER X.

OF CASTLE HILL PERPLEXITIES.

AT the appointed hour for Phyllys's arrival, Mrs. Keith went to the station; and together they drove through the town, the elder lady exchanging bows with acquaintances by the way. Phyllys was rather silent, taking everything in with interested eyes.

Her first impression had been of somebody distinctly good-looking, but unapproachable. Mrs. Keith, quick to read this impression, did not at once exert herself to modify it.

Leaving Market Oakley behind, they bowled swiftly along the smooth high road till pretty Castlemere was reached; then by the lodge gate they entered the private grounds leading to Castle Hill.

Once indoors, Mrs. Keith unbent. Thus far she had merely made herself agreeable. Now her gloved hands held those of Phyllys, and her large eyes looked tenderly in the girl's face. After a momentary hesitation, real or assumed, she bent for a kiss.

Phyllys glanced up, surprised and touched. A wonder stirred within her. Why should Mrs. Keith be so pleased, so affectionate? She knew no sufficient cause. That Giles should have liked to know her had seemed natural, since he was near of kin; but that Mrs. Keith should care to do so was puzzling.

Then she recalled her late deadly peril, and the fact that Giles had rescued her. That might well give Mrs. Keith a peculiar feeling with regard to her. And, again, it might be that Mrs. Keith was so fond of Giles as to be gladdened by anything that gave him pleasure. Phyllys smiled to herself over the latter solution, and Mrs. Keith kissed her again.

"My dear, I am delighted to get you here at last! We have wanted it for years—Giles particularly."

"It is delightful to come."

Phyllys spoke in her most sedate voice, yet with evident gratification. This little scene took place in the ante-room, between hall and drawing-room; and as they entered the drawing-room a slight gasp broke from her.

It was large, and many-windowed, with nooks and retreats, with a ceiling artistically designed and colcured, with fine paintings on the walls, with a broad general harmony of outlines and tinting, and a delicate beauty of contrast in details, which at once appealed to Phyllys's artistic sense. She thought of the prim little sitting-room at home, its stiff squareness, its ponderous furniture, its framed texts.

"Ah!" murmured Mrs. Keith, reading her face.

"I never saw anything like it!"

"Rather handsome, is it not? I am glad you can appreciate. Now you will be glad of some tea. Where can Colin be?" She rang the bell. "Tell Mr. Keith we are here," she said to the butler.

"Mr. Keith desired not to be disturbed, ma'am. Tea was taken by his wish to the studio."

A fretted look came, and one cup clicked against another with a sound suggestive of tremulousness. "Nonsense! What nonsense!" muttered Mrs. Keith. Her brows drew together with a sullen expression.

"Does Colin paint?" asked Phyllys. "Mr. Keith, I mean."

"He is 'Colin,' not 'Mr. Keith,' to you, my dear. Yes, he dabbles a little in painting; and lately he has taken an absurd fancy for messing with wet clay, trying to model. Sheer waste of time, for he has no gift whatever in that direction."

The resentful tone in which she alluded to Colin's pursuit was in odd contrast with the softened note of her next remark:

"Such a pity Giles is still away. Yes"—seeing with pleasure Phyllys's disappointment—"he was to have got home yesterday. But the friend with whom he has been shooting in the Highlands fell ill, and cannot travel. Giles has stayed to take care of him. So like Giles! Always thinking of others before himself. And I know what a disappointment it must be to him. But till he arrives you must put up with Colin and me."

Phyllys tried to hide what she felt. This was indeed a "Waterloo without a Wellington."

Till the dinner-gong sounded, nothing more was heard of Colin. Then the butler solemnly announced: "Mr. Keith is sorry not to come to dinner."

Mrs. Keith made a sharp turn. "Why?"

"Mr. Keith does not wish for any dinner, ma'am."

"Absurd!" she muttered. Then to Phyllys, with a constrained smile: "You and I must make the most of each other. Colin is treating us cavalierly."

"He must be very fond of modelling," the girl said, as they went through the hall.

"A great deal too fond. Such a waste of time."

"Do you think so? My father used to love it. They said he was a born sculptor."

She had a strange impression that her simple words had administered a blow. She glanced a second time, to verify the impression. Tightening lips and drawn brows showed strong feeling of some kind. Not till they were seated did a reply come, couched with evident unconsciousness of the interval:

"There are so many things better worth doing."

Phyllys wisely resolved to avoid a discussion.

Old Mrs. Wyverne, despite opposition from Barbara and exhortations from Miss Robins, on the score of encouraging vanity, had taken care that her grandchild should not do her discredit. Phyllys had only one evening frock, which she wore now; and it was simple, but pretty and in good taste. Perhaps she felt its prettiness a trifle thrown away under present circumstances, yet she enjoyed herself.

The great dining-room, with its sombre ancestral portraits, its heavy silver candelabra, its antique furniture, its massive black-oak sideboard, its well-laid table, with centre-piece of embroidered old-gold satin and hot-house flowers, its butler and footman waiting in deferential silence—all these laid pleasant hold upon her. She had no sense of embarrassment, such as may come with unaccustomed surroundings. Everything seemed natural, and as should be. Travelling abroad in childhood, and being much among grown-up people before the age of thirteen, had given her an ease and an unconsciousness which she could not have acquired in Midfell alone, despite her grandmother's excellent manners.

Great was the contrast between the Castle arrangements and the ultra simplicity of Burn Cottage, yet she behaved as if all her life used to the former. Mrs. Keith, narrowly observant, was more and more satisfied. The slight upset to her equanimity just before dinner, whatever it had meant, passed off, and she talked continuously.

When they returned to the drawing-room, Mr. Dugdale appeared, making at once for Phyllys. Then Colin came in.

He was unlike Giles certainly. He looked very tired, and there were purple shades below the eyes, which had a curious fixed inwardness of expression, as if their owner were forced to gaze at something out of reach for others.

XUM

A hand was lifted between them and the nearer lamp.

"So Giles stole a march upon us, making your acquaintance in the north," he said to Phyllys.

"If he had not, I should not be here now," she replied. Somehow she could not at once feel at her ease with Colin, as she had felt with Giles. He awakened a shy side of her, seldom visible. Giles from the first had drawn her out. Colin unconsciously repressed her. It might have been his inviolable ease of bearing, his curious calm aloofness, which had this effect. Giles possessed a cultivated ease, but Colin's was different; his was an absolute and intrinsic ease, which perhaps nothing in life could disturb. In Giles it was an acquired possession; in Colin it seemed to be an inherited part of himself. "Mrs. Keith says you are fond of modelling."

A shade of interest dawned in the listless manner.

"Do you know anything of it?"

"My father used to model in clay."

"Then you understand the grip it takes upon one."

"Yes; I used to see that. He was a busy clergyman, and had very little spare time. But when he could get to it, he was perfectly happy. I was only ten years old when he died; still, one doesn't forget."

"Perhaps you will take a look at my studio to-morrow?"

"May I? That will be delightful. Are you doing statues?"

"Busts chiefly at present. I may take to statuettes by-and-by. Portrait-sculpture seems to be my line."

"You look as if——" She hesitated, doubtful how far she might venture. The doubt had not assailed her with Giles, yet of the two Colin was the more gentle in voice and manner. He responded to what she had not said.

"One can't stick to work without paying for it; but the game is worth the candle."

"I wonder if it is?" she queried.

The heavy blue eyes, still with that curious oppressed "inward" look, met hers, but could not gaze.

"You are a trifle too keen-sighted," he observed. "Don't betray me, please. There is nothing that I detest like a fuss."

"Would it not be better for you to be quiet and not talk?"

"Thanks; you are kind," was all he said. He took her at her word, and soon beat a retreat. The others did not notice until he was gone. Mrs. Keith drew her lips together, with fresh annoyance. "At it again!" was written on her face.

"Had she really not seen?" silently wondered Phyllys.

Colin did not appear next morning till breakfast was ended, and a cup of tea met his wants. Mrs. Keith was short in manner, as if still offended; but her vexation seemed powerless to ruffle him. Phyllys wondered whether he felt it more than he showed.

She scanned him with interest, in her girlish fashion. A gift to delve below the surface was hers, but as yet it had not been developed; and while he interested, he also baffled her.

Everything in this new world claimed attention, Colin not least. She was keenly conscious of the contrast between his slender outlines and gentle dilettante ease of manner, compared with the muscular vigour and solid force of Giles. That she would like Colin she felt no doubt; perhaps in another fashion from the fashion in which she liked Giles, yet not less real. The plucky way in which he kept up and made himself agreeable, while manifestly suffering, won her admiration; and this morning the charm of his delicate face, with its intellectual development of brow, and the dreamy abstraction which seemed a part of himself, laid hold on her imagination. He was unlike anybody she had hitherto known. She felt herself unable to fathom him; yet she could not wonder that he was so much to Giles. It would be difficult, she thought, to view him with indifference. He might be liked or disliked; he could not be ignored. Her eyes were again and again drawn in his direction, and each time she found herself to be the object of his study.

The night before he had seen a pretty girl in a neat frock, kindly solicitous about himself, but hazily indistinct. Things in general were apt to grow hazy, when overpowering headache had him in its grasp. He would often talk on resolutely, while unable to see across the room, and hardly aware of what he said.

To-day, though not at his best, he could use his faculties, and he recognised that Phyllys was out of the common. The rounded outlines of her slim figure, the wavy flow of hair about her well-shaped head, the subtleties of moulding in cheek and chin, the sweet expressiveness of eyes half hidden under dense fringes, the changeful suggestions of light and shade—these, item after item, found their way to his brain, touching him as artist, not as man. He scrutinised her less as a girl of flesh and blood than as a subject for statuary.

Breakfast over, he strolled through the French window, and indulged in a cigarette; but when Mrs. Keith disappeared, he used his opportunity. Phyllys found him by her side, asking in the soft dragging voice, which at first she had supposed to mean physical weakness, but which she found to be habitual: "Will you come with me now?"

On reaching the distant room which had been lately transformed into a studio, she gave one of her little gasps of pleasure. It appealed powerfully to her artistic instincts—instincts which were hers by inheritance and early cultivation, and which had not been entirely slain by nine years of systematic asphyxiation.

Two skylight windows had been made, with arrangements for shutting off or modifying light from either, and a heavy curtain was partly drawn across the side-window. Near the stove at one end of the long room lay a square of carpet, supporting a sofa and an armchair. To these Phyllys paid no attention. The space remaining was boarded and bare. At the centre stood a modelling-stand, four-legged and heavy, with a revolving top, upon which was something hidden by cloths.

Many framed photographs of famous antique sculptures adorned the walls, varied by three or four fine bas-reliefs. Several statues occupied small pedestals; and on a rough side-table lay plaster casts of limbs and hands, together with odd little wooden tools of quaint shapes, which she touched with pleasure, for they recalled vividly old days.

He led her round, pointing out some fine casts, chiefly from historic masterpieces, which he had lately brought from Italy. They lingered over a bust from the Venus of Milo; and then over the copy of an ancient dilapidated torso, which Phyllys surveyed with dubious eyes.

"I don't think I care about that. It might be anything."

"Ah, but it is grand! The work of a great sculptor. See the moulding, how squarely it is put in. Look at those flat surfaces, and the relation of each to the whole. The main question in sculpture is not so much what a man works at, as how he works at it." Then a pause, and a slow smile. "For the matter of that, the same may be said of all art—painting, music, writing."

"Won't you show me something now that you did yourself when you were abroad?"

"I left them all behind me. Nothing worth bringing back. Here is one attempt since my return."

He led her to a corner of the studio, where stood in shade a head of bronzed plaster upon a stand. "Giles!" was her exclamation. "How like! O how like!" She viewed it from different positions. "It is his very self. And how wonderfully you have given the look in his eyes. Only a little hollow for each eye—and yet they are his!"

"Sure proof that character and expression reside more in the surroundings than in the eyes themselves!"

"And you did this since you came home?"

"Yes. It was hard work to get him to sit; but he granted me an hour at a time under pressure. When he went north I had to do the best I could with photographs. No, I did not attempt the moulding. That was done by a young fellow in the town."

Phyllys's next move was towards the centre modelling-table. She had noticed that he kept clear of that, and her curiosity was awakened. "May I see what you are doing now?" she asked. After a momentary hesitation he complied, removing the damp cloths, and laying bare a child's head in clay, life size, nearly, if not quite, completed.

It was a touching, lovable little face; gentle, half-sad, yet with a tender shy peace on lips and brow. The luxuriant hair was cut low on the forehead, and fell around in heavy waves; and the effect of dark eyes was admirably given, under drooping lids.

"Who is it?"

"Elsye Wallace. She died many years ago."

"Then you have done it from memory?"

"Partly from memory, partly from an oil-painting and some photographs."

"I heard a Dr. Wallace spoken of yesterday."

"He is our medical man. Elsye was his only child."

A chair was near, and Phyllys sat down, resting her cheek on one hand, and gazing earnestly at the head. A smile broke over her face, as if in response to the shy smile on the still face before her.

"You little darling!" she murmured.

Colin stood back, his attention forcibly diverted from his own work to Phyllys. A longing seized him to make a sketch in clay of that pretty girl-head. His fingers ached to reproduce the soft flow of her hair, the delicate moulding of brow and lips. As she sat, she had the precise pose which he would want; and he hardly dared to breathe for fear of arousing her, of making her move. He was trying to learn every curve of it by heart, so that he might be able to replace her in the same attitude. When, in response to searching observation, she turned, she caught the gleam of that gaze from under a penthouse of slender fingers.

He at once explained. "I am wondering whether you would let me make a study of your head while you are with us."

"Mine! But why? Yes, if you like. That would be rather fun."

He was replacing the wet cloths, and she observed: "You won't try to work at that to-day? You know you can't."

He finished what he was doing, and then said: "But when Giles comes home, you must be less keen, please. I don't betray myself to him, if I can help it. And"—after a pause—"don't name to him this bust of Elsye Wallace."

"I won't, of course, if you would rather not."

"I would rather you should not. Now, shall we go back?"

In the hall they were joined by Mrs. Keith, who showed anything but pleasure on hearing where Phyllys had been. "I have hunted for you everywhere," she complained. "Such a pity to waste your time in that stuffy studio—and bad for Colin too."

"The skylight was open," remarked Colin. "Phyllys has kindly consented to let me make a model of her head."

Mrs. Keith's movement was of strong protest.

"You will not do anything so ridiculous."

"I can hardly conceive anything less ridiculous, supposing the attempt to be successful."

"Phyllys has come here to enjoy herself."

"But, indeed, I shall enjoy that," urged Phyllys. "I love anything that has to do with modelling."

Mrs. Keith's face darkened.

"'How like! Oh, how like!'"

"I would rather that it should be given up," she said in a hard, rasping tone.

Colin made no verbal reply. The mother's and son's eyes met; and Phyllys, watching, realised a trial of strength between the two.

Suddenly the mother's eyes sank, and she spoke in a subdued voice, conquered and sullen. "Of course, you will do as you choose. My wishes are of no importance."

"Of very great importance, but one has sometimes to follow one's own judgment. Some day I hope you will see with me. Shall I show Phyllys the church this morning?"

"No." Her tone was rude in its annoyance. "She is coming with me."

"Then I will go for a ride," in a voice of unruffled courtesy.

CHAPTER XI.

OF SCULPTOR AND SITTER.

NEXT day brought to light fresh aspects of the new world in which Phyllys was plunged.

To her the change had come as a veritable plunge, involving those sensations of shock and breathlessness which a dip in the sea is apt to produce. Not in any disagreeable sense, but with a bracing and arousing effect.

Her hour in the studio had awakened her mind to new thought, new feeling. The masterpieces shown by Colin had touched her more deeply than would be understood by anybody possessing no inborn love of art. In Phyllys this love was inherited, and in childhood it had received careful cultivation—first from her father, a gifted artist; then from her mother, in loving recollection of that father who had educated his wife in the same direction.

All the ten years at Midfell, though trained to outward submission, she had silently fought against dictums which went in the teeth of her parents' teaching. To some extent she had been moulded by persistent pressure, had taken shape and colour as a plant under training can be educated into new forms. But, like such a plant, she had a strong tendency to "revert" on the first chance; and here was her chance.

Colin fascinated her. His personal beauty—a type of beauty due less to outline of feature, though that outline was fine, than to expression, and his apartness from common life, were both so unlike aught she had ever come across, that she could not dismiss them from her thoughts.

"I like him," she said to herself more than once. He was different from Giles, and Giles was her friend. Colin might in time become her friend also; but of this she was doubtful. Despite his ease of bearing, she could not get to know him so quickly as she had got—or had seemed to get—to know Giles. Below the easy demeanour she reached soon a firm surface; and whether she would be able to penetrate that surface, time alone could show.

For two hours daily did Colin lay claim upon Phyllys, and she granted what he asked, albeit not easily. Mrs. Keith had ceased from verbal protestation, but every possible obstacle was put in the way, though in so subtle a fashion as hardly to be defined.

Phyllys found her first morning in the studio charming. Colin was at his best; ready for talk, quietly gay. She had begged to watch the process from the very beginning; and she stood gazing with delight at his deft handling of clay, as he filled in and covered over the light framework of lead piping; shaped roughly the shoulders over cross-pieces of wood designed for their support; and added lumps of clay, which, with firm touches, he formed into nose, chin, ears, giving each in turn a slight general resemblance to her own. It seemed to her that his task would be a bagatelle, he advanced so fast. When she said so, he broke into his noiseless laugh.

"This is preparation, not work. If you had not asked to come in, it would have been done before I troubled you."

He went to and fro between the large and small room, bringing handfuls of the moist clay, remarking once, "A great sculptor would have a boy to keep him supplied."

"You will be a great sculptor some day," she declared confidently.

The opinion had no weight, yet he smiled. He was in a frame to be easily pleased. For one thing, the sun shone; for another, he was free from headache; for a third, he felt that his sitter would bring inspiration. With all his outward placidity, Colin was a genuine artist in temperament; a weather barometer, a creature of moods.

"Do all sculptors work as fast as you?" she asked.

"There are different modes. Not only one excellent way. Some do it more slowly, adding tiny pellets, not lumps. Each has to follow the method by which he can produce the best results. The broader and quicker method suits me."

"You seem to build it up," she murmured.

"That is the essence of clay-modelling. It is a literal building up. In marble sculpture one has the reverse—carving away material, and leaving the figure exposed."

"You mean—it was there all the time, shut up in prison, and it had to be set free," she suggested, with a happy little laugh.

That brought his eyes upon her. "Precisely. But only a sculptor can see it there, before he cuts away the mass that hides it."

Colin had made a rough little clay sketch of Phyllys in the attitude which first attracted him, and this rendered it easy to place her anew in the same position. The worst of it was that she had to gaze at a bust on a table, and could no longer watch his manipulations. Time passed slowly. When she had sat for a quarter of an hour, it seemed like a full hour, and to maintain the exact position was difficult. She tried to find entertainment in chatting about Midfell and her home-folk, but his absent murmurs of assent acted as a check, and she sank into silence, which soon meant an expression hopelessly "dead." He had to arouse himself that he might arouse her.

This first day all went well, and he proved merciful, allowing frequent rests.

In days following the work advanced more slowly; nay, even seemed to stand still. Colin could not satisfy himself.

He would stand often doing nothing, gazing steadfastly at his sitter, with an air of calm aloofness, as if trying to read her very soul. The aloofness prevented any self-consciousness on her part. Sometimes she wondered what it was that he saw or wished to see in her; sometimes she had a sense that he saw deeper than other men—than Giles, for example. But all the while she recognised that he looked upon her as his "sitter" pure and simple. He was studying his model for artistic purposes. He was not troubling himself to know Phyllys Wyverne more intimately for her own sake.

Then, when fifty minutes of endurance were ended, he would move, would hope she was not tired, would offer her the armchair, would ask whether she minded a cigarette, would become in a moment transformed from the intent artist to the pleasant host. She found in him a dual nature; not, like that of Giles, simple, homogeneous, the same throughout. One hour he was artist; another hour he was man.

Perhaps she admired him more as artist, and liked him more as man; but the combination had power, and his very aloofness excited in her a wish to win his approbation.

By the fifth day she knew that things were going ill. Colin was not pleased with his own work. He foresaw that this bust would be less of a success than that of Elsye Wallace; and the harder he toiled, the less he got on. He was gaining a worn look, his features becoming colourless and sharply-drawn, like a fine cameo. Phyllys longed to advise a day's holiday, but did not venture.

A rap at the door made him lift troubled eyes, and a box was brought in from the moulder, containing, as he knew, the cast of Elsye. "Put it down," he murmured, and bent anew to his modelling. It was characteristic of him that he should bestow his whole energy on the task in hand, and should have no thought to spare for the task completed. But presently, finding his sitter hopelessly "flat," he suggested an adjournment, and at her request took out the cast, placing it on a pedestal.

"It is lovely!" Phyllys said. "Are you not glad?* Don't you feel proud of having done it?" She gave herself a stretch, and sat down on the sofa, while Colin threw himself dejectedly into the armchair, with a hand over his eyes. "Isn't it almost perfect?"

"I don't know."

She watched him for some seconds in silence.

"Ought you to do any more to-day?"

There was a short laugh. "Certainly I ought—if I can. That is the question."

"It seems getting on so nicely," she ventured.

"It's a dead failure," he replied.

"I suppose people don't know their own faces well. It seems to me all right."

"It's not you. I can't get at yourself."

She smiled, not ill-pleased. "But you don't expect to put my real self straight off into a lump of clay?"

"If I can't, I'm no sculptor."

Phyllys's next remark was commonplace. "You've got my nose and mouth all right."

He laughed again. "If that were all! The veriest tyro could do that. An artist aims higher."

Her eyes questioned him wistfully.

"True art means much more than making a copy," he murmured. "It means interpretation; not copying. There's a lack of soul in what I have done. You have an elusive personality. I can't get at your true inwardness. Yet I'm not usually a duffer at character-reading."

She repeated the word "Inwardness?"

"Your true self—your soul—your inner being."

She waited for more, and he said dreamily: "There is a soul to every outward form of beauty, and an underlying meaning."

"I don't think I understand."

Her face pleaded for further elucidation, and he forced himself to respond.

"In art each body has a soul—that is to say, in Nature, with which art deals, which art interprets. One has to get at the soul before interpretation is possible. A superficial resemblance is nothing. People who condemn love of the beautiful know nothing beyond outlines. Every thought of man may find outward expression, in word or in shape; and the outward expression is the body; the thought from which it sprang is the soul. Every thought of God may—perhaps must—find expression in word or in form ; and there, again, that which is manifest is the body, but the Divine underlying thought is the soul of that which is manifested. If once you realise this, I don't think you will be in danger of undervaluing beauty of form."

"I don't think I am," she said to herself. Then, smiling, "I'm rather glad it is not easy to know me at first sight."

"Much of you is easy, but you have many facets. When I think I have reached the true Phyllys, I find myself mistaken. One day you are one thing, next day another. My aim is to get to the background of these variations."

"I wonder how you mean to accomplish that?" she said laughingly.

She had recalled him to his purpose. He leaned forward, examining her with a penetrative gaze. She met it firmly, determined on resistance. He should not fathom her one inch further than she permitted. She would be as elusive as she chose

But those blue eyes had power, tired and aching though they were. They differed altogether from Giles's eyes ; and they were reaching down, far below the superficies of her being. If this was a trial of strength between the two, she knew already that he was getting the mastery. She could not veil from him what he meant to see. Despite her will-refusal, he was getting into touch with her true "inward" self. He was stronger than she. She knew it, and resented the fact, and yet she was oddly glad.

An abrupt consciousness dawned upon her that this meant more than mere artistic interest. How much more she could not tell ; but she was aware of a change. The indifference, the "apartness," had vanished. Her eyes fell slowly before his.

Colin had never seen her thus. He would hardly have thought it possible that she should wear so winning an aspect, though he had for days analysed every line in her face.

"On the brink of this she stood, glancing round cautiously."—p. 864.

This was no matter of lines, and though as sculptor he thought less of colouring than of form, yet the pretty flush, the half-troubled curve of coral lips, the sweetness of fringed downcast eyes, laid hold upon him. If she was a being of many facets, he was the same, and a facet of hers touched squarely a facet of his at that moment.

"I have come upon the real Phyllys at last," he was saying to himself ; and he said it with a joy which was only in part artistic. Phyllys said nothing. She only felt. She only knew that Colin was reading her still, and that she could not meet his gaze.

A harsh voice broke the pause. "So! you are using Phyllys for a model? How is that, pray?"

Phyllys looked up in blank amaze. This—Giles! This—her Midfell friend, her rescuer!

He stood almost between them, facing the fireplace, his back to the long room; upright, tall, solid; his hands clenched, and an extraordinary blaze of yellow light in his eyes, like that of a wild beast. Wrath transformed the whole face. Its ordinary deep red was exchanged for a mottled pallor. He had come in at the door behind Colin, and three or four steps had brought him to his present position.

Phyllys's offered hand was unnoticed or ignored, and she let it drop, stiffening into girlish dignity. If Giles felt no pleasure at seeing her, she would show no pleasure at seeing him. Colin's first movement had been a perceptible start, but he replied now in his lowest, most dragging voice:

"Yes; I'm making a study of her head. Not a successful one, I'm afraid. You didn't let us know you were coming to-day."

Giles seemed to awake to the fact that he had not greeted his guest. He went nearer, put out his hand, and muttered some unintelligible sounds. She responded coldly, and he turned from her with a sharp passionate movement, towards the bust of Elsye Wallace, standing prominently on a pedestal.

Phyllys instantly recalled that Colin did not wish him to know of it. She wondered, had he seen that on his first entrance?

But no. Plainly this was his first glimpse, and plainly it stupified him. The surprise was not a pleasant one. Giles stood gazing at the head; his hand still clenched, his face set as in iron.

"That was not to have been seen," observed Colin.

The words, meant in explanation, seemed to put a finish to Giles's anger. He swung round, and strode blindly away, knocking as he passed against the heavy modelling-stand with such force that the bust of Phyllys was hurled to the ground. But Giles made no pause. He disappeared, and his step could be heard retreating heavily along the passage.

Phyllys half spoke, but checked herself. Colin sat down, resting his brow on both hands.

"What an awful duffer I am!" he murmured.

"But nobody knew Giles was coming," ventured Phyllys.

"One might have expected it any day."

"I don't see why he was vexed."

Silence answered her. She knew from his look that, whatever there was to learn, she would not hear it from Colin.

"You won't work any more now, will you?" was the only remark she could think of.

"I don't think I can."

Another break.

"Had I better go? Mrs. Keith said she would want me."

He stood up to open the door, a trifle relieved, she thought, at the suggestion; and she carefully refrained from a glance towards the overturned bust. Outside, she remembered that she had left a book, and she went back—to find Colin flung prone on the sofa, with shut eyes. The bust still lay where it had fallen.

"Couldn't I get anything for you?" she asked gravely. "Your head is bad!"

"Rather! No—nothing I want, thanks. Is that your book? I'll have a lazy hour."

Phyllys went again, feeling flat. This was not the manner of meeting with Giles that she had pictured. She was sorely disappointed by his seeming indifference, and his extraordinary display of temper had left an unpleasant impression. Could it be that he objected to Colin making a model of her head? But that would be childish! Why should he mind?

CHAPTER XII.

OF AN INADVERTENT DISCOVERY.

IT was one of those links in the chain of life which present themselves unsought—which at the moment seem unimportant, yet which have a grave bearing upon one's happiness at some after period.

Phyllys had no thought of making any discovery. Indeed, she did not recognise it as such, when she had made it.

Her mind that day was bent upon the disappointing nature of human friendships. Not that she used such phraseology. She only said to herself that it was "horrid," and wished Giles would be his former self.

Little had been seen of him since his arrival. At luncheon he was sombre and silent, and Phyllys treated him with dignity. Colin looked ill, ate nothing, and talked like a machine wound up. Since luncheon he too had been invisible.

It was now between five and six o'clock, and Phyllys sat alone with Mrs. Keith. Rain fell heavily, keeping them in, and keeping callers away. Mrs. Keith knew nothing of the studio scene; but she had noted with inward dismay Phyllys's bearing at luncheon, not only towards Giles, but towards Colin; and she used this opportunity to descant on the excellences of dear Giles's fine character, of the beautiful devotion which had always existed between him and Colin, of the manner in which, years earlier, he had been wont to deny himself pleasure and amusement that he might sit for hours beside Colin in a darkened room, and make time pass for the invalid.

"If you had the least idea how Colin used to suffer, you really wouldn't wonder at my anxiety about him," she observed. "Often, for days together, he could hardly endure a glimmer of light, or a voice above a whisper. One dreads what might bring all that back. And Colin never can do anything without working up himself into a state of excitement."

She reverted to the merits of Giles.

"There is something about the dear fellow so grand, so unlike the common run of men. He has such control over himself. Colin is a very dear fellow too, of course; still, his is the weaker nature. The smaller nature in every way."

But if Mrs. Keith, for reasons of her own, designed to turn Phyllys from Colin to Giles, she went to work the wrong way.

"Tiresome!" she muttered. "This silk will not do. I must get the other piece."

"What piece? Can I find it for you?"

"Thanks very much, if it will not be a trouble. I don't want to disarrange these things by moving. It is a square of crimson silk, larger than this. You will see it, lying on the shelf, just inside one of my black-oak cabinets—there are two in my room, you know. The one that is unlocked, on the right side as you go in."

Phyllys ran lightly upstairs, thinking still of Giles and his altered demeanour. Suddenly she found herself face to face with him. He looked so sombre that she could not resist giving him a little smile, and his face relaxed instantly.

"I have seen nothing of you yet," he observed. "But to-morrow——"

"Are you going out now?"

"I am obliged—unfortunately. But, if I might count on you in the morning for a walk,—would you come? We have no fells or mountain streams; still, you shall see something pretty."

Phyllys demurred, for she had hitherto devoted the better part of her mornings to the studio. But it would not do to let Colin feel that he had her at his beck and call. Her proud little spirit rose up in protest; all the more because that morning she had felt his power.

"I should rather like a good walk," she said demurely; and his face, which had grown rigid under her hesitation, lighted up anew. She could not but see the change.

"Then I may reckon on you?" he said, and he said no more. The silence, interpreted by his look, was eloquent.

Friends still! That was what it said.

She gave him one slight flash, as she ran off. And with regard to him, as with regard to Colin, questioning arose. Was it with the one no more than artist interest? Was it with the other no more than friendship?

Phyllys made no serious attempt to find a reply. She only knew that it was very delightful, after years of snubbing, to find herself the object of so much kind and warm feeling.

On reaching Mrs. Keith's bedroom, her recollections were confused. She could not recall what had been said. A black-oak cabinet, unlocked—so much remained in mind. Turning to the left, she pulled the door of the cabinet on that side, and it opened. Within she saw no crimson silk lying on the shelf. A pile of shawls and old cloaks had been untidily heaped together in the space below; and she disturbed the pile, pulling it partly out, searching for the silk which might have fallen. So doing, she came on something behind—a good-sized, half-length portrait in a black frame. The light fell full upon it, and a pair of clear blue eyes, earnest, dreamy, observant, met her own. "How like!" she exclaimed.

She lifted it carefully out. The style of dress belonged to a bygone period, and the face as a whole was hardly that of Colin; but the look in the eyes was not to be mistaken. It was, perhaps, a resemblance less of form and colour than of the spirit which gleamed through.

"Some near relative," she conjectured. "But why keep it hidden away here? How droll people are! Well, I must hurry."

Convinced at last that the silk was not within the cabinet, she restored the portrait to its former position, piled the clothes in front of it as before, and tried to shut the door.

Then she saw that it had been locked, and that the hasp had failed to catch, remaining outside. No key was visible. She recollected Mrs. Keith's words: "On the right side as you go in." This cabinet stood on the left.

She went to the second cabinet, found that to be genuinely unlocked, and at once saw the crimson silk. She caught it up, and ran downstairs.

"I'm sorry to have been so long," she said: "I opened the wrong cabinet by mistake. Somebody had locked it in a hurry, and had not shut it first, and I forgot all about right and left. So I wasted time, hunting for the silk,

I could not help noticing that old oil painting under the things. The one that has such a look of Colin, I mean. Rather a young man, and in a queer old-fashioned dress—a fashion very far back. I wondered whether it might be Colin's grandfather, and whether he was dressed for theatricals."

She stopped, for the colour had departed from Mrs. Keith's face, leaving one uniform whiteness.

"Are you faint?" she asked in concern. "May I get anything for you?"

"Thanks, no; it is nothing. I shall be all right directly. So stupid of me!" And Mrs. Keith smiled. "I have had three or four such turns lately, without any cause. Really, I shall have to ask Dr. Wallace for a tonic—only I do so dislike the man."

"Well"—and she pressed her handkerchief to her lips—"now I am better. What were you saying just before the faintness came on? Something about—how absurd of me to forget! My head is quite confused."

"Only that old oil-painting in your cabinet. I thought it must be some near relation, because of the likeness to Colin." She would not suggest that it might represent Mrs. Keith's husband, though the idea had occurred to her mind. A wife would hardly bury her husband's portrait beneath a pile of old clothes.

"Ah! to be sure—yes. I remember now. An old painting of my brother Jock—Colin's uncle. Not nearly so old, of course, as it looks. The artist had a fancy to do it in that style. You are right about the dress. It was for some theatricals. He was particularly good in acting—very much in request. You found the silk?"

Phyllys gave it to her, remarking, "I had not heard of your brother."

"Really; but probably you would not. Jock has been out so long in Australia, never once coming home, that friends hardly remember his existence. He is a wretched correspondent—never writes. I dare say he has sobered down now, but once upon a time he was rather wild."

"Had you not better rest?" asked the girl, pitying those blanched lips.

"It really is of no consequence. I am used to such turns, and I think nothing of them. I suppose they arise from a touch of heart-weakness. One word, before anyone comes. Phyllys, I am going to treat you as a friend. There is something about you that invites confidence. You are true, I am sure—always true."

Phyllys waited, perplexed.

"That old portrait——" Mrs. Keith stopped, her lips working nervously. "It belongs to my past. Almost no one living, except myself, knows of its existence. I particularly wish that others should not know."

Phyllys made a sound of assent.

"I have painful associations with it—so painful that I can hardly bear even to see it. I simply could not bear to hear it discussed. There are reasons, which I am not able to explain. It is a tale belonging to my past. Perhaps I ought to acknowledge that I was, in a measure, to blame—that I did not act quite rightly. But there are things that cannot be undone, however sincerely one may regret one's own action. Do you see what I mean? The very sight of that old painting makes me miserable for days, bringing up so many sad memories. That is why I keep it hidden. It always has been hidden, since the death of my beloved husband."

"But Colin knows——" This was said involuntarily.

"Not even Colin. He has not an idea of its existence. And I particularly wish that he should not know. He would be so annoyed to think that I had not told him earlier. And I cannot! cannot! The whole subject is too painful! It is too much wrapped up in sad memories. And Colin, as you must have seen, is peculiar. One cannot always foretell how he will take a thing."

"Of course, I should not think of saying a word, if you would rather I should not."

"That is what I was going to ask. If you had kept to my directions, you would not have opened the wrong cabinet. It happened that I had to go to that one early this afternoon, and no doubt I slipped the lock. But, under the circumstances, I think I have a right to ask your promise never to mention the portrait to anybody without my leave. It would mean no end of discussion and explanation—raking up of the past, and great pain to myself. There are subjects far better put out of mind and forgotten, when one can no longer set things right."

"You mean, if the person is dead whom one has wronged?" suggested Phyllys, trying to meet the case.

Mrs. Keith made a nervous movement. "I said nothing about wronging anyone. But when people have died—well, yes, that was the sort of thing that I meant. So you will give me your solemn promise, on your word of honour——"

It seemed to Phyllys a considerable fuss about nothing; but she replied readily: "Yes, of course. I promise never to mention the picture to anybody, unless you give me leave. I'm sorry I went to the wrong cabinet."

"It really is of no consequence, my dear. All that I wish is to avoid tiresome discussions. The picture is of no concern to anybody, except to my brother and myself. The artist was a nobody. Now we may dismiss the subject. I think I must have some sal volatile after all. I feel so queer still. Thanks, no; I had better go myself. It will do me good to move."

She mounted the wide staircase, stepping languidly, till within her room. Then her manner changed. Her face darkened, and the lips grew hard. She bolted the door, and went to the left-hand cabinet, finding it as described by Phyllys. "How insane of me!" she muttered. She turned the picture with its face to the back of the cabinet, and paused to consider.

"No. Now it has been seen, it shall not stay there. I must put it somewhere else."

Her eyes wandered round the room, and she walked to a large cupboard, within which lay a flat wooden box, strong in make. This, with some difficulty, she drew out and opened. It contained several handsome discarded summer gowns, too old-fashioned for use. She had a weakness for storing away disused articles of dress.

In the bottom of the box she laid the portrait, face downwards, finding just sufficient room for its admittance. Over it she spread a folded woollen shawl, and over that the gowns neatly folded. Then she shut down the lid, turned the key, pushed the box back to its former position, closed the cupboard door, and turned to lock the cabinet.

A glitter was in her large eyes, and paleness had given place to a spot of deep red in either cheek. "I must not risk anything of that sort again," she muttered.

The cabinet key was on a small bunch that she carried always in her pocket. The other key had been left hitherto in the box; but now she held it clenched in her hand, with a look of determination.

She left the room, ran down the back stairs into the garden, and walked swiftly to the nearer kitchen garden, at the lower end of which was a small and rather deep pond, fed by a spring. On the brink of this she stood, glancing round cautiously, to see if anybody were within view. Then into the middle of the pond she threw the box-key. It vanished with a splash.

"That will do," she muttered, and she turned away, breathing quickly.

When again in her room she rested for an hour, but at dinner her face was haggard.

CHAPTER XIII.

OF LEVEL PLAINS.

NO question arose next morning as to studio work, for Colin did not appear. "One of his worst headaches," explained Mrs. Keith. "His own fault entirely, poor dear boy! If only he would not be always fussing over that ridiculous modelling!"

Phyllys fired up in his defence, and Giles looked strangely at her. She was rather ashamed of her little outburst the next moment. What had vexed her most was the calling of Colin "poor." Whether she liked him or Giles the more she could not have told, but there was no question about her admiration for Colin. She regarded him as one gifted beyond the common run of mankind.

No more was said, and the walk came about as a matter of course. It was a perfect morning, and she might have congratulated herself on being in the open air, instead of having to sit for the main part of two hours like a waxen image; only such congratulation seemed unkind to Colin. She felt it to be hard upon him that, whatever he set himself to do, should be hampered by ill-health, and systematically opposed by the one individual of whose sympathy he ought to have been sure. Giles had everything—good health, vigour of mind and body, wealth, position, and the special favour of Colin's mother. And yet, Phyllys felt that, had the choice been offered to her, whether to possess Giles' many gifts or Colin's one supreme gift, she would have had no hesitation in choosing the latter.

"Anybody may be strong and rich," she thought. "But to have genius—that is best of all—that is beyond and above everything." In her girlish judgment no doubt existed that Colin's power held the Divine spark, which means something so very much more than mere talent.

Presently she woke up to the fact of her own abstraction, and her consequent silence. A side-glance revealed the intense gravity of her companion's look. Their eyes met, and he said:

"You are thoughtful to-day."

"'What made you come all this way, Gordon?'"—p. 866.

She would not let slip the subject of her thoughts. He and she were friends; but she had her reservations. Who has not, with even the dearest of friends? Two days earlier she might have chatted frankly of Colin and his pursuit; but now she was not able. She could not forget the experience of the day before, and Giles' anger. The latter had made her a little afraid of a false step; and she was still more afraid of awakening in herself any renewed sensations of consciousness with respect to either Colin or Giles. It was safer to cork down such possibilities, and to keep to surface topics.

So she launched out into light chatter about Castle Hill and Midfell, making little jests, laughing, and doing her best to make him laugh also.

For the moment she succeeded in her aim. Her winsome ways captivated him anew; and his very silence, the sombre gravity of his eyes, the reluctance of his smile, his intense absorption in what she was and said, all drew her out, making it easy to pour forth her ideas, to open out herself.

But even as he drew her out, she was alive to the contrast between this morning and previous mornings. Being with Giles after being with Colin was like walking on a level plain after climbing a mountain peak. The simplicity, the naturalness, the whole-heartedness, were refreshing; yet she found herself longing for the mountain-heights once more.

The two men were different in mind as in body. With Colin she had a sense of her own inferiority; a consciousness of being pulled to a higher level. She was fascinated, and half afraid; not sure how far she understood, and eager to understand more; delighted when he responded to aught that she said, and ready at any moment to fall flat, if he treated a remark of hers with polite indifference.

With Giles she had no particular sense of inferiority, unless in respect of muscles. She was aware of her power over him, and aware that she could make him like her—perhaps to any extent. She knew that he did like her, and that she could touch his happiness. She was dimly aware at this moment that something connected with herself was making him unhappy.

Once Giles had had the feeling that he could do what he chose with Phyllys. That had been a momentary sensation, true at the instant, but fleeting. In the studio, on his entrance, he had known that Colin could do what he willed with Phyllys; and the overwhelming pain and mad wrath which at the sight had carried him away, would have fully opened his eyes, had they not been opened already, to the engrossing nature of his love.

To-day it was Phyllys who felt, with a vivid realisation, that she could do what she liked with Giles; that she could twist this big powerful man, if she would, round her slim little finger.

The sense of command was delicious, as it generally is. And yet—yet—when a vision arose of the studio, and of Colin's delicate absorbed face, with penetrative eyes searching into her very soul, she knew that she would rather be there than here, even though she had no such sense of control over him, and could no more twist him round her finger than she could turn aside a locomotive on its iron road or the winds of heaven in their paths.

Not that she definitely preferred Colin to Giles. Giles was her friend; Colin had not even sought her friendship. But to some women there is a greater charm in the sense of being controlled by than in having control over the personality of another. And Colin attracted her strongly. She wanted to watch him again at his work, to study his curiously dual nature, to learn from his murmured suggestions, to grasp his high ideals, to possess his lofty views of life, to breathe the mental and spiritual atmosphere which he breathed. Giles awoke in her no such cravings. She was not sure that he would even understand what they meant.

Phyllys pulled herself up. This was heterodox to her friend. She remembered all that Giles had been to her, not only in saving her life at risk to his own, which probably any man passing would have done, or tried to do, but in his cousinly kindness, day after day. She was actually forgetting anew to talk to him. Pretty apologetic eyes went in his direction.

"I am afraid you are tired?" he said.

"I? I'm never tired!"

"We are there now, and you will be able to rest," he said, with a smile of unmistakeable melancholy.

He had promised "something pretty," and he kept his word. The spot to which he led her was beside a river, broad and swift; not chestnut-hued or broken by stones with swirls of white foam and gleams of golden light, yet a most fair scene, after a more ordinary type of English rural beauty than that about Midfell. An arched stone bridge spanned the stream, cows clustered under its shadow, and on the other side flags grew in abundance. On their own side of the water, which faithfully reflected the tint of heaven, a clump of willows sparkled in the sunshine.

This was what Giles had pictured to himself beforehand, and Phyllys exclaimed in admiration. He found her a seat, and she sank afresh into silence, forgetting to talk, lost in a dream, her cheek supported on one ungloved hand, her lashes dropped till they veiled her eyes.

It was the very attitude which had inspired Colin's artistic scene. It inspired another sense in Giles.

He could not turn his gaze from her. Not that he was seeking, like Colin, to penetrate her soul. He was only enchained, taken captive, helplessly at her mercy. He was not analysing his own feelings. He was not good at self-analysing, and words never flowed readily with him, even in the secret chambers of his mind. But without words, without any attempt at verbal definition of his sensations, he realised to the very tips of his fingers that to have Phyllys thus by his side, alone with himself, was absolute happiness; that to have her always as his own would be—Heaven. And then, with a great throb of pain, he realised also that not to have her, never to possess her, would be——

He dared not face that possibility. It was almost enough to unman him. Cold drops broke out on his forehead.

What was she musing about, as she sat there, sweet as a rosebud, not dreaming of the vehement passion of love and longing which shook to his depths the strong man at her side? She was not occupied with him—that, at least, he saw. Yet his compelling gaze drew her attention slowly, and she at length looked up, with a little sigh of pleasure.

"People who don't love beautiful things must lose a great deal of happiness."

Giles thought so too, feasting his eyes on a beauty that was not of inanimate nature.

"Colin says beauty is Divine," she murmured, and the words struck him with a hard shock. Though not so utterly taken by surprise as on the day before, he felt a flame of wrath flush through his frame, making every nerve tingle.

He thought he had known before, and now he knew that he had only conjectured. It was then—Colin! Colin had stolen her from him. Colin, his more than brother! Colin, whom he had loved as he loved his own soul! A wave of fierce resentment rushed into the brotherly affection which had bound these two together since earliest infancy.

"Don't you think so too?" she asked, smiling, and turning towards him.

The smile died out. He could not control his face, and what she saw startled her.

"Are you vexed with anything I have said?" she asked seriously.

"Never!" He strove ineffectually to clear the thickness from his voice. "I never could be vexed with you. It is only"—he had difficulty in speaking, and she looked at him with perplexed eyes—"only a passing thought—a recollection. If I was vexed, it was with somebody else, not you!" Then, with a severe effort, he mastered himself. "You were saying something about beauty being Divine. Colin's idea, was it not?"

"But you did not quite like that, so we can talk about something else," she said, with a touch of reserve, a drawing back, which wounded him to the quick.

"I should like you to explain," he entreated.

"Colin could explain better than I can. You should ask Colin. Why, there is Gordon!" she cried. "Here we are, Gordon! Come along!" at the sight of a small boy.

Gordon Alyn marched composedly up, with failing legs, and an aggressive six-foot air.

"I say, you have brought me an awful long way," he declared. "Mother says Phyllys has got to come to lunch with her to-day."

"Of course I will, and if we start directly we shall be in splendid time." She jumped up, almost too eagerly. The sense of relief was patent, and it meant a fresh stab for Giles. He walked down to the water's edge to recover himself. Gordon surveyed his broad back, then turned to Phyllys.

"I say! Have a bite?"

He extended benignly a red-cheeked apple, well dented on one side.

"No, thanks. What made you come all this way, Gordon?"

"Mother wanted you. 'Course, I came," said Gordon.

[END OF CHAPTER THIRTEEN.]

INFINITE AND INFINITESIMAL.

By the Rev. J. Monro Gibson, D.D.

"But will God indeed dwell on the earth? behold, the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain Thee; how much less this house that I have builded."—1 KINGS viii. 27.

In a certain class of our modern literature it is sometimes strongly asserted, and often quietly assumed, that Jehovah of Israel was only a tribal god, who might or might not find his match in the gods of the nations round about. It is easy to make this notion plausible enough by quoting passages in which Jehovah is spoken of as "The God of Israel," though it would be just as reasonable to attempt to prove that He was only the God of one man by quoting passages which speak of Him as "the God of Jacob"; and, moreover, it may be quite possible to show that in dark times and among ignorant people the vulgar idea of God was no better than in the countries round about, just as it would no doubt be possible to find some ignorant people in our own land with even grosser notions of God than many of the heathen have. But those who know their Bible cannot be deceived by such fallacies, for they at once think of the innumerable passages in which Jehovah God of Israel is spoken of not as God of Israel only, but of the whole earth, and of the universe; such passages as those that speak of Him as having made "the heavens and the earth and all that are in them," as "from everlasting to everlasting God," or as "inhabiting eternity." Surely a tribal god would not need quite so much space!

It is the custom among these same people, while admitting that the Hebrew prophets and many of their saints were inspired, to assert or insinuate that it was the same kind of inspiration as is found in the great men of other nations. Suppose we try a simple test of this. If there is any production of very ancient times which, more than another, might lay claim to the inspiration of genius, it would be the poems which have been ascribed to Homer. Solomon was a man of genius undoubtedly, but no literary critic would think of putting him alongside of Homer. When earthly things are spoken of, the Greek is clearly in advance of the Hebrew. When heavenly things are spoken of, how completely is the order reversed! Compare their conceptions of God. We shall say nothing of the multitudes of gods and goddesses which come trooping into Homer's story in season and out of season, for it might be thought enough to say that the Hebrew nation was monotheistic, and the Greek polytheistic. How that difference came about would still remain a question; but leave that aside. Take Homer's conception of the supreme God, the mighty ruler of Olympus, and as such, the ruler over all. When Thetis wings her flight from the Plains of Troy to snowy Olympus, she finds the great Jupiter gone to Egypt to a dinner party, and before she can tell him what has happened she has to wait a longer time for his return than it would take a Cook's tourist to make the same journey now. Of course, modern astronomy makes it quite impossible to believe in such a god as the Jupiter of Homer, but it only illustrates the amazing reach of thought which led Solomon to say of Jehovah God of Israel, "Behold, the heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain Thee."

As so often happens, what is intended to discredit the Bible and do away with its inspiration is the very thing which exalts it more than ever to those who take the trouble to think. It might be no very great marvel for a man of literary ability in our day to write about God in the majestic strain of these magnificent passages in the Old Testament, for he has to inspire him all the wonders of Nature which modern investigation has disclosed; but the miracle is that men who knew nothing of all this could do it, and not only so, but do it far better than it can be done by the very big men of our day who know all about these things. Let us take as a specimen Isaiah xl. 12-18. That was written, remember, by a man who never heard of spectrum analysis, who did not know the velocity of light, who had not the least conception of the extraordinary magnitude and the immeasurable distance of the heavenly bodies, a man who actually did not know of any world bigger than the earth on which he lived, and not only so, but had not the least idea that the earth was anything like as large as we now know it to be—so narrow, so very narrow were his ideas of the universe; and yet when he speaks of the God of the universe he speaks of Him in strains so exalted that not one of us who know all about these modern discoveries could come near it, if we were to try our very best. What does that mean? Genius? Yes, perhaps; but more: it means inspiration—inspiration of a very different kind from that which thrilled the lofty poetic soul of Homer when he wrote of gods and men.

There is another unparalleled glory in the Bible representations of God. Side by side with these magnificent passages, in which are set forth His infinite majesty, there is usually some tender touch which reminds us of His fatherly care and love. The two truths are continually set over against each other, so that the one may properly balance the other; His infinite greatness on the one hand, His minute attention on the other. There has always been a tendency to sacrifice the one to the other which the Bible alone has been able to counteract. Those who are strongly impressed with the infinity of God as seen in Nature are apt to lose their faith in His fatherly care; while those who have, like the ancient Greeks, made the gods to dwell on earth, have lost the sense of the divine infinity and eternity. But see how the two things stand side by side in the sacred scriptures: "Thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, Whose name is Holy: I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a humble and contrite spirit." There are many such passages in the Psalms, of which we shall only quote two: "Sing unto God, sing praises to His name: extol Him that rideth upon the heavens . . . A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows, is God in His holy habitation" (Ps. lxviii. 4, 5). "The Lord doth build up Jerusalem; He gathereth together the outcasts of Israel. He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds. He telleth the number of the stars; He giveth them all their names. Great is our Lord, and mighty in power; His understanding is infinite. The Lord upholdeth the meek" (Ps. cxlvii. 2–6).

Does not this striking combination of thought about God commend itself to us? Does it not commend itself even to the most modern sense of the fitness of things? We feel as we read it, or hear it read, that there is no incongruity. The notes struck are very different, but how beautifully they harmonise! The music of Homer's Olympus no longer finds response in the modern mind and heart. But when David or Solomon or Isaiah takes you up into his heaven, what is written of the God of Israel is as heavenly in its music, as celestial in its tone, as impressive in its effect, as it could have been three thousand years ago.

It would seem, indeed, as if the progress of modern science had been such as to give more and more emphasis, richer and larger illustration, to these two great truths concerning God, which to the shallow mind seem incompatible, but which to those who think, and are possessed of true and pure feeling, are in fullest harmony. The telescope has illustrated the one, the microscope the other. The progress in the two directions, out to the infinitely large, into the infinitely small, has gone on hand in hand, as if to keep the balance true. As worlds upon worlds, systems upon systems, star galaxies beyond star galaxies, have been discovered to our astonished gaze, what fitter words to express the growing emotion than this very utterance from the days of scientific ignorance: "Behold, the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain Thee"; while, on the other hand, the microscope does not allow us to forget that God indeed dwells on the earth, that His care descends not only to the hairs of the head, but to the tiny cells which make up the structure of each single hair; and just as with the increasing power of the telescope there has been a growing enlargement of our conceptions of those heavens which declare the glory of God, so the more powerful the microscope the more marvellously delicate and intricate has been found to be the structure of objects which to the naked eye appear quite simple. And even the most powerful microscopes have been left far behind, for investigation has discovered to the mind what was impossible to exhibit to the eye, a quite inconceivable intricacy of mechanism in the molecules which unite to form the structure, and in the still more recondite atoms which constitute the molecule. Lord Kelvin says that if a drop of water were magnified so as to appear of the size of the earth (diameter 8,000 miles), the atoms of which it is composed, magnified on the same scale, would not be so large as cricket balls. And now we read that the phenomena of the newly discovered radium prove that the atom, the smallest particle of matter hitherto thought to exist, is not the smallest after all, but is made up of myriads of still smaller particles. And the same inconceivable intricacy is believed to exist in all substances, even the commonest and apparently the simplest. And yet there are people who think that man is too small and inconsiderable a creature for God to take notice of or pay attention to!

Not only has modern science illustrated each great thought about God separately, but it has in a marvellous way combined the two, just as we find them combined in our text, and in these other beautiful passages of scripture we have been quoting. For the spectroscope has come, and has given the opportunity of investigating not only the great masses of the heavenly bodies, but the very molecules and atoms of which they are composed; and behold, they are found to be the very same in their nature as those with which we are familiar here on earth, thus making it evident that it is the one God over all Whose glory is seen in the limitless abysses of space with their innumerable worlds, and in the invisible atoms of which we are told it takes millions to make up the smallest speck the human eye can discern.

And these infinitesimal atoms are all marshalled and arrayed with the same regularity and faultless precision which we find in the movements of the planets and the stars. If God so marshal the infinitesimal atoms, why should it be thought a thing incredible that the very hairs of our head should be numbered? And when we see this marvellous combination of attention to the largest and the smallest, how entirely reasonable and most credible is the assurance of the prophet: "Thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, Whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a humble and contrite spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones."

And now may we not say that in the marvels of modern science we have not only an illustration of the infinite power of God on the one hand, and of His infinitesimal care on the other; but a suggestion of that delightful relation of friendship with us which is so beautifully revealed in the life of our Lord Jesus Christ? We are quite aware that the very idea is scorned by some of those who count themselves exceedingly scientific; but if they would only think, they would find in the very faculties which they use to put God far away the proof that it is His intention that we should be very near Him. It would be said, no doubt, that man's kinship is not at all with a supposed God above him, but with a real ape beneath him. Well, apes do wonderful things—for apes. We have heard that they can do a little counting, to the admiration of onlookers. They have some kind of thinking faculty evidently. How far do the thoughts of an ape go? Do they go very much beyond his dinner and his cage? Or take the dog, which is, perhaps, a better specimen; or the elephant. Does it not strike you as a most marvellous thing that a creature so small, apparently so insignificant, as man, with so much on the physical side of his nature that seems akin to the lower animals, should have the power to think these great thoughts, to traverse in fancy this immensity of space, to weigh the planets in scales, and the suns in a balance, to measure the velocity of light, and enter into the hidden secrets of the atom? What does it mean? A slow development out of the counting of an ape? Nonsense. It means that God has made man in His own image, after His own likeness, to enter into His thought, to trace the working of His hand away out into the infinite of the immense, away into the infinite of the small, aye, and away up to the infinite of the holy and the pure. "There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty hath given him understanding." Not the smallest doubt of it. Every new discovery in science confirms it. God has evidently made man to take him into His confidence. He has given him powers to fit him to be His friend. It is no vain question to ask, "Will God in very deed dwell with man upon the earth?" He will, if we will let Him; He will dwell with us, and prepare us to dwell with Him. It is sin that hinders, and the Son of God has been manifested to take away sin, and to bring this message in the Father's name to all who will forsake their sins and follow Him: "I call you friends." There is manifestly a basis for such friendship in those wonderful powers by which we can traverse the limitless interval between the infinitely great and the infinitely small, enter into the Divine thought of the star galaxy, enter into the Divine thought of the almost unthinkable atom. All that is wanted is to be set in right relation to Him spiritually, so as to reach that purity of heart and holiness of life without which it is impossible to please Him. And this we have from Christ. Through Him we have access to the Father. Through Him we receive the atonement. And, our sins forgiven, we receive His Spirit to dwell with us here on earth and prepare us for dwelling with Him in heaven, there to continue our study of these glorious works of His, which in their limitless extent will afford scope even for the labour of eternity.

WHEN Nectarius, the Archbishop of Constantinople, died in the September of the year of grace 397, great were the speculations among the citizens of the magnificent Eastern capital as to who was to be his successor. The archbishopric of "the new Rome" in many respects, during that feverishly religious age, was the most dignified, and in some respects the most influential, office which a subject of the Emperor of the East could aspire to. Not merely over the churches and clergy of the metropolitan city was he supreme, but he exercised an authority, none the less great because it was somewhat undefined, over very many of the dioceses of the Eastern Empire—the Metropolitans of Alexandria and Antioch, alone among the Oriental prelates, being absolutely outside his broad sphere of influence. The Archbishop of Constantinople ranked among the highest of the imperial officials, but differed from the most powerful of these great functionaries in that he was irremovable, the sovereign will of the autocratic Emperor was powerless in the presence of the Archbishop; only his own deliberate act, as in the case of Gregory of Nazianzus, or the solemn decree of a General Council of Oriental bishops, could dethrone the Metropolitan. Nectarius, when he passed away, had filled the high office for some sixteen years with quiet dignity and acknowledged credit. He had been called to the post as a layman, when advanced in years, having previously held a distinguished civil appointment. He was a statesman and a man of the world in a good sense; ever splendidly hospitable, and, although no theologian or orator, he was fairly respected, and men looked up to him as a wise and thoughtful administrator of the Church in a difficult and harassing period. Many an ambitious prelate and churchman eagerly desired to succeed him, and in the months following the death of Nectarius, Constantinople became the scene of various and even of discreditable intrigues. Among the intriguers, Theophilus, Archbishop of Alexandria, who has left behind him a dark and evil reputation, was prominent, Theophilus being desirous that the important post should be filled by one of his own officials, a certain Isidore.

CHRYSOSTOM: I.—THE PREACHER—ANTIOCH.

By the Very Rev. H. Donald M. Spence, D.D., Dean of Gloucester.

WHEN Nectarius, the Archbishop of Constantinople, died in the September of the year of grace 397, great were the speculations among the citizens of the magnificent Eastern capital as to who was to be his successor. The archbishopric of "the new Rome" in many respects, during that feverishly religious age, was the most dignified, and in some respects the most influential, office which a subject of the Emperor of the East could aspire to. Not merely over the churches and clergy of the metropolitan city was he supreme, but he exercised an authority, none the less great because it was somewhat undefined, over very many of the dioceses of the Eastern Empire—the Metropolitans of Alexandria and Antioch, alone among the Oriental prelates, being absolutely outside his broad sphere of influence. The Archbishop of Constantinople ranked among the highest of the imperial officials, but differed from the most powerful of these great functionaries in that he was irremovable, the sovereign will of the autocratic Emperor was powerless in the presence of the Archbishop; only his own deliberate act, as in the case of Gregory of Nazianzus, or the solemn decree of a General Council of Oriental bishops, could dethrone the Metropolitan. Nectarius, when he passed away, had filled the high office for some sixteen years with quiet dignity and acknowledged credit. He had been called to the post as a layman, when advanced in years, having previously held a distinguished civil appointment. He was a statesman and a man of the world in a good sense; ever splendidly hospitable, and, although no theologian or orator, he was fairly respected, and men looked up to him as a wise and thoughtful administrator of the Church in a difficult and harassing period. Many an ambitious prelate and churchman eagerly desired to succeed him, and in the months following the death of Nectarius, Constantinople became the scene of various and even of discreditable intrigues. Among the intriguers, Theophilus, Archbishop of Alexandria, who has left behind him a dark and evil reputation, was prominent, Theophilus being desirous that the important post should be filled by one of his own officials, a certain Isidore.

At this time in the position of favourite and chief minister of the Emperor Arcadius, the son of the great Theodosius, was the Eunuch Eutropius. This Eutropius was all powerful in the councils of the state. His had been a strange career. He had risen from the lowest and most degraded position which a slave could occupy, to the highest post in the state, and, when Nectarius died, was the chief minister.

Burningly ambitious, utterly unprincipled, rapacious, selfish, unscrupulous, an able and accomplished schemer, history only relates one good and noble deed carried out by him during his tenure of almost absolute power—absolute in good truth, for Arcadius, the weak and slothful Emperor who slumbered on the throne of the East, allowed himself to be guided in all things by his favourite Minister of State. This one good deed was his selection of a successor to Nectarius. It seems that Eutropius, with all his ambition and selfish designs, still preserved some reverence for Christianity; he has even been described as a religious man—perhaps "superstitious" would better describe his character—and that, somewhat shocked and dismayed when the knowledge of the base intrigues to secure the appointment to the archiepiscopal throne was brought to his ears, he induced Arcadius, the Emperor, to cut the knot of the many intrigues by designating a successor to Nectarius, and by insisting upon the immediate consecration of the object of his choice. Arcadius allowed Eutropius to name the future Archbishop. Constantinople and the whole of the East were astonished when a priest of the distant Syrian city of Antioch was presented for consecration to the Archbishop of Alexandria. Though he was in Constantinople, working for his friend Isidore, sorely against his will, under a pressure which Eutropius knew well how to exert, Theophilus consented to consecrate the imperial nominee.

Eutropius had lately been in Antioch, and in the course of his visit had heard John the priest preach in the great cathedral of the Syrian city. John of the Golden Mouth * (Chrysostom) he has been lovingly called. Never had he listened before to such winning, moving eloquence, and when the disputes as to the succession of Nectarius had become a great scandal, the Minister of Arcadius remembered the warm bright eloquence of the Antiochean preacher, and how greatly he was admired and beloved in his own Antioch, he determined that this John and no other should sit on the proudest episcopal throne of the East.

But when he appeared in the stately Constantinopolitan Basilica, men asked curiously who he was, and what was the life-story of the strange-looking man who had taken the place of the magnificent Nectarius. The personal appearance of John was mean and insignificant, short of stature and sickly-looking; bald, and poorly clad. There was, indeed, no beauty in that small bowed form which could win the favour of the citizens of a city so fastidiously devoted to everything which pleased the eye. But very quickly the unlovely face and homely dress of the great orator was forgotten, and the vast Church of the "Holy Wisdom" (St. Sophia) was crowded as it had never been crowded before whenever John of "the Golden Mouth," the new Archbishop, preached. The simple life-story of John Chrysostom soon was told and retold in every circle of the capital of the East.

He was born at Antioch some fifty years before his appointment to his great office, A.D. 344 or 347. His father, who died when he was still quite young, was a distinguished civil servant of the Empire. His mother, Anthusa, placed him in the school of the famous pagan teacher and rhetorician Libanius, once the friend of the Emperor Julian. Full of admiration for the pure and beautiful life of this Anticchean lady, Libanius, the illustrious pagan orator and apologist, is said once to have publicly and regretfully alluded to Anthusa before one of his crowded audiences in these terms: "O immortal gods of Greece, what women there are among these Christians!"

John became the most distinguished of the many pupils of the famous Libanius—so distinguished, indeed, that the great master designated him as his successor in his school of rhetoric, and sadly mourned over the loss of so brilliant a pupil, when John forsook his studies and devoted himself to Christian letters, especially to the interpretation of the sacred Christian writings. Like many other of the young earnest men of that age, the brilliant scholar was attracted to that stern, ascetic life led by so many of the more earnest of the followers of Christ, believing that only by the practice of the most austere self-denial, the higher life pleasing in the eyes of the Divine Master, could be led. John wished to withdraw himself entirely from the society of men, and would have thrown in his lot with one or other of the companies of solitaries who were beginning to throng the deserts in the neighbourhood of Antioch, had not his loving mother Anthusa besought her son not to leave her alone. It was a strange passion, this total abnegation of self, this flying from the haunts of men, their business and their pleasures; this choice of a life of intense mortification, of long fastings, of ceaseless prayer, of utter solitude. But it was a passion which took possession of not a few in that first age, when Christianity had become the religion of the Empire. Many believed that thus, and only thus, could the Divine Master be truly served. The religion of Jesus, since it had ceased to be an unlawful cult, had become

* There is some little doubt when this now familiar term was given to the famous preacher. Some question whether it was really applied to him in his lifetime.

"His mother besought her son not to leave her alone."

—so it seemed to many a devout soul—too easy a profession; the world had entered into the sanctuary hitherto strictly guarded by a relentless persecution, and had polluted it; they must fly from the world, and in silence and in secret work out painfully and alone their salvation. They forgot the touching, pathetic words of their Master in His solemn prayer, "I pray not that Thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that Thou shouldest keep them from the evil." It was an unnatural school of thought which possessed so strange an attraction for men like John Chrysostom, and which produced, it must be confessed, many insane enthusiasts; but at the same time, after a period of stern and rigorous training, it gave back to the world a few really great men. John of Antioch was one of the latter.

For some time the young enthusiast remained with his mother; but in his home-life he withdrew from all worldly occupations and relaxations, spending his whole time in study and in prayer, practising the most rigid austerities, and sleeping upon the bare ground. Probably his mother, Anthusa, soon died—she is not mentioned further in any of the writings on various theological questions put out by the ascetic scholar at this period of his life; indeed, he seems to have quite withdrawn from the city, and to have dwelt as a solitary in the desert wastes of Eastern Syria. The awful austerities practised by him at this time ruined his health, and laid the foundation of his subsequent frequent and painful illnesses. Returning eventually to Antioch, he was ordained deacon by Meletius, the loved Archbishop, who had watched and admired the long soul-strivings of the brilliant scholar after holiness; this Meletius desired to enlist for the active work of the Church the services of such an athlete of Christ as he was conscious existed in the scholar and ascetic John. A consciousness too, of his great powers evidently influenced the young scholar; and a feeling that he was wasting these powers in the somewhat selfish austerities through which he was painfully working out his own, not his brothers', salvation was gradually awakened within him. So he returned to active and public work for the Church. Flavianus succeeded Meletius in the Antiochean bishopric, and appointed John "of the Golden Mouth," who had at length been finally ordained to the priesthood, to the office of principal preacher of the great Antioch Cathedral.

It was largely during this period of his life, extending over many years, that the world-wide fame of Chrysostom—for by this name the great orator has been generally known—was virtually won. He preached unweariedly, twice every week he tells us, sometimes oftener. The greater part of those sermons which make up the voluminous works of Chrysostom belong to these years of his life at Antioch. No writings that we possess throw such a flood of light upon the life of that age as do those brilliant eloquent and luminous Homilies of the greatest pulpit orator the Catholic Church has ever possessed. It is true that we seek in vain, in this great répertoire of Homilies, the carefully reasoned-out discourses of a Gregory of Nazianzus, or of an Athanasius, on grave doctrinal questions; not that by any means the preacher of Antioch neglected such teachings. Still, the leading characteristic feature of Chrysostom's Homilies was their practical character. He dwelt upon the life which his hearers were leading; on their temptations, their repeated falls, or their well-grounded hopes and fears. He painted for them again and again, with every form of vivid and pictorial illustration, the home and the family life, the public and city life, the seductions to which the rich were ever exposed, the sorrows and woes, and, above all, the real compensations of the poor. The latter phase of existence he always dwelt on with a deep sympathy and intense love. No preacher that ever lived has found the key of the hearts of the poor as did Chrysostom.

Again, his knowledge of the Bible was profound, and his power of exposition of the Divine Word simply matchless. "Week after week it was his custom to go through some book of Holy Scripture, verse by verse, clause by clause, almost word by word, endeavouring with all diligence and patience to ascertain the exact meaning of the passage before him, to place it clearly before his audience, and to base his practical exhortations upon it."

With rare and winning eloquence he attacked the vices for which Antioch was too famous; he painted the luxurious existence of the great, their palaces of porphyry and cedar; he sharply condemned the enormous expenditure on the circus and the splendid and costly shows; he held up to scorn the false and enervating luxury of the wealthy ladies of Antioch, with their retinues of eunuchs and slaves; he gravely reproved the pride of the philosophers, with their affectation and their singular dress. No class was spared, neither age nor sex.

And it must be remembered that the men and women whose lives were so severely criticised and censured by Chrysostom were not pagans brought up with the favourite Epicurean doctrine ringing in their ears, "Eat we and drink we, for to-morrow we die;" but were Christians by name and profession, followers of the Teacher of Galilee, listeners to the words of the disciples Paul and Peter, James and John. As we read his sad and bitter denunciations of the life led by so many of the avowed disciples of the Man of Sorrows, we catch sight of some of the reasons which induced not a few of the noblest souls in that luxurious, and too often selfish, society, to seek a purer air in the solitude of the desert; the reasons which persuaded so many sad-hearted men and women to throw up the contest with the world, and in solitude and silence painfully to work out their own salvation; but we feel now these were wrong.

The luxurious life, the lavish expenditure of the fashionable wealthy ladies of Antioch perhaps has never been equalled, certainly never been surpassed in any age. In some of the wealthier families as many as two or three thousand slaves ministered to the wants—or, rather, swelled the pomp of these haughty Roman Provincials. Nor, as Chrysostom tells us, were they always kind or considerate to their hosts of dependents, who worshipped, strange to say, alongside their imperious mistress or master. With terrible scorn the great preacher paints the stately procession of one of these great ladies to church in a chariot all glittering with gold ornaments, drawn with four white mules richly caparisoned, and accompanied by a long train of eunuchs and slaves. Then he dwells with scathing eloquence on the dress of these "Christian" leaders of Antiochine Society, on their costly tunics of silk, embroidered with gold, and glittering with gems; their very earrings costing sums of money which would long nourish a multitude of the poor and destitute; the very embroidery which gleamed on their costly robes, Chrysostom tells us, often positively depicting scenes from the Gospels they professed to love and to reverence. Another day he would inveigh with passionate fervour on the curious, but alas! too common, practice of the ladies of the great city who loved to spend hours in painting and enamelling their faces, in trying to make their eyes brighter, and their hair most attractive and showy. Sorely did these toilet devices vex the simple and honest soul of the ascetic teacher. He would tell them such acts were a positive profanation of God's fair handiwork; that by such false means their beauty was even marred rather than enhanced.

Nor did he spare the men of his city—the foppish, over-dressed, golden youth; the middle-aged and old men of Antioch, with their shoes all worked with gold and precious embroideries, who spent their substance on their houses, on walls inlaid with coloured marbles and delicate ivory, on rooms lit with windows bright with curious and costly coloured glass. He rebuked the excessive cost of their wasteful and lavish entertainments, with the guests' couches of ivory, of silver, and even of gold; with the priceless vessels on their tables. He would scornfully allude to their libraries of books written in letters of gold and colour, with the precious parchments carefully folded up in gorgeous and beautiful coverings, but rarely read.

And all this—reproaches and exhortations, reminders and remonstrances, heart-searching questions, expositions of the Holy Books such as never had been heard before, at once luminous and convincing, repeated with an endless variety of illustrations and picturesque imagery—went on week after week, sent forth in that wondrous penetrating voice which has won for this matchless orator his well-known title of "Golden Mouth." His popularity with all classes and orders in Antioch, the second or third city of the East, was measureless, and increased as years followed years. No better examples of the rare power and versatility of Chrysostom's preaching, no more striking or impressive instances of the power of his wonderful eloquence over the souls of men and women, can be cited than the collection which has come down the stream of time of his so-called "Homilies of the Statues." The strange circumstances under which he preached these memorable sermons were as follows:—

In the year 387 the edict commanding the levying of a new and somewhat burdensome, and as it seemed, to the Antiochians, arbitrary tax, was promulgated. A dangerous uproar among the excitable population followed the imperial announcement. It was no carefully planned revolt, simply a sudden impulse; but, in the course of the tumult, stones were thrown, and the sacred statues of the Emperor and his family were insulted, some being defaced, some thrown down. Among these was an equestrian statue of his father, and an image of his dead, but still tenderly loved wife, the blameless

Flaccilla. No sooner had the senseless mischief been perpetrated than the excited citizens saw what they had done, and they dreaded, and with good reason, the vengeance of the all-powerful Emperor Theodosius, whose passionate disposition was well known. Antioch looked for a terrible punishment, and the leading citizens trembled for their lives and property, and the masses looked on to the impoverishment and desolation of their loved city—its baths, its theatres, its gardens. A searching inquiry was ordered to be made; all the civic privileges were suspended; the baths and theatres, where so large a portion of the life of the inhabitants was spent, were summarily shut up, and numbers of noble and illustrious citizens were arrested, some of whom the terrified magistrates, over-zealous to show their fervid loyalty to the insulted Emperor, cruelly put to death. It was an awful trial-time for Antioch. No man felt his life safe, or his property secure from summary confiscation. Desolation and mourning brooded over the beautiful city; worse things even were expected. The aged and infirm Bishop Flavianus undertook the long journey to Constantinople personally to intercede for guilty Antioch; while Chrysostom, the Preacher, summoned the dismayed and terrified citizens to meet him in the vast Basilica. Almost daily for twenty-two long and harassing days, after earnest prayer and supplication, the great Christian orator talked to Antioch. These sermons, preached during "the terror," are known as "The Homilies of the Statues." The crowds were enormous. They hung on his words; only in the great church did they feel safe, only there did the dread cloud of terror which hung over the hapless city seem to lift for a little season. Chrysostom spoke, men say, as he had never spoken before. Every day he struck some new note. Now it was resignation, now it was comfort and hope; perhaps, after all, the mighty Emperor would listen to their venerable Bishop, and would forgive the cruel insult; now it was a passionate exhortation to trust in God, and to throw themselves body and soul on the Eternal Pity; now his words took a loftier tone, and he would bid them, should the cloud of terror pass from them, order their lives anew and dedicate their remaining years to nobler things, to a truer hospitality, to a more generous almsgiving, to a higher conception generally of the solemn duties of life. "The Homilies of the Statues" are indeed a matchless monument of history and of sacred eloquence, and give us a far-reaching conception of the manners and customs of the age, of the limitless power of the Emperor, and, above all, of the mighty influence which Christianity had won, alike in the hearts of the people and in the Cabinet of the sovereign.

For the intercession of the aged Bishop was successful, and the injured Emperor forgave all; the prisoners were released, the confiscations were cancelled, the forfeited privileges of the city were restored, baths and theatres and gardens were once more unsealed, and the great and beautiful city breathed again, for it received a full free pardon.

SONG OF A ROSE.

O THAT we might live our life out like the rose,
Which on all that draw her nigh her grace bestows,
That is sweet from first to last,
And through sunshine, rain, or blast,
As his life is who the source of sweetness knows!

How fair are e'en the shadows of the rose!
For their darkest but a deeper red disclose.
O might our hearts' shadows be
But a clear intensity
Of Love's colour, that with heavenly passion glows!

When we wither, might we wither like the rose!
For so daintily her beauties she foregoes,
That when all her leaves are shed,
Yet their fragrance is not fled,
But rewakes whene'er the wind of memory blows.

PAULINE W. ROOSE.

THEIR SUMMER AT THE COTTAGE.

A Complete Story by Katharine Tynan.

THE cottage stood by the side of the road. It was very old, but someone had modernised it without spoiling it. Creepers had covered the addition, which comprised a little kitchen, a dining-room, an upstairs bedroom, and a bath-room, so that its newness did not show itself outside. The upper windows, back and front, looked over an enchanting stretch of country.

It was on the crest of a hill. In front the woods and park-lands melted away into blue distance. At the back, just a field away, there ran a chain of valleys suddenly deep and fringed with woods. Beyond the valleys were lower hills; beyond the hills the sunsets. The sunsets were magnificent. To Annie Wray life at the cottage seemed principally a panorama of sunsets.

She had come to the cottage ill. She and her sister Barbara had been obliged to work for their bread in London; Barbara had gone out decorating tables, advising as to furniture and hangings, arranging flowers, sometimes shopping for those who had no leisure to shop for themselves. She had made quite a little clientèle among the big houses of the square which was near their flat in a block of workmen's dwellings. It was such a comfort, said the mistresses of the big houses, not to have to leave everything to the servants. Many a compliment Barbara had of them as she stood drawing on her gloves to go, after her work was done. She had a dimpled, delightful face, the brightest of the bright. She found the discomforts of the flat something to laugh at. The noisy children, the quarrelling, gossiping women, the cats, the concertinas, even an occasional stumbling step on the stairs at night.

Not so Annie. Annie was delicate and nervous. Nerves seized on her while Barbara was out to such an extent that even in broad daylight she was afraid of the loneliness of the little dusty, garish rooms. She painted delightfully in water-colours. Now and again she had been fortunate in selling a picture; but she could not paint in those nervous days. She could do nothing for the nameless depression, the fear that haunted her.

At last Barbara found out her sister's state, concealed from her as long as possible. She called in a doctor—a clever young man, who sat in a far more expensive house than he could afford waiting for the fortune which he was sure was on its way to him. The sitting was figurative. As a matter of fact, while he waited for the people of the square to find him out he worked incessantly among the poor people, "to gain experience" he said when someone praised his charity.

He looked more than once at Barbara unobserved as he talked of the patient.

"Can you get her to the country?" he asked. "We have no drugs in the pharmacopœia equal to the sun and the air. She has house-nerves and town-nerves. Only the fresh air will set her straight."

As it happened, the solution of the problem was at hand. The sisters owned a cottage in the country, left to them by their Aunt Kate several years back. Aunt Kate had kept house there with a spinster like herself, who had gone on renting the cottage at an infinitesimal rent after her death, since the nieces did not want it. Only a few days before Miss Summerfield had resigned the tenancy of the cottage. Her relations had decided that she was really too old to go on living alone, and had carried her off to be looked after for the rest of her days.

When the notification had reached Barbara she had said: "Who on earth is going to give us ten pounds a year for it now?"

She looked at the doctor's face, and then at Annie's with a quick flash of illumination, which made her prettier than ever.

"There is the cottage," she said; and then, explanatorily to the doctor, "We happen to own a little country cottage. Within the last few days it has been left on our hands."

"Excellent!" said Dr. Maurice Egerton.

"But your work, Babbie? What is to become of your work?" Annie cried out in distress.

"I shall find work to do, never fear," said Barbara, smiling and dimpling till Dr. Egerton thought he had never seen anything quite so pleasant.

They still had Aunt Kate's tiny legacy—about a hundred and forty pounds—intact, kept carefully for a rainy day; so they had some provision for the time in which Barbara would be casting about her for a way to make an income at the cottage.

XUM

Annie Wray would never forget in all her life that change to the cottage from the workmen's dwellings. The first morning at the cottage the sun, low yet over the dewy fields, shone in her eyes at four o'clock—for the flitting took place in June.

"Oh, Babbie, Babbie!" she cried. "Look at the dear sun! Do you remember how breathless it was in the flat? Oh, how good it is to be alive!"

This from Annie, who a few days before had not had the courage to live, so many stealing shapes of fear came upon her from every side.

They had not yet explored their demesne, but they were too happy to sleep; so they lay awake talking, and presently Barbara got up and lit the fire and made tea, and then they dressed and cooked their breakfast, and ate it with a great appetite, and all the time Barbara was flashing her glances about the place, saying that here she would set up her bookcase, and there would be the very place for Annie's easel, and so on.

They had brought a little store of provisions with them over-night, enough to last them for the time in which they should be finding out the resources of the place.

"They are sure to be few," said Babbie, "at six miles from a railway station. I foresee that we shall have to be our own universal providers."

"Hens!" cried Annie eagerly.

"And a goat," said Babbie. "Goat's milk is so good in tea."

"And vegetables," said Annie.

"And fruit," said Babbie.

"Oh, how sweet it is!" cried Annie. "I smelt the lilac all night in my dreams. Is that a sweet briar hedge over there? And I am sure I see a clump of lavender there among the long grasses."

"I must find a boy to help me to clean up the garden," said Babbie.

"We shall be able to keep it ourselves," said Annie, "once all the rubbish is cleared off. Do let us get out and see what there is."

The additional furniture was not to come for a day or two, but the cottage was already plainly furnished, and had been thoroughly cleaned out by the good woman from the village whom Miss Summerfield had left in charge. She had received them last night, and had promised to return in the morning to cook their breakfast and give them information as to how they were to get a small handmaiden, and other matters. But Mrs. Jones was not due for a good hour yet, and the hour was given up to exploration.

The front garden was the flower garden, although the flowers were now almost extinguished by weeds and the encroachment of their wild brethren. There was a little path, with an arch of flowering trees above it, going down to the small gate that opened on the grassy road. Opposite the gate there was a delightful coppice.

As is the way in such cottage-gardens, gooseberry and currant bushes grew among the flower-beds. They were covered heavily with fruit. In a country where every cottage had its fruit-garden and orchard there was no temptation for the fruit-loving urchin, and the houses were scattered and far apart.

Standing at the gate and looking back, Annie cried out in an ecstasy over the beautiful colours of the tiled roof. Already there was a glow in her cheeks. Her eyes were happy.

"Dr. Egerton would not know you," said Babbie, "if he could see you now."

They went round the corner of the house, and came upon a little railed-off place with outhouses. There was a house with a copper and an open fireplace, apparently for laundry purposes. There was a little stable of two stalls and a coach-house. There was a kennel and a hen-house on wheels, and an open cowshed.

"Presently we shall have a cow," said Babbie, "and a pony and governess cart. But at first we must be content with a goat and fowls. And now let us see what there is in the orchard," for there was a tangle of low boughs across the palings.

They opened a little gate and went in. It was going to be a great fruit year. Pear and apple and plum trees hung with the little fruit, and the ground was covered with strawberry plants, and the plants with fruit already well formed.

They went from one thing to the other, discovering, and crying out in delight.

When they had come round to the side of the house, where was a secluded lawn with an arbour and a dial and an empty pigeon-cote, and a cool clear well in one corner, they saw a great farmer's waggon lumbering by the gate.

"That will take my fruit and vegetables to market," said Babbie. "Oh, yes, it will. You will see how I shall arrange with the farmer. He won't be able to refuse me."

"How fast you go," said Annie, looking at her sister's bright face. "I am going to paint you, Babbie. Just stand as you are, watching that flight of birds. How lucky that I would not be parted from my paint-box."

She ran off, and Babbie smiled happily. "The cure begins to work already," she said.

When Mrs. Jones arrived with a red-cheeked, black-haired daughter, who she said was as sharp as a needle, and whom she proposed for the cottage servant, she was amazed to find that the young ladies had already breakfasted, and that one was painting the other out of doors.

After an unusually prolonged silence, during which Babbie's face had been brightening and darkening much as you may see the meadows when the wind passes over them, she suddenly announced that she was going to give tea and strawberries to cyclists and other travellers, "for," she said, "it will take time to put the garden in order, and we must begin to earn money at once."

"Won't it be rather horrid?" asked Annie doubtfully.

"Not a bit of it," said Babbie briskly. "We'll only get the quiet sort here. It's too far off the beaten track for the other sort. Those who come here will know we are ladies, and behave accordingly."

There was someone who did not approve of this plan, and that was Dr. Egerton.

He had kindly seen to the transference of such furniture as the girls wished to keep; and on the afternoon of its arrival, while the packing-cases still blocked up the garden-path and the rooms, and the carrier had just departed, who should turn up but Dr. Egerton?

He came into the sitting-room, upon which the cottage door opened, and found Babbie just attacking the first packing-case courageously with her chisel.

"I thought you'd want a man," he said calmly, "so I've cycled down. Let me have the chisel. I should like to know how you proposed to move the things when you had got the cases open. Why, Miss Annie! This is surely not my patient? What have you done with the nerves?"

Annie looked up at the fair-haired young giant with the kind, merry eyes.

"I left them at the flat," she laughed with an archness which suddenly brought out a likeness to Babbie.

"You'll have some tea?" said Babbie.

"When I've earned it," he replied laughing. "Now, have you a screwdriver?"

For the next two hours Dr. Egerton worked like a navvy, and by the time he had got the heavy furniture in place he was quite ready for the hospitable tea which Annie had been looking after while Babbie helped at the unpacking. It was tea eked out with eggs and strawberries and cream, crisp lettuce and honey and hot cakes.

It was during the unpacking process that Babbie told the doctor—they had become as intimate with the doctor in a few weeks of acquaintance as they would have been with anyone else in as many years—of her scheme.

"All sorts of bounders will come," he said. "I don't like to think of it."

"No, they won't," said Babbie stoutly; "and if they do we shan't serve them."

"How are you going to refuse them?"

"There will be always Fairy at hand."

"Oh, Fairy. I had forgotten Fairy. By the way, I have not made his acquaintance yet."

"Imagine forgetting Fairy!" said Babbie. "He is the most precious of our possessions."

At this moment Fairy made his appearance. He was a phenomenally ugly, absolutely amiable young bulldog, who had been presented to Babbie by one of her rich London clients at parting, since he had manifested a devotion to Babbie from the first time of their meeting.

"Now, isn't he beautiful?" said Babbie, dropping on one knee and lifting the dog's fore-paws to her shoulders.

"Excellent," said the man grimly. "You've only to put him in front of the cottage and the cyclists won't come. How are you, Fairy, old chap?"

Fairy wagged his tail in a friendly manner, and looked more unmitigatedly ruffianly than ever.

"Ah! I'm glad you have Fairy," Dr. Egerton said, with an air of relief. "The only drawback to the cottage was its loneliness. Fairy is as good as a man any day."

"Better," said Babbie, looking up at him audaciously.

The days went by like a dream of peace at the cottage. The goat had been added to the establishment, and after a time had been supplemented by a second. Babbie had learned to milk, and was the sweetest milkmaid in a pink print frock; and the fowls had been purchased, and were doing all that could be expected of them in the way of laying eggs.

XUM

They had discovered the village shop by this—a shop out of a picture-book, made all of wood, and scrubbed inside to an immaculate whiteness. It adjoined a tiny, old-fashioned house—was built on to it, in fact—and the shop was shut till you tinkled at a bell, and then the old woman or her granddaughter would come and open the door and serve you. The little shop held an incredible number of things, from bacon to boots, patent medicines to reaping hooks. The house and shop were situated just at the edge of one of those deep valleys, so deep and sudden that the little garden was bounded by the tree-tops of the valley, and, looking over the white palings, you looked down through a feathery green world of waving leaves.

Babbie had interviewed the farmer who owned the big waggon. He had agreed to carry her fruit, when she should have it, to Covent Garden, whither he sent his own strawberries every day. Soon after midnight those strawberry days they would hear the waggons lumber by.

By this time also they had got the front garden clear of its weeds, except for a wild space in one corner which Babbie had fenced off for the goats.

"Next year we must have a Kerry cow," she said, "although I shall be sorry to part with Nannie and Jinnie. But goats are always bad for gardens."

They prepared for the cyclists by setting tables covered with a snowy white cloth just outside the door of the cottage. On these they laid out their plates of strawberries, their strawberries in punnets, their jugs of cream and castor sugar, the teacups, and the other requisites for a pleasant tea-meal.

Babbie had taste, and a portion of Aunt Kate's legacy had consisted of a quantity of china and delft of all sorts. It was easy to select teacups which should be pretty without being too valuable to entrust to casual hands. A set with roses entwined with blue ribbons meandering all over it was the ideal thing. And since the roses had come on in the front garden now, a big bowl filled with roses always made the centre-piece of the pretty table.

Although their grass-lane only made a loop from a busy road, returning to it again, it was surprising how many cyclists went by from morning till night. And after Babbie had put out her tables and her little sign, their numbers seemed to increase very rapidly.

They were a quiet class of cyclists. The rowdy ones must have kept to the main roads. And Babbie noticed that the same people seemed to return again and again. Many ladies came, many men of all ages. Babbie began to take an interest in her guests, and to be pleased when they became regular customers.

After the strawberries there were raspberries; and Babbie was beginning to look forward to the time when her stock would consist of plums and apples. By this time Fairy was pretty well known to the people, and it was seldom necessary to rebuke him for frightening off customers. Indeed, lying in the trellised porch, with the twilight of the little parlours behind him, and all his teeth showing on the outside of his mouth, he became rather an attraction, and condescended to be fed on the hot buttered griddle-cakes which were such a favourite part of the feast with the cyclists, till his mistress felt bound to interfere before his figure should be altogether ruined.

Doubtless Babbie in her print frock brought nearly as many customers as the strawberries and cream. She was proud of the businesslike figure she presented with her trim little leather belt, and the pocket in which she carried money. It was impossible not to be pleased looking at Babbie. Only Dr. Egerton seemed a little morose about it when Babbie adopted her best business manner towards him, clinking all the coins in her pocket; and she seemed to take a mischievous, half-fearful delight in making him frown, by the businesslike way she would pass his tea, and slice him his pink slices of ham, and set his eggs and griddle-cakes before him, when he paid them one of his many visits.

Once his eye kindled at her.

"I won't have you at the beck and call of every man that passes the road," he said. "I won't have it, I tell you, Babbie."

Then Babbie glided away from him in a frightened fashion; and a mild, be-spectacled cyclist, turning in at the gate at that moment, was alarmed by Maurice Egerton's frown much more than he would have been by Fairy's smile.

Annie took no part whatever in the business arrangements of the cottage. She had gone back to her painting, and seemed to find endless subjects for it, and never any lack of inspiration. To her there never was such a beautiful country before.

It was beautiful indeed, although the songs of the birds were over, and the yellow fields of August, the heavy foliage of the woodlands, had succeeded the tender beauty of the country as first they knew it. It was a very hot summer:

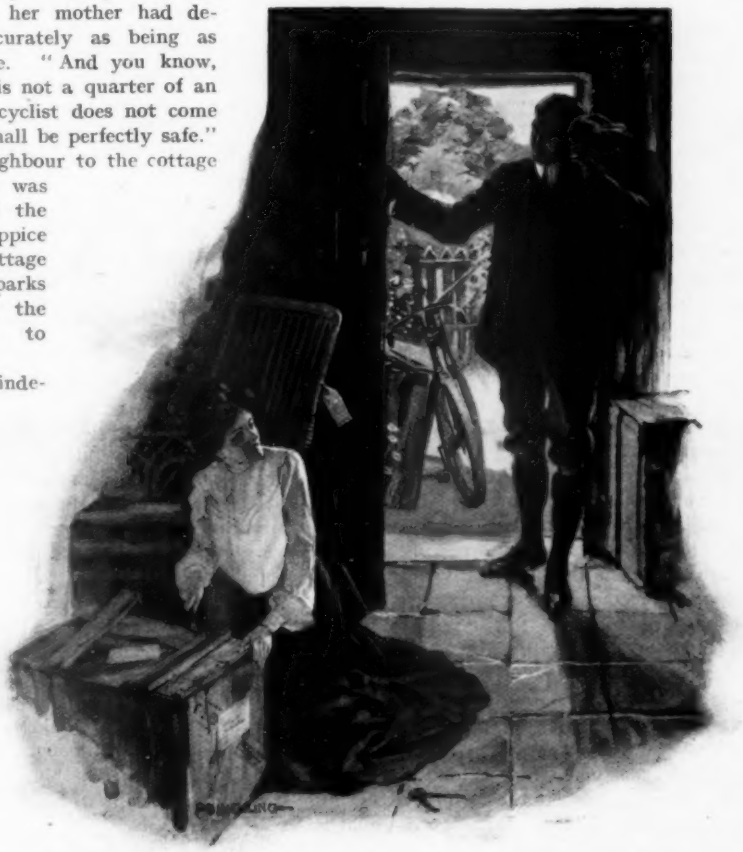
but what did that matter in a country intersected by field and wood-paths, so that one need hardly ever take the glaring high-road.

Annie had traversed most of those field-paths for miles in every direction. She had grown so strong now that nothing seemed to tire her. She had sent up some pictures to the dealers who had sold pictures for her before. She had adorned every blank space of the cottage walls with others, and the pictures added to the beauty and attractiveness of the cottage, and were greatly admired by some of the lady cyclists who were permitted to penetrate its interior.

But Babbie had taken fright at these long excursions of her sister in the loneliness of the fields, and had insisted that she should take Fairy for protection and companionship.

"As for me," said Babbie, "I shall not want him. I have Amy." Amy was the little maid whom her mother had described quite accurately as being as sharp as a needle. "And you know, Annie, that there is not a quarter of an hour in which a cyclist does not come up the road. I shall be perfectly safe."

The nearest neighbour to the cottage as the crow flies was Squire Unwin of the Court. The coppice opposite the cottage gate, the green parks with the deer in the glades, belonged to him.



Mrs. Jones, indefatigable gossip, had told them of Squire Unwin, who had married very young and lost his wife, and lived retired with his little boy in a solitariness which some people resented as morose, ever since his loss.

The two girls had seen him at church, in the big Unwin pew, with the golden-haired child by his side, and Annie had thought him interesting. He had rather a sad face, and his brown hair was streaked more thickly with grey than his years gave warrant for.

"He was greatly attached to his wife?" Annie said to Mrs. Jones.

"Now that's the odd part of it, Miss," the gossip replied, wiping the soapsuds from off her arms—she was engaged in doing the weekly wash for the cottage. "They do say that Lady Hilda, poor soul, wasn't his choice at all, although he was hers. They were cousins, and his father was bent on it, and her father was bent on it, and the poor lady herself was bent on it. Still, he mourned her as though he did truly love her."

"I pass his gardens every day," said Annie irrelevantly. "I am so obliged to him for his roses and pinks. I say a thanksgiving to him every time I pass."

Mrs. Jones only stared in wonder. The eccentricities of the young ladies were beyond her.

"It won't be so pleasant in winter," Maurice Egerton suggested to them. "Your thoughts will turn townwards in winter."

"Not mine," cried the girls in chorus.

They were not afraid of the winter, when the cottage should close its ever-open door, and they must have fires, and there would be books to read, and Babbie would be preparing her small estate for the early vegetables with which she was going to earn money.

"You will have to keep indoors, Nancy," she said. "But for the gardener there is hardly a day of the year that is not outdoor. There will be frosty days too, and pink and lavender skies, and silver stars and orange sunsets. In the winter one has such a renewal of energy; one feels that one can do anything."

But the winter was yet far away; still it was golden summer weather.

One day, after many weeks of heat, a sudden thunderstorm and heavy rain drove Babbie and her tables indoors. She was not frightened about Annie. Annie had gone to sketch some old houses in a little village which one came upon in the middle of fields. She would have found shelter from the storm.

The sun had come out brightly, and she was just setting the first of her tables back again when she was startled by a rough voice almost at her elbow, and turning round she saw a most particularly villainous-looking tramp. With a shock of terror she noticed his close-cropped hair, and concluded that he had just come out of jail.

"What do you want?" she asked, controlling her terror with a great effort.

"There's a good deal 'ere I'd want if I 'ad time," he said, his small eyes peering into the cottage, "but, as it 'appens, my dear, I've a pressing engagement this arternoon, so if you'll just 'and over to me that little purse o' yourn, and whatever other little coins you 'appen to 'ave in the 'ouse, I won't give you any more trouble, my dear."

Babbie looked helplessly towards the gate, where no cyclist appeared. Doubtless the storm had sent them into shelter for the time being. She was alone in the cottage, except for Amy, a child of fifteen. What good would it do her if Amy was to come?

"Come, 'urry up," the tramp said violently. "There ain't no one comin' to 'elp yer. 'And over the swag."

"If you'll go quietly," said Babbie, very pale, but very gentle.

She was unhooking her treasured little leather bag from her waist. As it happened it had a good deal of money in it, for the morning had been a good one. She was horribly conscious too of a small store of gold laid away in a bureau in the little parlour. How often she had resolved to open a bank account and be done with it.

The ruffian emptied the contents of the bag into his own pockets.

"Come," he said, with a grin, "this is all very well for a beginning. About ten bob altogether, I should say. Now you've somethin' else—somethin' better nor ten bob to give me for a keepsake. A few pounds laid away, a bit of joolery——"

Would no one ever come? There had been days, indeed, when a pause had occurred in the stream of cyclists like one of those mysterious pauses in the most congested traffic. She began to tremble. The fellow saw his power to terrify her, and delighted in it as the cat delights in the torture of the mouse.

"Come," he said. "Such a pretty little dear will 'ave its pretty ornaments. Just fork out, my girl; give me a kiss, and I'll be going."

She uttered a faint scream then. Would God send no one—no one to help her? What would Maurice Egerton feel if he knew of her danger?

"If you're going to make a row," said the tramp brutally, "I'll slit your weazand for you."

Then he saw the incredulous relief in her face, and turned about quickly. A tall man with a child on his shoulders was standing looking in at the little gate. He seemed to take in the situation at a glance, for he put down the child very gently, and leaped the gate without the formality of opening it.

"What's this? What's this?" he cried, spluttering with anger, and shaking the tramp, whom he had caught in the act to fly, much as a terrier shakes a rat.

Babbie recognised with amazement Squire Unwin, though she could not have imagined the transformation wrought in his face by the energy of anger. His blue eyes were flashing, a colour had leapt to his cheek, his brow was splendid.

"How I wish Annie could see him!" was, oddly enough, Babbie's thought.

"What has he been doing? Has he frightened you?" asked Squire Unwin, shaken by his own anger. "Has he robbed you?"

"Only a few miserable tanners and browns, Guvner," whined the tramp. "I'll give it back if ye'll let me go this time."

He was turning out his pockets as he spoke, and the heap of coins fell on the gravel-path.

"Is that all?" asked the Squire, still shaking him. The question was addressed to Babbie.

"That is all," she said.

"Then go," said the Squire, flinging the ruffian from him; "but remember that I shall put the police on your track as soon as I can get to the village."

The fellow went off at a long, shambling trot, and the Squire turned to Babbie sharply.

"You shouldn't live here alone," he said.

"But I don't," protested Babbie. "My sister lives with me, and Fairy, and Amy."

"Where are they all now?"

"Annie, my sister, is out, and Fairy is with her. Amy is only a child; it was no use calling her."

"Ah, well! I'm sorry you were frightened," said the Squire, suddenly kind. "If you will stay here alone, you must have a very good watchdog. But I am forgetting. Come here, Roger. I wanted to ask shelter for this little boy. I'm afraid he is very wet. We were caught in the thunder shower. Would you take him in—he is not very strong—and do what you can for him while I return to the Court for a carriage and a change of clothing?"

"Oh, poor mite!" cried Babbie, her face softening and brightening. "Fortunately, we have a big fire. I shall just wrap him in blankets in front of it. Indeed, he is drenched through. I shall leave the thanks till afterwards."

"You will keep the door shut while I am away?"

"I shall keep it shut, and shall only open if the result of my scrutiny through my peephole is to show me a most unexceptionable cyclist."

The Squire went off briskly, and Babbie took the little boy to the fire and pulled off his wet clothing. The sky was overcast again, and there was a rumble of thunder.

"I wish Annie were in," she said to herself. "There will be no customers this afternooon."

Almost at the moment she heard the welcome little three knocks with which Annie announced herself when the door of the cottage was shut against her, and, having wrapped the little boy in a blanket and set him up in the corner of Aunt Kate's big, roomy sofa, which she had drawn near the fire, she ran to let her in.

Annie also had been caught in the rain, so that she had to change and let down her curling soft fair hair to dry. She was delighted with Roger, who was a quaint, gentle, ethereal-looking child, with beautiful manners.

Babbie had explained to her hastily the things that had happened, and how Squire Unwin had left the child.

"I shouldn't have taken Fairy, indeed I shouldn't," said Annie in pangs of contrition; "and, do you know, Babs, I believe I met the man in the wood? He gave Fairy an uncommonly wide berth."

It was Babbie's turn to cry out.

"I am so thankful you had Fairy," she said fervently. "And now, are you hungry, Roger? We are going to have a famous tea."

She left Annie and Roger curled up by each other on the sofa. Annie had found an illustrated edition of Hans Andersen, and was reading the Ugly Duckling for Roger. She had got into a thin woollen gown, pale blue in colour, the loose sleeves of which fell away from her round arms. All her hair hung about her face, and, as naturally-curling hair will do in damp weather, it crinkled and curled wildly.

> "Hair such a wonder of flix and floss, > Freshness and fragrance, floods of it too."

"Let me stay with you," said Roger. "I don't want to go home when father comes with the carriage. You have no idea of how lonely it is at the Court when father is not with me—what long, long evenings they are when Nanna goes down to the servants' hall, and I am left alone in bed, and the shadows come on the wall and ceiling. Now in these little rooms where one can see everything, I never should be afraid."

"Dear little heart," said Annie, "the shadows come here too."

"But I should not be afraid of them," said Roger, with gentle obstinacy. "I shall ask father to let me stay, and to-morrow you shall finish the Ugly Duckling for me. I think this is much nicer than fairy-stories."

The afternoon had come over in clouds and rain now. There was little fear that they would be disturbed by the cyclists.

Roger sat up in the corner of his sofa eagerly watching the preparations for tea. Amy had got leave to go home and see her mother, and Babbie was getting the tea herself, bringing in now a basket of beautiful raspberries, the last of the season, again a plate of hot buttered cakes to stand before the fire.

The scene was a pretty one when Squire Unwin stood and looked at it unseen. As a matter of fact, he had tapped patiently several times at the open door of the cottage, guarded now by Fairy, and had not been heard; so, guided by the delightful, unusual sound of Roger's laughter, he came deprecatingly through the little parlour, glancing with quick appreciation at one or two water-colour studies on the wall, along a little passage, and was standing holding his hat in his hand at the door.

Roger was chattering away at the top of his voice, giving his quaint impressions of men and things in the freest possible manner. The narrative was punctuated by peals of soft laughter from Annie, which had so exhilarating an effect on Roger that he had to laugh too.

"And if I hadn't been an only child," said Roger, "there'd be two of me. And just fancy all the fun me two could have with that other of me."

Then he looked up and saw his father.

"Please, father," he said, "I want to stay here. You've no idea of how lonely it is when there's only one of me; but Annie's nearly as good as two of me, and I should teach her to play cricket."

Then Annie sprang up, and stood blushing, with her grey eyes dark and mysterious in the shadow of her hair. And while she listened to the Squire's apologies for having entered without knocking Babbie came in with the teapot, and they were soon perfectly at home. The Squire drank a preposterous number of cups of tea, and Roger made havoc with the raspberries and griddle cakes.

"They were soon perfectly at home."

"I never saw him eat like this before," said the Squire, pleased and puzzled. "He generally has a very poor appetite."

"It's because there's only one of me," said Roger. "And please, father, may I stay here to-night?"

"It would really be the best thing," said Babbie, looking at Roger, with her bright head on one side. "Oh, no; it wouldn't be any trouble. He is a dear little lad. I should just put him to bed straight out of his blankets."

So it was settled, and the Squire went home without Roger; and some time later, Roger, fast asleep and rosy, was carried off to bed in the little upstairs room in the gable, where the two sisters slept.

After he was in bed, the two sat and talked over the fire.

"What will Dr. Egerton say?" asked Annie, "when he hears about that tramp? I know he will be dreadfully angry. Can't you imagine just how he will look, Babs?"

Yes Babs could imagine it.

"I'm afraid he will say," said Babs with her eyes down, "that the cottage is too lonely for us. He has been so against the cyclist teas. I'm afraid he'll say we must give those up, and keep our door shut and barred if Fairy is not on the premises. Half the charm of the cottage would be gone if we could not always have our doors open."

"What will you say, Babbie, if he insists on things?"

"I'm afraid I must obey him," said Babbie, with a shy laugh; "he is very domineering."

"So long as he doesn't want us to leave the cottage. Oh, I couldn't leave the dear cottage. It would break my heart to go back to town," cried Annie, with terror in her voice.

"We shan't do it then," said Babbie soothingly. "See all the cottage has done for us! It has really made you a strong girl. You were never strong before."

"It was only the town was the matter with me," said Annie. "I am a desperate country lover, Babbie."

The next day and the next day and the next day Master Roger refused to leave his new friends. His father was in distress, but Roger had never been coerced, by his father at least, and had never needed it, having been always gentle and reasonable, as only delicate children are. He made his conditions loftily.

"If Annie is my Nanna I will go home with her," he said.

It was an absurd impasse. Day after day the Squire came to fetch Roger, and Roger refused to go. Presently it came to be understood that Roger was paying a long visit to the cottage. So he roamed happily with Annie in her sketching excursions, and, as his father invariably accompanied them, Fairy could stay at home and look after Babbie and the cottage.

Every day the Squire asked Roger when he was coming home, and every day Roger responded firmly that he was coming when Annie would come as his Nanna.

"I shall have to carry him off in his sleep," said the Squire one day.

"You mustn't do that," said Annie anxiously. "I'm afraid he would take it badly when he woke up. We love to have him."

"But you can't keep him for ever. And I am as bad, wasting all your time. When is that picture to be finished? I am going to buy it, you know, before it is hung in the Academy."

"How many more of mine are you going to buy?" asked Annie.

"Every one," said the Squire firmly. And then—"My dearest, won't you come home to me and Roger? We are such a lonely pair. I think I want two of me as badly as ever Roger did."

"After all," said Annie, that night when she and Babbie sat with their hair down, discussing the wonderful things that had happened, "the cottage was heavenly in summer. Do you remember the nightingales when we came first? and the glow-worms lighting their little lamps in the green dusk? But it would be another thing in winter. We are going to take Roger to Italy for the winter. And what did Dr. Egerton say? Anything new?"

"He said that the cottage would be damp in winter. Practice is coming to him, and presently he hopes to move into the Square itself. But we shall keep the cottage for week-ends, and to lend to our friends."

"You have settled it all, then?" said Annie, staring.

"Did you think no one was to settle things but you?"

"I am a selfish wretch. Oh, how glad I am, Babbie. Of course, I knew it would come."

"And I knew it would come. I think we have understood each other all along."

"And you won't hate going back to town?"

"I love the town," said Babbie demurely, "except just for week-ends, when I love the country."

Nine Hours in the Country.

W.E. Tickner '05.

By D. L. Woolmer.

"WE could not afford to go away to stay this summer holiday," said my old nurse, now no longer in service, but with a home and husband of her own; "but we did manage to go out once or twice for the day. On one afternoon we went to 'Ighgate Simetery and saw the old people's graves. On another, my 'usband went on a 'earse to Walton-on-Thames. Our landlord, who is an undertaker, had to take a coffin down there, and he offered my 'usband a ride."

And this was the idea of a treat for a respectable couple. The imagination of one of the liveliest nurses who ever brushed the hair of a set of restless children, and sweetened the discipline with tales—comic, romantic, and original—had been dragged down by matrimony into the depths of prosaic realism. Truly the French find some justification for the statement that their English neighbours take their pleasures sorrowfully.

"LONDONERS LOSE THEMSELVES IN THE COUNTRY."

"Let them take their pleasures in their own way," says the superior cynic. "Some folks like apples, some like onions. Those who like onions have a right to indulge their idiosyncrasies, though it may reduce them to tears. There is nothing the poor delight in more than a fine funeral. Though debt and starvation stare them in the face, they will find money to insure their children and old parents, and they often spend the whole of their insurance grant in mourning. The parade and publicity seem to assuage their grief as nothing else can do."

All this may be true enough, but it has its pathetic meaning. Ignorance of the sense of innocent enjoyment is not bliss. The class of poor who struggle to earn a weekly wage and live within it often illustrate the proverb, "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." Men, women, and even children, in crowded districts grow familiar with death, which often shares their living room. Necessity rends the veil which wealth and culture draw over its ghastly accessories. A visit to a cemetery is sometimes their nearest approach to a country excursion. The excitement of doing honour to the dead brings a change in the dull routine of daily work, and they find afterwards a morbid satisfaction in recalling every gloomy detail. Many sons and daughters of the city, especially those who grew up twenty or thirty years ago, scarcely know what wholesome recreation means. It brings them one step towards the discovery to transport them, if only for a few hours, into the country. But it is seldom that anything less than a personally conducted excursion will tempt a street-bred race beyond the province in which their days and nights are passed. If they are induced to sacrifice a day's earnings in order to take an independent trip, it will generally result in disappointment. The power to appreciate Nature is not of rapid growth. They know nothing of the delight of basking in the sunlit solitude of some rolling downs, conscious only of the enchanting music of birds and breezes; whilst poetry, stored away in memory's cabinet, floats through the mind. It has not been given to them to watch the glory of a cloud float over a golden hill and follow its dark shadows with snatches of Milton's verses and Handel's music, or to compare it with Constable's pictures. Even rustics, born with some gifts to appreciate the country, if early transplanted into the town, strike root so deep that ideas of their childhood's home only live on in pleasant dreams. These dreams are often rudely dispelled by an effort to realise them.

As grey hairs began to increase on a cobbler of my acquaintance, his mind reverted to the scenes of his youth. He resolved to visit them and to introduce his sons to their grandfather's cottage. How they longed and planned and saved up for the excursion! Their holiday only reached its initial stage. An early train took them out of town, an early train brought them home again. The window of one of the most dismal cellar kitchens in Dingico framed the cobbler's bent head and active elbows long before duty demanded. His laugh rang out at his own expense as he described arriving in the country in the rain. He and his sons had not known what to do with themselves; so, like old caged birds given the chance to use their wings, they fluttered back to the place they knew as home. A man of this sort may find a funeral diverting, and a ride on a hearse exhilarating; but, thrown on his own resources in green pastures, he is as completely lost as a town mouse would be if let loose in a harvest field. Accustomed to its own holes and corners, its own dainties of the larder, its own excitement of dodging the domestic cat or laughing at the domestic trap, it has little in common with the simple-minded field mice.

With no familiar landmarks—no "Goats and Compasses" to give them the points of the compass, no "Suns" but the glorious orb above to direct them, no "Wheatsheaves" to fix their locality but the innumerable shocks dotted over the hills—the poor town-bred strangers are apt to wander hopelessly astray. Country cousins, clinging to each other amid the traffic of the Strand, and finally taken under the lofty and paternal care of a policeman, may be an amusement to Cockneys, but the laugh is on the other side when Londoners lose themselves in the country. Rus in urbe is not more at sea than urbs in rure.

So it proved when kind-hearted novices determined to open the gates of Paradise to some hard-working Westminster women. The plans, if they could have been carried out, left nothing to be desired. All would have been well if the organisers had grasped the fact that a vanguard and rearguard were necessary to marshal the troop. They imagined that a body of intelligent persons, who made no trouble of street crossings and enjoyed the railway journey, could manage to follow their leader from the country station to a private park, where they were invited to spend the day. It was also supposed that one of the most practical, who wanted to fulfil a morning engagement and join the rest later, would be quite equal to act on clearly written directions. Five of the party, who lagged behind the rest, roamed about fields and lanes for hours, and the elders were worn out when they reached their destination. The conscientious woman who decided on duty first and pleasure after had a story of travel to tell when she arrived, hungry and tired, to find tea over and the rest of the party preparing to return home. She had spent the whole afternoon in various trains, chiefly at the expense of the railway company. But experientia docet. Disappointments of this kind seldom happen more than once in the same place. A mortified half-resolve never to have another excursion generally melts into a superior decision to profit by past mistakes. And so each year increases forethought and lessens the chance of casualties.

Before the Education Act made school compulsory the children's treat was a benefit to society. It encouraged good conduct and regular attendance. It serves the same purpose now for Sunday schools, and remains a popular institution. It is unnatural to think of the rising generation cramped up in narrow alleys and of their playgrounds being limited to asphalte courts. The good-hearted well-to-do cannot contemplate the idea without a wish to give them, for one day at least, a chance to fill their lungs with untainted air, their senses with sweet scents and sounds, and their minds with pictures of green fields and pleasant memories. The children, with all the world before them, going forward with unknown capacities buttoned up in their small jackets, to meet a future teeming with unknown possibilities, are recognised as a trust. How or why they get a holiday matters little to them; they live in the present. Their parents, who learnt in schooltime the pleasure of a day in the country, have not let this lesson slip with many others into forgetfulness. If an outing for old and young together—a combination which economises time and funds in very poor districts—is open to them, they are willing to pursue the study farther. For one day the mothers will lay aside the burdens of their families, even the trivial round of scouring, and the common, but very wearisome, task of preparing food. For once they will be cooked for and waited upon; for once they will forget the wash-tub, the charing, the struggle to make both ends meet, and cool their tired feet on green grass. Though the open country recedes before the town, and longer journeys involve greater cost, the red-letter day celebrated by the annual excursion arrives as surely as the summer. The last inquiry is answered, the last ticket is given out, the last explanation—forcibly delivered, though generally misunderstood—that "infants in arms" being admitted with their mothers does not mean a free pass to two or three toddlers, the last tear of unsuccessful candidates is wiped away, and the last leg of the responsible conductor of the party leaves terra firma and follows its fellow into a railway compartment.

Off at last. The train, from the appearance of the windows full to bursting, the living freight's capacity for enjoyment replete to overflowing. Shouts and cheers meet with return salutes of various kinds. Good-natured sympathisers left behind wave handkerchiefs, newspapers, or anything handy in reply. A porter with only a mop and pail makes a fine demonstration, producing a circle of spray that sparkles like diamonds in the sunshine. For it is June, and the season of school treats has begun, but is not far enough advanced to make the officials weary of them. After the first half hour, the noise begins to subside. Hunger and drowsiness assert themselves over excitement. Breakfast was lost in expectation, the night broken by dreams of missing the train. In the case of the girls the hindrance seemed to arise from their hair. A multiplicity of plaits or a superabundance of curling pins would catch in everything. Preparations of this kind are part of the voluntary suffering which completes enjoyment. The vanity of the boys is generally satisfied with decorations of paper frills, pink, blue, green, and white. They revive memories of old-fashioned ornaments for the fire-stove. The little ones slumber contentedly in their teachers' arms or leaning against their shoulders. The corner seats are filled with hunched figures under nodding heads, and the wakeful moments occupied with paper bags, in which careful mothers have screwed up biscuits or scraps of unfinished breakfast. The elder boys and girls enjoy the windows. As in a company of children of a larger growth, there is generally one to explain and descant upon the mysteries of the unknown scenes which rush past. The ever-recurring question, "What's that?" never fails to find an answer, though it may be wide of the mark. The golden beauties of a potato field are ascribed to weeping willows, straw stacks are little houses. Statements of this kind are very rarely challenged. It is remarkable that children, quick to answer questions on botany or in object lessons, fail to recognise the originals of illustrations when first presented before their eyes.

The stamp of town breeding is evident, negatively in ignorance of natural history, and positively in tastes and habits. They hail with joy a London organ-man who, with an eye to business, has taken a holiday on his own account. He has no occasion to grind for his living to-day. The money for a "halfpenny turn" is readily paid in advance, and hour after hour his hackneyed tunes mingle with the din of penny trumpets and other cheap instruments of music. The organ-grinder's most powerful rival is a gipsy with Aunt Sally and cocoanuts. Some successful winners sell their cocoanuts to advantage without loss of time. One boy's aim is unerring. The wide-awake gipsy soon detects him as a company promoter. He has accepted fees of a halfpenny to throw for clients whose eyes or hands are less steady and clear. He is ordered to retire from the competition; but the transaction has been so successful for him that he is regarded as a hero.

The dark side of street training displays itself again and again in sharp practice. Greed and cunning cannot be passed over and excused. They are the outcome of unnatural sharpness, which is itself the inevitable result of circumstances. Underfed children are driven by hunger to strive and manœuvre for themselves. Their misdirected ingenuity and their ear-splitting music may be only the outcome of an inborn craving to produce something, if only a noise. The inclination for artifice and the taste to handle a harp and organ are as old as Jubal and Tubal-cain, and want diverting into a safe course, rather than suppressing. Teachers, and other grown-up persons equally endowed with ingenuity, find a safety valve for exuberant spirits in constant exercise and active employment. The mothers disregard the noise with placid philosophy; but at the sight of a pond they ruffle up like hens with broods of ducklings. They know that no prohibitions, no warnings of danger, no threats to tell the terrible but absent fathers, will keep the boys dry. The chance of bathing, however black the water may be, is not to be lost.

OFF AT LAST.

The tired women, free from present anxieties, mostly desire nothing more than to sit under the trees and talk together. A few younger ones are willing to be children for the time being, and patronise a swing and a skipping rope. These diversions are chiefly kept going by men and women whose stooping, shrunken figures tell of life spent in close offices, factories, or sedentary employments. In spite of enjoying scant leisure, they are the backbone of the Sunday school. Their pale, tired faces never fail to meet the children in their classes, and light up, as they teach them, like wintry clouds in the sunshine. It is patent that all taste for recreation is not starved out of them. As these persons bob slowly up and down, two or three together in the revolving rope, they look youthful with enjoyment.

"Don't hurry me, lady. I don't get the chance to pick grass more than once a year," pleads a factory girl, who prefers to wander amongst the hedgerows and lingers at the risk of being left behind. She knows more of the pleasure of picking grass than many of her comrades; some "hands" have never been out of London in their lives. Happily this state of affairs bids fair to improve. Factory Girls' Holiday Funds bring a change of a few days or a few weeks within the reach of thousands. Their own letters show with a force beyond the compass of fine literature what the rest and variety mean to them.

"I never thought to see the country again!" This ejaculation bursts from a venerable lady with memories. "Would I like it?" The answer finishes off with a sudden expansion of the old face, and then it becomes a question whether the bubbling feeling will overflow in smiles or tears. The wrinkles take a new direction as the grannies abandon themselves to enjoyment. They trust to the promise of friends to arrange everything for them, to lift them in and out of the brake if necessary. To sit in a garden and bask in the surroundings, to live in the past and enjoy the present, is enough for them.

Old people are as diverse as the young, but one thing they possess in common—experience. The lovely and the unlovely, the peaceful and the peevish, look at the life which lies behind them with different eyes; but it is their own, to contemplate, idealise, and explain.

> "Be the day weary or be the day long,
> At length it ringeth to evensong."

And the evening chimes or curfew bell often seem more musical than others, for there is more time to listen to them. The day spent out of London also draws to a close, and the evening light seems to suit the old people, who wait in quiet content for the summons to return home. Some nod drowsily, some moralise, and repeat with new feeling the hackneyed saying, "God made the country, man made the town." Now and then the more serious and thoughtful murmur allusions to a "heavenly land," or scraps of verses learnt in childhood, for Nature's composing influence is upon them. Some few, whose greater originality and intelligence, or superior birth and education, award them the distant respect of their neighbours and the doubtful privilege of loneliness, draw together. One of this number, aged somewhere between eighty and ninety, approaches another, sitting beside her, with an attempt at sociability.

"Are you comfortable, ma'am?" she inquires politely.

"Yes, ma'am, I thank you," replies the other octogenarian, outdoing the first in old-world courtliness of demeanour. "I have not the pleasure of knowing your name, ma'am."

"My name, ma'am, is Hawker. You must think of 'pedlar,' and then you will remember it."

The new acquaintance progresses favourably. It transpires that both the old ladies are well connected, and are not therefore quite at home with their neighbours. One of them possesses that hall-mark of gentility, a piano. It is as old in fashion as her costume and manners, and neither she herself nor anyone belonging to her can play upon it; but it serves as a sideboard where bits of china and other family relics stand with their broken sides turned to the wall. The other old lady had a piano once, and its history leads to a story, sad but common enough. It ran away, like all other furniture with the right number of legs, because drink invaded the home. Confidences flow apace. Something in the quiet scene opens the cabinet of memory.

"I see the quality is wearing bonnets something like I used to wear when I was a girl, only they don't put them on quite the same. How well I mind washing and starching them, and hating to do it because they all belonged to the country. I never saw the town until I married, and many's the time I have wished that I had never seen it at all."

"Ah, ma'am, you may well say that if you were brought up in the country. But young folks will get to London if they can."

"That was just me. I was a widow with three little children when I was twenty-six, and I had to work for them, too. I mind once when I had done my job of shirt-making, and had to carry it home across the park, I was so tired that I rested my back against a tree and cried like a girl. I should have lost heart many times if I had not had a beautiful dream."

"A dream, ma'am. Tell me about that."

Heads draw closer together, and the quavering voice becomes solemn.

"I dreamt there was nothing but clouds above me, and then I saw a great hand stretched out to me through the grey. It was the most beautiful hand I ever saw. When I woke I thought it meant that God had beckoned me, and that I was going to die and leave the children, and there would be nothing for them but the House. When they were in bed next night and my work was done, I went down to see an old couple who lodged in the room below and had been kind and friendly to me, and told them all about it. I asked them to look after the little ones if I were took off sudden, and I burst out crying again. I think I can see those two now sitting by the fire. The old man was quiet a minute; then he said, 'Look here, my girl; you are wrong about the meaning of that dream. It was all to tell you that the hand of God would be over you and the kids. You will be able to keep them until they can keep themselves, and by-and-by they will keep you.' Well, I took heart again, and it has all come true. My son makes me an allowance, and he would never let me want for anything."

One dream and one scrap of autobiography leads to another, until it is time to start for home. The evening finds the party back in familiar scenes. If, in contrast to fields, lanes, and gardens, the streets and courts seem closer and narrower; if, compared with the smell of hay and hedgerows, the perfume of oil shops, gin shops, fried fish shops, and stale vegetables seems more noticeable, the revellers, being refreshed in body and mind, are more able to resist the depressing effect. Food for day dreams and imagination strengthens that inner being, which is liable to grow faint under the pressure of sordid environment. A glimpse of new scenes has awakened new senses and old associations. A softening impression that friends are kind, that the world is fair, and that God the Father above created it to be a good place, steals into hearts apt to harden from neglect. Perhaps words glibly spoken of the hope of eternal rest have gained new meaning from the experience of a calm, still day. It may be that the vague idea of a better world has taken shape and colouring from the innocent enjoyment of passing nine hours in the country.

"TWO OR THREE TOGETHER IN THE REVOLVING ROPE."

A ROMANCE OF OLD FRANCE.

By Christopher Hare, Author of "Dreams to Sell," Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.–XXIII.

The story opens in the reign of Louis XIV. Yvonne de la Féronniere, heiress of an old Huguenot family, is being educated in the famous Abbaye-aux-Bois. Her school friend, Gabrielle de Beaumanoir, marries the Duc de Maillebois, and at the wedding Yvonne meets Réné, the young Chevalier de Beaumanoir. They are mutually attracted to each other, and their friendship ripens into love. They meet again at the Palace of Versailles when King Louis receives the Doge of Genoa. Yvonne's guardian, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, abruptly removes her from the Abbaye-aux-Bois to his own house, where reigns an atmosphere of worldliness and frivolity. Mdlle. de la Féronniere is a great heiress, and no effort is spared to make her become a Roman Catholic, and to compel her to marry her cousin, Adolphe de Vaudreuil. She is driven to extremity by the Abbé de Chaylus. Then follows the revocation of the Edict of Nantes and the persecution of the Huguenots, and Yvonne disappears. Meantime Réné de Beaumanoir has sailed from Toulon in command of La Topaze to redeem captives from Barbary. M. de la Forêt, the Huguenot pastor, goes with him to offer himself in exchange for one of his own people. Adventures with the Dey of Algiers follow, and M. de la Forêt completes his sacrifice. Réné has a narrow escape, and returns post-haste to Paris as soon as he lands.

CHAPTER XXIV.

"MY poor Réné! What a strange and deplorable adventure! To think that François, our most trusted messenger, should reach Toulon ere you sailed, only to meet with that terrible mishap, so that it was all of no avail!"

It was the young Duchesse de Maillebois who spoke. She sat by her brother's side, in her own particular chamber, hung with green tapestry in a quaint design of children and birds. Candles in silver sconces threw a soft light around, while the cheerful glow of a great wood fire played on the painted ceiling.

He had told the story of his adventures, of his perils by sea and land; and, above all, the weird tale of the messenger's loss of memory, which had only returned to him as he stood once more on the threshold of his master's house.

"It was a cruel delay when every moment was so precious," cried Réné; "but at last I am here, and together we will find her. Have you told me all that you learnt from old Madelon? Is it possible that Mademoiselle Yvonne can have disappeared, and left no trace behind her?"

"Alas! yes; that is precisely what has happened," replied his sister. "My first thought was to go boldly to Monsieur de Vaudreuil, and insist upon an answer. But Henri would not hear of it; he warned me that it would only put dear Yvonne's enemies on their guard. Moreover, a week later Madelon found their house deserted, and we learnt that they had gone to Blois, where Monsieur had been summoned in haste, to return to his official duties. He is Deputy-Governor, I believe."

"Can I see Madelon, and question her myself?" he inquired.

"Unfortunately she is beyond your reach. On the occasion of that visit to the Hôtel Vaudreuil, she seems to have received some mysterious message from the concierge, and I greatly fear that she must have been lured away—Heaven knows where—for I have had no news of her since."

"Then up to this moment you have no clue to help us, Gabrielle?" he asked, with a growing feeling of dependency.

She shook her head. "Alas! none whatever. Yet I have done my best, and never rested in my pursuit. Her uncle's first aim is to secure Yvonne's fortune, therefore before he marries her to his son she must become a Catholic. To compass this, she will doubtless have been placed in some strict religious house, and I have already found a pretext for visiting most of the convents in Paris and the neighbourhood."

"Your name has, I presume, assured you a courteous reception, my dear sister; but I do not think they would reveal to you the secrets of the prison house."

"Ah, Réné!" she sighed. "If you knew how warmly I have patronised every good work, what alms I have bestowed, the shameless way in which I have made love to every abbess and tourière and portière, you would pity me. Yet still no trace of my dear Yvonne!

"Once, indeed, I heard of a mysterious lady closely secluded with the Visitandines of the Rue St. Antoine; and I gained admittance to her cell, to find that she was only a friend of that poor Madame Guyon. In my despair I even carried my search to the Couvent des Pénitentes, Rue Grenelle St. Honoré," she added in a lower voice. "With a lettre de cachet you know that anything is possible!"

"Yes, indeed!" replied her brother, with a shudder. "We must dare to face the worst. If you have visited convents in vain, what say you to the Bastille?"

"What a terrible thought!" cried Gabrielle. "The mere terror of it would be enough to kill a sensitive girl of tender nurture," and she looked up with brimming eyes.

"Yet I am haunted by this spectre of fear, and I cannot rest until I have laid it," was the sad rejoinder. "In old days my father knew the Governor of the Bastille well, and I trust that he will befriend me so far as to tell me the truth. I will go to-morrow, before my heart fails. I cannot rest, or despair would overwhelm me. If this fails, I will seek out Adolphe de Vaudreuil and wring an answer from him at the point of the sword."

Some dim memory recalled to Gabrielle that the man was a noted duellist, but she checked the word of demur which trembled on her lips. There was no other way.

Betimes, on the morrow, the Chevalier de Beaumanoir found himself before the grey walls of the Bastille. The massive towers which seemed to rise above him in cold defiance, the great barred doors strengthened with chains and iron gratings, the vigilant body of guards and warders, all smote him with a sense of helplessness. It needed a stern effort on his part to penetrate into that grim abode of desolation.

Yet in truth he met with no obstacle, and the manner of his entrance was strangely easy. It so chanced that the Governor was at leisure that morning, and the name of Beaumanoir awoke sunny memories of the past and of his old friend. He gave a courteous welcome to the young officer, who was surprised to find such a cheery, ruddy-faced man in the position of head gaoler. After a brief exchange of compliments came the awkward question:

"What can I do to serve you, Monsieur le Chevalier? It would give me much pleasure, to do so for your father's sake."

Now Réné had passed a wakeful night in trying to frame some excuse for this visit, but the ways of diplomacy and deception were so unfamiliar to him that he paused for a moment, and found no words to reply. He looked up in the Governor's face, which was so open and friendly that it inspired confidence. On a sudden impulse, he told him the whole story of his eager, half-despairing search.

"Ah, Monsieur," he added, "you will pardon this bold step, and tell me if, indeed, Mademoiselle de la Féronniere is within these terrible walls."

"You have my deepest sympathy, Monsieur de Beaumanoir, and I will give you all the information in my power. We will search the register, in which is entered the name of every prisoner, with the date of his arrival, the name of the special tower in which he is confined, and the number of the chamber. But I trust that your alarm is unfounded, for I cannot believe that such an arrival as that of the lady you seek should not have attracted my special attention."

He touched a silver hand-bell, and his secretary brought in a massive volume bound in black vellum, and after spreading it open on the table before him, stood aside awaiting further commands.

"No; it is as I thought," said the Governor, after a time, as he looked up at his young friend with a smile "There is no such name in the index. You may be thankful to escape that worst certainty, for it may indeed be too often said of those who enter here that they leave all hope behind."

"How can I thank you for your kindness, Monsieur?" exclaimed Réné, who had listened in breathless suspense.

"Now that you have ventured amongst us, my friend, there is much to interest you in this ancient fortress; and it will be something to boast of, in the days to come, that you have seen the inside of the Bastille.

"Monsieur Noirfontaine will be your guide, and I bid you God-speed, with my warmest sympathy in your welfare and success."

Beaumanoir gladly accepted the offer of so rare an opportunity, and took his leave with ever-growing wonder that so genial a man could be found to occupy so sombre a post.

The young secretary who led the way, with a great bunch of keys hanging at his girdle, felt something of personal pride in acting the part of host to such a stupendous and gruesome dwelling. He first conducted his guest up a narrow, winding staircase, to the summit of one of the high towers, from whence there was a bird's-eye view of the whole.

"You see, Monsieur," he observed, "that the entire castle is closed in by a deep, wide moat, which is our outer defence."

"Yes; it would be no easy matter to cross that," said Réné, to whom, even at a distance, rose the horrible stench of the water which putrefied below.

"Then you notice that all these massive towers are united by thick walls, enclosing two large courts. Each tower is eighty feet high, with four storeys, and has its special name. Thus here is number one, the Tour du Trésor; next to us is number two, De la Comté; and so forth.

"There are dungeons at the base below the level of the ground, some quite dark—horrible dens, Monsieur, for the very worst criminals.

"'There is no such name in the index.'"

"Ah, you happy people outside, you have no conception what long imprisonment means, even when there is no torture!" and he shuddered.

"Come with me; I will show you one of the cells for solitary confinement, which was lately occupied for nigh on fifteen years by a man of high rank."

Silent with growing dismay, the visitor followed, down steep stairways and along endless dark corridors, until at length his companion paused and held up his lantern.

"Ah, yes, this is number seventy-nine."

The key grated in the lock, and the heavy double doors swung slowly open. The air was heavy and oppressive, and the light within, which came through a narrow loop-hole, was so dim that for some minutes it was difficult to distinguish anything.

Réné felt his heart grow chill at the thought of the hapless captive who had been immured for so many long years in this miserable hole, and of whose ultimate fate he did not care to inquire. He looked round the cell. There was a low pallet, a table, a basin, a brass candlestick, and a wooden chair, and in a dark corner of the rough stone floor, lay a broom and a tinder box.

"Poor man, what a terrible doom!" he sighed. "Death must come here as a welcome release."

"You may well say so. Ah, I could tell you strange stories of the many devices, by which the unfortunate prisoners try to kill time. I have heard of some who trained spiders, of others who spent those long weary hours of solitude in measuring the dungeon again and again, in counting the iron studs on the door, in pouring water from one dish to another, in arranging and re-arranging a few faggots of wood; and, last resource of all, in pacing with measured tread, up and down, backwards and forwards, like a wild beast, in his lonely cell."

"Poor souls!" cried young Beaumanoir, and his eyes filled with tears at the thought that Yvonne might have nearly escaped such a fate.

"May the Lord have mercy on them and count this to their credit, that for them the days of purgatory may be cut short!" he added, below his breath.

After this they were passing on through a long corridor, when Monsieur Noirfontaine raised his hand in token of silence, and whispered:

"We must make no sound here, for yonder is the prison of the 'Man of the Iron Mask.' He has been here for close on twenty-four years, and has never been seen, even by his special warders, without that black concealing mask fastened on with a padlock."

"Who is he?" was the low, eager question.

"Ah, if I knew and were to breathe his name, it would be at the sacrifice of my own life. He is a man of noble mien, I am told, and is treated with profound respect; but his keepers have orders to despatch him instantly if he uncovers. It is one of those dark mysteries which will never be solved," he added below his breath.

This was the last and the strongest impression, which Réné carried away from that memorable visit to the Bastille. For many days he was haunted by the weird remembrance of all that he had seen.

It had been a fruitless expedition, so far as his search for Mademoiselle de la Féronniere was concerned, but his soul was filled with thankfulness that it should have been so. His task was still all before him, for Yvonne was as far off as ever; yet at least one load of anxiety was lifted from his heart, for he could not think of her as a captive in that terrible place without a thrill of horror, even before he had crossed the grim threshold; but now the dread of such a fate for her was maddening.

Nothing now remained but to seek out the De Vaudreuils at Blois, and learn the truth from them, or perish in the attempt.

CHAPTER XXV.

MEANTIME, Yvonne. Where was she? We must go back to that memorable day, of late October, which followed the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

The pale, grey light of dawn was dimly stealing over the high roofs of old Paris, until it smote the lattice window of Mademoiselle de la Féronniere's chamber in the Hôtel Vaudreuil. She was watching the first glimmer with wistful eyes, and vaguely wondering what suffering and humiliation the coming day might have in store for her.

The long, close confinement and meagre fare, the solitude and anxiety, preyed upon her health, and she passed a wakeful night.

Again and again there rose up before her the vision of that last painful interview with her uncle, when she had firmly and irrevocably rejected his final offer, and registered a solemn vow that she would never change her faith nor accept Adolphe de Vaudreuil as her husband.

Since that hour the girl had been kept a close prisoner in her room, closely guarded even from the friendly interest of her cousin Louise, while the faithful Madelon had not been suffered to approach her. Twice a day Rosalie, Madame's maid, had brought her bread and water, and rendered in silence a scant measure of service.

What would be the end of it all? she asked herself, with a curious feeling of aloofness, as though the question concerned someone else. Did the Marquis de Vaudreuil think to frighten her and starve her into submission, or was he, in cold blood, awaiting her death that he might inherit her estates?

Strange weird visions and fantastic waking dreams would, unbidden, haunt the girl in those long, silent watches of the night. She remembered the antique-ring, her most precious possession, which she had given into Madelon's care that she might send it to the Chevalier de Beaumanoir, as a last resource, in token of her urgent need.

Had the hour come for this final, desperate appeal? And, ah, if so, could she ever dare to hope that it would reach him?

In fancy she saw a white dove bearing the ring, and flying southward with outspread wings. Yet danger was at hand; for above, in the calm blue sky, there hovered a fierce bird of prey, a hawk whose piercing gaze had scanned his victim from afar. Of a sudden he swooped down with deadly aim; already the silver plumage was ruffled and blood-stained, as her gaze was fixed on it with the fascination of terror.

Hope died within her, when she caught sight from afar of an eagle, who clove the air with swift, strong flight. The avenger was at hand, but would he be too late to save? And then, alas! what would it profit the hapless dove that vengeance should be wreaked on her destroyer?

Ah, what sound was that? The dim echoes of distant strife, the din of battle in the air?

No, this was no fancy; it was nigh at hand—a creaking in the lock of her chamber door, which was stealthily opened. Was this some new form of persecution? A cry of dismay trembled on her lips when she caught sight of Rosalie, who crept in with noiseless, slippered feet, bearing a lantern in her hand.

"Oh, Ma'm'selle!" she whispered. "You are awake? It is well. You must rise in haste and make ready for a journey. And there must be no sound to rouse suspicion in the house. Monsieur awaits you."

"What, at this hour?" exclaimed Mademoiselle de la Féronniere indignantly. "Bear word to your master that I will attend him later."

"I dare not delay, Ma'm'selle. It would but anger him to no purpose. My orders are to bring you at once. There is a carriage awaiting you in the outer courtyard."

"What evil plot is this? If I am to be carried hence, at least let it be openly, in the light of day, after due farewell to Madame and my cousin Louise."

"I pray you, be guided by me, Ma'm'selle," pleaded the maid. "Resistance will not serve you, for no one dare cross the will of Monsieur, and if you go not willingly he will use force. Dress quickly in your warmest garments, for the early morn is chill to travel in. Believe me, I would help you if I could," she added in a kindly tone, for even her frivolous heart was touched by the cruel persecution of one so gentle and patient.

Yvonne understood. She was absolutely helpless; and, after all, any change could hardly be for the worse. So she thought, poor child, in her ignorance of the dark places of the earth, where sin and cruelty have their habitation.

Having once made her decision, she wasted no time in futile regrets or idle protest, but nerved herself to face the task before her. She rose at once, and put on her simplest clothes, the plain black gown which she had brought from the convent and treasured as a reminder of those peaceful days. As she made her brief, hurried preparations for this sudden journey she could not fail to notice that she was closely watched. This gave a new turn to her thoughts, and reminded her that if she could carry away any money or jewels, they might be of priceless value in the dark, unknown future.

She took advantage of a moment when Rosalie's attention was engaged elsewhere, to take from under her pillow a small, embroidered satchel, which contained most of her treasures. This she had put ready, several days before, when some vague idea of flight had occurred to her, only to be promptly dismissed as impossible.

"Can I not see Madelon for one moment?" she asked, when all was ready.

"Alas! no, Ma'm'selle," was the reply. "There are spies in the household, and it would be more than my life is worth to suffer you to meet her; but I will give her your farewell, or any message."

"Tell her what has befallen me, and bid her remember!" She dared say no more, for she felt that she was in an atmosphere of treachery.

"Give Mademoiselle Louise my tender greeting," she added; "and pray her ever to keep a kindly thought of her unfortunate cousin."

As they reached the open door there were sounds below.

"Come quick, Ma'm'selle!" gasped Rosalie in abject terror. "I hear the voice of Monsieur, and his step on the stair. He is growing impatient; we have tarried too long already."

Closely muffled up in a long grey cloak and hood, Mademoiselle de la Féronniere followed her guide down long, dark passages and winding stairs to an old part of the house which she had never seen before. It was too dark to distinguish anyone; but she knew that her uncle had joined them, and as they reached a low, narrow entry, he took the lantern from Rosalie's hand, and dismissed her with curses on her slowness and stupidity. Then he caught Yvonne by the shoulder, and half led, half dragged her across the inner courtyard to an arched gateway, where a hired coach waited on the other side.

"'You must rise in haste and make ready for a journey.'"

Whispered orders were given to the coachman, and the next moment the girl was lifted from her feet and roughly thrust into the chariot; someone sprang into the seat by her side, and she knew by the rumbling and creaking that they had started.

For awhile there was silence, then there sounded in her ear a voice like a frost.

"All my kindness and persuasion have failed to move you, Yvonne. It only remains to see what stern discipline and severity will do. To carry out this most thoroughly, I have here a lettre de cachet, signed by the King."

There was a pause, and the girl held her breath, but spoke never a word. Presently Monsieur de Vaudreuil continued in a changed tone:

"Listen to me, child. Even at the eleventh hour there is yet time ; and deeply as you have sinned, mercy still awaits you. One word of penitence and obedience from you, and a life of happiness, of wealth, and luxury awaits your future."

"I cannot speak that word, Monsieur," was the low, firm reply.

"Then you have sealed your fate for ever, and your blood be upon your own head. Henceforth I wash my hands of you, and sterner guardians will do their worst," was the firm reply.

After that there was silence. Thus began the fateful journey.

Slowly they made their way over the rough cobble stones of the narrow streets, where the tall, spectral houses peered down through the dusk

But already the grey tide of light had swept over the sleeping city, and now the rosy finger of dawn was beckoning weary men and women out to their labour. On every side there were signs and sounds of waking life, and from the stately church towers overhead the hour chimed on many bells. As they drove out through the city gate, they were challenged by the town guard, who demanded to see the safe-conduct. As the officer peered at the paper he muttered the names aloud :

"Monsieur Robert Lange, wool merchant, of the Rue St. Antoine, and his daughter, Antoinette Lange." A piece of gold was slipped into his hand, and he made a sign to the coachman to drive on.

Outside the walls, the open space was crowded with sheds and hucksters' booths for some coming fair. The road was deep in mud, and very slow was their progress as they jolted over the ruts, until at length they came to Villeneuve le Roy, where the horses were baited and the travellers broke their fast.

By this time the sun had risen high in the heavens, and before them lay stretched out, like a long white ribbon, the highway over which they had last driven, on the eventful day of that regal, splendid fête at Sceaux.

What a change had come over her fortunes! mused Yvonne. That had been their high-water mark, when in the heydey of prosperity, flattered and admired, she had played her brief part as a queen of society.

Ah, but another memory awoke, deep and tender, and she dwelt with passionate emotion on that halcyon day. Then it was that she had met Gabrielle once more, and had heard from her the latest news of Réné, and had received the message of his undying love. And now, alas! how the scene had shifted and the cup of earthly happiness had been dashed from her lips.

She was a wretched prisoner, friendless and forsaken, hurried away from all that made life dear, threatened with the most cruel persecution, and destined to be buried alive in some dreary dungeon, where she would never see the light of day again.

Since the Fête de Sceaux a cloud of brooding silence had severed her from her friends, and the gates of Paradise were closed against her. Never had Yvonne more need of the sparkling courage which had not failed her yet in her darkest hour.

Now it so chanced that as the lumbering coach rolled out into the open country, leaving far behind the close, pestilential air of old Paris, the girl seemed after a while to breathe in fresh life, and her spirit rose to face the coming ordeal. Also, to her surprise, when they drew up here and there at some tavern door by the wayside, she found herself treated with consideration, and called "Mademoiselle Lange," and food was set before her—the best mine host could supply—with only the whispered warning from her guardian that she must keep her hood closely round her face.

She wondered whether this was not a device to throw any possible pursuers off the scent, and this she thought the more likely when she heard her uncle repeat the story of his being a wool merchant from Paris, and speak of her as his daughter returning to her convent school.

This he did in a marked way when he found himself compelled to put up for the night, at no greater distance than the little town of Étampes. He had been compelled to do so after an angry wrangle with the driver, who swore that his horses could not go another step, and threw out dark hints of the risk in travelling by night on those lonely country roads.

Monsieur de Vaudreuil cursed his ill-luck, and in the same breath his folly, in not bringing some of his serving men as an escort ; but he had no choice, and was forced to put up at the "Lion d'Or" for the night.

Secrecy was so plainly his object that a flash of hope passed through the mind of Yvonne. Surely, if he so feared pursuit, there must be someone who still took an interest in her fate, and from whom he sought to hide this clandestine journey.

XUM

Suddenly the girl thought of Louise, who had always been her friend; the crippled daughter of the house, who from her sick chamber learnt all that happened, and whose keen intelligence was a match for her father's craft.

Réné was far away on the distant seas; a barrier of silence had risen up between herself and her old schoolfellow Gabrielle; with all her devotion, old Madelon was a servant, poor and without influence. If help were to come to her in her extremity, it would be through her cousin Louise.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE night had closed in gloom, a sky grey with heavy clouds; but the morning dawned glorious in rosy light, and a smiling world, flooded with sunshine, welcomed the travellers as they started betimes from the inn at Étampes. After a night's rest the horses jogged along with fresh spirit, and the grumbling driver had recovered his temper, and saw that his interest lay in serving the whims of his master for the time being.

To Yvonne, who had so long been an unwilling denizen of the great city, closed in by tall houses which almost shut out the sky, it was joy only to breathe the sweet air of the country after that polluted atmosphere. The girl drew a quivering breath of delight as her eyes rested on the hedgebanks by the wayside glistening with dew-drops, on the fertile meadows, the yellow hay-stacks, and the cluster of red-roofed cottages here and there, with little children playing on the threshold.

Stretching out beyond them, lay the straight white road, with tall poplars on either side showering down the gold of their autumnal foliage. For the moment Yvonne almost forgot whither it was leading her as she looked out across the fields to the distant villages, each with its church spire, white in the sunlight, pointing heavenward.

She was free to dream undisturbed, for her uncle no longer took the slightest notice of her when they were alone. He had unfolded a bundle of plans and accounts and was deep in their study. Of a truth, he had chosen a most congenial occupation, for it was the schedule of the broad estates in Poitou which had been entrusted to his care, and of which he was planning to rob his orphan ward by legal sequestration of a heretic's goods and chattels.

The thoughts were as far asunder as heaven and hell—of those two who sat in silence, side by side, during the long hours of that jolting and rumbling, as the heavy coach lumbered on its way.

But all things come to an end, and the day was far advanced when they arrived in sight of a broad, shining river, on whose reedy banks uprose the famous city of Orleans, with its towers and turrets, and ancient castle frowning down on the grey ramparts below. Here they drew up at the courtyard of a tavern in the Place du Martroy, opposite a statue of Joan of Arc; and on the swinging sign-board above the door was painted a rude picture of the warlike maid.

Monsieur thrust his head out of the coach window.

"Look to it, you fellow, that we have fresh horses within the hour, for it is my set purpose to make the last stage of our journey this night."

The man mumbled assent, and meantime the landlord stood in the arched gateway, with a beaming face

"Will it please Monsieur to descend? Here we can offer you good fare, and fresh wine of a vintage not to be matched in Orleans."

The travellers had scarcely alighted, when at this moment a burst of loud laughter, accompanied by the sound of jovial voices, came through an open door. De Vaudreuil drew back disconcerted.

"Can you give us a quiet chamber for our supper?" he asked, in a tone of authority. "I am Monsieur Lange, a merchant from Paris, travelling with my daughter, who is in delicate health."

"Ah, Monsieur, I have all you can desire, if you will condescend to follow me," was the reply, as with an obsequious bow mine host led the way through the inn parlour, where some young gallants in riding costume were sitting at a long table.

He hastily ushered the new arrivals into a mean inner chamber, scantily furnished with a bench or two and a deal board on trestles, laid out with earthenware platters and pewter goblets; while the rafters of the low ceiling were black with smoke. But a savoury smell of cooking was wafted in from the kitchen beyond, and made amends for much to the hungry guests.

The landlord of "La Pucelle" knew from long experience that, after many hours on the road his customers were not wont to be over-fastidious, and he could always insure their content with the special vintage of which he was so proud. Still, he made his humble apology.

"I am indeed distressed, Monsieur, to offer you these humble quarters; but we were not warned of your coming, and, as you see, the best salle is already given up to M. le Comte de Cluny and his followers, who do but dine here and bait their horses, for they ride to Versailles to join the court."

"Then we bourgeois may stand aside and wait the pleasure of these fine gentlemen!" rejoined the latest visitor, with a shrug of the shoulders and twinkle in his eye. "Well, see to it, man, that you give us of your best, and serve us promptly, for we, too, have a journey before us. Ah! I wish my legs were astride a saddle instead of being cramped in that wretched box," he added to himself.

"You shall have no cause to complain. Monsieur Lange. My wife has a fat capon, wellnigh done to a turn already, and I will bring you the flask of wine myself."

He was as good as his word, and Yvonne and her uncle were enjoying an excellent meal, when suddenly there was a clatter of iron hoofs on the paved yard, and a horseman dashed up to the door. He seemed to be in terrible haste, for before he had time to alight he demanded in a loud voice, somewhat breathless from fatigue:

"Can you give me any tidings of Monsieur le Marquis de Vaudreuil? Has he alighted here or passed this way?"

In a flurry of proud excitement mine host bustled forward to the entrance. Surely his tavern was becoming mightily aristocratic, a house of call for all the nobles of France!

"M. le Marquis has not arrived here yet; but I make no doubt that he is on the way," was his complacent reply, in a tone loud enough to be heard by all his customers.

As that first cry reached him, de Vaudreuil sprang to his feet, for he recognised the voice. What shrewd mischance was this? How had it happened? Who could have set the pursuer on his track?

He turned with a flash of rage on the startled girl by his side.

"This is your doing, Yvonne! Curse you for it! But it will not avail you; I vow that you shall rue the day!" and he clenched his hands as though to strike her.

She rose to her full height and faced him with a clear, unfaltering challenge of brave eyes, while her voice rang out like a low-toned bell.

"You wrong me, Monsieur. I had no knowledge of your plot. How then could I betray it?"

Then of a sudden she paused, and a questioning look crept over her face, for some instinct told her that Louise might have done this.

But the change of mood passed unheeded, for her guardian had caught words, repeated aloud in a tone of awe by the landlord.

"An urgent summons from his Majesty the King, did you say?"

Monsieur de Vaudreuil hesitated no longer. In another minute he had pushed his way through the group standing by the inn door, and with an imperious gesture drew the messenger aside.

"Ah, Monsieur! Heaven be praised! I have found you!" cried the man in joyful surprise, which changed to dismay when he saw his master's face distorted with rage.

"What means this, Pierre? Why have you dared to follow me? Who sent you hither to spy on me?" he asked, hurling forth the angry questions like a challenge.

"It was Madame, who bid me haste for my life, and spare no cost, and rest not night nor day till I came up with you!" the poor fellow blundered out, sorely aggrieved at this scant welcome after his weary ride. "There came a letter for you from the King, with his own seal."

"Spare me this long preamble, and give it hither at once," said the Marquis, holding out his hand.

"But, Monsieur, they said the letter itself was too precious to send," he stammered. "I might be robbed on the way, like as not, riding alone. So Ma'm'selle, I mean Madame, broke the seal, and said it was of desperate urgency and you must return to Paris on the instant."

The unlucky Pierre spoke the words as if he were repeating a lesson His master turned upon him in wrath.

"Do you expect me to believe this cock-and-bull story?"

"See here, Madame has written," he cried, and after fumbling in his pouch pulled out a

"'I had no knowledge of your plot. How then could I betray it?'" crumpled note. There were just a few scribbled lines :

"Come back, Monsieur, at once. The King has need of you.—Your obedient wife, to command, "OLYMPE DE VAUDREUIL."

Never had Monsieur found himself in so difficult a position, and he inwardly cursed his wife for a silly fool. But that was no new discovery, and brought him small comfort. Why, in the name of Heaven, had she not sent a copy of this precious letter, if she was too nervous to trust it out of her hands ?

What if it were indeed urgent, and the King had some immediate and all-important commission, with which no one but himself could be entrusted.

All the world, of course, believed him to be still in Paris, and he knew that his Majesty was not one to brook delay. Oh, if he were not hampered by that girl, who had plagued him enough already by her obstinacy !

Then a sudden thought struck him. This man who had been sent from home was steady and trustworthy, and had been many years in his service. He must have guessed much already. Why not confide in him altogether ? It was in an altered tone of friendliness that he spoke.

"Listen, Pierre. There are travellers within on their way to Paris who ride through the night. If I can secure a fresh horse and take the journey with them, it may save me at least four-and-twenty hours, and I am heartily weary of that lumbering coach.

"But in that case I must leave Mademoiselle in your charge. To-morrow morning, when the horses have had a night's rest, you will escort her in the hired chariot to St. Pierre, on the road to Blois, to the Convent of the 'Filles de Marie,' in the Rue du Mail. It is but a matter of some twenty miles, and I will give you a letter for the Mother Superior. Remember that here I am known as Monsieur Lange, a merchant from Paris, and the lady is my daughter. Be cautious and discreet, and you will earn no niggardly reward."

"Monsieur, I am at your service to command, and you will not repent your trust."

Like all serving men, he knew the value of a secret.

Having once made up his mind, M. de Vaudreuil found no difficulty in carrying out his plan. The Count de Cluny gladly welcomed so useful an addition to his escort ; and the landlord's wife, a buxom, good-tempered woman, readily promised to take the utmost care of Mademoiselle until the morrow, when she would continue her journey.

ON JORDAN'S BANKS.

By the Rev. Dr. J. G. McPherson, F.R.S.E., Minister of Ruthven.

(With Illustrations from Photographs by Bonfils.)

THE BRIDGE OF THE DAUGHTERS OF JACOB.

NO river in the world is more spoken of by mankind than the Jordan. No river attracts so many pilgrims from distant lands. This is not because it is a river of the world, like the Thames or the Tiber; not because of its overflowing phenomena, like the Nile; not because of the beautiful scenery on its banks, like the Abana and Pharpar, "lucid streams." But because the Jordan is the symbol of the spiritual birth of man and his entrance into heaven, the scene of Christ's baptism and the crossing to the Land of Promise.

In itself, apart from the associations of the Holy Scriptures, the Jordan is anything but attractive. It is a colossal trench, from 600 feet to 1,300 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. There is a miniature of the awe-striking ditch in the stream that glides along in inky repulsiveness a hundred feet under the precipitous rocks from Novar in Ross-shire to the Cromarty Firth. Here and there, at the fords, the water is nearly on a level with the surrounding tree-decked land; but otherwise it is far from being attractive.

Four streams dispute the honour of being the source of the Jordan; but really all that now surrounds these must have been once a huge marsh, and it is now very difficult to trace the real Jordan source. Captain Newbold, by careful observation, with the help of the Arabs, found one stream that was never dry: it runs past the ruined walls and forts of Banias. The streams are fed by the rains that glide down the slopes of Mount Hermon or by the melting snows that rush with wild impetuosity through the deep-cut ravines; and ultimately they settle for a time in Lake Huleh. There is an old Roman bridge over the stream at Banias. Swollen with snows, the stream shows to advantage its dizzy cataracts; at other times its deep rock-hewn bed is comparatively tame. There is, however, a curious cavern in the cliff which has for centuries drawn ascetics to worship there. It was also one of the chief dwellings of the Baalim. The Greeks afterwards were fascinated by the inspiring associations, and dedicated it to Pan. There, shortly before the birth of Christ, Herod built a temple of white marble in honour of Augustus, deifying the Emperor by placing his bust beside that of the Grecian god. Soon the place got the name of Cæsarea Philippi, as it was embellished by Philip, the tetrarch of the district. Cæsarea, however, was again replaced by the name Paneas, pronounced by the Arabs Banias. Strange is it that at the place where a heathen god and a vain man were worshipped the very God-Man and His disciples took refuge till He planned His world-redeeming work. It was there that Christ made the first clear confession of His Divine Sonship.

The shore of the little Lake of Huleh is thickly surrounded with swamps and jungles of the papyrus reed, well described by MacGregor in his brilliant boat excursion with his Rob Roy. From the south end of the lake the Jordan descends into the Great Rift in one almost continuous cascade, falling 680 feet in nine miles. Already has the river received its characteristic name, "The Descender." Then it recovers itself, and has a smooth flow, before entering the Sea of Galilee. Six miles above the confluence the river is, as here represented, crossed by "The Bridge of the Daughters of Jacob," on the main route between Galilee and Damascus.

The Sea of Galilee was once the "focus" of all the life and industry of Palestine. Nine important towns were built on its shores, and prosperous villages crowded the neighbouring plains. The surface of the sea was constantly crowded with fishermen's boats, whose heavy "takes" were preserved and sent to Jerusalem. The rich resources of the place attracted representative men from many quarters, and these supplied our Lord with a many-minded audience to initiate His grand world-spreading gospel. On the shores Christ delighted to walk and meditate. There He spent a very large part of His ministry. He walked on its waters, and "the wavelets rippled His benign words to listeners on the shell-studded shore. Indeed, the Sea of Galilee is the very cradle of the Gospel.

Imbued with the glorious associations of the narratives of the evangelists, travellers of our day are disappointed with the loneliness of the place. After having been the favourite haunt of the Founder of Christianity, it is now the picture of desolation. Not a white sail glisters in the sunset; nothing but ruins stud the shore. It is now only haunted by its own great memories. But the late Rev. Dr. Hugh Macmillan noticed one redeeming feature amid the sombre loneliness—the pilgrimages there for the beautiful scallop-shells. "It is the symbol of that which has drawn all hearts to this sacred shrine and made it the most loved of all lands. We put it to the inner ear of the soul, and we hear the murmur of all the centuries of Christian civilisation in its depths. It seems to whisper to us, amid all the changes of time, of the Kingdom which cannot be moved, and of the hope that maketh not ashamed."

SHEPHERDS FORDING THE JORDAN.

The Jordan then commences its main descents and meanderings. Between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, into which it throws its waters, Lieutenant Lynch passed down twenty-seven rapids, which he calls threatening, besides several minor rushes. But in the sixty-five miles of its course the river traverses about two hundred miles. The valley varies in breadth from three to fourteen miles. On the right bank are the mountains of Galilee and Samaria, from 800 to 1,500 feet in height; on the left bank the flat-topped hills of Gilead rise to 2,000 feet, only broken by the valleys of the Yarmuk and Jubbok. The long, narrow vale expands twice—at Bethshan and Jericho—to the features of a plain.

Professor George Adam Smith, after careful observations, repeatedly made, considered that the whole of the valley of the Jordan might be cultivated through time. "The heat is of a forcing-house. Wherever water comes, the flowers rise to the knee, and herbage often to the shoulder. By all the streams there are brakes of cane and oleander." Yet the undrained swamps breed malaria. The unhealthy jungle harbours wild animals, and snakes appear at every turn.

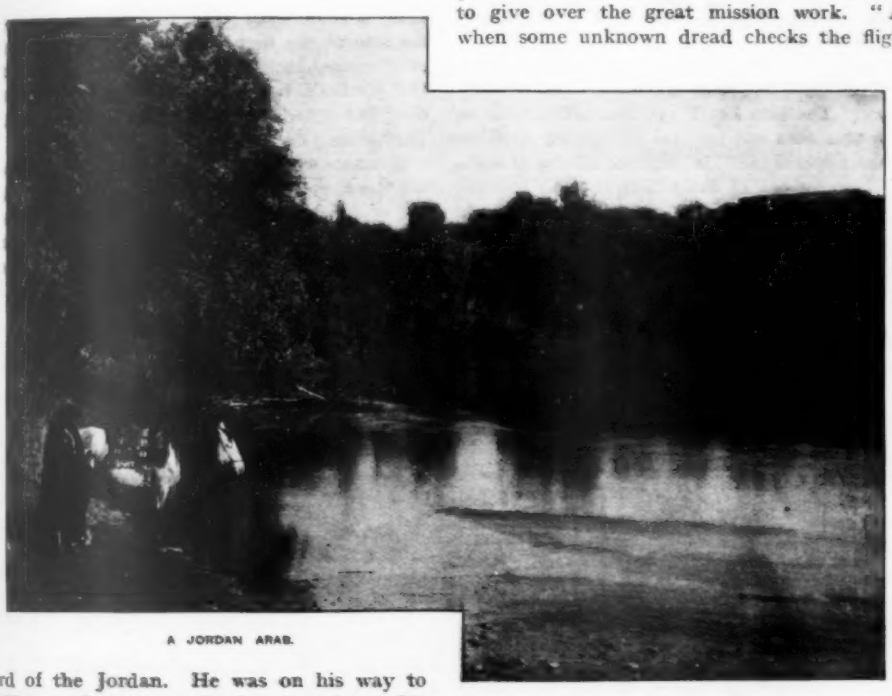
Down this broad valley there curves, with often beautiful sinuosity, a narrower bed, perhaps 150 feet deeper. Again the bed of the river appears quite normal, with fords to secure the safe passage from one side to the other. The banks are mostly of white marl; tamarisks are choked with tangled bush; the annual "swellings" generate the rankness. Looking south from the highland, the river appears like an enormous green snake.

In the centre of this disease-breeding hollow, the Jordan forms a ditch as deep below the level of the Levant as are some coal-mines. "Dead drift-wood is everywhere in sight. Large trees lie about, overthrown; and the exposed roots and lower trunks of the trees are smeared with ooze and slime."

Valleys, "well watered everywhere," are generally the attractive sites for cities; but few are found in the valley of the Jordan. Jericho was a very flourishing region under the Roman rule, for they knew how to irrigate and cultivate. Palms once abounded in some places; corn, balsam, and flax were sometimes to be found; the Crusaders welcomed the sugar-cane growing near Jericho. Solomon cast the bright brass vessels of the temple in the clay of the Jordan. Why, then, are so few towns found on Jordan's banks? Because for nine months of the year the heat is intolerable, and vegetation is soon burned up, unless constantly irrigated, though refreshing dews are sometimes heavy. Professor Smith found the heat opposite Jericho 104° in the shade. Accordingly, the Arabs dwelling there are a sickly race. They are nomads by nature, and contemn agriculture. Yet Dr. Robinson found their horses, cattle, and sheep fattening on the rich pasture; while large herds of black buffaloes luxuriated in the deep mire of the marshes—doubtless lineal descendants of the "fat bulls of Bashan."

As in all rivers of the same magnitude, while deep enough to prove a formidable passage in time of war, there were shallows in the Jordan, where at times it could be forded on foot. Abraham must have crossed it, though of early days only the passage of Jacob is mentioned. Next it was crossed by Joshua over against Jericho, at the head of the descendants of the same Jacob. Moses saw the Promised Land, and gave directions for Joshua as to the passage which he himself was not permitted to make. The river was unusually full of water at harvest-time, when the overflow took place. All are familiar with the account of the miraculous crossing.

The lower fords, nearest to Jerusalem, were frequently of great service to the people. David passed over one to fight the Syrians, and again in his flight to Mahanaim. Somewhere near this Elijah went with Elisha from Gilgal to the river's bank, when the fearless prophet smote the waters with his mantle and made the dry land appear for their safe crossing. From the chariot of fire, that bore the Baptist's prototype to his heavenly rest, the mystic mantle fell on Elisha. With this the new prophet again smote the waters, and they divided to let him pass over in safety.



As Elisha was in Samaria when Naaman, the leper, consulted him about his loathsome disease, the washing for purification in the Jordan seven times must have been at a ford higher up than that east from Jericho. It was by this upper ford also that the Syrians fled after being routed by Elisha's intervention. There, too, the sons of the prophets were erecting dwellings of wood, when the axe of one cutter fell into the river, to be miraculously recovered by Elisha. Such a startling incident as an iron axe floating on the waters of the Jordan would be long remembered by the chosen people.

John the Baptist commenced his peculiar functions at the lower ford. Here he was near the wilderness of Judæa. The preacher of repentance thundered forth his warnings. As Dean Farrar graphically puts it: "In the tropic noonday of that deep Jordan valley, where the air seems to be full of a subtle and quivering flame—in listening to the howl of the wild beasts in the lone night, under the lustre of stars that seemed to hang like balls of fire in a purple sky—in wandering by the sluggish, cobalt-coloured waters of that dead and accursed lake, until before his eyes, dazzled by the saline efflorescence of the shore strewn with the wrecks of death, the ghosts of the guilty seemed to start out of the sulphurous ashes under which they were submerged—he had learned a language, he had received a revelation, not vouchsafed to ordinary men—attained, not in the school of the Rabbis, but in the school of solitude, in the school of God."

All thronged to listen to the winged words of the terrible denunciator. The wilderness was uncultivated and untenanted, stretching from Jericho and the lower ford of the Jordan to the shores of the Dead Sea. Wild beasts were not yet extinct in the reed beds that marked the "swellings of Jordan"; yet from every quarter of the country the people thronged to catch the accents of the Elijah-like voice. Strangely, they saw that the weirdly clad enthusiast was in earnest, and many felt their consciences painfully stinging; and since he had chosen baptism as his symbol of their repentance "they were baptised of him in Jordan, confessing their sins." And the lower ford of the river was most convenient for the sacred rite.

XUM

In all probability the scene of our Lord's baptism was at a ford further up the river. For it is recorded that our Lord came from Nazareth in Galilee, in the north, and not from Jerusalem in Southern Judæa, to be baptised of John. And the very careful observer, Dr. E. S. Ffoulkes, is strongly of that opinion. John was moving northward on his missionary enterprise, arriving at Ænon and Salim in the north-east corner of Samaria, not far from a ford of the Jordan. He was on his way to Galilee, perhaps to make inquiry about his cousin (six months younger), whose path he was divinely opening up for the missionary work of the world. Certainly he was making for the seat of Herod's jurisdiction, by whom he was doomed to be executed for his fearless denunciations of the king's scandalous life At the same time, our Lord was coming south from Galilee to see the Baptist, who had, by the marvellous reports about the preacher's success, stirred up in His breast, as He wrought at the carpenter's bench in the despised village of Nazareth the martial spirit for the redemption of mankind. The prominent text of the Baptist, "Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand," roused up His missionary energies with such living enthusiasm that He used it as His own first text in preaching to the world.

A JORDAN ARAB.

The two—Christ and John—met halfway, by some divine guidance; for

> "There's a divinity that shapes our ends > Rough hew them how we will."

The countenance that flinched not at the sight of tyrannical kings and treacherous Pharisees was strangely subdued before the presence of the Master, to whom he was soon to give over the great mission work. "As when some unknown dread checks the flight of the eagle and makes him settle with hushed scream and drooping plumage on the ground, so before the royalty of inward happiness, before the purity of sinless life, the wild prophet of the desert becomes like a submissive and timid child." Yet he was privileged to baptise, with the water of Jordan, Him who was afterwards to baptise with the Spirit.

What a world-inspiring sight must that have been to the onlookers of the performance of the sacred rite. The two descended into the waters of the Jordan; and there the glorious sign was given that the Messiah had come. The Holy Spirit—dove-like—hovered over the Saviour's sacred head, and the Father's voice from the opened heavens lovingly proclaimed to the assembled people the Divine approval of the world-saving mission: "This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased."

Well did the people know that it was in the waters of Jordan that Naaman's leprous body was cleansed by the prophet Elisha; and that here the gift of the Holy Spirit was transferred by Elijah to his successor. The only river of Israel had thus been the means of symbolising the washing by water and the gift of the Spirit. But now that sacred stream had been made everlastingly famous by the baptism of the God-Man.

Near the place where the Jordan discharges into the Dead Sea there is the Pilgrims' Bathing Place. The late Dr. Hugh Macmillan tells us that this does not impress the visitor with its scenic appearance. It requires all the absorbing associations of Holy Scripture to impress upon him the fact that this is more than a commonplace river. "There was," he says, "a line of poplars and willows fringing the banks, and the young, bright green foliage was the only hint of colour in the universal gloom."

The delightful gurgling sound of the brook Cherith, near Jericho, breaks the monotony of gloomy silence. Yet in the morning sunshine a splendid view may there occasionally be obtained. The Dead Sea glitters in the south; the commanding mountains of Moab, round the dome of Nebo, stretch out across the Jordan. Northward extends the Jordan valley, with mist-clad mountain ranges hemming it in on both sides. One's feet tread on the site of the first altar to God in the Land of Promise, built with the stones taken from the Jordan's bed when the Israelites crossed over unscathed under Joshua's leadership with the blessing of their dead Deliverer.

I cannot close this paper without emphasising the fact that it was the pioneers of America—a country unheard of during Scripture ages—who first navigated the sacred Jordan and gave the vivid and graphic accounts of their experiences there.

ONE OF THE FORDS OF THE JORDAN.

"To Thee, our God, we Fly."

Words by BISHOP WALSHAM HOW.

Music by the REV. F. PEEL, B.Mus. Oxon.

3. Thy best gifts from on high
In rich abundance pour,
That we may magnify
And praise Thee more and more.
O Lord, etc.

4. Though vile and worthless, still Thy people, Lord, are we;
And for our God we will
None other have but Thee.

THE RIGHT VIEW OF PENITENCE.

By the Rev. W. Hay Aitken, M.A., Canon of Norwich, and General Superintendent of the Church Parochial Mission Society.

"Against Thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in Thy sight."—PSALM li. 4.

A WELL-KNOWN contemporary preacher has observed in one of his most interesting sermons that this is not a penitential age, and surely this witness is true. Some of us who have been long engaged in evangelising work cannot help contrasting the moral phenomena of to-day with those which obtained a quarter of a century ago in this respect. It was then a much more common thing to see people completely broken down under a sense of sin, and exhibiting every sign of spiritual distress—sometimes even of anguish of heart—under the convicting influence of the Holy Spirit. To-day these indications of profound contrition and spiritual distress are much more rarely to be witnessed; and it is the exception when we notice anything much more marked than that serious regret for the past, which is the necessary condition of all hope for the future.

When we seek to discover the causes of this change, a good many different explanations present themselves to our minds, each of which may have had something to do with bringing it about. To begin with, possibly we are more affected than we know by current theories of evolution. I am not discussing now whether these are true or false, but merely indicating what I conceive to be one of the effects of these speculations so widely diffused throughout modern society.

As long as man regarded himself as something nearly approaching a fallen angel, it was natural that a sense of shame and degradation, on account of sin, should powerfully affect him. When, on the other hand, he looks upon himself as a highly improved and developed animal, it would seem to be equally natural that he should congratulate himself on his moral elevation over his brute ancestors, even if he may admit that he has not yet attained to an ideal condition. It may, perhaps, be said that the masses do not study evolution, and are therefore little likely to be affected by such considerations; but we must remember that the masses are influenced by what they read and what they hear; and that some such feeling as this is prevalent in the literature of the day, and in the conversation of cultured people, can, I think, hardly be denied.

In the next place, we may refer to the diminution of crime and the general improvement of morals, as contributing to the same result. We are very far from being what we ought to be, but we are a good deal better than we were; and we are full of hope for better things still in these respects, as education becomes more universal and legislation confines our national temptations within narrower limits. There is also the hope that social and sanitary reforms may in the future do more than they have done in the past towards elevating the moral tone.

But when we have made full allowance for the effects of each of these causes, we shall probably be very far from feeling that we have discovered an adequate explanation of the fact that we are considering. There is another cause which we need clearly to recognise, in order that we may the better be on our guard against it. It is my firm conviction that this indisposition to recognise the exceeding sinfulness of sin is chiefly due to a subtle atmosphere of unbelief which pervades modern society, and influences, more than they are themselves aware, multitudes of people who are very far from being professed sceptics, or even doubters.

All conviction of sin must depend upon our belief in the existence of God. Apart from this, there may be faults or indiscretions, or defects or excesses or wrong-doings towards our neighbours, but sin there c nnot be, unless there be a God to sin against and a divine law revealed as the measure of our sin. The disposition of sceptical thought in our own time has lain chiefly in the direction of doubt of the Divine Personality. Intelligent doubters will admit, with a great philosopher who has so recently passed away, Herbert Spencer, that there must be a force behind all phenomena to which these themselves are due; but, inasmuch as this force lies beyond all sense-perception, we can know nothing about it, and therefore can stand under no moral obligation towards it.

Hence it is as impossible to sin against it as it would be to sin against the laws of Nature. If we fly in the face of Nature's laws we know that we shall suffer for it, but we are not on that account overwhelmed with penitential distress. If I fling myself from a cliff I may count upon broken bones and other injuries, even if I am fortunate enough to escape with my life. I have trifled with the great law of gravitation, and I shall have to rue my folly; but, whatever I may suffer as the result of this, I shall be conscious of no compunction, no penitential regret directed towards that particular law of Nature which I have defied.

Similarly, there can be no sense of compunction or penitential distress towards this mysterious power in the background of all being, not even if I am assured that it "works for righteousness," still less if I know nothing about its moral qualities. Now I am persuaded that many people who would be far from accepting this agnostic position with respect to God are yet sufficiently affected by it to lose to a great extent that keen sense of Divine Personality upon which all deep conviction of sin must depend; and hence they are devoid of any feelings of contrition, and indeed seem almost incapable of experiencing them.

But it may perhaps be questioned whether it is altogether desirable that we should have such a deep sense of guilt, and be thus weighed down with penitential distress at the thought of our follies and shortcomings, as well as our actual transgressions. To such an inquiry, from the Christian standpoint the answer cannot be doubtful. A shallow and superficial estimate of sin must necessarily induce carelessness of life, and thus contribute to deterioration of character; while, at the same time, it must rob the soul of that intense gratitude towards God for His pardoning love, which must ever be the source of all true spiritual devotion. Once we begin to look upon sin as a mere trifle, God will become unnecessary to us. We can afford to dispense with His divine intervention when we so little dread that which is His opposite; nor will there be any occasion for us to love much, because we have had much forgiven, if we do not believe that there is much in our lives that needs to be forgiven.

We conclude, then, that a deep sense of sin and a true contrition is one of the most important conditions of all satisfactory spiritual experience; but having said this, we must carefully guard ourselves against being misunderstood, as if we were making a sine quâ non of certain religious "frames and feelings."

Far be it from us to lay undue stress on mere emotional experiences. These must always be, to a great extent, a mere matter of temperament. Some people are much more easily moved to tears than others, and sometimes those who seem to feel least really feel most. Nor need we torment ourselves by examining and scrutinising our own feelings in this respect. Our wisdom lies rather in exposing ourselves to those influences which may induce a true and deep contrition, however it may express itself. Of course, it is the special work of the Holy Spirit to bring about conviction of sin, and we may trust Him to be ever ready to do the work that specially belongs to Him. It is for us to inquire how we may co-operate with Him in this respect by exposing ourselves as fully as possible to His sacred influences.

When we ask the question, How may we hope to induce such a sense of penitential distress at the thought of our sins as shall dispose us to value God's pardon, and (as one of our mission hymns well puts it), "to hate what we deplore?" the answer to our inquiry is surely implied in what we have had occasion to say about the cause of this so common defect.

If the loss of the sense of the Divine Personality militates more than anything else against true penitence, then we shall best contribute to bringing this about, so far as this lies with us, by such a presentation of the Divine Personality to our minds as shall bring out in strong relief the contrast between God's dealings with us, as an actual living Person, possessed of sensibilities similar in kind to our own, though probably much more delicate, and our dealings with Him.

We need to see sin in the light of God's personal love to us, and to regard it as a personal outrage against that love, if our hearts are to be moved to true contrition. "Against Thee only have I sinned!" exclaimed the Hebrew monarch as he lay prone in the dust before God, sobbing out his heart-broken confessions. This was the point to which the Holy Spirit led him. His atrocious crimes against man seemed to him to be engulfed in a vaster and even more heinous offence against God.

His bygone life passed in review before his remorseful gaze. He saw himself once more a shepherd boy, singled out by a divine choice from amongst his peers, and raised as by the hand of God to high estate. He thought of how he had been delivered in those early days from the lion and from the bear, and from that still more terrible antagonist the gigantic Philistine. He thought of all his sufferings through the implacable animosity of Saul, and of how God's faithfulness and truth had delivered him from them all. And then there came the appalling contrast between all this unmerited goodness and the cursed sin that had indeed given occasion to the enemies of God to blaspheme; and with that contrast a sense of base ingratitude that crushed and humiliated his soul, nay, a conviction of heartless treachery that made him loathe himself. And thus, "out of the depths" of self-despair he stretched his hands towards the mercy-seat.

And have we no similar contrasts to dwell upon? If God be our Father, what has been our response to His fatherly love? Have we forgotten Him days without number? While He has been surrounding us with privileges and favours, have we been drawing upon His bounty only to grieve and disappoint Him? Has His Holy Spirit followed us with persevering assiduity, only to be resisted and repelled over and over again, until we fairly marvel at His patience in that He still pursues us with the pleadings of His love? Have we wilfully preferred our sins and worldliness to His divine call, and turned away from Him to cling to the very things that He would fain save us from?

And, most of all, have we done despite to a Saviour's dying love? Have we been amongst the passers-by to whom His Cross has appealed in vain? and has His plaintive voice of sorrow, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?" fallen in our case upon deafened ears? Have all His sorrows and pains, His anguish, His loneliness, the very breaking of His heart for us, appealed to us in vain? Have we, as it were, trampled His blood under our feet, and thrust aside the hand that pressed upon us the blood-bought gift of everlasting life?

Against Thee only—against Thee, Thou Father of love—against Thee, Thou unwearied Spirit of grace—against Thee, Thou great hero and victim of our race, the glory of our manhood, and yet the most despised of men—against Thee, and against Thee only, have I sinned. Ah! it is when we realise this that sin becomes truly loathsome, and the heart that it had made as adamant, yielding to the melting influence of triumphant love, becomes that "broken and contrite heart" which that same love that has made it what it is can never despise.

FOUNDED ON AN INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF SIMEON STYLITES.

By the Rev. S. N. Sedgwick, M.A.

FULL forty feet above the road the Stylite, or pillar-man, stood perched on his dizzy platform. From his vantage he could see far into the country on one side, and into the distant town of Antioch, at the foot of the hill, on the other. Worn by his fasting, tanned and shrunken by exposure, with a great chain fastening him to a post in the centre of the platform, he looked like some giant eagle in captivity.

He seldom looked deliberately at the view, regarding any such useless amusement as a snare to draw him away from the contemplation of heavenly things; yet his many years on the pillar-top had given him an unconscious power of taking in everything that went on below.

Even when he stood up all day on the Festivals of the Church, with his arms stretched up motionless to the sky, or when he knelt in meditation, with his head bent to his knees, his sense of observation told him of everything that passed in the road beneath.

It was the ninth hour of the day, when it was his custom to speak to those who came to consult him, or to preach to the crowds which gathered to see him. On the hill-side a tribe of Arabs had pitched their tents, having journeyed from the Armenian plains to visit the shrine of the Christian anchorite whose name was reverenced amongst their nation. They sat in their white burnouses in a circle round the pillar, surrounded by a second crowd of people from the neighbouring town, who had come out of motives of curiosity.

Simeon rose from his prayers with difficulty, and advanced to the edge of the platform. The people stood up.

"Are there any priests of God who desire to speak to me, the unworthy?" he asked. No one replied. "Are there any from the Emperor or the magistrates?" he continued, for it was well known that Leo himself consulted Simeon on affairs of state.

Again no one replied, and the Stylite thereupon addressed himself to the waiting crowd. There is no need for his address to be given in detail. He who runs may read of it, and many others, in his life by the historian Antony, who was his disciple. He spoke to those wild Arabs of One who was God, and yet not a far-off and awe-inspiring Deity to be propitiated, but One who, having made the world, left not the world alone, but had entered it Himself to taste, nay to drink deep of the cup which every man must take. A true Son of Man, sympathising with brother-man, and at the same time a God, able to help His creatures, ever ready to hear them, ever pouring out His water of life to fill their dry, desert wells.

As he concluded, a chariot driven furiously down the great road that led from Seleucia, the port of Antioch, swung into the midst of the crowd. The horses, brought to a sudden check, reared back upon their haunches as the people scattered right and left. The Roman gentleman, sitting in the car, called to his driver to lash them on, with an impatient oath; and the driver brought his whip sharply across their foaming flanks. They sprang forward again; the crowd veered and wavered; a woman, with a child by her side, screamed, as the little one tripped and fell in the very path of the chariot.

In a moment it would have driven over her body, when a young man flung himself at the reins, and stopped them within a foot of the child.

"Shame on you, Æmilian," he cried. "Are you so put to it that you must run over women and children?"

Æmilian swore at his opponent. "Out of the way, Eulogius; out of the way." By all the god – the saints, you shall pay for this. I am on Imperial business."

"You are free to go on, my lord," answered the younger man, releasing his hold as the mother snatched her child away.

Æmilian, for some private reason evidently exasperated, seized the whip and cut fiercely at Eulogius's head. The latter only saved himself by a quick leap out of range.

"In the name of the Saviour," came the Stylite's voice, hoarse and thunderous, "Æmilian, Sub-Prefect, what scenes are these, for this pillar, and for me? Go gently, or it shall go hard with you. Have I no influence—— ?"

Æmilian looked up with a frown, and let his whip fall to his side.

"Your pardon, Father," he said. "I—I forgot myself."

"It is no uncommon thing," said the girl who, separating herself from the crowd, had run to Eulogius' side.

"Ah, the lady Eunice," said the Roman. "I was not aware that the fortunate Eulogius had two champions—again. May I have the honour of driving you back to Antioch, lady ?"

The girl drew back with a quick flush. "It pleases Æmilian to jest," said the other man with a quiet contempt.

A snarl escaped the Roman's lips, but he checked himself as the Stylite, ignorant of their conversation, broke in upon them.

"Peace ?" he said. "That is well. Now, my lord, tell us the news. What brings your chariot red-hot from the harbour ?"

"I have not time to tell the tale now, holy Father," was the reply. "The Emperor's army has been defeated in Africa ; the Arian rebels have won the day. But there has been treachery."

A deep groan escaped from the crowd, and even Simeon's eyebrows met in a deep frown.

"And how came you, Æmilian, to know at Seleucia what happened in Africa ?" the Stylite asked.

"A trireme brought the news," said Æmilian. "Here are documents——"

"Send them up to me," demanded Simeon peremptorily, throwing from the pillar a long cord.

"Your pardon, Father," Æmilian said, perturbed. "I am to take them at once to the Council of the town."

"What ?" thundered Simeon. "You refuse ? Am I not to know ? Will not my advice be sought ? Very well, then ; the Emperor shall know that Æmilian——"

"Nay, nay, Father," said the Roman, with some agitation. "If—if—I may have them later to-night, with your comments, that shall serve. We will wait—we will wait."

He drew a bundle of parchments from his breast, and quickly fastened them to the cord. The Stylite placed them within the little shelter like a sentry box, which the Emperor had insisted on building for him on his platform, while Æmilian drove off, and the crowd dispersed, buzzing over the news.

The Stylite spent some time on his knees, reading the papers with dim eyes. They told a dismal tale. A punitive expedition sent by the Emperor to Alexandria had failed ; the general in command, Basiliscus, had disappeared ; there seemed no doubt that monies levied for the support of the army had been diverted as bribes to the conspirators, in league with the enemy. A complicated story to unravel, but the basest treachery plain through it all. Its effect on the people would be felt in scarcity of corn, which was drawn very largely from Egypt. Its effect in Antioch Simeon could not gauge. One thing was evident : the 1,000 talents drawn as war-tax from Antioch had gone with the rest of the bribe.

Two nights later, Simeon, meditating in the darkness, was startled to hear the unmistakable sound of sobbing at the foot of the pillar. It was very dark, and he could discern nothing below ; but the hour was late for anyone to be out of the town, and after listening a moment he called out.

"Who is there ?" he cried. "Fear not. Is it to tell me of some grief you are here ? Speak, I am awake."

"It is I, Father," answered a voice from below. "I, Eunice, the Prefect's daughter."

"I know you, maiden. I have seen you here in the daylight often with—with—Eulogius."

"Yes, Father. It is for him I weep. He is my lover, and yesterday he was accused of conspiring with Basiliscus——"

"By whom, lady ?" asked the Stylite, with sudden interest.

"By Æmilian, Father. He has been tried and condemned. Æmilian showed letters in proof. And—oh, God—he is to be executed to-morrow, unless——"

Her voice broke, and she gave way to uncontrollable sobbing. Simeon waited a little. "Come, child," he said at last. "What is this 'unless' ?"

"Eulogius and I are betrothed, Father. We made our provisio before the Bishop two months ago. But Æmilian also desires me, and he has offered to save Eulogius if I will consent to marry him."

"And you ?"

"I could not do it. Oh, I could not. Not even to save Eulogius."

"I am right glad to hear you," said the Stylite. "Now listen, child. I have the means to save Eulogius, maybe. (God be praised," he added to himself, "that I did not send back all the parchments to the Council.") "Go to your father," he continued aloud, "and tell him that I must see him to-morrow morning at all hazards before the execution. Tell him I conjure him by his loyalty to the Emperor, to the Lord——"

"I cannot, I dare not, Father."

"What?" The hermit's tone expressed his supreme surprise. "Why not? What have you done?"

The girl began to weep again. "I could not let Eulogius die," she said, "so I bribed my tiring-maid——"

"Hush! Speak softly. I am quick of hearing," the hermit interrupted. The girl sank her voice. "Eulogius is in my father's prison," she continued, "and my maid has been sporting with one of the jailors. I bribed them both—it was easy—to give Eulogius the opportunity of escape. The message I sent to him was that he should meet me here. I meant to ask for your protection for him, Father."

It had come to be a recognised thing that any accused person might claim the shadow of the pillar as sanctuary, and Simeon saw the girl's plan at once.

"So I dare not go back to my father," Eunice continued. "By this time he must know all. That is what is killing me with suspense. Why has not Eulogius come? He should have been here an hour ago. Ah! what is this?"

There arose a confused noise of shouting from far down the road. From his vantage the hermit could see the flickering of torches in motion as the bearers ran.

"Keep still, girl," he called. "In a moment we shall know."

The noise came swiftly nearer. One man's voice singled itself out above the rest. "Catch him, you hounds. Quick, or you will be too late! Shall I flog you into speed?"

A dim, panting form slipped through the darkness to the base of the pillar. "Sanctuary, Father, sanctuary!"

It was Eulogius' voice, faint and trembling, Eunice flung her arms about him, and drew him into the shadow. The pursuing soldiers came up, halting within arm's throw of the pillar. Æmilian, behind, blind with rage, screamed at them to drag him away, to attack him where he stood. He even flung his spear, which struck the pillar with an angry clangour.

"Æmilian, Æmelian!" Simeon's voice rang out. "Again you would profane this spot with blood. Touch this man at your peril. Move but one step nearer, and I will call down God's curse——"

The superstitious Roman was not proof against the hermit's threats. He had heard the strange stories of Simeon's power.

"He is a malefactor, Father," he cried. "Escaped even now. He is to die at sunrise. He had a fair trial. Had it not been that I suspected that he might be set free, and kept watch myself outside the prison, he would have got safely away."

"As it is," said Eunice, advancing, "you have set upon him with your men and wounded him sorely, but he is safe—safe from you now."

Æmilian started at the sudden appearance of the girl. "You have heard this girl's story, doubtless, Father," he cried; "but I demand my rights. Let him be escorted back to the prison."

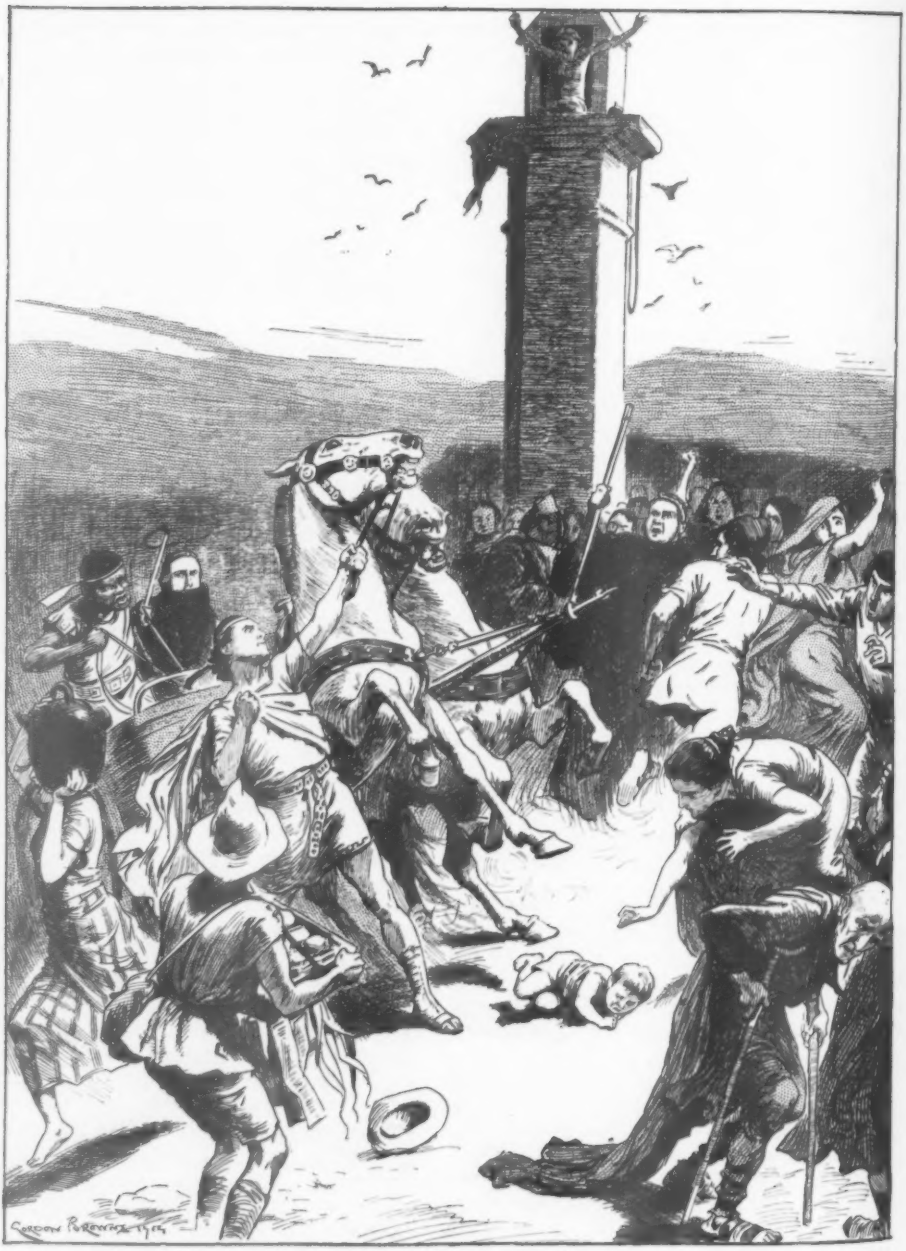
"God's rights come first, my son," said Simeon quietly. "Stay you here and guard him, if you will; but he shall not die till I also have adjudged his cause."

In vain Æmilian pleaded, blustered, threatened. With a decision that was almost fanatical, Simeon held to his word, and the Sub-Prefect was forced to content himself with setting his men to guard the pillar until daybreak.

Eulogius and Eunice sat, shivering, with their backs to the pillar. The girl insisted on throwing her cloak round his shoulders, for he had escaped with but little on. So they sat there and whispered and prayed, while the hermit up above, deep in contemplation, stood watching for the dawn.

It came at last and shone upon the haggard and weary faces of Æmilian and his men. His two victims lay asleep, worn out.

The hermit was upon his knees, and none dared interrupt him. At last he rose, and advancing to the edge of the pillar, he bade Æmilian catch the ink and parchment which he was sending down upon his cord.



"My hands are numb with cold," he said. "I cannot write thus early in the morning. But the matter is urgent. Take pen and ink, and follow my dictation. Write, 'To the Prefect.'"

"To the Prefect, Father?" Æmilian asked. "Can I not send a man?"

"Write my message," was the reply, "and then send you a man with it. Write."

Æmilian did so.

"Eulogius, condemned to death for conspiring

"A young man flung himself at the reins."—p. 913.

with Basiliscus, hath claimed sanctuary of the Pillar. Æmilian guards him till your arrival. Come hither at all speed, and let me hear also the grounds upon which the charge hath been made."

"Letters in his own handwriting, Father," Æmilian said, looking up.

"Indeed?" said the hermit composedly. "Then add, 'Bring with you, I beg, the letters and other proofs of his guilt, with a sufficient band of men to take him back with you if your justice prove also God's.'"

The letter finished, Simeon ordered Æmilian to send it up to him to sign. The Stylite read it closely, with imperturbable face, and, signing it with cramped hand, returned it to the Sub-Prefect, who despatched it with all speed to Antioch. Again, without a word, the hermit turned to his prayers.

The minutes went slowly by, but they passed in silence. Eunice awoke with a little cry, realising quickly her situation. At her voice Eulogius leapt to his feet, as the Prefect, her father, accompanied by his men, galloped to the foot of the pillar.

Simeon explained the situation briefly. "Now," he said, "in the name of the God of justice, I stand here to listen to the charges on which this man was condemned."

The Prefect drew out the incriminating letters. "These were found in Eulogius' house," he said. "They are evidently rough drafts of others sent to Basiliscus. Read them for yourself, Father."

The hermit received them and scrutinised them carefully. "They are in the handwriting of Eulogius?" he asked.

"They are forgeries," Eulogius broke in. "Forgeries intended to ruin me."

"Silence," said the hermit. "Take pen and paper, and write as I dictate. 'I aver on my honour as a Christian man that I have never been in league with Basiliscus.'"

Wondering at the command, Eulogius did so, and his document was sent up to the Stylite. Again the hermit peered at the writing; then, advancing to the edge of the pillar, he uttered a sentence which startled all who heard it.

"Æmilian," he asked, "will you confess your guilt, or shall I bring it home to you?"

Æmilian's hand flew to his sword with an oath. "Guilt?" he exclaimed. "I?"

"You!" said the Stylite, as the Prefect's men slipped quietly round the accused man. "You are guilty of conspiring, first of all against Eulogius, who stood in your way; you are guilty also of treachery to the Empire."

"'Tis false, false. I deny it. You have no proofs."

"The proofs are here," said the hermit solemnly. "With your own hand you have condemned yourself. 'Basiliscus' you have spelt thrice with a 'contract.' In these traitorous letters it is so spelt; in the message you wrote to the Prefect here you spelt it so; in these forged letters again it comes. But Eulogius here, writing equally unconsciously, has spelt it in full. I have no doubt that there are other similarities; but for the present 'Basiliscus' condemns you."

So sudden and unexpected was the catastrophe that the wretched man had nothing to say. His lips moved; he half uttered some word, but it died unintelligible upon his tongue. Within a minute he was guarded, and in custody.

Then, and not till then, the hermit spoke again. "Eulogius also is prisoner," he said. "Deliver yourself up, my son, till justice, formally administered, shall set you free. And, Prefect, here is a daughter for you to guard until you can hand her over to another who loves her well. She will be a willing enough prisoner, eh, lady Eunice?"

Then as the advance guard of men set off, bearing the wretched Æmilian in their midst, and Eulogius, hand in hand with his lady, followed joyfully with the Prefect, the hermit stretched a solemn hand over the little company.

"Prefect, Prefect, take my words—nay, the Master's words—in your mind as you try yonder unhappy man: 'Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us.' . . . . As we forgive, as we forgive," he murmured, as he sank down upon his knees and remained there—a lonely, gaunt effigy in bronze against the full, hot glare of the risen sun.

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

JULY 17TH.—Asa's Good Reign.

Passage for reading—2 Chron. xiv. 1—12.

POINTS. 1. A reformation of religion.
2. Peace and prosperity.
3. Prayer followed by victory.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Religion Revived. A baronet was one day examining the works of the celebrated sculptor, Mr. Bacon, and observed a bust of the great preacher, Mr. Whitefield, among them, which led him to remark, "After all that has been said, this was truly a great man. He was the founder of a new religion." "A new religion, sir?" replied Mr. Bacon. "Yes," said the baronet. "What else can you call it?" "Nothing new," was the reply; "but the old religion applied with new energy, and treated as if the preacher meant what he said."

The Blessing of Peace. At the close of the war (1812) some of the chief officers of the United States were in the city of New York on a dark afternoon in February, when the ship was sighted which was bringing back the commissioners from what was feared was their unsuccessful mission. The sun had set gloomily before any news from the vessel reached the city. Expectation had become painfully intense, when a boat touched the wharf, and it was at once known that a treaty of peace had been signed. Those who first heard the glad news rushed in breathless haste into the city to tell their friends, shouting, as they ran along the streets, "Peace! peace!" The cry was re-echoed from street to street, so that the news spread with almost electric speed. The whole city was in joyful commotion. Torches were lighted. Shouts of "Peace! peace!" were everywhere heard. For peace means prosperity, and prosperity brings happiness.

Victory or Death. Before the decisive battle of Bannockburn, an abbot, placing a small altar on an eminence, celebrated mass in sight of the Scottish Army. He then passed along the ranks, exhorting the Scots in a few forcible words to fight for their rights and liberty. The Scots kneeled down. "They yield!" cried King Edward. "See, they implore mercy!" "They do," said one of his generals; "but not mercy from us. On that field they will be victorious or die." (Sir Walter Scott.)

JULY 24TH.—Jehoshaphat's Reforms.

Passage for reading—2 Chron. xix. 1—11.

POINTS. 1. The King takes reproof rightly.
2. Religion revives under his influence.
3. Judges are instructed as to their duties.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Reproof and Its Application. A clergyman once talking with a nobleman who swore profanely in conversation, expressed satisfaction in the thought that there is a God who judges the world, and will hereafter make retribution to all according to their works, "and will, my lord," he added, "make a difference between him that sweareth and him that feareth an oath." His lordship answered: "I thank you, sir, for your freedom. I understand your meaning, and will try to make a good use of it." The clergyman answered: "I have also to thank you, my lord, for saving me the most difficult part of the discourse—namely, the application."

Influence for Good. In a country churchyard in England a little white stone marks the grave of a dear little cottage girl. On the stone were chiselled these words: "A child of whom her playmates said, 'It was easier to be good when she was with us.'"

Love of Justice. While Athens was governed by thirty tyrants, Socrates, the philosopher, was summoned to the Senate House, and ordered to go with some others to seize one Leon, a man of rank and fortune, whom they determined to put out of the way that they might seize his estate. Socrates flatly refused, and added his reasons. "I will never," he said, "willingly assist in an unjust act." The chairman of the Senate sharply replied, "Do you think, Socrates, to talk always in this high style, and not to suffer for it?" "Far from it," he said. "I expect to suffer a thousand ills, but none so great as to do unjustly."

JULY 31ST.—Omri and Ahab.

Passage for reading—1 Kings xvi. 23—33.

POINTS. 1. Omri's great wickedness.
2. Ahab's disastrous marriage.
3. The country flooded with idolatry.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Qualifications for Wickedness. A gay young fellow who boasted of his vices was expatiating one day on the qualifications necessary to form a perfect and accomplished libertine. Having finished his tirade, he turned to one of the company present, who seemed to take his remarks very gravely, and whom, therefore, he wished to insult, and asked him his opinion. The gentleman very drily replied: "It appears to me, sir, that you have omitted two of the most important and necessary qualifications." "Indeed! And pray, what may they be?" "An excessively weak head and a thoroughly bad heart." The rake was silent, and soon afterwards left the room.

A Wife's Influence. "Rebekah," said a dying husband to the wife who bent over him in remorseful agony, "I am a lost man. You opposed our family worship and my private prayers. You drew me away into temptation, and led me to neglect every religious duty. I believe my fate is sealed, and you are the cause of my everlasting ruin." Truly terrible in eternity will be the re-union of those who helped each other on the downward road.

Multitude of Idols. There were many idols in one of the Polynesian islands. But a native teacher was beginning to make his way in setting forth the true and only God. The people came to him one day, and asked him to throw their gods away, because if they remained, the people would, out of fear, give offerings to them. So he began at one end of the island, and went on to the other end. He found 215 stone gods, and it took him two days to break them up. There were three stones larger than the others, which were supposed to be superior gods. The teacher took some of the food lying in front of one of these. The people cried out, expecting him to fall down dead. There was one god for about every five of the people.

AUGUST 7TH.—God Taking Care of Elijah.

Passage for reading—1 Kings xvii. 1—16.

POINTS. GOD'S PROVIDENCES.
1. Punishment of an idolatrous nation.
2. Care of His servant Elijah.
3. Blessing on a believing widow.

ILLUSTRATIONS. No Difference in Judgment. It was my lot to be in the great Chicago fire. As the flames rolled down the streets I saw the great and rich fleeing before the fire with the beggar and the thief. All were alike. It was like the Judgment day. Not the mayor nor the mighty men could stop the flames. All were on a level then, and many who were worth hundreds of thousands were left paupers that night. So it was with the Deluge. Noah's ark was worth more than all the world. So it was in Ahab's time. King and steward, rich and poor, were all affected. It was God's judgment for sin, and not till the people repented did the rain come. So will it be in the Judgment day. "If the righteous scarcely be saved, where will the ungodly and sinners appear?" (Moody.)

Interposition of Providence. In the time of the Commonwealth many ministers of the Church of England were ejected from their livings. One of them, being pursued by enemies, sought refuge in a malt-house, and crept into the kiln. Immediately afterwards he observed a spider fixing the first line of a large and beautiful web across the narrow entrance. By the time the web was finished his pursuers came to search for him. He heard one of them say, "It's of no use to look in there. Look at that spider's web. The old villain could never have got in there without breaking it."

Living by Faith. In Bristol, the founder of the great orphanage continued to live without any regular income, yet God never allowed him nor his orphan children to want. Sometimes it happened that there was no money left, and all the provisions in the house were gone—a trying state of things indeed. But help always came. They put their trust in Him, and were not confounded.

AUGUST 14TH.—Obadiah and Elijah.

Passage for reading—1 Kings xviii. 1—16.

POINTS. 1. Obadiah fears God.
2. Befriends the people of God.
3. Believes the Word of God by His prophet.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Influence of the Fear of God. A weary day had been passed in visiting a wretched neighbourhood. Its scenes were sad and sickening. Famine, want, drunkenness, and other sins were all reigning there. But a surprise awaited us. On opening a door, we stepped into a comfortable room. Its walls were hung with prints; the furniture shone, and a bright fire was dancing merrily over a bright hearth. It was an oasis in the desert. We whispered to one another, "Surely the fear of God is in this place. This must be the home of those who fear God." And so it proved to be. (Dr. Guthrie.)

Timely Charity. At a corner of Russell Square an old woman had for several years kept an apple-stall. Standing at the window one very wet day, Judge Talfourd observed the poor old woman in her usual place, crouching down, wet through with the pelting rain. He hastily put on his coat and hat, rushed off into the rain, bought an enormous gig umbrella, and placed it triumphantly over the old woman. "Wasn't it a glorious thought?" he was heard to say. "The thing actually covered her and her apple-stall, too."

Reward of Faith. Sir W. Napier one day in his walk met a little girl sobbing over a jug she had broken. She, in her innocence, asked him to mend it. He told her he could not mend it, but would give her sixpence to buy a new one if she would meet him there at the same time the next day, as he had no money with him. When he returned home, he found an invitation waiting for him which he particularly wished to accept. But he could not then have met the child at the time appointed; so he declined the invitation, saying: "I could not disappoint her; she trusted in me so implicitly."

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A SUCCESSFUL MISSIONER.

ONE of the most successful Temperance missioners now before the public is the Rev. Leonard M. Isitt, of New Zealand, who is at present on a visit to this country. When he was here a few years ago he produced a very deep impression, and attracted large audiences in all parts of the country. Mr. Isitt has recently led a crusade in Chelsea, under the auspices of the Children's Protection League, and the meetings have been presided over by the Bishop of London, the Archdeacon of Middlesex, and other distinguished personages. One marked feature of Mr. Isitt's orations is the wealth of illustration which he brings to bear upon the Temperance argument; "from grave to gay, from lively to severe" is the keynote of his style. He is an ardent and convinced prohibitionist, and, while recognising that an old country cannot immediately reform its legislative methods, Mr. Isitt is not slow to point out, from his own experience, in how many ways the Colonies furnish examples of the first importance for an effective dealing with the thorny problems of the evils of intemperance. As becomes a Christian minister, a deep religious fervour gives force to his appeals, and he has the great encouragement of winning over large numbers of thoughtful and earnest people, who would scarcely be affected by the conventional Temperance meeting. For reviving the work, and giving a fresh impetus to the movement in populous places, Mr. Isitt is certainly the man for these times, and, as his knowledge of the Temperance cause has been gained in many parts of the world by direct personal observation under the most favourable conditions for obtaining facts at first hand, he is in the position of being able to present the case for total abstinence with a freshness which is quite delightful. We advise those who have not yet heard him to take an early opportunity of doing so.

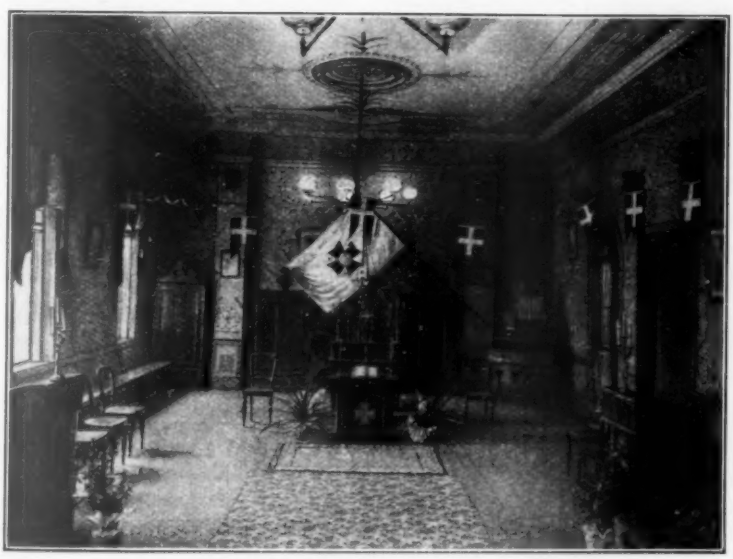
ARCHDEACON WILBERFORCE'S TESTIMONY.

We have received many gratifying letters with regard to the reprint of Archdeacon Wilberforce's powerful contribution to our columns, "Why I am an Abstainer." The distinguished position of the writer as Chaplain to the Speaker, and Canon and Archdeacon of Westminster, apart altogether from his magnificent services to the Temperance movement, give an especial value to his remarkable testimony. The pamphlet is published at 1d. per copy, and supplied in quantities of 50 for 2s. 9d., and 100 copies for 5s. Orders may be given to any bookseller, or sent direct to the publishers, Messrs. Cassell and Company, La Belle Sauvage, Ludgate Hill, E.C. As the large edition is almost exhausted, early application will be necessary. Workers who want to do something practical during the holiday season should lay in a supply of Archdeacon Wilberforce's testimony for distribution during their rambles in the country and at the seaside.

THE LICENSING BILL.

At the time of writing it is quite impossible to forecast the fate of this important measure in Committee. A forest of amendments has to be dealt with, friends of the Bill as well as its fiercest opponents being responsible for many suggested alterations. The leading Temperance organisations have left no stone unturned to influence Members of Parliament; while the many large and representative demonstrations in all parts of the country must have done much to "spread the light" among the general public. It is needless to say that "The Trade" is well taking care of its own interests; but there is a growing conviction among Temperance people that an eminent statesman was not very far astray when he said that, if the State does not throttle "'The Trade,' 'The Trade' will soon throttle the State."



A NOVEL CRUSADE.

In a popular seaside resort, which for the present shall be nameless, a few of the leading members of the local branch of the C.E.T.S.

have put their heads together to improve the internal and external appearance of the local refreshment rooms. They have quietly visited the various houses and pointed out to the respective managers the importance of smartening up the houses inside and out. Offers of growing plants in pots have been made, and in the case of one establishment a complete refurnishing of new cups and saucers and plates has been provided gratuitously, conditional upon the proprietor paying for a new rig-out of spoons and knives and forks. No doubt an eye will be given to the tablecloths, a very dismal feature of many refreshment rooms; but, after all, the main thing is to see that the persons in charge really understand the making of a cup of tea, coffee, or cocoa, for although the accessories are important, the "refreshments" themselves in too many cases need improving.

A DANISH TEMPLAR LODGE-ROOM.

We give an illustration of a Good Templar Lodge-room at Svendborg, Denmark. The picture shows the lower end of the apartment, where the Vice-Templar sits when the lodge is in session. In front of that officer is a small altar, on which is the Bible. It will be seen that at each of the officers' tables there are candles, which when candidates are brought into the room are lighted, even although the apartment is illuminated by a dozen or more gas jets. The candles, however, explain a curious custom of the Danes, as illustrated in Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables," in which the genial Bishop, who is entertaining an escaped criminal at his table, gently reproaches his housekeeper for not bringing out the extra silver candlesticks with lights in honour of his guest! So in the Good Templar Lodge-rooms, in special services, when new candidates are being welcomed, or distinguished visitors received, the candles are always lighted in their honour and extinguished when the ceremony of introduction is over.

GOOD TEMPLARS' LODGE-ROOM AT SVENDBORG, DENMARK.

PROGRESS IN THE ARMY.

According to recent returns collected by the Army Temperance Association, there are now 26,171 total abstainers in the Army in England, and 24,000 in the Army in India. One of the most gratifying features of the work is that about one-third of the recruits sign the pledge soon after enlisting. A large percentage of officers are active members of the Temperance Association, and their excellent example is a powerful factor in popularising the work in the ranks.

ANOTHER ABSTAINING BISHOP.

The correspondent to whom we supplied some time ago a long list of teetotal Bishops must add another name to the number. The Right Rev. St. Clair Donaldson, the new Bishop of Brisbane, is an abstainer, and takes a keen interest in the Temperance movement generally. While he was Vicar of the parish of St. Mary-of-Eton, Hackney Wick, he had one of the largest and best worked Bands of Hope in the diocese of London.

SHORT ARROWS

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

Only Two Hours.

IT is one of the latest boasts of Western Canada, towards whose welcoming and fertile shores so many emigrants from our bleak island are tending, that she now sets the standard in corn for the whole world. The superiority of her grain is stated to be due to the singular fact that during the most critical agricultural months of the year she is blessed with two hours' extra sunshine every day over all other corn-producing countries. What would "two hours' extra sunshine," in the way of kindness and good deeds, do for the ripening and mellowing of the Christian character? How much would "two hours' extra sunshine," in the way of additional work for missions, on the part of churches and individuals, do towards the great ingathering of that spiritual harvest of the world, for which the fields are already white!

How Little Have I Served?

SOME time ago, before military reforms had become the order of the day, an officer wrote: "The life of a British officer consists in trying at all times to get leave of absence, and in this pursuit I have not been wholly unsuccessful." It is a poor boast that we have been enabled to shirk work in life, and one that nobody would like to make upon his deathbed. Rather we should try to be so serviceable that we shall be missed when we die. We are to bear one another's burdens, and not to put our burdens upon others. Let us not try to discover how little, but how much, we can serve as Christian soldiers in the war in which the Church Militant is engaged.

Caught up from the Crevasse.

"WE were about to rope ourselves together," says an Alpine climber, "when the apparently solid snow gave way, and I found myself flying down between dark walls of ice. Suddenly my fall was arrested by my becoming jammed into the narrowing crevasse; my knees pressed against the opposite side of the chasm, my heels resting on a ledge of frozen snow. Some fifty feet overhead appeared amid the darkness a round bright blue spot, my only glimpse of the upper world. My companion's voice called down into my living tomb that he would seek help from a hut not far away. Fearing I might fall further, I cut with my ice-axe two hand-holes in front of me, and then began with a large penknife to pick holes on each side of a projecting knob of ice, through which I passed, and knotted tightly, the loose end of the rope which happened to be round me. This device might, I thought, uphold me, should all other supports give way. But at this moment sounded down the call, 'Help is near!' and there, far above in the bright blue space, hung a little black cord, moving rapidly down—truly a messenger of life! There yet remained the peril of my being drawn upwards ere I could unfasten my own rope from the ice projection, and for a few moments I was in imminent danger of being dragged asunder; but, free at last, I shouted, 'Now, now!' and was quickly safe above on solid ground." In this thrilling story I read a striking allegory. How truly is each human soul fallen deep down away from God, in Whom alone is life; and helpless, as that traveller in the crevasse, are we to lift ourselves into safety, light, eternal life. Like him, we often cast out grapplings of our own devising to preserve ourselves, as we hope, from perdition; but, alas! how often, unlike him, we cling on to these, regardless of the only true salvation—deliverance which must come from above. Nor can any human help, however sympathetic, however spiritual, raise us from death to life, any more than could that friend alone help the fallen traveller. Only the strong cord of Christ's redeeming love can save us. The song of the ransomed, begun on earth, never ending in heaven, will be: "He sent from above," "He took me out of the horrible pit, and set my feet upon a rock."

No Hair-Splitting Charity.

WHEN they were making one of the temples in the Japanese town of Kyoto, the ropes used to move the huge wooden beams were unable to bear the great strain that was put upon them, and broke. Thereupon the women of Kyoto all sent contributions of the hair of their heads. These were made into ropes that were strong enough to do the work. The writer has seen the great coil of them, which is kept at the temple as a memorial of the women's self-sacrifice. It is easy, if one has money, to write a cheque for charity, but to give time and trouble costs as much as it must have done to these heathen women to part with their hair. Think of this, British Christian women, and do something similar.

Clear Shining after Rain.

"What a disappointment, and after such an expenditure of time, and toil and money!" I exclaimed, as there burst forth a thunderstorm, with a deluge of rain. We were keeping high holiday in Havre, where an international competition of fire-engines was arranged, bringing crowds of visitors from all the country round. Streets and squares and public buildings were gaily decked; the main thoroughfare of the city with special elaborateness and brilliancy. Innumerable archways of evergreens, spangled with lamps of every hue, spanned the broad street. Alas! on the day when the actual illumination was to take place, this terrible storm at noontide threatened to mar the whole. "All those pretty lamps must be destroyed," I remarked, for my last experience of such a scene had been in Shanghai, where the Chinese lanterns dropped one after another from their festoons, soddened quickly by the heavy rain. "Do not be disquieted; the lamps will be all right," my friends replied. "The globes are of celluloid and absolutely waterproof, and are furnished with electric lights." In fact, when the storm passed over and evening fell, out shone the gay lights with a brilliancy which no storm, wind or heavy rain could dim. The thought arose in my mind, how blessed would it be were our spirits thus illumined by a brightness which earth's chances and changes cannot affect! So it should be, so it may be, for each one into whose heart has shone "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." That heaven-sent current is beyond the reach of all earthly influences, however stormy, however depressing. Linked on by simple faith to "the true Light," "the light of life," our light will shine steadfastly before all men, to the glory of our Father in heaven; aye, and in blessed contrast to the ever-waning lights of time, that heavenly radiance will "shine more and more unto the perfect day."

An American Boy Preacher.

The congregation of Bethany Free Baptist Church, of Whitman, Massachusetts, is one of the most numerous in this town, and worships in one of the largest edifices in this section of the State, but is led by a seventeen year old boy, who, perhaps, has had as varied an experience during his short life as any preacher filling an American pulpit. Edward Hersey Brewster was called by the congregation after hearing him preach what was considered the most eloquent sermon ever delivered within Bethany's walls, but at the age of five he was appearing in public in theatricals. Since then he has seen service as a messenger boy, carrying telegrams and other missives. After discarding the uniform of the messenger, he gave readings from Shakespeare, Byron, and other authors at the age of twelve years; while as a boy in knickerbockers he was preaching sermons at the age of fifteen years. The young preacher is a descendant of one of the noted Puritan elders of New England, William Brewster. His parents were in such straits that, as already stated, when but five years old, he found employment as a child-actor, appearing at several of the principal theatres of the United States. He might have continued his stage career, but the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children would not permit him to remain on the stage, and he left it after two years of this life to attend one of the public schools of New York. Again poverty forced him to find an occupation, and he donned the messenger's uniform; but while thus engaged he found time to pursue his studies, and, the attention of one of the prominent New York pastors being attracted to him, again the boy's life was changed, and for a time he was employed as a bank clerk. His ministerial friend also interested him in the Young Men's Christian Association, and here young Brewster apparently found his calling. He not only attended the meetings, but induced his friends and associates to join the Association, and when his talent was discovered was frequently called upon to lead meetings and to speak. It was but a step from this work to that of an evangelist, and the boy missionary, as he was called, conducted revival services and camp meetings during one summer in New England, some of which were attended by thousands of people. It was this work which led to his call to the pastorate of the Bethany Church, and although he has been preaching from its pulpit less than a year, such interest has been manifested in him that the congregation has already considerably increased. So interested are the church members in their young minister that arrangements have been made to pay his expenses for a course at Harvard University, in order that he may have the advantages of a college education. He will continue to act as pastor, however, during this time. In addition to his ability as a speaker, Mr. Brewster is also a notable athlete, and at the Young Men's Christian Association sports has won many medals as a result of his prowess in running, jumping, and other feats.

A TEMPLE TO THE CHINESE GOD OF WAR.

To the God of War.

ABOUT the beginning of the Christian era, the land of Sinim was harassed by warfare. The history of China tells how the bloody sword of the great general Kwante won him distinction. As a reward of valour, his grateful nation deified him after his death. Since the time when the Prince of Peace appeared in great humility, and the tidings of peace spread ever westward, Kwante has been worshipped in the Far East as the God of War. He is the head of the military, just as Confucius is the head of the gentry, of China, and one of the most popular gods of the pantheon. The great religions of China are Confucianism and Taouism, which are indigenous to the country; and Buddhism, which was transplanted from India. The Chinese Mars is properly a Taouist deity; but, like many others, he appears in the temples belonging to all three creeds, for they have been dovetailed together. Chinese records declare that in 1856, when the southern provinces were torn between the armies of Insurgents and Imperialists, Kwante appeared in the sky and turned the tide of battle in favour of the defeated Imperialists. For this service the Emperor promoted him to the same rank as Confucius. There are now 1,600 State temples dedicated to the honour of Kwante, in which the Mandarins worship twice a month, besides thousands of smaller temples. The knife used in executions is kept within the precincts, and the executioner worships the God of War on replacing it after his ghastly work is done. The province of Hupeh, with its neighbour Kuei-chow, has been described as "The Chinese Switzerland."[1] This part of the midlands has a fertile soil covered for tens of thousands of acres with the poppy blossom—white, crimson, purple, and pink—very lovely to the eyes, but a deadly curse to the nation. It is estimated that in the four provinces of Hupeh, Kuei-chow, Sze-chuen, and Yunnan, six-tenths of the arable land are given over to poppy culture. It has driven out the cotton, mulberries, sugar, rice, beans, wheat, and other grain. The granaries have been, therefore, left unfilled, and poverty and suffering have ensued. No other foreign invader has so rapidly taken possession of the country, and probably no warfare has occasioned so much death as the poppy. It is stated that 160,000 suicides in China are due annually to indulgence in the vice of taking opium. So powerful is this enemy of God and the empire that the Prince of Peace only can turn the tide of battle in favour of righteousness in its struggle with moral weakness.

"The Quiver" Order of Honourable Service: Distinguished Members.

SINCE our last list was published two more members have been added to the roll of Distinguished Members, admission to which is granted only to candidates who can show a record of continuous domestic service in one family of at least fifty years. The names of the latest recipients of badges and certificates of membership are—

Name.	Address.	Years of Service.
ELIZABETH BISHOP LONG	Kenton, Exeter	60
MARY WARDLE	Swinton, nr. Manchester	67

In reply to numerous correspondents, the Editor begs to remind his readers that the enrolment of candidates for THE QUIVER Order of Honourable Service is suspended in all classes except that for Distinguished Members, whose qualifications are stated above.

Old Laws for New.

WHEN we examine some of the obsolete laws of our English forefathers, we cannot help being occasionally sorry for their lapse or their repeal. When we visit the average public athletic field while a big game is in progress, we feel that a statute of James I. against swearing (unfortunately, only to be in force "till next session of Parliament") might advantageously be revived. Nor, on such an occasion, would the reinforcement of the law of good Queen Anne against betting come amiss. We have all been saying lately that we eat too much, so we shall admire the enactment of Edward III. that, except on feast days, no meal might consist of more than two courses, "and if any man choose to have sauce for his mess, he well may, provided it be not made at any great cost." Grooms and craftsmen might only eat fish or meat once a day. In 1349 work was made obligatory on idlers; and it became illegal to give money to a beggar. We can imagine that our latter-day multitude of swearers and gamblers and gluttons and loafers and mendicants and triflers would find something remarkably uncongenial in the drastic rigour of those iron times.

Round the World for a Rhyme.

IN a prosaic age, when we are told that people do not care for poetry, it is refreshing to find an occasional instance in contradiction. An unsigned article in THE QUIVER for April, 1903, was prefaced by a few lines from a beautiful poem by Deas Cromarty, never published in book form. One of the quoted stanzas ran:

> "Athens kept her Parthenon,
> Egypt had her Sphinx of stone—
> Gaunt stood Golgotha, alone!"

These words so haunted the mind of a lady, a subscriber to this magazine for twenty years, in Georgia, U.S.A., that she wrote for the poet's name to the American publishers, who forwarded the request to the English house, who passed it on to the right quarter, from which it was sent to the anonymous author of the article. The author dispatched the required reference to the inquirer in Georgia, U.S.A., and from her received a note of thanks in the English Midlands. "The poetry of earth is never dead."

Don't Run it Fine.

A CHORISTER who had been asked from a distance to sing at a harvest festival in a country church last autumn found it convenient to cycle to his destination. It was (for a wonder) a bright and rainless evening, and he enjoyed his ride. But it struck him as strange that, when, after a dozen miles or so, he got within earshot, he only heard for about five minutes the faint ringing of the bells across the hills, and then there was an ominous silence. The truth flashed upon him: he had mistaken the time of the service by half an hour—7.30 for 7—and though he put on frantic speed the choir had been long in their places on his arrival, and the psalms had begun. Perhaps in this simple misfortune there is a parable. As our friend told us his story, we thought how often men and women "mistake the hour" in their spiritual life. The world is pleasant, and any season will do for repentance, and the last fact which they will believe is that they have grown (or can grow) old. And when at last the darkness has fallen, and the unmistakable warning has come from the frontiers of eternity, who shall say whether it may not be too late, and the doors may not be shut, and there may be no part left for them in that festal song which is sung in the courts of heaven by the redeemed?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 829.

85. St. Matthew says the angel (or messenger) came down from heaven. (St. Matt. xxviii. 2.)

86. When they met Jesus they fell down and worshipped Him. (St. Matt. xxviii. 9.)

87. "Go tell my brethren that they go before Me into Galilee ; there shall they see Me." (St. Matt. xxviii. 10.)

88. It was commonly reported that the chief priests had given money to the soldiers to say that the disciples had stolen the body of Jesus. (St. Matt. xxviii. 15.)

89. To preach the gospel to the whole world, and not to the Jews only. (St. Mark xvi. 15.)

90. They were to have the power to cast out devils, to speak with new tongues, to lay hands on the sick and they would recover. (St. Mark xvi. 17, 18 ; Acts x. 46 ; St. James v. 14.)

91. To obtain a remission of taxation and freedom from the personal service demanded of the people by King Solomon. (1 Kings xii. 3, 4.)

92. Jeroboam, a servant of Solomon, whom he appointed to superintend the building of Millo, and who was chosen by God to be the first king of the kingdom of Israel. (1 Kings xi. 26, 27, 31.)

93. The overbearing conduct of Rehoboam, who threatened to become more severe than his father King Solomon. (1 Kings xii. 13-16.)

94. The setting up of golden calves as objects of worship at Bethel and at Dan, and making anyone a priest who was not of the family of Aaron. (1 Kings xii. 28-31.)

95. Because he was afraid, if the people went to Jerusalem to worship, they would turn against him and kill him. (1 Kings xii. 27.)

96. The people being anxious to keep the Feast of Tabernacles (or . harvest festival), Jeroboam ordained a feast on the fifteenth day of the eighth month similar to that of the Feast of Tabernacles, which was on the fifteenth day of the seventh month. (1 Kings xii. 32, 33.)

SPIRITUAL DIFFICULTIES.

IN connection with this magazine we are inaugurating a New Department which it is hoped may be found helpful to many Christian people who are from time to time troubled with moral and spiritual difficulties. We do not contemplate dealing with the objections of professed sceptics, but rather with the conscientious perplexities of those who find themselves, either continually or occasionally, faced with some critical problem of faith or conduct. To all such we offer a cordial invitation to state their difficulties (as briefly and as plainly as possible), in order that we may place such statements in the hands of some experienced and sympathetic adviser in spiritual matters, who will, of course, hold all such communications in the strictest confidence.

All correspondents must give their names and addresses to the Editor, as a guarantee of good faith, but their names will not be published. The Editor reserves the right to insert in THE QUIVER any such questions or replies as may appear to him of general interest ; but he does not undertake to publish, or even provide replies to, every inquiry made.

As THE QUIVER goes to press several weeks before the date of publication, inquirers will understand that some delay in the publication of answers is inevitable, but those whose difficulties are of an urgent nature may, subject to the provisions above mentioned, and in every case to the discretion of the Editor, have a reply sent to them by post on their enclosing a stamped and fully addressed envelope for that purpose.

LAUNCHING OUR FIRST MISSION BOAT.

AMONG the Editor's correspondence one day soon after the May number of THE QUIVER was published was a letter from a lady, in which she said: "I am enclosing a cheque for £25 for one of the Children's Mission Row-boats mentioned in THE QUIVER for this month. I should be obliged if the boat may be named Mildred, in memory of my little girl, and if it should be required in the North of England I should be glad for it to be used there."

We have had the greatest pleasure in accepting this offer, and The Quiver No. 2 will bear the name of Mildred, in loving remembrance of the little one who has not lived to take part in the children's collection for these boats, but whose memory will be kept fresh by the boat bearing her name, consecrated to the service of carrying the Gospel to the sailors.

The first list of subscribers to the fund, which we publish this month, not only includes this touching memorial gift from an English home, but shows that our appeal has already awakened a response from across the Atlantic, for we acknowledge at least one contribution from a reader of THE QUIVER in the United States.

It is probably too soon to expect to learn many of the results of the collections which are being made by our readers for THE QUIVER Fund. But the holiday season will be upon us when these lines reach most of our subscribers, and as the exodus to the coast begins we would ask our readers to remember the need of those who go down to the sea, not for pleasure, but to earn their bread, often at the risk of their lives, and always in the face of dire temptation afloat as well as ashore.

Already the first of THE QUIVER Row-boats is at work, and we are happy to be able pictorially to chronicle at Blyth, Northumberland, on May 31st last. The little craft is a credit to her builders and to THE QUIVER, and everyone who saw her as she slid into the water was agreed that she was admirably fitted to help forward the good work on the Tyne which is being done by that practical and true friend of the sailors, the Rev. S. Hewitt Fullerton, the Chaplain of the Mission at South Shields. The actual ceremony of launching was performed by Miss Fisher, daughter of a well-known North of England shipowner; but it was preceded by a bright little open-air service, conducted by the Rev. C. E. James, Vicar of Blyth, and attended by two of the chaplains and other local clergymen and friends of the Mission. The beautiful launching prayer will, we are sure, find an echo in the heart of every QUIVER reader:

"O Thou that sittest above the water floods and stillest the raging of the sea, accept, we beseech Thee, O Lord, the supplication of Thy servants for all who shall in this vessel cast the Bread of Life upon the waters. In all their ways enable them to serve Thee, and by their example to set forth Thy glory throughout the earth.

"Watch over them in their going forth and their coming in, that no evil befall them nor mischief come nigh to hurt their souls. And so through the waves of this troublesome world, and through all the changes and chances of this mortal life, bring them of Thy mercy to the sure haven of Thine everlasting Kingdom, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

These solemn and beautiful words having been spoken, Mr. Fullerton gratefully accepted, on behalf of the Mission, the boat which was to be dedicated to work upon the Tyne, and called upon Miss Fisher to speed the craft upon its career.

What of the work in which The Quiver No. 1 is to take part? There is need on the Tyne for three new boats, but so far we have only been able to give one. Five hundred men a day pass through the Seamen's Institute at South Shields, and in this and two other Institutes not far short of 300,000 visits in the year give Mr. Fullerton and his helpers the opportunity of speaking a word in season and of holding out a helping hand in that manly, practical fashion which is the surest way of winning the confidence of the sailor.

Who will help? The difficulty is not to find points where help is needed, but to reach the means to furnish the help. The problem is not to find the station where the next boat is needed, but to get the money quickly enough that the call shall not go by unheeded. Collecting cards are offered to one and all by the Editor of THE QUIVER, La Belle Sauvage, Ludgate Hill, E.C.

The following is a first list of contributions, comprising those amounts received up to and including May 31st:—

WISE MEN AT PLAY.

SKETCHES OF THE BRITISH CHAUTAUQUA.

By F. M. Holmes.

CHAUTAUQUANS ON THE SLOPES OF CADER IDRIS.

THEY are merry folk, the British Chautauquans. The thirst after knowledge which is supposed to possess them does not parch their good spirits, or cause their love of honest fun to flag.

The memory is still fresh among them of Dr. Clifford playing musical chairs, and of the delightful way in which for the nonce he became one of the jolliest of big boys.

Only a foolish or a churlish person would grudge the learned divine his hours of play, and from what we have heard about him we gather that one reason why he is so much beloved by some good folk is the great geniality with which he can enjoy the lighter side of life and enter into its wholesome recreations.

Another Chautauquan will tell you of the jokes which that "grave and reverend signior," Dr. McClure, of Mill Hill School, poured forth on a coach drive to the famous show-place, the Devil's Bridge, near Aberystwyth. Dr. McClure may be described without offence as "The man who must be obeyed," and the faculty of enforcing obedience is undoubtedly an admirable one in the head of a great public school; but, away on a holiday with the Chautauquans, he can be as jocular and genial as any of the boys he rules so well in the days of term.

If you, watching your opportunity, bring forth a joke which you have carefully treasured to set the proverbial table in a roar, be sure that Dr. McClure will have something to cap it; and if you quote a homely proverb by way of making a remark when you do not know what else to say, you must not be surprised if he raps out a funny parody.

Thus, if you declared, with no doubt quite singular appropriateness to the conversation, that a bird in the hand was worth two in the bush, he would probably reply with solemn gravity that a hair on the head was also worth two in the brush.

Chautauqua, too, reveals the Rev. J. R. Wood in a new light. To observers of public affairs he is known as an ex-President of the Baptist Union and the hard-working pastor of a large church in North London, but somehow you never connect him with music.

Yet at the Chautauqua he bursts forth into anecdotes of Handel and of Mendelssohn, and, with Madame Lizzie Owen to render solos and a Welsh choir to swell the chorus, the fortunate Chautauquans find themselves in possession of musical sessions which rival any number of ordinary seaside concerts.

Moreover, few may think of the eminent Wesleyan, the Rev. C. H. Kelly, as an entertaining story-teller concerning the deeds of reformatory boys. But Mr. Kelly has been for some time in touch with a large institution as chaplain, and more recently a visitor to one of his Majesty's prisons in a similar capacity; and he tells tales to the Chautauquans.

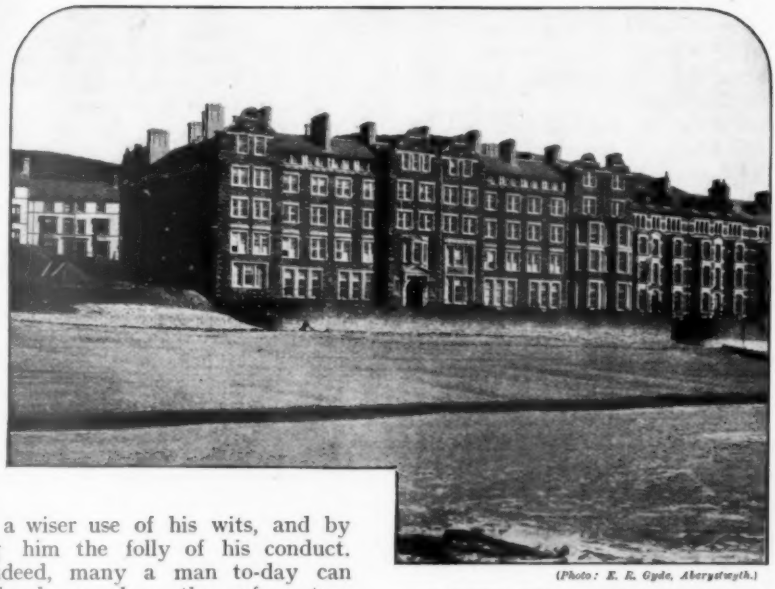
In listening to his experiences we realise that he, at all events, has grasped the great principle of discrimination. He can distinguish between the weak, the foolish, the misled, and the downright bad. Some, alas! are indeed really bad, but others belong to brighter grades of human character.

A boy several times ran away from the reformatory, and was brought back and punished. After one of these escapades he was seen by Mr. Kelly, and we can imagine the keen look of mingled kindness and firmness with which the chaplain regarded him.

"What a stupid boy you are!" he said, in a tone not suggestive of contempt, but rather of banter with the bite of truth in it. "What causes you to run away?"

"Well, ye see, sir, they keeps thinkin' I will, and keeps a-watchin' of me, and a-tryin' to prewent me."

"And so you run away to beat them?"



"Yes, sir."

He evidently delights in pitting his wits against those of his masters, just as some burglars, it appears, revel in the excitement of playing their skill against all house-guards and detectives.

Mr. Kelly soon settled this boy by inspiring

"EXCURSIONS ARE ABUNDANT."

(Photo: E. E. Gyde, Aberystwyth.)

him to a wiser use of his wits, and by showing him the folly of his conduct. But, indeed, many a man to-day can bless the hour when the reformatory cut short his career of crime, and the firm but kindly chaplain prompted him to a wiser and a better course.

Here is Mr. G. A. Hutchinson, telling stories of the deep-sea fishermen he knows so well. Arriving one day at a certain fishing port in a storm, he found a ship showing signals of distress, and a rescue boat preparing to save her. But, to the surprise of all on shore, the vessel changed her signals, declaring that help was not needed. The captain, anxious to avoid expense, and thinking he could save himself, refused the offered aid, and the result was, alas! disastrous. Yet he could have been saved, if he would—a striking illustration of a phase of human nature.

And here is Mrs. Charlotte Benham, well known throughout the country as an organiser of girls' guilds. She has interesting experiences of her own to relate.

One miserable day she was alone in a railway carriage, expecting a solitary journey, when suddenly the door opened, and in trooped four women. Three were evidently grumblers. Everything was wrong with them—husbands, children, weather, and the hard times.

But the fourth was different—quiet, cheerful-eyed, and sweet-voiced. The marks of care and hard work were visible on her face, but she lulled the baby at her breast to sleep, and cheered the child at her knee.

"Never mind, Bobby," said she. "Father will meet us at the station."

Everything about her was restful, yet cheerful.

Mrs. Benham had found a topic for her speech, or a subject for her next article, and the moral of her story is so obvious that it does not need pointing out.

The British Chautauqua is an assemblage of persons who unite a certain amount of study with a large amount of holiday-making, and season both with a liberal supply of pleasing social intercourse. They enjoy, in fact, a sort of co-operative holiday, but a holiday, the promoters would declare, having a distinctive character of its own. It aspires to be educational as well as social, and religious as well as recreative.

Nevertheless, according to English custom, it fully recognises individual liberty, and attendance at lectures is not compulsory, while the holiday aspect of the gathering is ever kept to the fore, and fully emphasised.

It arose in this way. About ten years ago, an English gentleman connected with the Baptist denomination, named Mr. Percy C. Webb, formed the idea of adapting the American institution known as Chautauqua to British habits and customs. His sister, Miss Beatrice M. Webb, of Hampstead, has joined him as honorary secretary, and the Rev. John Bradford, of Leytonstone, as honorary co-director, and these three, by their unfailing energy, good spirits, and great capacity for management, keep the organisation flourishing.

Now Chautauqua is the name of a lake in New York State, on the shores of which a summer school is wont to gather every August, and a system of home reading is maintained among the members throughout the year by means of correspondence.

The word is, of course, Indian in its origin, and signifies a bag-purse, tied in the middle—a shape which, it appears, is the form of the lake. Yet this meaning is now in danger of being entirely forgotten, and a new signification has arisen, denoting a society arranging for a particular kind of holiday with a certain amount of home study.

The home study which has been pursued by some of the British Chautauquans is the study of the Greek Testament. Almost every day during the holiday a Greek class is held by the Rev. Thomas Williams, B.A., of Aberystwyth, who conducts his lectures so attractively that he would make his pupils in love with the language if they were not so already. Attendance is quite optional, but a considerable proportion avail themselves of the opportunity and maintain the study throughout the year by correspondence.

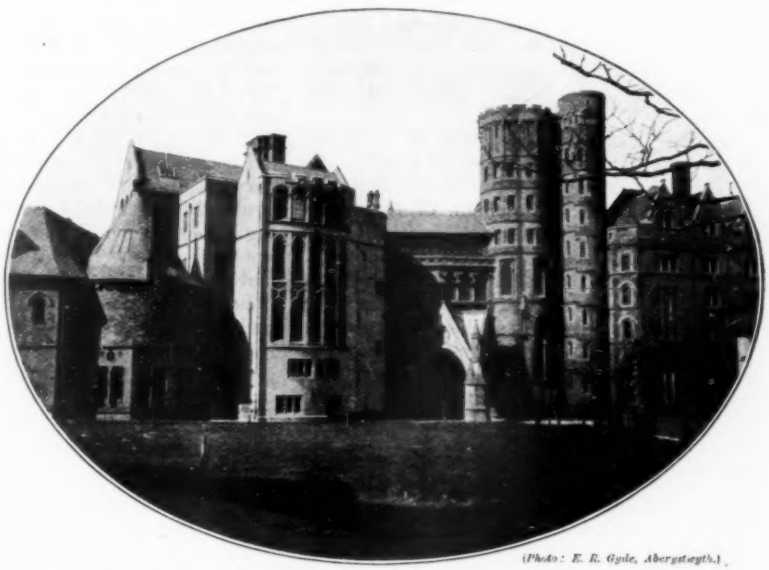
What is the use of learning Greek? To which question Mr. Williams replies with a smile. "A worthy but ignorant man asked that question once," said he, "and added, 'The Apostle Paul did not know Greek.' The good man had not the slightest idea that Greek was the original language of the New Testament. Perhaps he thought it was written in Welsh, which has been said by some to have been the language of the Garden of Eden!"

A large proportion of the Chautauquans are engaged in tuition, and certain of the lectures are evidently intended more particularly for Sunday school teachers—as, for instance, Professor Agar Beet's addresses on "Theology in the Sunday School," and the Rev. J. C. Carlile's on "Organisation in the Sunday School" and "The Teacher's Magnetism."

Mr. F. F. Belsey, sometime President of the Sunday School Union, gave one afternoon an illustration of his blackboard lessons. Mr. Belsey is evidently an enthusiast for the use of the blackboard in Sunday schools. He goes down to the school of Whitefield's Mission in Tottenham Court Road an hour before the commencement, and draws beautiful pictures with coloured chalks on the board.

Here is a story he told the Chautauquans, as an illustration of his lessons. A certain king had four horses which he wished broken in, so that he could drive them in his chariot on his approaching birthday. Two were ginger-bays and were named respectively "Ira" and "Lingua"; the others were black, and were called "Cor" and "Corpus."

The trainer began with Cor, and, having got her fairly tractable, took her out with Corpus, and these being gently but firmly disciplined, were presently harnessed with the ginger-bays, so that on his birthday the king was able to drive them with ease in the procession. This story, elaborated with some care, is seen to be an allegory, Cor being the heart of man, Corpus the body, and Lingua and Ira the tongue and the temper. Once get the heart right, and the others will follow.



Mr. Belsey had prepared a series of pictures for his impromptu audience, but the house porter gravely cleaned them away, and he was left at the hour of commencement with a very blank blackboard, though he kept a smiling face. His feelings must have been akin to those of Thomas Carlyle when he heard that his manuscript of the "French Revolution" had been burnt by a maid-servant.

In accordance with the idea of rendering service to the Sunday school worker, Mrs. Benham was to give a demonstration on teaching a girls' class, and Mr. Robert Cameron, M.P., was to speak on effective religious teaching to the young; while along similar lines would probably be the Rev. J. Ross Murray's lectures on the Bible in Shakespeare and in Milton, or Dr. Monro Gibson's lectures on the visions of Zechariah, or the discourse by Dr. Edward Judson, of New York, on Browning's religion. But subjects called secular are also included—as, for instance, a series by Dr. McClure called "The British Citizen."

WHERE THE LECTURES OF THE CHAUTAUQUA ARE GIVEN: UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, ABERYSTWYTH.

Several places have been visited for the summer holiday, the Chautauquans first favouring Pwllheli in North Wales, and afterwards gathering at Edinburgh, Saltburn, Folkestone, and Barmouth. At last they appear to have settled themselves down at Aberystwyth, a charming seaside resort on Cardigan Bay. Here are sea and sands, rocks and mountains, with opportunities for any number of delightful excursions. But, further, the Alexandra Hall connected with the University College of Aberystwith affords a most suitable boarding house for two or three hundred Chautauquans, and the College buildings themselves offer an admirable place for the lectures.

So, when the students fly away for the vacation, the Chautauquans appear in their stead. They take the Alexandra Hall for practically the month of August, and though during term it is the residence for the women students of the University College, yet its doors are open to all Chautauquans of both sexes and of any age during this month.

Lectures, however, occupy a comparatively small part of the time. Social gatherings find a place, the Mayor giving a reception one week and Chautauqua entertaining the Mayor and friends in the town on another occasion. Moreover, excursions are abundant, one being arranged for nearly every day. The Rev. G. Eyre Evans, who knows Cardiganshire like the palm of his hand, is usually the leader on these expeditions, which are made by road and rail, and by that old-fashioned conveyance called "Shanks's mare."

One of these excursions leads deep into the heart of the Welsh hills to Strata Florida, the ruins of a once magnificent ecclesiastical structure, now known as "The Westminster Abbey of Wales." Here lie buried the unconquered princes of Wales, and, excavations having been made, the tombs, together with much tesselated pavement and many beautiful architectural remains, have within the last few years been cleared.

The name is almost certainly the Latinised form of old Welsh words, "Ystrad Fflur," and from the Abbey probably went forth the monks to hospices on the surrounding mountains—hospices which in the old days would be of eminent service in this part of wild Wales. Tradition has it that the monks built the original Devil's Bridge, which, so far from being a mischief and a device of the Evil One, has been of incalculable benefit to mankind in crossing the almost inaccessible gorge of the Rheidol.

Another enjoyable excursion is to Lampeter College. The authorities kindly invited the Chautauquans to the building and entertained them to luncheon in the beautiful grounds. The College, with which some distinguished churchmen have been connected in the past, can boast an excellent library, rich in literary treasures, and stands in the midst of delightful scenery. Yet another trip winds round the coast to Barmouth and the estuary of the Mawddach, and the mountains rising peak above peak beyond. Of course, the Devil's Bridge—called more respectably Pont-y-Mynach, or the Bridge of the Monk—figures in the programme, both by coach and by the new narrow-gauge mountain railway; and the neighbourhood of the bridge is so rich in beauty and in delightful mountain scenery that many persons could visit the lovely spot repeatedly and find in it a never-failing charm.

But, indeed, the Chautauquans are ready to ramble all over wild Wales, and wicked snapshots might be taken of teetotallers and divines picnicking at "Black Lions" and "Red Dragons," these being well-conducted and old-fashioned inns of the remote countryside.

People who do not know Chautauqua may easily mistake its character. It is evidently a delightful holiday party, affording pleasing opportunities of acquiring knowledge, as well as of enjoying recreation. But its spirit is, in the main, the spirit of honest merriment and of wholesome fun, and the fact that some members return to its gatherings year after year shows how greatly it is appreciated. "Never mind, old chap," says Mr. Evans to a Dutch member who is very dull on the closing day, "cheer up; it is only forty-eight weeks to the next Chautauqua."

A GENERAL VIEW OF ABERYSTWYTH.

THE ORDEAL OF ALICE LORRAINE.

By Morice Gerard, Author of "The Tenant of The Grange," Etc.

CHAPTER I.

JOHN CARDEREL laughed.

"You are not used to hills like these, Miss Lorraine?"

"No, indeed! I thought we had hills in Surrey, but they are gentle inclines, while these are precipices. And what a rate you go down them."

"Alice! you must not talk to the driver so much. He will attend to you and not to the horses. I don't want to take a sudden leap into the Lynn, a few hundreds of feet down, if you do."

"Don't be alarmed, Miss Challice; I am a very careful charioteer, as you know. I hope I can attend to Miss Lorraine and the horses as well. The greys know the road perfectly, and I can trust them to respond to every turn of my wrist."

John Carderel certainly looked master of the situation. Sitting up high on the four-wheeled dogcart, he handled the reins with the unerring instinct of a perfect whip. By his side sat Alice Lorraine, who was on a visit to her aunt and cousins at Lynton. At the back were May Challice and her brother Arthur.

John Carderel and Arthur Challice were partners in a first-class firm of solicitors, with an office at Barnstaple as well as at Lynton.

It was the August Bank Holiday. An expedition had been planned for the day to the Doone valley, as both the partners would be free. Carderel was thirty years old, five years senior to Arthur Challice. The girls were almost of an age. Otherwise they afforded the greatest contrast to one another. Alice was tall and very fair, with a svelte figure; May shorter, with dark eyes and hair, and an olive skin.

Alice Lorraine soon shed her initial nervousness, and began to enjoy herself to the full. Some rain had fallen during the previous night, sufficient to lay the dust. Now a soft heat haze was in the air, not enough to hide the landscape, but sufficing to give it an air of mystery, and to make the distant line of Exmoor appear a limitless beyond.

Carderel turned and looked at the beautiful girl, when the greys rounded a corner of the road. On each side were the most lovely trees; to the right they scaled the steep bank almost to the sky-line, to the left they descended precipitously to the deep-flowing Lynn, which could be heard gurgling and tossing against the boulders far below. John had anticipated appreciation of this lovely view, unsurpassed in England. He turned, and found it clearly written in the forget-me-not eyes of the girl by his side.

Carderel did not say anything. He just looked his fill, not at the landscape—he was familiar enough with that—but at Alice. He took in the red-gold of her hair, in rebellious order under her picture hat; the classic outline of her nose, lips, chin, and contour generally; the dainty setting of her head on her shapely shoulders. She was looking away, half turned, partly absorbed by the landscape, partly listening intently for the song the river was chanting from its leafy hiding-place.

John Carderel looked. As he looked his face grew a little set, a suggestion of pain came into his grey eyes, a spasm affected his heart. He had for a fortnight been learning a lesson without knowing it. Now the consciousness of it burst upon him, as truths will sometimes. He would have preferred ignorance; instead, he had knowledge. He would rather this thing had not been, infinitely rather. Yet it was there.

John Carderel loved this girl with all the passion of a quiet, almost stern, self-contained nature. His was no gentle affection, to be lightly altered, or turned on one side. It was like a mountain torrent, sweeping obstacles in the way before it, yet held rigidly within its banks. John had a strong will and a deep nature.

He had fallen in love with this cousin of his partner, this visitor from Surrey, unconsciously. He had never dreamt of it until the citadel of his heart had been taken by storm. There had been no suggestive preliminaries, no dallying on the threshold. He had seen Alice Lorraine almost every day of the two weeks which had elapsed since her arrival by the comical little toy railway which brings the tourist world to the border town of Devon. Yet no suspicion of the truth had come to him until this moment.

When it did come it was absolutely unwelcome. There was something about Alice which seemed to lift her immeasurably above the ordinary plane of feminine humanity—a completeness, a dignity, a grace as majestic as it was sweet and entrancing. He thought her the very antithesis of Wordsworth's definition of a woman to be loved and wed :

> "A creature not too bright or good
> For human nature's daily food;
> For transient sorrows, simple wiles,
> Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears, and smiles."

There was nothing of this about fair Alice Lorraine. Yet John Carderel loved her, knew that he loved her, as she sat by his side that August morning. What was he, he asked himself bitterly, that he ventured to lift his eyes so high ? A plain man—strong and stalwart, it is true ; but quite, unmitigatedly plain. A country solicitor, with ample means, but still only that, as his ancestors had been before him, certainly for a hundred years. The Lorraines, he knew, held their heads high in the social world. Sir Geoffrey Lorraine, Alice's father, was a Judge of the High Court. The Challices had given him briefs at the outset of his career, when he went the Western circuit. The old-fashioned firm of lawyers had helped to lay the foundation stones of the future judge's palatial building. In return the barrister had married the attorney's sister. The latter had become a Lorraine, and had practically ceased to be a Challice. So that the intercourse between the two families had been merely formal and nominal until this summer, when an invitation somewhat hastily given was unexpectedly accepted. Neither was this the only, or chief, obstacle to any declaration of love on his part. Carderel considered himself tacitly engaged to May Challice. Not a word of actual love-making had ever passed between them. He was in no way bound, except by his own high sense of honour. That held him, however, as much as any legal obligations would have done.

May Challice, he knew, looked to him as her future husband. The rest of the family regarded the affair, likewise, as a foregone conclusion. What could be more satisfactory and appropriate ? The partners would be more closely allied than ever. For years John had been a sort of older son in the Challice establishment. That May did not dislike him she had let him see in a hundred ways. Whether her heart was deeply stirred, or not, he had no means of judging, lacking, perhaps, the key. It was only now that he reviewed the situation for the first time. He chewed the cud of reflection, and found it bitter in his mouth. Many men would have been satisfied that no compromising words, no overt acts, bound them to the sacrifice. Of these was not honest John Carderel. An implied understanding was as obligatory in his court of honour as any pledge.

Yet he winced. Whichever way he looked he faced a thorny path. To break with May was unthinkable. To marry May, loving Alice, as now he knew he did, was well-nigh unbearable. Yet the latter was the course he meant to pursue.

John was thirty ; yet had he never looked love of woman in the eyes before. Now that it came it acted as an illuminant of enormous brilliancy and radiating power. It showed him himself : it showed him life. Hitherto he had never understood either.

Love painted a most beautiful landscape in glowing colours. Honour shut the gate, and double-locked it, saying, "You must never enter there !"

Now he knew that he was an instrument of music, finely tuned, but upon which only one hand could play. Those fingers must never touch the keys. The notes that might have vibrated in fullest measure must be dumb. He knew now what love was, what he was capable of doing and suffering for the one who alone could speak to his very soul. Yet nothing of this must be his.

Some men would scoff and call this quixotism. To Carderel it was simply honour.

Alice Lorraine half turned. She became conscious of his look. Perhaps it expressed more than he knew, certainly more than he intended. A faint blush, which deepened as it went, commenced at her beautiful ears and gradually overspread her face.

Rather a sharp voice from the back of the dogcart said :

"We have the greatest confidence in your driving, John, and in the integrity of the greys ; but don't you think they did take that last corner rather fine? It is a great responsibility—the whole firm of Carderel and Challice in one trap, not to mention two poor women—eh, Cousin Alice?"

"I am quite content to trust myself," Alice said, "to Mr. Carderel's driving."

John steadied the horses, which it must be confessed had got rather out of hand. As he did so, the words last spoken rested in a dull sort of way on his brain. Did they mean much or little?

When he ventured to look again the blush had faded; Alice's face was a shade paler than it had been before. That was all.

It said much for Carderel's strength of character that he was able to go through that long day in the Doone country as if nothing distracted his wonted serenity.

They lunched at the well-known farmhouse hostelry at Malmsmead off country fare, ham and eggs. Then they went up the Doone valley. Alice was fresh from the re-reading of Blackmore's famous romance. She was walking with Arthur Challice. She appealed to the latter for sympathy, and was met with caustic scepticism.

"'Lorna Doone,'" Arthur remarked. "Have you been reading it again, cousin? Rather spun out, but nevertheless an excellent book."

"I am so glad you like it."

He laughed. "You did not let me finish my sentence. An excellent book for the tradesmen of Lynton and Lynmouth, and livery stable keepers for miles round; for folks who sell tea and light refreshments. It brings shoals of Americans here every year. I don't like them myself, but they spend money. I must admit that."

Arthur was strolling along with his hands in his pockets. Alice took refuge in silence; but it was "pain and grief" to her. At last she said:

"Is that all you can see in the book?"

"Oh! there is nothing specially the matter with the story; but when Blackmore called it a 'romance' he spoke the truth. Is there anything here in this very pretty—I grant you that—but quite homely landscape which suggests Carver Doone and all the rest of them? Why, you can walk into the valley and out of it as easily as you can say 'Jack Robinson.'"

Alice after this talked on different subjects. Arthur Challice, with his scalpel of commonsense, had dissected her body of romance. Later she appealed to Carderel, and found much more sympathy.

"It is the fashion here," he said, "to run down Blackmore. I suppose it is the inevitable reaction from having the book so much talked about. Nevertheless, I believe in it, allowing for the change of times, customs, and climate."

Alice stooped and gathered a fern from the very brink of Bagworthy Water. Her attitude showed her shapely grace of form.

"I shall always keep these ferns—I hope they will live—in memory of the most beautiful place I have ever seen, and the happiest day I have ever spent."

She looked up suddenly, and met John Carderel's gaze fixed upon her with such a sad, hungry look she never forgot it.

In a moment he had banished it all from his face. He had reassumed the mask we all wear, at any rate in public.

Had Alice Lorraine overheard one or two remarks May Challice had confided to John's ears as they walked up the Doone Valley, she might have had a key to the look she had observed. May had said, "I should not be surprised if cousin Alice leaves us soon. In fact, I wonder she has stayed so long."

"Why?" he had exclaimed. "She seems to be happy here, and enjoying herself particularly."

"Ah! but," the girl answered, "when there is a special attraction elsewhere, even places like this are at a discount."

"But Miss Lorraine is not engaged. At any rate, she does not wear a ring."

"There are such things as tacit engagements," May suggested.

John Carderel was silent.

CHAPTER II.

A FORTNIGHT passed. Alice Lorraine showed no signs of being in a hurry to depart, a condition of mind which May had evolved out of her inner consciousness. She was daily drawn nearer to grave John Carderel. His strength of mind and character attracted her. There was a virile fibre running through his nature, which instinct told her was rare. In addition, there was a sympathy of outlook between them, an accordance of taste in little things as well as in great, which made for friendship, at any rate, if for nothing more.

May Challice saw this growing appreciation on the part of her beautiful cousin. It chafed her spirit, and robbed her of her habitual good temper. At the same time it surprised her. She could not understand John's appreciation for Alice, nor the latter's feeling for him—if, indeed, it existed, of which she was sceptical for a long time. May thought him ugly. She quite acquiesced in the match as advantageous in every way for herself. It would give her a first-rate establishment, more than ample means, and a position second to none in their social world. The acceptance of John Carderel as a husband was a necessary part of a whole. She quite appreciated that fact. Nevertheless, when she went out anywhere with him she would always feel a sense of apology. She would be the wife of a man plain to the verge of ugliness. The apologetic attitude on either side is not a commendable ingredient in matrimony. Nevertheless, she was far from welcoming the idea that anyone else should displace her in the position she had regarded for a long time as indisputably her own.

One night May went into Alice's room in her dressing-gown. The maid was brushing her mistress's hair. It fell in a beautiful cascade about her shoulders. When her cousin entered Alice dismissed the girl, taking the brush into her own hand. May talked of various things, waiting her opportunity. Presently she said :

"I shall want you to come and visit us again, cousin."

"Of course ! I have had a very happy stay, and the place is simply lovely."

"I mean on a special occasion. Of course, you know John Carderel and I are to be married some day."

The brush had stopped. After a pause it went on again.

"I did not know you and Mr. Carderel were engaged. I congratulate you. He is——"

"As plain as they make them, and as good. Yes ; I know his virtues and his defects. We are not engaged in so many words ; but the affair was arranged, I believe, in our cradles. At any rate, I was in mine. John was, I expect, a grave, good boy at the time who ate no taffies * and eschewed marbles. He is ten years older than I am."

That night Alice faced her own feelings, and decided that the only thing left for her to do was to return to her Surrey home. John Carderel had come into her heart to stay. To see him daily, under existing conditions, was torture. Distance and time were the only allies the brave girl could summon to her aid.

She announced her intention the following morning to Mrs. Challice, and, in spite of some polite opposition, adhered to her determination to leave the next day.

"If you really must go," May said, "we shall have to make our expedition to-day to the sands between Lee Abbey and Lynmouth. It is a case of now or never."

Alice had been very anxious to take home some shells and seaweed as mementoes of her visit ; but other expeditions had come in the way hitherto. Now her wish for mementoes had passed. She had got one which would last her the rest of her life. Nevertheless, she hailed the proposition with satisfaction. It would, at least, keep them out of the way of John Carderel. Perhaps May had thought so, too ?

An early lunch was arranged, so as to give them a longer afternoon. They went down to Lynmouth by the cliff railway. It was a glorious day. The tide was low. The long line of breakers, far out towards the Welsh coast, gleamed white and glistening in the sun's rays.

Neither of the girls was in sympathy with the bright environment. Alice had to summon all her courage to keep up appearances. She failed, of course, to deceive her companion. As regards May, the reaction had set in. She had carried her point of separating these two who, she knew, loved one another. Now she was asking herself, Was the game worth the candle ? For, after all, though she wanted to marry John Carderel, she did not love him. The thought that someone else had won him touched her to the quick. Vanity and jealousy, not love, were the levers of what she had done.

They went along the beach until the sands were reached, where, alone in this district, the rarer shells are to be found. Here they separated. May had armed herself with a novel in which she was deeply interested. Alice was glad to be alone with her own misery, to be able to shut herself off from the companionship which, most of all at that moment, galled her spirit.

Mechanically she looked for shells for awhile, scooping up the sand and sifting it for the smaller specimens. Thus she wandered on past a headland. The sun was hot. She had slept but little the previous night. Up by the side of the cliff was some sloping sand in a shaded corner. Alice rested here, and before she was aware had fallen asleep.

A couple of hours passed. She awoke with a start. The sky was overcast. Rain was

* Devonshire for sweets.

"There were arms about her, but they were human enough."—p. 942.

beginning to fall; a few drops, the precursors of a shower, falling on her face and neck, had been the cause of her rousing.

Alice jumped up. The breakers, no longer flecked with sunlight, but dark and ominous, had come up close to her. The tide, which runs very rapidly on this coast, had already covered all the sand of the little bay while she had lain asleep. She was girt in by a ring of waters. Escape round either headland was now impossible. She looked at the cliff, which rose three hundred feet above her. To attempt to scale it was out of the question.

She shouted again and again. There was no answer, except a mocking echo from the rock behind her, and from the screaming of the gulls circling over head.

The highest of the advancing waves drove her back. Still they came on. Now she could retreat no further. The sea, hungry for its prey, shut her in; the solid red sandstone was at her back; the tide surged about her feet, her ankles, her knees; her clothes began to swirl about in the water; she had to cling to a friendly ledge to save herself from falling headlong. In the distance a steamer was taking its leisurely course, the passengers and crew little dreaming of the tragedy being enacted near them that August afternoon.

Alice faced death. She prayed, and as she did so a great calm settled down on her spirit. The bitterness of parting from those she loved —one most of all, who was not hers—the fear of death which had gripped her heart, all this left her. She seemed lifted up in an ecstatic vision. The steamer was gone. What did it matter? The rain fell on her face. She did not heed it. The air seemed full of angels, hovering round her, ready to bear her up in their arms——

Yes, there were arms about her; but they were human enough, and virile. John Carderel lifted the fainting girl up into a boat, in which were May Challice, now bitterly contrite, and two fishermen.

May had been absorbed in her novel. When she roused herself the tide was nearly at the full. The headland round which Alice had heedlessly wandered was already shut in. Unless her cousin had gone back, which seemed improbable, she was in the most dangerous spot on the whole coast, where May knew that more than one visitor had been drowned.

What Alice had passed through was nothing compared with May's agonised feeling, as she ran back along the beach towards the boats in the little harbour. It was her gross carelessness which had brought this about. In addition, there was the sense of the wrong she had done, magnified tenfold by her conscience in this hour of peril.

John Carderel had been waiting for the girls on the beach. Seeing May running, with breathless apprehension written clearly on her face, his quick intuition had guessed the cause. Scrambling into a boat, they had started back at once at such a pace as perhaps no other boat on that coast had ever attained. John had forced the rowers along by the dominance of his own spirit.

Had it not been for him, Alice Lorraine must inevitably have been drowned.

In the afternoon of the following day John Carderel called at the Challices. In the morning May had written him a very contrite letter, full of self-accusation and of affectionate regard for these two, whom she had striven to separate, now brought together by the touchstone of peril. To Alice she had told all, and had fully convinced her that of real love, the true marriage bond, she had none for her brother's partner.

May met John in the hall. He greeted her with both hands. Her eyes were charged with unshed tears.

"You will forgive me, John? You do not know what I suffered during that terrible time, what I have suffered since. She is an angel. You are a very lucky man!" She smiled through her tears.

"May," he said, "we have always been the best of friends. We will always be that, and more."

So he passed into the room where Alice lay on a sofa. She had not slept through the night after her terrible ordeal. During the day she had been drowsy. When John came and stood over her Alice's eyes were closed. She was in a sub-conscious state between sleeping and waking. It seemed to her that she was in the middle of a beautiful dream, that a strong hand was leading her through the fairy palace of life.

Suddenly her eyelids lifted, and she saw Carderel bending over her. Then, without a word, he took her into his arms. His face was lit up. The plain man was made beautiful by his great love.

"I am very happy," she said. Then she looked at him shyly. "Are you—John?"

He knelt down by her side. His lips were very close to hers.

"I did not believe there was anything like it in the world."

THE ROMANCE OF PHILANTHROPY.

By the Rev. H. B. Freeman, M.A., Vicar of Burton-on-Trent.

SAVE for the watery glint of an occasional swinging lamp, the narrow streets of Paris, with their high, over-reaching roofs, would be dark upon a moonless night of the early seventeenth century. The rain lashed the pavements, and flowed into the evil-smelling kennels, as a young man made his way dauntlessly through the storm. His acute ear caught a human wail, keener, though feebler, than the groaning of the shutters in the wind. He beheld a harridan skulking upon a doorstep, with a child upon her lap, whose little limbs she was twisting into shapes of horrible deformity, that she might coin money from casual compassion. The wayfarer scourged the wretch with such words of fire as flamed easily upon the lips of Vincent de Paul, and tenderly conveyed the tiny victim to a rough house of shelter. It is hardly too much to say that from this horror, blazoned on the imagination of a loving and righteous man, arose the present care in civilised countries for helpless and ill-treated infancy. Through Vincent's influence, Louis XIV. was persuaded to establish the first Home for lost children in Paris.

Our next French picture has a widely different scene, but the same hero. The sun was shining on the golden sands of Marseilles as Vincent de Paul met an aged woman, who was weeping bitterly. To gratify a private spite, her son, upon whose earnings mother, wife, and children were dependent, had been seized for a galley-slave. An idea came to Vincent as he knelt down and prayed beside the fettered and miserable prisoner, whom he had sought out and tried to comfort. By his tears and the charm of his address, he won over the master of the galleys to allow him to put on the liberated slave's chains. As the rowers were known by numbers, not by names, personal identity did not matter.

"TENDERLY CONVEYED THE VICTIM TO A ROUGH HOUSE OF SHELTER."

For several weeks Vincent was fastened to the oar, and learnt the hard labours and terrible cruelties that such crushed creatures were forced to endure. Inquiries made by his friends led to his eventual rescue; and it is cheering to be able to add that the freedom of the man in whose stead he had suffered was presented to him as a boon. From the public indignation kindled by the fearful tale which Vincent had to tell, came a vast amelioration of the condition of galley-slaves in France.

Diverse in creed, nationality, and character, Vincent de Paul and John Howard, who lived about a hundred years later, were united by that message of "deliverance to the captives" which must always be divine. There is much that is romantic in the career of this eccentric reformer of the prisons of the world. His wretched health, his morbid scruples, and his lifelong diet of vegetables, with a little bread-and-butter and tea, stand in strange contrast with the fact that, amidst the filthiest plague-dens of England and the Continent, he seemed to bear a charmed life, and that on one occasion, when his ship was attacked by Barbary pirates, he dominated the frightened captain and crew, rammed a cannon to the muzzle with nails, and let fly to such good purpose that the corsairs sheered off. It may not be generally known that Howard had great repute abroad as a doctor. A Turk, whose daughter he cured at Constantinople, offered him a fee of nearly a thousand pounds, but he would only accept a handful of grapes from the grateful father's garden. It was his skill in medicine, rather than his passion for prison reform, which really brought Howard to his death. At Cherson, in Russia, he was induced to attend a fashionable young lady, who was sick of a fever. The summons was urgent, the night wet and cold, and he had to ride to his patient upon a dray-horse. Some sort of infection caught him at last. He soon afterwards died, fifteen hundred miles from home, with the wish upon his lips, "Place a sundial over my grave, and let me be forgotten." This was a singular end for one of the foremost figures in Europe—a man to whom monarchs had listened, who possessed the gratitude of millions, and whose funeral was one of the most magnificent of his generation.

Prosaic in their actual working as must be many of the big modern organisations for the alleviation of poverty and pain, some of them have their misty beginnings upon the borderlands of romance, where the mythical and the actual meet. As we survey his sepulchre in the Church of St. Bartholomew the Great, or look upon the imposing pile of his hospital, our thoughts travel back to that Rahere who is first heard of as a layman, at the wild court of William Rufus, and who is asserted by some to have been a minstrel and a jester. During a pilgrimage to Rome he fell ill, at that still notorious haunt of malarial fever, the legendary burying-place of St. Peter and St. Paul, and vowed on his recovery to build that hospital "yn recreacion of poure men," of which St. Bartholomew is said to have designated Smithfield as the site. Seven hundred years later the Royal Free Hospital owed its conception, we are told, to the circumstance that a surgeon saw a poor, destitute girl lying upon the steps of St. Andrew's Church, Holborn. She was friendless, a stranger to London, and died unrecognised; but the popular grief for her sad plight had a beneficent and far-reaching result. The locality of another great hospital is connected with one of the loveliest stories in English history, for it was the cross at Charing, which Edward I. erected in memory

> "Of her who knew that Love can vanquish Death,
> Who kneeling, with one arm about her king,
> Drew forth the poison with her balmy breath,
> Sweet as new buds in spring."

"Men shall remember ever," sang Mortimer Collins in one of his less-known lilting lyrics, "how the King loved Eleänore."

It is interesting to remark that three of the greatest fiction-weavers of all time have irradiated certain aspects of British philanthropy with the glamour of their genius. The Charterhouse, which Fuller called that "masterpiece of Protestant English charity," has been immortalised by Thackeray in "The Newcomes." It was there that Colonel Newcome said "Adsum" when his name was called for the last muster. It is, perhaps, worthy of note that a friend of the writer's, the present Vicar of Littlemore, who is an old Charterhouse boy, took Thackeray to call upon the "Poor Brother," from whom the idea for this famous character was almost certainly derived. The Charity House of Richard Watts at Rochester, founded in 1579, to lodge for one night "six poor travellers, not being rogues or proctors," forms the motive of one of the Christmas books of Charles Dickens. A Yule supper is given to the company by a host (probably meant to be the novelist), who makes up the seventh traveller, and the toast he proposes is: "Christmas Eve, my friends, when the shepherds, who were poor travellers too, in their way, heard the angels sing 'On earth peace, good will toward men.'"

Sir Walter Scott, in "The Fortunes of Nigel," has drawn an incisive and elaborate picture of George Heriot, the splendid goldsmith and money-lender, from whose munificent bequest Heriot's Hospital in Edinburgh was reared. While not beyond reproach in his private life, "Jingling Geordie," as James I. is made to dub him, had large ideas as to the responsibilities of riches. The consort of James, Anne of Denmark, once owed him as much as forty thousand pounds; so Royalty made him jingle to some tune. "For the wealth God has sent me," Scott represents Heriot as exclaiming, "it shall not want inheritors while there are orphan lads in Auld Reekie." Many a poor Scotch student has had cause to bless the jingling of this grand court jeweller's guineas.

"SAW A POOR DESTITUTE GIRL LYING UPON THE STEPS."

What romances, if they were not mercifully hidden behind silent lips, or beneath sad and shameful graves, could be written, during the two and a half centuries of its existence, of the Foundling Hospital! The zeal of these successors of Vincent de Paul was occasionally greater than their discretion. It was disastrously decided, for instance, at an early period, to accept any child that might be presented. One hundred and seventeen infants were the result of the first day's open doors. To this unfortunate experiment belong many curious tales. Parish authorities, sometimes with the connivance of a brutal father, would rob a weak mother of her new-born child to rid themselves of the cost of its keep. A most undesirable and frequently fatal trade was established, as far as three hundred miles from London, of conveying children for admittance. A father, on trial at Monmouth for the murder of his infant, which had been found drowned, proved that he had given a guinea to a travelling tinker on condition that the child should be deposited at the Foundling.

A fellow, with five babies in a basket, fell into a drunken sleep on a common, and in the morning three out of the five were dead. Only one out of a party of eight children who were brought out of the country reached Hatton Garden alive, and the survivor owed its life to the despairing mother, who fed it at intervals as she followed the waggon on foot. A suspicious-looking traveller from Yorkshire was questioned as to his freight at Highgate, and confessed, "I have two children for the Foundling in each of my horse's panniers. Once I used to get eight guineas for the trip, but now another man has set up against me, and has lowered my price." Even when the luckless atoms were not starved or murdered, the rapacity of their conductors often put them into the receptacle at the gate without a rag of clothing. There was an amusing consequence of this when a foundling, who had prospered in the world and had become a rich banker in the North, desired in his old age to learn his origin. The books of the institution, when overhauled, only bore witness to the extreme inadequacy of his toilet on admission.

We read such entries as these, about the middle of the eighteenth century, and we wonder what tragedies of a hapless mother's love or remorse may lie behind them: "A male child, about two months old, with white dimity sleeves, lined with white, and tied with red ribbon." Or, again: "A female child, aged about six weeks, with a blue figured ribbon, and purple and white printed sleeves, turned up with red and white." The clerk who made the following laconic entry does not give one the idea of being a sentimentalist: "A paper on the breast, clout over the head."

Notes have been found tied to the garments of children, asking the country nurse to tell her name and place of abode to the mother. Mothers have attended baptisms in chapel to hear the name given, and have tried to preserve recollection of the features by frequenting the Sunday dinner. Before now a mother, who has come to chapel to return thanks for kindness to her dead child, has been informed that the object of her lamentation has a hearty appetite and is in a particularly flourishing condition.

"HE WATCHED THE UNREGARDING CROWDS FLIT BY."

Elements of the pathetic or the picturesque may be discovered in the initiation of many latter-day projects for the lightening of the burdens of human penury or woe. The earliest colony of mercy for the care of epileptics was started, about the middle of the last century, amid the primitive Germans of Westphalia. There is shown, beneath the boughs of a quiet beechwood, the grave of a peasant who had been blind for sixty years. This pioneer spent his dark life in journeying from village to village, teaching the people to pray; and in the days before railroads he adventured as far as Berlin, to intercede with the King for the despatch of some messengers of Glad Tidings. When the simple country folk learnt about the Master, they desired to do good as He did, and blind William Heermann received loving shelter in his old age from the colony which his prayers had created.

But there is no example of what might almost be called "the romance of prayer" which can be compared with the work which the late George Müller wrought in his orphan homes at Bristol. This extraordinary enthusiast certainly reversed most popular methods of charitable appeal, inasmuch as when his financial needs were sorest he always refused to state his difficulties, either publicly or privately, lest such disclosure should argue lack of faith in God. The more straitened he was in his enormous enterprises the more reticent he felt he must be. Müller asserted that he could trace fifty thousand distinct answers to his special prayers. The dinner at one of his houses was once delayed for half an hour because there was no money to pay for the food; but a remittance came before the thirty minutes were up. "Our riches are in a bank which cannot break," was the light-hearted answer of a matron to an admiring visitor at a moment when there was not a penny in hand. And the visitor put down five pounds. We are assured that these deliverances, and many like them, are not romance, but reality; and we appreciate the homely hyperbole on Müller of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon: "That man gets from the Almighty just whatever he chooses to ask for."

"Yours in the Lord's service," replied Mr. William Quarrier, with a signature perhaps not quite as firm as it was forty years ago, when we wrote to ask him to tell us something about the rise of those extensive homes for destitute lads and lassies which are one of the glories of Glasgow.* Probably Mr. Quarrier did not read Latin, for one of his grandchildren, on being scolded for idleness, is reported to have answered his mother: "See how grandpapa has got on, and he never had any education!" But if he knew his Virgil, Dido's dictum, "I have suffered myself, and therefore I know how to help others," would have suited him well. As a fatherless boy, he used to drudge at pin-making ten or twelve hours a day for a shilling a week. He thought he must have been seven or eight years of age; but he remembered better that he had eaten no food for thirty-six hours, when he stood one afternoon on the pavement of High Street, Glasgow, and watched the unregarding crowds flit by. He was conscious that there then came into his forlorn and childish heart the first dim longing to do something, if God should prosper him in business, for wastrels as neglected as himself. What this noble Scotch shoemaker accomplished may be witnessed by those who will visit his homes, two miles beyond the Bridge of Weir.

Quarrier believed in the ministry of beauty more than did good George Müller; and his gabled orphanages, in their pleasant grounds with trees and lake, are fair as a garden of the Lord.

There is a piquancy in contrasts; the rich and aristocratic youth of England, in shining "toppers" and Eton jackets, by the slopes of Windsor, and street Arabs, parodies on civilisation, ignorant as savages, vicious and verminous, shivering beneath the old Adelphi arches, till the bull's-eye of the "slop" upon his beat remorselessly bids them move on. Quintin Hogg knew both sides of our national picture, and he did not spare the Rembrandt tints. When he left Eton, with every glowing prospect of the world before him, he felt as though he should go mad if he did not devote his best energies to the succour of these outcasts of humanity. He has told us how he herded as a shoeblack with shoeblacks, sleeping on barges or under tarpaulins, holding horses, or doing any odd jobs which might make him one with the boys.

From his first Ragged School, to which five pupils came absolutely naked, except for their mothers' shawls, grew by slow, but logical, degrees, the myriad-featured Polytechnic, with its fifteen thousand members. In that most successful centre of Christian help and service the President was found dead in his bath after a long day's toil at his chosen task. And when, within a few hours, the lads assembled for their Sabbath offering of prayer and praise, the eyes were closed that had so often shone with sympathy, and the heart of the friend of the friendless was still.

As we range over the many and varied deeds of charity and goodness which God has put it into the hearts of His people to do, and as we delight to realise that what is useful may be sometimes beautiful or romantic, our memories go back at parting to that happy manifestation of unselfish love which brightened one of the Redeemer's longest and weariest days, in hard and faithless old Jerusalem; when a certain poor widow, unknown and yet immortal, cast into the treasury those two mites which make a farthing—"all the living that she had."

A ROMANCE OF OLD FRANCE.

By Christopher Hare, Author of "Dreams to Sell," Etc.

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—XXVI.

The story opens in the reign of Louis XIV. Yvonne de la Féronniere, heiress of an old Huguenot family, is being educated in the famous Abbaye-aux-Bois. Her school friend, Gabrielle de Beaumanoir, marries the Duc de Maillebois, and at the wedding Yvonne meets Réné, the young Chevalier de Beaumanoir. They are mutually attracted to each other, and their friendship ripens into love. They meet again at the Palace of Versailles when King Louis receives the Doge of Genoa. Yvonne's guardian, the Marquis de Vaudreuil, abruptly removes her from the Abbaye-aux-Bois to his own house, where reigns an atmosphere of wordliness and frivolity. Mdlle. de la Féronniere is a great heiress, and no effort is spared to make her become a Roman Catholic, and to compel her to marry her cousin, Adolphe de Vaudreuil. She is driven to extremity by the Abbé de Chaylus. Then follows the revocation of the Edict of Nantes and the persecution of the Huguenots, and Yvonne disappears. Meanwhile Réné de Beaumanoir has sailed from Toulon in command of La Topaze to redeem captives from Barbary. M. de la Forêt, the Huguenot pastor, goes with him to offer himself in exchange for one of his own people. Adventures with the Dey of Algiers follow, and M. de la Forêt completes his sacrifice. Réné has a narrow escape, and returns post-haste to Paris as soon as he lands. He searches for Yvonne, even to the dungeons of La Bastille, but she has been carried off secretly by her guardian, as she will not renounce her faith.

CHAPTER XXVII.

IT was, indeed, by a strange combination of circumstances that Mademoiselle de la Féronniere found herself alone in a posting tavern of the ancient city of Orleans. Ever full of suspicion, and a lover of crooked ways, Yvonne's uncle left her in ignorance of his intentions. She knew nothing of his return to Paris, or of her own destination, but had some vague idea that he was called away on private business and would resume his charge of her the next day.

Yet there was relief and joy in the thought that, even for a brief while, she would be free of his dreaded presence. She would be well guarded, of course, but even a change of gaoler was a gain. The young girl breathed more freely when she found herself in the little room which had been carefully prepared for her, with an assurance that it had an outside bolt. It was meanly and scantily furnished, and the only sign of pretension was a piece of faded tapestry, nailed up at the farther end. This caught her eye at once, and the landlady, who had ushered her in with a dim lantern, began hastily, in a tone of apology:

"Mademoiselle will pardon me, but the two serving wenches must pass through her chamber to their garret beyond. See; this is the little door," and she lifted up the tapestry to show it. "They will be nigh at hand if Mam'selle needs service in the night."

Yvonne made no demur, but when she had responded to a friendly good-night, and was once more alone, she had time to form her plans. It was quite plain that, if the maids slept in the inner room, the outside bolt would not be used, as they would have to rise betimes. So she resolved to sit up until the maids had gone to bed, and then barricade the door from the inside. The moonlight was shining through the narrow casement; and as she leant out on the sill she could look down into the court-yard, now quiet and deserted since the guests had ridden away, save for a sleepy stable-boy, who closed the yard door with a bang behind him as he went out into the street beyond.

The girl smiled as the thought occurred to her that this must be an honest place where bolts and bars seemed so little in request. Then a sudden idea set the hot blood wildly throbbing, and she flushed scarlet in the darkness, all agape at her own audacity.

Was not here a way of escape pointed out to her by the finger of a kind Providence? What should hinder her from stealing out at daybreak through a sleeping house, to face the outside world, and make a bold stroke for freedom? She had all to gain and nothing to lose, for she knew that her kinsman had no mercy and that the worst awaited her.

The bold design once conceived, all the details seemed to map themselves out without conscious effort on her part.

First, she must quietly creep into that small pallet bed in the corner behind the blue-striped curtains, and feign slumber, to arouse no suspicion when the serving girls had to pass through her chamber. Never had the time passed so slowly. The clock in the church tower, which seemed almost over her head, chimed the quarters with relentless zeal, and was answered on all sides by the echoing bells, which jarred through the city as though it had nothing else to do but to keep time.

Still she listened in wakeful restlessness, until at length a faint sound caught her ear—a muffled tread on the stairs. Her door was softly opened, then closed again, and she held her breath as she heard the dull thud of slippered heels across the floor. A latch clicked and they were gone, for through the thin partition she could hear suppressed giggling and chattering for a while, until by degrees it died away and their heavy breathing assured her that they slept.

Then, after the emotions of the day, drowsiness slowly overcame her, and even the clanging bells rang out unheeded and had no power to disturb that peaceful slumber at the very crisis of her fate.

It was still dark when Yvonne awoke with a start to full consciousness; but the blackness had already given way to the dull grey of a cloudy dawn, and as she rose in haste and peered out of the garret window she could faintly distinguish high-peaked roofs and ghostly church towers through the mist.

She did not linger in the borderland between sleeping and waking, for there was not a moment to lose, and all the plans which she had made over-night rose sharp and clear before her mind. She carefully concealed beneath her simple black gown the precious satchel which contained all she possessed—this girl, who but a few days before had been a great heiress. She had thought of everything, even to the fact that her silver-grey travelling cloak had a lining of fine black camlet. This garment, worn on the reverse side, would be a complete disguise, shrouding her in nun-like fashion, with the hood closely drawn round her face.

Yvonne breathed a silent prayer, unlatched the door, and passed out. The landing was dark, and she had to feel her way along the wall until she reached the staircase, where the worm-eaten boards creaked beneath her feet and seemed to shriek the alarm at every step.

When she reached the ground floor, and trod on the uneven stone pavement, for a moment her heart failed her. In the pitch blackness she could distinguish nothing, and she had forgotten the way out. Only by groping about with the tips of her fingers was she able, after a while, to find the door and push back the heavy bolts with a grating sound which seemed loud enough to wake the sleeping household.

At length the girl drew a deep breath of relief, as she crossed the threshold and stood outside the door, which she managed to latch behind her, when the sharp yelp of a dog near at hand warned her that she was not yet out of danger. The sound smote her with terror, for instant discovery and pursuit might follow, and she knew not which way to flee. Fortune had favoured her so far that she had left the inn by the way which led into the open square, and, remembering that she must have driven in from the north, she resolved to turn her hasty steps in the opposite direction.

Only by slow degrees was a great purpose shaping itself in her mind—that her forlorn pilgrimage should have for its end and aim her own dear home in Poitou. Surely she was not forgotten there, and kind hearts would remember and be good to her. Yet, alas! at that moment she knew that it was far off and remote as heaven.

A leaden sky hung low and threatening, and the kindly mist enfolded her as she passed on between tall houses, which stooped forward across the narrow street, almost touching at the eaves.

Already the world of labour was awakening; but, to her joy, the men and women she met gave her scarce a passing glance. Mostly slow of step and bent with the heavy burden of life, curiosity had died within them, and their dull eyes sought the ground rather than the faces of their neighbours. As a Sister of Mercy she would probably excite no notice, and in defiance of all caution Yvonne resolved, with a sudden impulse, to put her disguise, involuntary as it was, to the test.

A lad was coming up the paved street with a low milk cart drawn by two shaggy brown dogs. She picked out the smallest coin in her purse, and going boldly up to him she asked him for a drink of milk. The young country fellow touched his cap loutishly, and, filling a pewter bowl, handed it to her with a few words in unfamiliar patois, which she made out to be:

"V'là, ma sœur, you are welcome."

Never had she enjoyed anything so much as that simple meal, and as she went lightly on her way she could have sung aloud for very joy and triumph. But she had not gone far before a fresh alarm reminded her of her perilous position. A night watchman, shambling along with his bell in his hand, met her at the corner of a by-alley, and turned abruptly to stare after her, with a lowering brow full of suspicion. He was a gnarled old man, with small, vigilant eyes, and Yvonne grew hot beneath his peering gaze. Yet she had the courage to slacken her pace, and even pause for a moment, when she understood that it was but the man's dim sight He had thought to recognise a familiar face, and turned away disappointed.

The danger had passed, but it left her heart throbbing; and, looking up, she saw before her the magnificent carved porch of the Cathedral of Sainte Croix. The old sacristan had just unlocked the side door, and was fumbling with his keys. Moved by a quick impulse, she followed him, and the leathern curtain fell back heavily behind her. For a moment she stood faltering and uncertain in the great, dim silence; then, guided by taper lights burning before some shrine, she found her way to a secluded corner, where she could rest on the marble steps of a side chapel, hidden from view behind one of the great pillars.

The calm and stillness of that vast solitude was soothing beyond words to her troubled spirit; and as she sat there, shrouded in gloom, and gazed with wistful eyes into the fathomless shadows beyond, all the prayers and supplications of past ages seemed to echo around from those silent walls which had heard so much.

In her simpler creed the Huguenot girl asked for no splendid ritual, no mediating saints, no mitred priest in raiment of fine needlework and wrought gold to unlock the gate of heaven; but in some mysterious way she felt that hers was, in truth, no alien faith. The same eternal heritage of need and sorrow was her mortal heritage, she worshipped the same God, and here in His temple she cast herself before Him in abasement and passionate devotion.

When she raised her eyes once more the dim morning light had found its way through stained glass windows into the great cathedral, and she became vaguely conscious that she was no longer alone. A few shadowy figures were kneeling in prayer, scattered here and there about the aisles and side chapels, and there was coming and going, to and fro, behind the stone columns which protected her.

Presently she caught sight of a slow procession, passing up the broad central aisle, to the rhythm of a solemn dirge chanted by deep voices, the "Libera Me." Followed by a crowd of men and women, and even little barefooted children, it entered into the chapel behind the choir. Drawn by some involuntary attraction, Yvonne pressed forward, and saw the eastern light gilding the tall crosier, carried aloft and shining on the priest at the altar, as a bier, covered with a black pall, was lowered at his feet.

Then she heard a voice near her asking whose funeral it might be, and the whispered reply struck her with shuddering horror.

"Nay; this is no dead man's burial, but a living leper, who is cut off from the world this day and set apart for a death in life."

In a kind of stupefied trance the girl heard the whole thrilling office of the dead—the rich, full voice which intoned the words of invocation, the chanted responses, and the swinging of incense, when the waves of fragrant smoke dimmed the altar. She scarcely knew it had come to an end until she saw the congregation pass one by one before the bier, sprinkling the leper with holy water. Again the funeral procession was formed, and, with the cross still going in front of the priest in his robes, the bier was raised and borne down the church.

XUM

Moved by some instinct of awed sympathy, Yvonne followed from afar, too much absorbed in the interest of this tremendous drama to take thought of the risk of discovery to herself.

On it passed, that strange, inhuman procession, out through the great portal of the cathedral, where the carved Christ, with outstretched loving hands and pitiful eyes looked down, out into the cold, clear light of day. Onwards went the bearers, faltering beneath their living burden, through the narrow streets, where men crossed themselves and women with pale faces fell on their knees. Ever onwards, they moved across the bridge, by the poorest part of the town, to a remote and unfrequented spot, lying near the river to the south.

Here, at Olivet, the funeral procession drew up before a low hovel, the leper's future home, where he must dwell alone until merciful death should release him.

As the pall was removed, and he rose trembling from the bier, clothed in his leper's garb, the priest gave to the wretched outcast gloves, clappers, and a bread bowl. Then, to complete the fearful symbolism, he cast on the hut a handful of earth from a graveyard, and the "De Profundis" was chanted.

"Dead to the world, be thou alive to God!" said the priest.

"This is thy sentence of deprivation:

"Thou art forbidden to enter any church, or market, or abode of men.

"Thou art forbidden to walk with naked feet, or to go out of thy dwelling without thy leper's garment and thy clappers to warn all the world to shun thee.

"Thou art forbidden to wash in any river, stream, or fountain.

"Thou art forbidden to make any answer, if thou art spoken to in the streets, until thou hast taken note of the direction of the wind.

"Thou art forbidden to eat and drink in any company, save that of lepers like thyself.

"Thou art forbidden to touch a child or give him aught.

"And I bid thee know that when thou diest thy body shall be buried in this cabin, and not in holy ground."

"She picked out the smallest coin in her purse."

The priest, having spoken these and many other terrible words, planted a wooden cross before the hut, and hung on it a box for alms, into which everyone present cast his mite.

Then the door was closed on the leper, and he was left to his awful lot, while the people dispersed, the men with downcast eyes and the women sobbing, for who knew when a like fate might overtake them?

Meantime, Yvonne had lingered on the outskirts of the crowd, and when it gradually melted away she stood for a while irresolute which way to turn; but at length, when the sound of footsteps had died slowly away along the path, she became conscious that she was not alone.

A lean, wrinkled old woman was crouched on the ground, rocking herself to and fro, and groaning in misery. Her faded hood had fallen back, and revealed her locks of scanty grey hair, which hung limp and uncared for. Years and sorrows had scarred her face with deep lines, and her eyes were dull and blurred with the bitter tears of old age, which had made furrows on her drawn, sallow cheeks. Her bare, withered arms were outstretched, with the elbows resting on her knees and the hands hanging stiffly forwards.

There was such an attitude of hopeless desolation about the whole figure that the girl's heart was touched to its inmost fibres.

As she came forward and stooped down by the woman's side, she caught the muttered words: "Oh, my son, my son!" And Yvonne knew that this must be the leper's mother.

No merciful unconsciousness had veiled from her eyes the last scene in that woeful tragedy. This daughter of the people had not fainted or fallen by the way, but with clear vision had drained to its last dregs the cup of agony. What a novitiate of long-drawn-out suffering must have been hers, leading up to this supreme moment of unutterable despair!

Yvonne's soul was flooded by a very passion of loving pity, and everything else in the world seemed to fade away into insignificance beside this poor creature's mighty need. Neighbours and friends all had turned away and left her afar in her desolation.

On this slight girl, a casual looker-on, a stranger of another creed, of another class, almost of another world, had fallen the burden of the Samaritan, when priest and Levite had passed by on the other side.

It was a bewildering revelation, even to herself, that the clarion call of duty should thus claim her instant obedience; that all thought of her own safety, of escape, of her distant home—all should be swallowed up in the overmastering impulse of charity.

One of that company, elect through all the ages, of waiting souls, she needed but to hear the Divine Word, "This is the way, walk ye in it," and thither straightway turned her willing steps.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE menace of the cloudy morning had been fulfilled, and the heavy mist had changed into a fine thick rain, which blotted out the distant landscape and seemed to enhance the dreariness of that lonely spot.

Yvonne de la Féronniere knelt down on the ground by the forlorn woman, still crouching at the foot of the cross, and pressed the cold, gnarled hands in her warm clasp. At the unlooked-for touch of sympathy the poor creature raised her eyes with the frightened, hunted look of some wild animal.

"Have you no one to care for you? Is there no friend whom I can seek?" asked a low, soft voice.

The leper's mother slowly shook her head and pointed with a trembling finger to the closed door of the hut.

"He was my only one; all the world to me!" she muttered, and sank back with a long, choking sigh.

"But you cannot abide here, my friend," persisted Yvonne. "Come with me. Together we will go to your home, and I will take care of you. Remember, you must live—for his sake!"

The words were spoken in a tone of authority which pierced the dulled brain. The woman made no resistance as she was gently raised from the ground and encouraged to lean on the arm of her new friend, whom she probably took for a Sister of Mercy. She was still shivering with the chilliness of misery; but instinctively she did as she was bidden, and led the way, with slow, uncertain steps, along the rough, tangled path by the river's side.

In silence they passed on beneath the bending willows and aspens quivering in the breeze, through rank ferns and dripping mosses, where the fallen leaves were too heavy with moisture to rustle beneath their feet. All was still and mute, save for the rhythmic wail of a moaning wood pigeon overhead.

For a while they followed the glimmering line of the river, seen through the branches; then they turned aside abruptly towards a thick clump of pollard thorn bushes. Here the girl could just distinguish a low, thatched roof, covered with thick, green moss and half hidden beneath clusters of wild clematis spread out like the tail feathers of a bird of Paradise. At the sight of her home the poor woman's deadened senses painfully revived, and, drawn by the force of use and custom, she took a faltering step towards the door and lifted the latch.

"Yvonne knew that this must be the leper's mother."

Yvonne looked with wondering eyes at the grim interior thus abruptly revealed, though for the first moment she could distinguish nothing clearly, as a peat fire had been left smouldering on the hearth and the place was dense with the smoke of it. Never had she beheld so wretched a dwelling. The uneven floor, like the walls, was of beaten clay, discoloured and stained in great patches with damp. There was scarcely any furniture beyond a rough wooden table and bench, and in one corner a heap of dry leaves and bracken, which had plainly done service as a bed. On a rude, blackened shelf near the fire were a few simple cooking utensils, earthen bowls, and pipkins; while a big brown pitcher, half full of water, stood against the door. On the table were fragments of black bread and a bowl of milk—remaining, doubtless, from the leper's last meal, thought the girl with an involuntary shudder.

But she was quick to perceive that these familiar objects appealed to his mother as nothing else had done. Now that she stood once more face to face with her old life, the fountain of her speech was loosened, and her long stifled rage and despair at length found words.

"They tore him from me," she hoarsely cried, "my poor Charlot, who had never harmed one of God's creatures! Think of it, ma sœur! I only asked to care for him and love him to the end."

Choked with sobs, she paused for a moment, while Yvonne soothed her with soft, low words of sympathy.

"Tell me all. When did your son's iliness begin? Have you dwelt here long alone with him?"

"Alas! that I should have sunk so low as to come to this miserable place!" she cried. "I, Marie Lecroy, who had a good home and a good husband, and was famed all over Orleans as the best embroiderer for church work in the city! Who but I was chosen to work the figure of St. Peter for the new banner of the cathedral? Ah, ma sœur, you would not think it now!" And she held out her poor coarse hand.

"I, too, can embroider a little, and I love the work!" exclaimed the young girl with a bright smile. "You shall teach me, and we will sit together at our needlework and earn money that you may buy for your son all that he needs."

"But I can no longer see the fine stitches, for my eyes are blinded with many tears since the troubles came," moaned the wretched Marie. There was a moment's pause, then she could not resist the craving of an over-burdened heart to pour forth its sad story.

"First, my poor husband died. He was of the dyers' guild, but our Charlot would never be apprenticed to his father's craft, and ever loved to rove the world. So he went to sea in company with a foreign merchant, and in some foreign port he must have caught that fearful malady. Then he came home to me, a lone widow, and when I knew the truth I sought to hide it from the world as I nursed and tended him; but my neighbours had dark suspicions, and after a while no one would give me work to do, and when there was no more money to pay our lodging they turned us out into the street.

"We wandered about till we found shelter here, far away beyond the ramparts, but even in this hovel they could not suffer us to die in peace together.

"The poor fellow would creep out to the river's side, and loved to sit there by the hour, and watch the ferry passing across down yonder. But in an evil hour there crossed over in the boat one of the city bailiffs, and he took notice of my Charlot. Then someone laughed: 'Know you not that it is the poor leper?'

"Then the fat bailiff swore at the ferryman for suffering my son to abide there, and warned him that the dread of infection would ruin his trade. Heaven avenge us on that cruel man!

"The next day he came with two barber-surgeons, and they saw Charlot and muttered together and signed a big parchment. Oh! it was all done according to law—and then—you know the rest!"

"But was there no refuge, no home for such sickness, such as there is in Paris—the St. Lazare?" asked the girl impulsively.

"There is no leper hospital now in Orleans. Old Jean, the ferryman, was sore troubled, but he could not ward off the blow," murmured the hapless mother, as she buried her face in her hands and rocked herself backwards and forwards, sobbing in agony.

Yvonne made no effort to restrain that outburst of emotion. She was wise enough to know that those healing tears would but relieve the soul from its crushing burden of grief.

From that hour began the young girl's life of lowly service. With full-couraged eyes she faced the task before her, and met it with a glad welcome. No labour was too wearisome, no petty household duties too menial, for this tenderly nurtured lady of a noble house. She fetched water in a pitcher from the river, gathered together sticks for kindling the fire, and swept and cleaned—not without a thrill of relief that all the poor leper's belongings, to his bed, his cup, and platter, had been removed to his hut.

Often when in the evening she poured broth into the two earthen bowls from the black pot which had been simmering all day over the fire, she thought with a smile how different it was from the cookery in which she had received such dainty lessons at the Abbaye-aux-Bois.

The bare upper chamber beneath the thatched roof, only reached by a sort of ladder from the living room, was henceforth her lodging. From the low, unglazed window she could look out on the glimmering line of the river, tinted like an opal in the moonlight, and crossed by dim, shadowy reflections. With wistful eyes she gazed into the far-off distance, which veiled all that she held dear; and the thought that Réné might be watching the same glorious silvery light on those Southern seas seemed to bring him very near, and to strengthen her longing heart with new-born hope.

But ere many days had passed there came a change of which she was slow to realise the grave import. Marie Lecroy, when the first violence of her passionate sorrow had worn away, gradually sank into a state of dull apathy and stupor. The shock of final separation, the shame and ignominy of that last scene when, before her very eyes, her death-stricken son had been banned by book and bell, and set apart in his living tomb—all this had been too much for the poor creature's endurance.

The poisoned shaft had pierced her heart, and when once all hope was quenched within her she fell a ready victim to the malarial fever ever haunting that low river side. She would spend long hours crouching by the fireside in gloomy silence, until there came a time when she had no longer strength to creep so far.

"Go, seek hunchbacked Jean; he will help," gasped the sick woman as she lay shivering on her pallet; then her eyes closed, and she sank back into unconsciousness.

In anxious haste Yvonne did her bidding, and went in search of the old ferryman, who had already befriended her in many ways, for without his help she could not have obtained the necessaries of life. He was her one link with the outside world.

In this hour of her extremity the young girl, awed by the sense of her own ignorance, looked up to the old man as an oracle. He told her of herbs and simples, which she duly prepared; but when these failed she listened with a doubting heart to the strange and gruesome remedies which he had to offer. He had his way, for she dared not demur in a case of life and death, but all was of no avail to poor Marie. She grew hourly worse, and, as the fever waxed, became wandering and delirious, until at length Yvonne, in despair, made one last appeal to her friend.

"Will you not fetch some learned physician from the city? I have money to pay him," she pleaded, for her little store was not yet exhausted.

But the hunchback shook his head, and put aside the suggestion with scorn.

"Believe me, she will but die the sooner for his nostrums. Her days are numbered, my poor Madame Lecroy—glory be to Mary and the saints!—for her heart is broken. I have seen death in many forms, and know the signs of his coming. Nay; it is a priest she needs, ma sœur, and when I cross the river again I will send word to the priest of Saint Eustache."

With a sudden impulse, the girl turned to him.

"You call me 'ma sœur,' but I am no nun, as you think me, good Jean!" she cried. "What will you say when you learn that I am a Huguenot, a fugitive?"

"Hush, hush, Mademoiselle," he interrupted hastily. "Tell me nothing. I only know that you are an angel sent by God Himself," and with that he turned abruptly away and set forth on his errand of mercy.

Yvonne never knew how she lived through the long, grey hours of that night. It was a terrible ordeal to keep her lonely vigil and to watch by the sick bed when the sands of life were slowly ebbing away and she was powerless to save.

Again and again there came a pitiful cry of "Charlot, mon Charlot!" and as it echoed through the stillness of the night there sprang up in the girl's heart a wild desire to go forth and fetch the leper to bid his mother a last farewell.

But, awed by the sense of her responsibility, she dared not leave her charge untended; and still the time passed, each minute an eternity, and no one came. There was no help on earth, but the gates of heaven were always open. As she knelt down by the sick bed and prayed aloud the sound of her voice brought a sense of human sympathy and comfort to the dying woman. She stretched out her hands yearningly, and looked up with shining eyes.

Then, softly at first and gaining courage as she went on, Yvonne sang one of those old canticles which had brought hope and strength to so many departing souls:

"L'ombre et l'obscurité
Couvrent sa Majesté,
Ses divins jugements
Sont les sûrs fondements
De son trône . . ." *

The girl had left the door open, forgetting all fear in the urgency of her need; but she was so engrossed in her service of song that she did not catch the sound of approaching footsteps until they reached the threshold; then, turning with a sudden start, she saw by the flickering rushlight that the priest had come. He was a big, portly man, with a ruddy, good-tempered face, a great contrast to the crippled figure of the old ferryman as the two stood together in the open doorway, with the first dim, grey light of dawn behind them.

"Stretched out her hands yearningly and looked up with shining eyes."

The young girl instinctively drew aside as the priest took his place by the death-bed—to him so familiar a scene—and began the last rites of the Church. But he was too late; already a grey film was stealing over the upraised eyes, the choking breath had failed.

Old Jean bent forward and raised the head; and as Yvonne caught sight of the drawn features, stamped with austere beauty by the ennobling hand of pain, she leant back against the wall, dazed and quivering.

The priest had ended his benediction to the departing soul, when he turned his shrewd, piercing eyes upon the young girl.

* "Clouds and darkness are round about Him; righteousness and judgment are the foundation of His throne."—Psalm xcvii. (Revised Version).

"Mademoiselle, I do not ask to know your secret," he said in a low, clear voice. "Yours has been a noble work of charity for this poor woman; but I heard you singing as I entered, and the words betrayed you."

He paused, and she bowed her head in assent. The worst might happen, but she would not deny her faith.

"I am no bigot, and would serve you, if I may," he continued. "There are not too many of your sort on this earth. Now listen to me. You are in danger, and each moment the peril draws nearer, for death holds a pomp of its own and demands attendants. Strangers will come here in a few hours, and will look on you with curious, unfriendly eyes. Depart while there is time. My friend Jean will help you, and the river is a safe highway. Farewell, my child, and may Heaven shield you."

"Brightly Gleams our Banner."

Words by T. J. POTTER. Music by ROLAND ROGERS, Mus.D. Oxon. (Late Organist of Bangor Cathedral.)

"We spend our years as a tale that is told."—PSALM xc. 9.

WE have in this psalm a contrast between the eternity of God and the transitoriness of all created things. Before the mountains, before the foundations of the earth were laid, even "from everlasting to everlasting," He was God. With Him "a thousand years are but as yesterday." Man's days are but "threescore years and ten"; his life is like "a tale that is told."

What, then, is a tale? In what respects is it like the life of man?

1. A tale is the product of the imagination. Even what children love to call "true tales" need imagination in the teller and the hearer. Facts may be so presented to the mind that they produce no impression. The teller needs the gift of imagination if he is to put his facts vividly, in due proportion, and in such a way that they become real to the hearer. The hearer needs imagination if he is to receive the impression the tale is intended to convey. Is it not so in human life? We are told that "the old live in the past, the middle-aged in the present, the young in the future." And this is partly true. The old do largely live in the past; but in a green, vigorous, old age the present is by no means out of sight, nor does the future fail to bear its part in "the fever called living." God has mercifully so constituted us that we are always looking forward to something, otherwise life would lose its interest. I have known an old lady of eighty who built a new house for herself with the full expectation of living there long enough to repay the trouble and the cost.

Nor is it true that the middle-aged live only in the present. The man of business exercises his imagination—hard-headed, practical, unimaginative as he may fancy himself to be. We see it in such phrases as "a long-headed, a far-sighted man." The men who make their mark in politics and business are those who can see beyond the present moment. They do not forget the past and its lessons, nor do they fail to see that the present conditions the future.

As for children, they live largely in the region of the imagination. Shakespeare tells us that "the poet is of imagination all compact"; he "gives to airy nothing a local habitation and a name." Children are your true poets. To the little girl her doll is a living thing. She pets it or punishes it in the full assurance that it is pleased by the one mode of treatment and saddened by the other. To the little boy his rocking-horse is a fiery charger. Listen to children at play, and you soon learn that they live mainly in the region of the imagination.

Is it not true of us all that it is not the facts of life, but what we think of them, which makes the happiness or misery of our existence? You sometimes see a face that tells of indwelling peace. You cannot doubt that such a face belongs to one who has "fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us" in "the gospel of the grace of God." Whoever, looking "not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen," learns to endure, lives in the region of the imagination, it is true, but not in an unreal world. We can only conquer evil, and find the help we need each hour, as we see by faith Him Who is the author and finisher of our salvation.

When I say that life, like a tale, is the product of the imagination, I only affirm that in its deepest depths life depends much more on what people call the imaginary than on what they call the real. Religion would be impossible to creatures unendowed with imagination.

2. Again, a tale is a thing of passing interest. The most interesting story one ever heard or read becomes tiresome by constant repetition. There are, indeed, some stories which will bear repetition. This is eminently true of Bible stories; but we are all sadly conscious that we hear or read these stories without feeling as we ought their force, when they are very familiar, unless some fresh experience in our own lives brings to them new meaning. In the case of ordinary stories we know how stale they soon become.

So life loses its interest. Not always for ourselves. No doubt the keen, vivid interest of life when we are young dies down in some degree. Yet let me say, as one who has reached the psalmist's "threescore years and ten," that I find life full of interest, if a less exciting thing than once it was. My point is that no one's life interests those who survive him. Men take up a morning paper as they journey to their business; see in the list of deaths the name of a man they have known well, done business with, sincerely liked. How does it affect them? "Ah! poor So-and-so has gone! I thought he was beginning to fail. Poor fellow! I hope his family are well provided for!" Then the conversation turns on some topic of the day. Even in the case of men who have occupied a large space in public life how soon they are forgotten! The great poet, orator, politician, soldier, is remembered for a little, and then ceases to be of interest to his fellow-men at large. It is well that it should be so. Life would be intolerable if we could not forget, or at all events remember without acute pain, those who have passed away.

3. But let us notice next that, though a tale is a thing of passing interest, it is also a thing of permanent importance; for we cannot hear or read a story and be as if we had never known it. It may fade from the memory; but it has left its mark. We only seem to forget. It is this fact which imposes such fearful responsibility on those who have the gift of telling a tale well, either verbally or in writing. There are books which do untold mischief. I confess that I look with some degree of fear upon the present fashion of disinterring the facts, or supposed facts, concerning royal and other personages who lived very unedifying lives. People think they are reading history when they are doing little more than satisfying curiosity not of the highest type There teem from the press books which can do no good and can hardly fail to do harm.

It is equally true of human life that it is of permanent importance—to others, to ourselves. "No man liveth to himself." We are always doing good or harm. We carry with us a moral atmosphere. It is impossible to be neutral.

No one can tell how far-reaching will be the effects of his words and his works. There is only one way in which we can be sure that our lives will be a blessing and not a curse to our fellow-creatures. You would do good; you must be good. We have all known persons whose very presence brought with it a holy influence. They did not talk much about religion, it may be, but you felt that the love of Christ constrained them in all they thought and said and did. Alas! there are others who are a blighting force. How is it to be with us? If we are "led by the Spirit" we shall not "fulfil the lusts of the flesh." Each day, as it brings us nearer to the end of this life, will not only bring us nearer to "the life that knows no ending," but it will find us more useful, more influential, in "the work of faith and labour of love" to which God has called us; more fitted to enjoy the blessings of our Heavenly Home. To the true believer life is, indeed, like "a tale that is told," but it is a wholesome story with a happy ending.

MAMIE'S PRETTY LADY.

A Complete Story by L. G. Moberly.

HEY called her "our lady" in Paradise Court, the unsavoury slum which she visited weekly.

None of them knew her name, but her small, dainty figure was a familiar one in the court. She always dressed in the same way—in a well-fitting dark blue gown, serge in winter, linen in summer, and a simple dark blue hat to match her gown.

The colour became her; it emphasised the pure fairness of her face, the golden glory of her hair; and the costume was eminently suitable to the court, which for general dirt and disorder could scarcely have found a match in London.

Though none of its denizens knew her name, they knew where she lived, because she had told them long ago that in any difficulties they were to come to the address she gave them.

With the vagueness so characteristic of their class, they had thought no more on the subject; or, if they thought about it, they concluded that she had some employment in the house she named. It did not strike them as for a moment possible that it could be her own abode; it was in such a particularly grand neighbourhood!

"Which she's a lidy, every inch of 'er," Mrs. Pettitt confided to her neighbour Mrs. Marsh, both occupants of one of the Paradise Court houses; "but there's lidies what 'as to work same as me and you. Companion, I should say she might be, or governess maybe. She's a lidy, whatever she is."

Yes, she was a lady, whatever else she was; and the class of person who lives in the slums knows very well indeed the difference between real ladies and sham ones.

She was loved by all the people, but most of all did the children adore her, dogging her footsteps as she passed in and out amongst the wretched dwellings, and pulling softly at her gown sometimes for the pure pleasure of making her smile down at them.

The sweetness in her deep eyes, the fascination of her smile, won the hearts of the little ones; but perhaps none of the children loved her so well as did Mamie Barker, the only child of Josiah Barker and his wife. Josiah's work was of an uncertain and precarious order Sometimes he got a job, but more often he did not. He would have found it hard to explain the nature of his profession, because he did so very many things in the course of a year. In fact, as his wife was wont to remark, "Jo, 'e can turn 'is 'and to anything; 'e's a 'andy man, is Jo."

Poor Josiah had need to be "handy." He and his wife and Mamie would indeed have fared badly if he had not been an adept at odd jobs.

Mamie was the apple of his eye, the very deepest joy of his heart; and it was a matter of untold pride to him and his wife that "our lady" never failed to kiss the child's little face every time she visited their room.

Mamie's person was the only portion of the Barkers' possessions upon which they expended any efforts after cleanliness, and Mamie's face was generally clean and very sweet to look upon.

It must be confessed that the small room, which was the only home she knew, left very much to be desired; and no representations, even from the lady they loved, could induce Josiah and his wife to understand the advantages of fresh air and soap and water!

"Of course," she said once in apology for her protégés, "one must remember that it is not so easy for them to be clean and tidy as it is for us. I expect, if I lived in a third floor back, and had to climb three flights of stairs every time I wanted a single drop of water, I might find cleanliness more difficult of achievement than I do. Fancy having to fetch your water from the back yard at the bottom of the house, and having to keep all your possessions in one small room that you sleep and cook and live in! Oh! it is not so easy as good folks think for the poor people to be clean and tidy."

Well! it was true enough that the room of Josiah Barker and his wife was not always the pink of perfection; but little Mamie, the joy of her parents' hearts, was invariably as fresh and clean and sweet as a new-blown daisy.

She was not unlike those flowers, too, for in spite of the dark and dingy street in which she had lived all her little life, in spite of the one room which was her only home, she had the dainty colouring of children living in more healthy conditions; and her blue eyes and curly yellow head, and soft pink and white cheeks made her a charming picture of a baby.

Nobody in Paradise Court evinced any jealousy because "our lady" showed a distinct partiality for Baby Mamie. All the neighbours made a pet of the child, which was not surprising when you realised her prettiness and her engaging little ways.

Ever since she could first take notice of anything or anybody, her baby heart had gone out to the lady who paid such regular weekly visits to her parents, and by the time she was able to use her small tongue her very first words were "Pitty lady," and "pitty lady" her friend remained to her as the weeks and months rolled by and she was able to say a great many more words, and had even learnt to combine words into sentences.

Her little face beamed with joy whenever the visitor's face appeared at the door. She would stretch out her soft dimpled arms, and cry happily "Pitty lady, pitty lady!" and she lavished a very large proportion of her affections on the friend whose sweet face and "Josiah faithfully fed the fire."—p. 964.

golden hair seemed to produce a profound impression on her infantile mind

When Mamie added walking to her other accomplishments, she frequently formed one of the little band of children whose only playplace was the roadway, and who spent all their time out of school hours in sitting on the edge of the pavement, or playing weird little games of their own in the gutter.

Mamie was sent out by her mother in charge of some older child when Mrs. Barker was engaged in doing the family washing; and if the "visiting lady" chanced to come down the court when Mamie formed one of the little row on the kerb the child would clamber to her feet and toddle towards "her lady" as fast as her fat and rather uncertain legs would carry her.

Clutching with eager hands at the visitor's gown, and lifting adoring eyes to her face, she would chuckle softly.

"Pitty lady come to see Mamie. Mamie loves pitty lady."

It was in winter time that something happened which made Mamie's father and mother devoted slaves of their "visiting lady," and which taught them something they will never forget as long as they live.

The winter that year had been especially rigorous, but Josiah had managed to find even more odd jobs than usual, and want had not knocked at the Barkers' door.

But—so it seemed to the two parents—something far worse than want came to them, on a bitterly cold March evening, after a day of bitter north-east wind.

Mamie, now three years old, had been out in the street as usual, joining the other children in their games; but when her mother carried her indoors at tea-time she noticed that the child was flushed and heavy, and that her eyes were unnaturally big and bright.

Josiah noticed it too when he came home an hour later; and before eight o'clock, with that terrible rapidity with which a child falls ill, little Mamie was tossing and raving in delirium.

Josiah and his wife, ignorant as they were of sickness, realised that something must be very seriously wrong indeed to account for the hard, hurried breathing which smote upon their ears like a knell; and Josiah hurried out to fetch the nearest doctor, whilst an agony of fear and apprehension knocked at his heart.

When the doctor came to the bedside, and looked down into the flushed face and bright, unseeing eyes, he shook his head.

"She is as bad as can be," he said tersely, as he gave a few short directions. "There is nothing to be done excepting what I have told you," he added, when his orders were given. "I am very sorry, but there is nothing more we can do. What is she saying?" he asked, after a pause, in which the child's voice wailed unceasingly "Pitty lady, pitty lady. Mamie does want her pitty lady Please come to Mamie. Mamie does want her pitty lady."

"What does she mean?" the doctor repeated.

"She's a-talkin' about our lidy what comes to see us," Josiah answered, drawing a grimy hand across his eyes; "she's fair set on that lidy, poor mite. Calls 'er 'Pitty lidy,' she do. Wants 'er to come now; that's what she's talkin' about."

"Would the lady come?" the doctor asked. "It would be a great thing to quiet the child, if——"

He looked from the troubled baby face to the faces of the father and mother, who watched it with anguished eyes.

"She's wonnerful kind and that," Josiah said doubtfully; "but o' course it's arskin' a lot ter arsk 'er to come out of a cold night, and what we thinks is as 'er time ain't 'er own."

"You mean she is working in some way?" The doctor idly wondered who this visiting lady could be.

"We thought maybe she 'ud be a companion," Mrs. Barker here put in. "Not but what she's a lidy—there ain't no mistake about that—but some lidies 'as to work."

"Well," the doctor answered abruptly, having already more work than he well knew how to do, and being painfully aware that he could do nothing more for the gasping little form upon the bed, "if the lady would come it might quiet the baby, and that is a most important matter. I'll look in in the morning. Good-night."

The busy man was gone, and the husband and wife looked at one another.

"Could we do it, Joe?" asked Mrs. Barker.

"There ain't nothin' I'd leave undone fer Mamie," Josiah replied almost fiercely. "I'm goin' right orf now to the lidy's 'ouse. I can but arsk of 'er to come, and if she won't she won't, but there ain't no 'arm in arskin' of 'er."

* * * * * *

The footman who opened the door of the great house in Grosvenor Square stared at the shabby man upon the steps ; for, although Josiah had put on his Sunday coat, washed his face, and plastered down his hair, he still looked to the servant in the doorway a very shabby person indeed

"What was it you wanted ?" the footman asked, after that comprehensive stare. "If you've come from the builders, you ought to have gone to the back door."

"'Twas the lidy I wanted," Josiah said humbly. The bigness of the house, the blazing electric lights in the hall, and the lofty manners of the footman overawed him.

"Lady, what lady ? Her ladyship's just going out, and——"

"'Twouldn't be 'er," Josiah interrupted eagerly. "What we was thinkin' was as it might be a companion or a governess lidy, maybe. 'Tis the lidy as comes down our court, a I come——"

"Look 'ere, there ain't no companion nor governess here. You've come to the wrong shop, and you'd best git—fast as you can lay foot to the ground. Companion indeed—pretty tales——"

"What is that, Giles ?" struck in a soft, clear voice that made the footman leap several feet into the air, and sent a throb of hope to Josiah's heart. "Please remember that no one who comes to the door is to be spoken to in such a way. Who is it ?" And in the interior of the hall Josiah caught a sudden glimpse of a wonderful shining vision, the like of which he had never set eyes on in all his life before.

He heard the abashed and discomfited footman making stammering apologies, then the soft voice from within saying, "Ask him to come in here and speak to me," and Josiah found himself inside the hall, where the lights dazzled him and the radiant vision seemed to dance up and down before his dazed eyes.

"Why, Josiah," said the voice he knew, "is it you ? I hope nothing is wrong ?" And at that moment Josiah's bewildered senses righted themselves, and he realised that the figure standing before him in gleaming white satin and shining diamonds was none other than the visitor to the court—Mamie's "pitty lady."

The footman had discreetly vanished into the back regions—where he was informing his fellows that "her ladyship didn't seem to know her place nor his, expecting him to be civil to a man off the streets"—and the little lady and Josiah were alone.

"Is there something I can do ?" she asked gently, when Josiah seemed to find a difficulty in making his wants known.

"I dunno as I oughter come," Josiah murmured, twisting his cap round and round with uneasy fingers ; "but me and Lizer we thought 'twas best I should tell yer—'bout—'bout Mamie."

The words ended in a little choke, and a startled look flashed into the soft eyes watching him.

"About Mamie ?" she said. "I hope there is nothing wrong with Mamie."

"She's terrible bad," the man answered shakily. "Took bad all of a sudden this arternoon, and doctor 'e don't seem to 'old out much 'ope, and the kid she do keep on callin' out for you somethin' shockin'."

"Calling out for me ? Oh ! why didn't you tell me so at once ? I will come directly—directly to her."

Josiah's eyes glanced sheepishly up and down her dainty form in its glistening robes. He recalled the footman's words, "Her ladyship's just going out," and, twisting his cap with renewed uneasiness, he stammered :

"I didn't oughter arsk yer to come. The gentleman what opened the door said as 'er lidyship was goin' out. I don't know if you're 'er lidyship, but—but——"

"Yes, I am ; but that doesn't matter," she answered, smiling into his troubled face and touching a bell beside her. "Even if I was going out, it would not prevent me from helping you now. . . Ask Marie to bring my long cloak directly, please," she said to the footman who answered her summons, "and whistle a four-wheeler. I shall not want the carriage at nine."

Josiah looked on in dumb wonder whilst the man sped away to do his mistress's bidding ; then he said awkwardly :

"I wouldn't ever a-come if I'd a-knowed you was—you was——"

"I am glad you came," she said more gently than ever. "I only want to help little Mamie to get better. I am glad you came."

"Doctor, 'e said if we could quiet 'er it 'ud do 'er good." Josiah answered, "an' there didn't seem no way to quiet her, 'ceptin' be fetchin' you."

Just then the maid and the cloak appeared, and two minutes later the amazed servants saw their mistress drive away in the cab, the shabby man upon the box having obstinately refused to go inside the vehicle.

Paradise Court does not go early to bed.

In spite of the cold, groups of people still hung about the doorways retailing the latest gossip, and there was a stir of excitement over the unwonted sight of a cab turning into the street.

"'Tis our lady," one said to the other; "and she ain't got nothin' on 'er 'ead." "She've come in a 'urry," quoth another. "Josiah's along of 'er; she've a-come to see Mamie, you mark my words."

She had a smile of greeting for them all as she passed into the house, but her tenderest smile and greeting were reserved for the little sick child upstairs.

Heedless of the shining garments she wore, with no thought for anything but the small, tossing form upon the bed, she sat down beside it, and said softly:

"I've come, Mamie dear. Your lady's come to see you."

The sound of the voice made the child turn her head restlessly on the pillow; her eyes gleamed feverishly; she threw out her arms with a pathetically pleading gesture.

"Please, I wants my pitty lady," she moaned. "Ask pitty lady to come to Mamie. I wants her. I wants her. Wants to sit on pitty lady's lap."

The disjointed sentences, the glassy, unrecognising stare of the child's eyes, went to the visitor's heart.

With a gesture of infinite tenderness she stooped over the bed and gathered the little restless form into her arms.

"There, there," she murmured softly. "Mamie's lady has come to her. Now Mamie must go to sleep like a good baby," and after wrapping her cloak warmly round the child she held her closely against her breast, whilst with her free hand she stroked back the ruffled yellow curls, and touched the flushed face with cool, soft fingers.

A sudden smile flashed out over the baby's face. She nestled down into the arm that held her, and a look of perfect recognition shone in her eyes.

"Mamie's pitty lady," she murmured happily. "Mamie's comfy now."

And in an incredibly short space of time her soft, regular breathing showed that the child was asleep.

Josiah and his wife stood, watching open-mouthed the extraordinary spectacle of the lady, in her beautiful gown, holding their baby in her arms and smiling down into the sleeping face; and once Josiah took a step forward and said huskily that they "didn't oughter keep the lidy no more now. Mamie 'ud likely as not sleep in bed."

But the lady uplifted a finger, and whispered:

"Hush! we must not on any account move or wake her. You and your wife keep up the fire and get a nap if you can. I am not going to let the child out of my arms till she wakes of herself."

And so through the long watches of the night she sat patiently in the high, uncomfortable chair, holding her burden carefully and tenderly, even though her arms grew stiff and aching with the tension, and her eyes were heavy with sleep.

Josiah faithfully fed the fire, but neither he nor his wife took the nap their visitor had suggested, and when the grey light of dawn stole into the room all three were sitting motionless and still, awaiting the baby's waking and the doctor's verdict.

Long before his usual time for paying visits to his patients, the doctor arrived—moved, perhaps, by a vivid recollection of the grave condition in which he had found Mamie the night before. He will never forget the sight that met his eyes when he entered the Barkers' little room. The parents, with worn and haggard faces, sat one on each side of the fireplace, and close to them, beside the bed, sat a woman, with a lovely face and deep soft eyes, dressed in a glistening satin gown, with the gleam of diamonds on her neck, and diamonds in her golden hair; a woman who looked smilingly up at him as though she were doing nothing uncommon, and said in a whisper:

"I think she is better. I do really hope she is better. We managed to quiet her."

"You have saved her life," the doctor said quietly. "She was wearing herself out, and you have saved her. She will do now. She can go back into the bed. You have saved her life."

And at that moment Mamie's blue eyes opened. She stretched herself, languidly, and lifted her arms to the lovely tired face bending over her.

"Pitty lady," she murmured drowsily, with a happy chuckle. "Mamie's pitty, pitty lady"

THE MAKERS OF MODERN CHRISTIANITY.

CHRYSOSTOM: II.—THE ARCHBISHOP—CONSTANTINOPLE, A.D. 397.

By the Very Rev. H. Donald M. Spence, D.D., Dean of Gloucester.

WE have drawn the rough outline of the life-story of that somewhat insignificant-looking man, with his strangely piercing eyes, with their grave and sad expression, with work-worn features prematurely furrowed with frequent sickness, rather than with years. He was about fifty-two when he was almost forcibly, and sorely against his will, enthroned as Archbishop in the lordly Basilica of the great Eastern metropolis. It was indeed a surprising elevation for the Syrian preacher, to find himself of a sudden transported from his distant native Antioch, taken for ever away from the people he loved, to whom he had preached in hours of sorrow and of joy for so many years, and who in turn listened to him as perhaps no flock had ever before or ever since listened to a devoted pastor.

Constantinople, at the close of the fourth century, was the most important city in the world, as well as the most magnificent, and the responsibilities which belonged to its Archbishop were indeed tremendous. The Imperial throne was occupied by the eldest son of Theodosius, Arcadius. Less intelligent even than his brother Honorius the Western Emperor, he had spent the whole of his brief life amidst the splendour of an Oriental palace. A sleepy, dreamy man, not irreligious, but wholly insensible to the awful responsibilities of his exalted position, he lived entirely under the tutelage of his chief Minister and his beautiful Empress, and was ever wholly insensible to the stormy events of the age in which his lot was cast, and appeared quite ignorant of the pressing dangers which threatened the very existence of his mighty empire.

Eudoxia, the Empress, was a Frank, the orphan daughter of the barbarian General Bautho. When Arcadius was about to marry the child of Rufinus, somewhile the all-powerful Minister of Arcadius, a palace intrigue, conducted by the Eunuch Eutropius, then the Imperial Chamberlain, had attracted the notice of Arcadius with a picture of the beautiful Frankish girl. Arcadius willingly agreed to the substitution of Eudoxia for his betrothed wife, and so she became Empress. The assassination of Rufinus, who aspired to the rank of Emperor, was not long delayed, and Eudoxia and the Eunuch Eutropius became the virtual rulers of the East. The bringing of the saintly Chrysostom to Constantinople was the work of Eutropius, and, as we have remarked, was perhaps the only good deed which marked his tenure of supreme power; for on the death of Rufinus this Eutropius became the Emperor's chief Minister and adviser.

Alas! the training of John Chrysostom sadly unfitted him for the duties and responsibilities of his great office. The new Archbishop was a grave and devout ascetic; he had no sympathy with Court and public life; he was utterly strange to all the habits and customs of the great and wealthy; he was intensely conscious of the faults and shortcomings of the luxurious classes with whom he was daily brought in contact, but he failed to recognise much that was good and true in the many-sided life in the midst of which he found himself closely mixed up. Utterly unpractical, he condemned all the state and pomp of the brilliant Court and of the higher circles, and with an unsparing voice he bitterly reproved, and wished abruptly to change, all the manners and customs of the most splendid and magnificent Society in the world. All his sympathies were with the poor, the needy, and the sad. He praised and even flattered the masses with a praise and flattery which were often hurtful to the objects of his loving expressions, and at times even dangerous to the public peace; while he reviled indiscriminately, with all the power of his matchless eloquence, the lives and conduct of the great of the earth. No honest biographer of this true saint of God, while admiring with no grudging admiration his pure and saintly life, his undoubted self-denial, and his burning earnestness, but must at the same time deplore his utter want of tact, his lamentable lack of sympathy with the rich, the powerful, and the noble; his sad and grievous failure to influence in any real degree those circles of the capital of the East with whom rested all the power and authority of the empire. Such a man as Chrysostom, with his splendid eloquence, his great learning, his true piety, his intense earnestness, might have done so much to leaven the manners and customs of the Court and the nobles of Constantinople; might have done so much, too, in the way of elevating and purifying the often sadly frivolous lives of many of the ladies and Society leaders of Constantinople.

The saintly monk-Archbishop began at once to put into practice his theories respecting the ascetic life of a stern simplicity, which he regarded as the one ideal to be aimed at. In his own dress and surroundings he resolutely acted up to his convictions. The stately way of living men had been accustomed to associate with the Metropolitan of the East was all changed; the plain and homely dress, the reduced retinue, the bare austerity of the Archbishop, the discontinuance of the lavish hospitality of his predecessor, surprised and disturbed the influential circles of Constantinople. He was never seen at Court; he renounced all the quiet influence of his great position, and devoted himself to his austerities and sweeping reforms. He even looked askance at the stately ritual of his Church. Everything that was in his power he sold. Rich and costly vestments, the priceless hangings, even some of the sacred vessels of gold and silver which adorned the stately churches of Constantinople, such as the Basilicas of "the Holy Wisdom," "the Apostles," and "the Resurrection," were disposed of, and the proceeds of the sales were devoted to hospitals and homes for the poor, the sick, and the needy—often, it is feared, with scanty discrimination. Nothing was spared that the Archbishop could put up to sale. The very pillars and precious marbles which had been gathered together for the decoration of the historic church of Gregory Nazianzus, the "Anastasia" or "Resurrection" Basilica, were sold. It is true that attempts were later made by his enemies to suggest a sordid and selfish avarice as the motive for this strange ignoring of all that was beautiful and dignified in ritual and worship, but they were, of course, indignantly refuted and easily disproved even in the darkest days of Chrysostom's subsequent misfortunes; and the verdict of posterity has ratified the contemporary acquittal of the noble-hearted saint of God: the memory of Chrysostom remains a precious heritage of the Church, absolutely white and stainless. It was ever God's poor he was thinking of; the wan faces of the friendless and desolate in the great city were the solitary objects of his tenderest compassion.

But while so full of sympathy, so ready to condone the faults and shortcomings of the masses who formed so vast a proportion of the dwellers of that capital of the East in which, to his surprise, he found himself suddenly elevated to so great a dignity, towards the great, the rich, the powerful, he behaved invariably as the stern monitor, the grave accuser—for these he could find no excuse; with their lives, with their trials and temptations, never could Chrysostom show the smallest sympathy. His Divine Master, the true friend of the poor, could look on the young rich ruler of the Gospel story, and, as He looked, loved him. Not so Chrysostom. The austere, ascetic monk, in his stormy career as Archbishop, with very rare exceptions ceaselessly scourged the higher classes of Eastern Society with his pitiless eloquence. He never found the key to their hearts; he never sought it. The Court of the wayward, the impulsive, the easily influenced Empress Eudoxia set the fatal example, and, as a rule, the Archbishop, one of the purest and most saintly of men, was at once detested and feared by the majority of the influential circles of the Society of the Eastern capital.

Many and striking were the scenes which are chronicled as taking place in the Cathedral of the Holy Wisdom (St. Sophia) when Chrysostom was Archbishop. The mighty church was densely thronged with all sorts and conditions of men and women whenever it was reported that the great orator was to preach. It was the usual practice in these great churches to separate the sexes, the women occupying large galleries, raised as in many modern churches, right and left of the centre of the nave. Chrysostom, whose voice, though sweet and penetrating, was somewhat low and weak, used to preach from a little pulpit placed on the choir screen, from what in a mediæval church was termed the rood-loft, instead of from the centre of the apse, as was the original custom. He was thus placed immediately in sight of the ladies of Constantinople, and at times he would pointedly address his reproaches to the members of the Empress's Court and other leaders of Society whose extravagance in dress, whose false hair, and other artificial devices to enhance their beauty or to conceal the ravages of time, were peculiarly hateful to the ascetic and austere Archbishop.

"O ye wives," he would pleadingly urge, "with what face can you exhort your husbands to generous almsgiving, when you consume the largest portion of their means on the adornment of your own persons? . . . When they see you laying aside luxury, they will lay aside the love of gain."

The peculiar dislike of the Archbishop to all magnificence of apparel in the case of both sexes was apparently founded on a somewhat strange Biblical theory. Clothes, in his opinion, were a perpetual reminder, a memorial of man's fall from innocency; all dress was, therefore, to be as plain as possible. "Tell me," he would say, "ye who indulge in grandeur, ye who array yourselves in silk, and weave gold into your robes, why do you thus adorn your persons with these things, not discerning that the covering of dress was devised for us after the transgression? Dress was part, so Chrysostom argued, of the punishment of the Fall.

But there were evidently many of the congregations which crowded the churches of the capital who cared little for the things which excited the wrath of the austere Archbishop, for he drew charming pictures of the beautiful influence which good Christian wives exercised on the family life of the city, and dwelt with all the power of his bright, warm eloquence on the modesty, temperance, and kindness of the true Christian lady; all his pictures were evidently drawn from the life.

The student of St. Chrysostom can scarcely credit that Christianity had been the accepted religion of the Empire for only some eighty or ninety years, when he reads the great preacher's earnest exhortation to the rich landowners, urging them above all things to build churches and to maintain a resident minister on their lands. "There are many who own farms and fields, and who are anxious to build baths and courts for their mansions, caring little all the while for the souls of those who till their fields and serve them. No Christian," urged the preacher, "should own an estate which is not provided with a church." Very touching is the picture painted by this truest of Christian preachers, when he paints the blessings which flow from the presence of a faithful servant of the Master in a country village; the quiet, beautiful influence, the help given to the poor and needy, the words of comfort and of sublime hope spoken to the dying and the sick. "O rich ones, think of your reward in Heaven, for did not Christ say, 'If thou lovest Me, feed My sheep'?"

Very dramatic and startling were some of the scenes in the great Basilicas of the Eastern capital in the years when Chrysostom ruled the Church. To give a notable example of one of these. We have alluded to Eutropius, the powerful Eunuch who, as the Emperor Arcadius' Minister of State, ruled despotically over the Eastern Empire. This Eutropius had bitterly vexed Chrysostom by many of his arbitrary acts; among these he had taken away the privilege of sanctuary which belonged to Christian churches. Eutropius had numberless enemies. His measureless pride and reckless greed, and finally his insulting conduct to the Emperor, at last brought about his sudden disgrace. Driven from the presence of Arcadius, he feared immediate death, and fled from his remorseless enemies to the sanctuary of the Church, forgetting, perhaps, that he had, in one of the edicts of his government, cancelled the "sanctuary privilege." But the Archbishop did not repel the fallen Minister, whom he found clinging to the Holy Table while his enemies were in hot pursuit of their prey. Chrysostom bravely refused to surrender him, and for the moment the unhappy fallen Minister was left in peace.

On the Sunday which followed the fall of Eutropius an unusually great concourse filled the Church of St. Sophia to listen to the Archbishop, who had sheltered the doomed man so lately the second person in the Empire. The preacher took his accustomed place in the pulpit of the screen. The curtain which hung before the sanctuary was suddenly drawn aside, and the cowering form of Eutropius was seen clinging to the altar. Taking the fallen Minister as the text of his sermon, Chrysostom preached one of the most striking of his thousand Homilies. "Vanity of vanities," he began by saying, as he pointed to the cowering form clinging to the altar; "what are now the pomps and glories of yonder man's proud consulship?" (He had just been appointed to this, the highest dignity in the Empire.) "What of his splendid festivities? Where the applause which used to greet him? Where the crowds who used to flatter him? Where the crown and garlands? Gone—gone! One wild gust of wind has stripped the towering tree bare. . . . All his glories were but as visions of the night. Vanity of vanities! These sad words should be graven on all our walls, embroidered on our garments; they should be written on the market-places, by every wayside; above all, on every heart. . . . See, Eutropius," he went on to say, "the Church which you treated as an enemy has received thee. It is her glory to have afforded shelter to an enemy; the suppliant is indeed an ornament of the altar." Then, turning to the congregation—"What, this wicked creature an ornament of the altar? Hush! Remember the woman who was a sinner was suffered to bathe the feet of Jesus." Chrysostom concluded his memorable sermon by asking the people for mercy and forgiveness. He was listened to, Eutropius remained for several days perfectly safe in the sanctuary, under the guardianship of his former foe, so powerful was the influence of the Church and its chief pastor. Then the fallen Minister and Consul, for some unknown reason, quitted his haven of safety, was at once arrested, and shortly afterwards decapitated at Chalcedon.

The unwearied reformer was not satisfied with his denunciation of the dress and customs of the higher classes of the capital; he was also thoroughly dissatisfied with the way of life of not a few of the clergy. As the result of his searching inquiries, many were suspended from their functions. He was absolutely right in his zealous investigation, for grave disorders evidently existed; but his unbending harshness and uncompromising severity won for him numberless enemies.

Grave moral disorder evidently existed in the ranks of the ecclesiastics. The ascetic Archbishop, too, found fault with their love of luxurious living, with their covetousness and want of earnestness, but his way of reformation was not that of a loving father, but rather of a stern master, for his enemies were continually being multiplied.

Yet he was not always the severe, the pitiless censor, for in his letters and treatises, in the writings of his friend and confidant, Palladius, we catch sight of many earnest and devoted men among the clergy whom he loved and trusted; of circles, too, of noble Christian women, whose lives he admired with no grudging admiration; and, above all, of uncounted numbers of the poorer and humbler classes, all passionately devoted to the grave, stern man who ruled over the Church of Constantinople between A.D. 397 and 404—the grave, stern man who, they felt, loved them dearly, and who was ready to give up his life for their sakes.

The saddest feature in the career of Chrysostom whilst Archbishop was his failure to win the confidence of the Empress Eudoxia. Her friendship would probably have established his influence over Arcadius and his Court. At first his relations with the Empress were friendly, but the kindly feeling which might have ripened into a warm friendship soon gave place to mutual suspicion, and in the end to dislike and hate. Eudoxia bitterly resented the public attacks made by the Archbishop upon the ladies of the Court. We possess pictures of some of these leaders of Society, carefully drawn by the hand of Chrysostom's faithful friend Palladius. They appear in the pictures, not merely as devoted to dress, and as practising all the many devices adopted by the fashionable ladies of Constantinople to heighten their beauty, not merely as setting the example of an exaggerated luxurious life, but as using their high and influential positions about the person of the Empress to amass money by means of confiscation, of extortion, and iniquitous fines imposed by the Imperial authority. We must, however, remember that these saddening sketches of Eudoxia's circle were drawn by one who was bitterly incensed with the Court, and who wrote under the influence of the burning indignation aroused by the subsequent cruel persecution of his beloved master.

For Eudoxia herself, whose character is painted, too, in the darkest colours, a kindly biographer would have found many excuses. Raised suddenly from a quiet and undistinguished home to the dizzy eminence of Empress of the East, possessed of a rare beauty, with a weak and selfish husband, mindless and utterly frivolous, to guide her—had Chrysostom used gentler and wiser measures, he might have guided the impulsive and strangely tempted girl into the paths of a nobler life, and directed that passionate heart so greedy of pleasure, so aflame with wild ambition, into higher longings and purer desires.

At first she was drawn towards that grave, saintly presence, so different from anything which had hitherto come into her wondrous life-story, with its strange vicissitudes; but Chrysostom paid no heed to her attempts at friendship, and studiedly avoided her splendid Court; and thus the Empress soon regarded the Archbishop only as a stern, hard monitor, devoid of sympathy and human affection. The gulf between them, alas! widened. Eudoxia and her circle cared more and more for those things which Chrysostom abhorred; things frivolous and worse. The true but unworldly saint of God came to look on the brilliant, beautiful Empress as the most dangerous enemy to the peace and well-being of the great capital of the East, the city he loved so well, and longed so passionately to make purer and holier.

Mrs. Shepherd's Paying Guest.

A Short Story by Scott Graham.

I.

"I NEVER wish to hear the name of Steele again as long as I live!"

The words were uttered in an accent as bitter as themselves by a tall, graceful girl, whose hands twined and untwined themselves nervously as she spoke. Her pale cheeks and air of distress were not lost on the little curate who was her companion. Quite a commonplace little man, anybody would have said at a first glance, and yet a second look at his snub-nosed, blunt-featured face revealed a kindliness which, alas! is not commonplace.

But the sympathy in his wistful brown eyes evoked no gratitude from Connie Davenant. It was enough for her that he was Maurice Steele, whose very name she had good cause to hate.

"That I can quite believe," he returned very gently. "Oh, you have been shamefully treated! Don't think I extenuate what Charlie has done, in any way! But perhaps it is possible that some day you may need a friend, and if I could be of any service to you——"

But her trouble just then seemed heavier than she could bear, and she flung away from him impatiently. "Do you think I could ever come for help to anybody of the name of Steele?" she asked scornfully. "You are Charlie's cousin. That is quite enough!"

He turned away with a patient sigh, feeling he could do no good, and returned by the next train to Whitworth, thirty miles away, where his curacy was. He had wasted half a busy day, and spent some much-needed money in the vain hope of comforting a sore heart, only to feel that, on the whole, he had done more harm than good.

Meanwhile, Connie was lying face downwards on her bed, her whole soul crying out in that voiceless agony which denotes infinitely more pain than demonstrative tears. Seeing Maurice Steele, albeit he was a mere stranger whom she had only met once before, had brought back all the bitter sense of loss and humiliation which had been hers ever since Charlie Steele, her promised husband, had jilted her five weeks before her wedding day.

They had been engaged six years. Connie was now twenty-seven, and six of the very best years of her life, she bitterly reflected, had been wasted in an engagement to one so weak and unstable that sudden prosperity and the adroit flatteries of a designing girl had turned his head. Other suitors had perforce had to stand aside, although Connie might have married well more than once during those six years had she been as fickle as Charlie. And now, when her freshness was fading, she had nothing left to look forward to—nothing!

For six long years all her thoughts had been concentrated on Charlie. They had corresponded nearly every day, and it had delighted her to plan out a happy future, saying to herself that when she was married she would do this or that. Being an orphan, living with relatives who were not entirely congenial to her, it was delightful to look forward to being queen of her own little kingdom some day, with not a wish Charlie did not share. She heartily pitied all the girls who, poor things, had no hope of possessing adoring husbands and pleasant homes at some future time. She wondered how they could endure the tedium of existence on such terms; and now—all these girls might very well pity her!

Six long years! For Charlie, at first, was very poor—an Oxford coach, with nothing but what he earned by hard work. True, he had vague expectations from an uncle; but, as he and Connie agreed, it would be very wrong to marry on those alone. He had luxurious tastes, and liked everything about him very comfortable; and then, suddenly, the rich uncle died, leaving a magnificent old place in one of the Home Counties, and money enough to satisfy even fastidious Charlie Steele, to the nephew he had scarcely noticed in his lifetime. The wedding day was soon fixed; but, first, nothing would do but Connie and her cousins must come to stay at Mulbrook Hall, to see the glories which there awaited the bride. As one more or less made no difference in that huge establishment, it was Connie's own suggestion, as she afterwards bitterly remembered, that Ethel Minton, her chosen friend and confidante, should go too. She required rest and change, and Connie was good-naturedly anxious that she should enjoy the luxuries so soon to be her very own. And propinquity did its fatal work. A few motor-car drives together, a few lingerings in the summer twilight, a few pathetic ballads sung as Ethel so well knew how to sing them, and Charlie came to his betrothed with a grave face, saying he knew now their natures had never been in sympathy, so, as there could be no prospect of happiness in their union, she was free! Free! And six weeks afterwards he had married Ethel!

Outside, the autumn sunshine made the face of Nature glorious; but Connie, writhing there, was only conscious of that mad desire to get away somehow, somewhere, out of the world, out of the body even, which comes to us all at times when the burden of existence seems too great to be borne. To have nothing to look forward to but grey, sunless years! Nothing to live for! Nobody to love! She had loved Charlie very dearly, for himself—not for the great possessions which had proved so fatal to her happiness; and for all she could see, her future life must be spent as it were in standing by the grave in which lay buried all her joy.

A tap at the door, and a decided voice requesting admission. Connie knew better than to refuse it, though when she turned, flushed and tear-stained, with rumpled hair, to meet the cold eyes of her widowed cousin and chaperon, Mrs. Ford, she was conscious of feeling like a silly schoolgirl

"I do wish, Connie, you would try to exercise a little more self-control," Cousin Jane began rebukingly, as she seated herself near the window. She was a good-looking woman of fifty, with a high nose and small, set mouth. "It's not a bit of use fretting; it only makes people laugh at you! At best, to be jilted is ignominious, and the only way is to treat it as a joke, as others do!"

In truth, it had added not a little to the sting that, in the small provincial town in which they lived, Connie's misfortunes were of necessity known to everybody.

"A change of scene would be the best thing for you, and all of us," continued her mentor; "so I've decided to let this house furnished, and go away for a year. It's time Aggie and May saw a little better society than there is in this dull neighbourhood; indeed, for my part, I shouldn't care if I never saw Westborough again."

The truth was, the anxious mother of daughters began to fear her girls, now twenty-four and twenty-six, would never find husbands there. They were not taking and attractive, like Connie, who, engaged though she was, never failed to arrest the attention of all the men who came to the house, as her duller and less adaptable cousins never did. She outshone them in every accomplishment and every game, as Mrs. Ford had often noticed with bitterness of spirit. Connie paid her a hundred a year for her board, or she would have had her congé long ago. As it was, Mrs. Ford had endured all in the hope that when Miss Davenant had married a rich man she would have Agnes and May to stay with her, and find them eligible husbands into the bargain.

A gleam of interest came into Connie's tear-dimmed eyes. "Indeed, Cousin Jane, I quite agree with you! I consider it an excellent idea to go away, and I can be ready as soon as you like."

"I have had a good offer for the house furnished," returned Mrs Ford, with a significant cough. "The girls would like to go abroad for the winter to some nice place—Montreux or St. Moritz Then, in the spring, we could go to London for the season, and have a gay time. All this will be very expensive, of course, and I am sure you will see—you will feel—that—that——"

She hesitated a moment, fumbling with the chain of her eyeglass. "Well! you are not a young girl now, Connie and I must tell you plainly I don't feel inclined to go trapesing about Europe with three young women at my heels! My first duty is to my own daughters. You have your own income, and can easily find some nice family to take you in. It isn't always advisable for relations to live together," she added, with an acrid laugh, as she rose to go, having said her say.

And Connie, left alone, realised that her bitter cup was not yet quaffed to the dregs; but that, still smarting and sore from Charlie's base desertion, she must go out into the heartless world to find a new home for herself. Certainly she had never been very fond of Mrs. Ford, whom she knew to be selfish and time-serving; but her house had been her home for many years, and, after all, blood is thicker than water.

Her income was £130 a year, all told, and she would have to live on it now. Langley Lodge was comfortable, even luxurious; but £130 a year does not lend itself to a very splendid establishment, even for one. Poverty was to be added to her loneliness now, it appeared. And, recollecting the source of all her troubles, she cried once more in her bitterness of spirit, "I never wish to hear the name of Steele again as long as I live!"

II.

IDA SHEPHERD was a young widow of the "marry-again" type. Her appealing blue eyes, her soft, carneying voice, her artistically-disposed black draperies, were all so many man-traps, cunningly arranged to produce the most deadly effect. But she did not fall into the egregious mistake of most women of the Becky Sharp kind, and only lay herself out to conciliate men, whilst neglecting her own sex. On the contrary, she was invariably gushing to all women in good positions who were likely to be useful to her.

Connie Davenant was one of many who thought her a nice woman. They had met the year before at a hydropathic establishment at Harrogate, and learning that Mrs. Ford, of Langley Lodge, Westborough, was somebody locally, Mrs. Shepherd had been especially gracious to her party. This year they had unexpectedly met again, for Ida had scraped acquaintance with some other Westborough people, and had stayed with them some weeks. Her home was in a small seaside town called Cliffby.

On the day following Cousin Jane's momentous announcement, Connie and Ida met in the public gardens, and the widow, commenting pityingly on her young friend's haggard appearance, soon induced the sore-hearted girl to pour out her troubles. She must find another home, and very soon. What did Mrs. Shepherd advise her to do?

"'Mrs. Shepherd' indeed! Surely, considering what friends we are, you might say 'Ida!'" pouted the widow. "You poor child, I am so sorry for you! Of course, you can't stay at Westborough, and your best plan will be to come and share my little doll's house! Do come! It will be delightful! You shall do just as you like, and as to terms—why, I shall be satisfied with what you paid Mrs. Ford."

In an indiscreet moment Connie had allowed her dear friend to worm the amount out of her.

"I'm not in the habit of taking paying guests," continued the speaker; "but I'll make an exception in your favour! Cliffby is a most bracing place, and—yes, you really must come, and I'll take no denial!"

And she gave Connie a kiss so gushing that a stranger would have imagined she was generously offering her hospitality for nothing. Connie, sore after her experience of the world's unkindness, never stopped to reflect that she had never seen Mrs. Shepherd's abode, and knew very little about the lady except her own account of herself. She was only anxious to find a refuge for her weary head. She knew nobody at Cliffby, and that counted for much. So she consented to go and live with the fascinating Ida, paying her a hundred a year. Cousin Jane had already begun to prepare for departure; and if Connie had had any doubt in her own mind that her relatives considered her an ignominious failure, the cool way in which the Ford family now pushed her into corners, and left her out of all their plans, would soon have enlightened her.

Mrs. Ford being satisfied, there was nobody else at Westborough with any right to dictate as to Connie's future movements. Therefore her surprise and annoyance were extreme when one afternoon, as she opened the front door to go out, she almost tumbled over Maurice Steele on the doorstep, in the very act of ringing the bell. She flushed scarlet, and would have liked to retreat; but she was fairly caught, beyond all possibility of saying "Not at Home." She did not doubt that his visit was to her, as he had no acquaintance with the Fords.

"Pray, pardon my intrusion," he said very earnestly. "I should consider a few words with you a great favour. I won't detain you long."

She felt that to refuse would be undignified, and so led the way to the little morning-room, where, without asking him to sit down, she faced him defiantly across the table. Her superior height was perhaps more consoling to her then than ever before, as she looked down on the little man, reflecting that he had a profile like a pug-dog, and that his feet and hands were

"It is. May I ask, is it against her you wish to warn me?"

"Yes. I know a good deal about Mrs. Shepherd. I have known her some years, and she is not a suitable companion for you; neither will you find it pleasant to live in her house. Meddling and mischief-making I detest,

"She faced him defiantly across the table."

out of all proportion to his size. He could easily read her hostility in her face, for she was a bad dissembler.

"I hope you won't think what I am going to say is an impertinence," he began, rather nervously. "I am sincerely anxious to serve you—to warn you——"

"You should have warned me before!" was her cutting answer. He saw what she meant, for he turned red, though he continued bravely, "I hear it is your intention to live with Mrs. Shepherd at Cliffby."

but I feel it my duty to say plainly that she is a person to be avoided."

"That is unfortunate, because, as it happens, she is my best friend! She is a charming woman, and as to social position, her father was an Oxford man and her husband an Oxford don——"

Maurice raised his eyebrows. "Oh, is that the version she gives of her history?"

"Yes, and I would not insult her by doubting it. Do you dare to insinuate she is an adventuress?"

The curate was silent. Men, as a rule, are unwilling to betray a woman's secrets, or whisper behind her back. He knew nothing absolutely discreditable concerning Mrs. Shepherd, though she was no fit associate for Miss Davenant. "Her origin was very humble," he said; "and she has only a very small house, and cannot give you the luxuries you have here."

"I don't care for luxuries; I only want kindness!" retorted she, with an angry flash of her grey eyes. "Pray, what possible right have you to interfere in my affairs, Mr. Steele?"

When she put it in that way, of course there was no more to be said. He turned away with a sigh, lest he should only make bad worse. He glanced back at her standing there, head high, cheeks flaming, and thought how handsome she was, and how blind his cousin Charlie had been to reject her sterling qualities for Ethel Minton's studied graces. "I don't think anybody ever made me feel such a pitiable little dwarf before," he ruefully reflected, as he trudged back to the station. He was only five feet two, and just then would have given almost anything to be as tall as Connie. An insignificant little man, with big hands and feet—that was his contemptuous estimate of himself. But the people of Whitworth, where he was highly popular as a preacher and amongst the poor, would have told quite another tale. "Little and good!" would have been the verdict of most.

Nothing now could have stopped Connie from going to Cliffby. The fact that anybody of the name of Steele wished her not to go was quite enough. She was not a romantic heroine, but only a very human woman who had been sorely wounded in her best affections, and for a time had lost the true proportions of things.

III.

IT must be confessed that when, arriving with a cab-load of luggage at the rickety gate of Kent Cottage, Cliffby, Connie for the first time beheld her future abode, her heart sank within her.

Mrs. Shepherd, who dealt in affected and sentimental language, had certainly always described it as "a bandbox," "a doll's house" or "her nest." Yet she had always contrived to give the impression of a charming little nook, smothered in climbing roses, and exceedingly comfortable. But Connie's first impression, as she entered the bare little red-brick house in a shabby back street, was that it was a dirty little den.

Cousin Jane, whatever her other shortcomings, was at least a splendid housekeeper, and Langley Lodge was as neat as a new pin. But as Connie followed her gushing hostess into the tiny drawing-room, the faded carpet of which appeared not to have been swept for a month, it seemed to her that not one single ornament or piece of furniture was whole, or had as many legs as it was properly entitled to. A red-armed charwoman alone appeared, for whom Mrs. Shepherd apologised, as she waved her guest into a fusty easy chair.

"I'm always having upsets with servants and Mrs. Pope is coming until I'm suited. She's rough and ready, but not bad—at any rate, I can't hear of anybody better just now, and no doubt we shall be very cosy, even if we do have to rough it a little! You won't mind, I'm sure, darling?"

Fine words, says a homely proverb, butter no parsnips. Connie was disposed to take the most lenient view of Ida Shepherd, but when she presently followed her up the creaking stairs into the small bedroom designed for herself, her heart sank still further. It smelt abominably stuffy, there were hardly two articles on the washstand that matched, no hot water was forthcoming after her long journey, and Mrs. Pope had not thought of unfastening the straps of the luggage, which had been dumped down on the floor anyhow. Tea (which tasted of onions) prepared her for the ill-cooked dinner served at seven by the charwoman, to which a dirty table-cloth and withered flowers were only too appropriate. Her hostess noticed how little she ate, and observed sweetly:

"You mustn't tak this for a sample, dear. Now you're here you'll help me with the housekeeping, and we shall get on swimmingly! You won't mind arranging the flowers perhaps, and watering the ferns in the drawing-room?"

Connie's reply was cut short by the entrance of Mrs. Pope, who laid a dirty slip of paper beside the widow's plate. "It's the bootmaker," she explained. "It's eight and twopence, and he says it's been sent twice before, and if you don't pay to-night he'll have the law of you."

Mrs. Shepherd flushed, as she rummaged in all the corners of her purse. "How tiresome! I've paid such a lot of bills to-day, Connie dear, that I've actually left myself without anything for this ridiculous man! Absurd, isn't it, that a lady in my position should be dunned for eight and twopence? You won't object to lending me the money till to-morrow, will you, darling?"

Altogether that was an instructive evening; and Connie went to bed with the firm intention of annexing a brush to sweep out her room on the morrow, if Mrs. Pope showed no intention of doing it. There was a big hole in the carpet, too, which she must mend if she did not wish to be tripped up. She pushed the so-called easy chair to one side, and there, beneath it, was a big black-beetle! A shuddering examination of other corners revealed further specimens of the genus, which she held in special abhorrence. As she vainly tried to find ease in her hard flock bed, she could not help thinking that, detestable as was everybody of the name of Steele, Maurice had not been altogether wrong in doubting Mrs. Shepherd's ability to make her comfortable. "But perhaps, when we get a good servant things will be better," she thought, with a desperate effort at optimism.

Next morning they went out to view the town, a pretty place enough. On the parade Mrs. Shepherd encountered an admirer, a certain Major Walsh; and in the pronounced flirtation which ensued Connie's very existence was forgotten. The widow made the largest of eyes at the Major, giving such plain hints that he was obliged to ask the ladies to lunch at the principal confectioner's; and they parted with the understanding that he was to come round to Kent Cottage in the evening. The house looked, if possible, dingier and dirtier than ever, when they returned to it; and after a slovenly tea and a worse dinner, the Major appeared, and speedily became absorbed in dummy bridge with his hostess. Connie was relegated to the atrocious piano, and would have felt sufficiently depressed and forgotten without the dismal recollection of the blackbeetles awaiting her in her horrible bedroom upstairs.

When the Major had departed, she asked whether there was good society at Cliffby, whereat the fascinating Ida shrugged her shoulders. "A set of starched old maids and gossiping widows!" she said tartly. "Nobody worth knowing! Major Walsh is only in apartments, for his health; and as for the women here, they're horrid cats!"

Which meant, as Connie afterwards discovered, that local society, which required something more than big blue eyes and a wheedling voice, declined to call at the Cottage. Besides the Major, tax-collectors and creditors demanding the immediate settlement of unpaid bills were the only callers. When these unwelcome visitors appeared, oddly enough Mrs. Shepherd had always either mislaid her purse, or just paid away her last five-pound note to the butcher. "Would dearest Connie mind—just for once?"

Truly, living in "a doll's house" was not without its drawbacks!

IV.

IT was three months later—a raw January morning. Connie was sauntering along the picturesque High Street, feeling so forlorn and wretched that but for the public place she would have liked a good cry.

By this time any lingering belief in Ida Shepherd was entirely dissipated, and she knew herself to be the dupe of a designing adventuress. Nay, worse, she was becoming absolutely frightened at her own position, for already the widow, on the strength of promises to repay her at an early date, had contrived to borrow over £80 from her guest to discharge various liabilities, and Connie's income, being strictly limited, did not admit of such inroads. She had hoped against hope that Mrs. Shepherd's specious promises would have been redeemed ere this, and that the merely temporary embarrassment due, as she grandiloquently asserted, to a dishonest solicitor, would come to an end. But now she seriously began to doubt whether her hostess really had any money at all. At any rate, none was forthcoming; and it was only to prevent the unseemly disturbances made by importunate creditors calling at all hours that Connie had consented to lend anything to Ida. In Mrs. Ford's clockwork establishment, where ready-money was paid for everything, such vulgar and degrading scenes as were almost daily witnessed at Kent Cottage were absolutely undreamt of. This morning, in reply to a cool request from Mrs. Shepherd that Connie would pay the water-rate, she had represented that the widow was heavily in her debt already, and refused to advance any more. Then the woman's true character came out. She flew into a violent rage, and heaped such a volume of coarse abuse upon her unfortunate inmate that the horrified girl fairly fled from the house.

If she could, she would never have returned to the miserable squalor of Kent Cottage again. One incompetent servant succeeded another, after a grand dispute about unpaid wages; and comfort there was none. Connie had only remained so long because she had positively nowhere else to go. Cousin Jane and the girls were flourishing at Florence, and gave no hint of wishing her to join them; and in any case, until she saw some reasonable prospect of the return of her money, she must remain with Mrs. Shepherd, humiliating though it was to be thus, as it were, in pawn.

"'What does this mean?' Connie asked."

"Oh, if I only had a friend, a real true friend!" she sighed. She knew nobody at Cliffby; indeed, she would have been ashamed to encounter decent people as Ida Shepherd's paying guest. She had few relatives, and her chief friend at Westborough, Ethel Minton, had dealt her the cruellest blow one woman can give to another. The future had never looked so utterly black and hopeless, even in the first anguish of Charlie's desertion, as it did to-day. Nobody loved her, nobody wanted her, nobody cared how much she suffered, or what became of her!

And then it was that she encountered the gaze of a pair of wistful brown eyes anxiously regarding her. At another time she would have passed haughtily by, with uplifted head, as befitted her in presence of a Steele. But now the longing for somebody to talk to; somebody who had known her in her old life, and sympathised with her, or, at any rate, pretended to do so, was irresistible. She stopped and held out her hand to Maurice.

The little curate was equally surprised and gratified, for he had made sure of a cut direct. He could hardly speak at first, for she looked so thin and ill that she was only the ghost of the handsome girl his cousin had first introduced as his betrothed. "How is it you are here?" she asked, after a few rather incoherent remarks.

"My vicar, Mr. Lawrence, has been very ill; and as the doctor ordered sea air he exchanged livings with the vicar of the parish church here, who wanted to be nearer London. As Mr. Lawrence did not wish to begin afresh, in a new place, without any of his old staff, I agreed to come with him for six months certain, and then remain or not as I choose to decide."

Maurice did not add that he had already been offered a living before leaving Whitworth, the Bishop of the diocese being unwilling to lose him; but loyalty to his old chief forbade him to leave Mr. Lawrence at this juncture.

Connie frowned a little. Her first spasm of cordiality over, she would rather that her humiliation should not be witnessed by anybody of the name of Steele. She had never dreamt of seeing him here, for she did not go to the parish church, which was frequented by the local aristocracy, but to St. Michael's, a little iron building which was nearest to the back slum wherein stood Mrs. Shepherd's abode.

"Don't, please don't, imagine I came here with the most distant idea of intruding upon you in any way!" he entreated, reading her transparent face. "I should not have spoken this morning, if you had not. I was very reluctant to come to Cliffby at all, and if you are likely to remain here, if my presence annoys you, I will leave when my six months are up."

It was impossible not to be disarmed by such utter humility. "You are too good," she murmured brokenly. Oh, how pleasant it was to speak to a gentleman again! Major Walsh, taking alarm, had fled from his too-impecunious charmer; and duns and tax-collectors had formed Connie's only masculine society for some time.

She never quite knew how it was, but after that she found herself talking to Maurice quite confidentially, though his name was Steele!

"I feel now, I ought to have warned you more definitely than I did against trusting Mrs. Shepherd," he said, when she had poured out her pitiful story. "I have known for years that she practically lives by her wits."

"But I naturally supposed that as the daughter of an Oxford man——"

"Let me tell you her history. The woman is an audacious impostor, who deserves to be exposed. As to being 'an Oxford man'—well, her father was a scout at St. John's when I was at Oriel, and, in the same sense that every cabman and railway porter born in the city is entitled to call himself 'an Oxford man,' he could do so, but not in the accepted sense. He had only one daughter, whom he educated above her station, and she gave herself great airs. She managed to fascinate a purblind, half-senile old Don, the oldest Professor in the whole University, and married him for his supposed riches. He died six months after, when it was found his fortune had all been muddled away in foolish investments, and she has since then chiefly lived on credit."

"What a wretched dupe I have been!" cried poor Connie, tears of mortification in her eyes.

"Nobody could possibly blame you. You have been the innocent victim of a designing schemer. I certainly wonder Mrs. Ford did not make a few inquiries before allowing you to reside with Mrs. Shepherd."

"She is in Italy now," sighed Miss Davenant. "Oh, I wish I knew what to do for the best!"

Eventually he proposed that he should walk home with her and see Mrs. Shepherd, and persuade her, if possible, to make restitution. Connie caught at the suggestion eagerly. Although he was a Steele, it was an infinite relief to have a man at her back to help her to subjugate her violent-tempered hostess. Probably she would give in when she was confronted with Maurice. At all events, he was now Connie's only hope, in spite of his nose being a snub, and the fact that the top of his hat was barely level with her chin!

V.

ARRIVED at Kent Cottage, they became aware of an unwonted stir. A furniture van stood outside, and several rough-looking men were going in and out, and storing away various articles inside the vehicle. But there was no sign of the fascinating Ida anywhere about the premises.

"What does this mean?" Connie asked of a man with a pint pot in his hand, who smelt like a stale public house.

"Ask the gov'nor," he grunted, nodding his head towards the drawing-room. There another man, rather better dressed, was giving directions about taking down the curtains, and to him she repeated her question.

"The reason of this, madam?" he returned rather shortly. "Well, I don't know whether you're a relation of Mrs. Shepherd or not——"

"Not the slightest!" interposed Maurice, most indignantly.

"All the better for you then, for, if you ask me, I say she's a slippery customer! I'm a creditor of hers, and some time ago she gave me a bill of sale on her furniture. And as I've asked for payment in vain I'm taking these old rattletraps to sell for anything they'll fetch."

"But where is Mrs. Shepherd?" asked bewildered Connie.

"Can't say. Bolted, most probably! It won't be the first time she's done a bunk in a hurry! I'm told she owes money all over Cliffby, and has had summonses without end. I wish I'd never seen her artful face, myself. If it hadn't been that she told me she had a relation coming to live with her, a young lady with ever so many thousands a year——"

"She told you that?" cried Connie breathlessly.

"Yes; and like a fool I gave her two months' extension of time on the strength of it! I hear she has told the same tale all over the town, of a great heiress who would pay all her debts. She hasn't a penny piece of her own."

A great bumping on the stairs heralded the appearance of the slatternly servant, carrying a tin hat-box, and in an outrageous temper.

"This is a pretty go, miss!" she burst out, slamming the hatbox on the floor that she might forcibly thrust on some very tight gloves. "The bailiffs in possession, and Mrs. Shepherd gone off goodness knows where, and me with not a penny of wages since I took the place! May I ask what you call yourself? You're a friend of Mrs. Shepherd's, so it's certain sure you can't be a lady! And if I can't get hold of her, I'll have the law of you, for you must be as bad as she is, or my name isn't Gladys Evangeline Higgs!"

Connie interrupted the breathless tirade by taking out her purse. "How much is owing to you?" she said quietly. She was so used to similar scenes by this time—she, so lately the denizen of Cousin Jane's aristocratic abode—that she took it quite as a matter of course, though Maurice's hands tingled with a most unclerical desire to shake Gladys Evangeline Higgs for her impertinence until her teeth rattled in her head.

Payment of twenty-five shillings produced an astonishing change. Asked where Ida was, Gladys returned quite civilly that she had gone out soon after breakfast, and directly after a railway porter had come for some corded boxes which were ready in her bedroom. "I say, miss, it was all a planned thing," she added shrewdly.

What a fool, what a dupe she had been, Connie miserably reflected! But Maurice wisely gave her no time to brood over her misfortunes, but suggested she should instantly pack all her personal belongings, so that they might not be seized as Mrs. Shepherd's property.

Until she could form some plans, he proposed that she should take apartments, and recommended some which proved the pink of comfort and cleanliness. But Connie was uneasy at the thought that nearly £90 out of the modest hundred-and-thirty which must last the whole year had already been spent, and how to meet the deficit she did not know. At last she confided her troubles to Maurice.

"Why not try some occupation?" he suggested.

"I should only be too delighted, if I could! Oh, I do long to be of some use at last in the world!"

He well knew that work would be the best balm for her sore heart. "I think I know of the very thing—that is, if you are willing to stay in Cliffby. The matron of the Convalescent Home, Miss Maxwell, is a dear woman, but not so young as she was, and would be glad of somebody to write her letters, do the shopping, and assist generally. Board and residence would be given, but only a very small salary. But you are independent of that, and I'm sure you'd find the work very interesting."

And so it proved. Connie had found her niche in life at last, and she found it wonderfully healing to her own sore heart to help to lighten other people's burdens. She forgot Charlie, she forgot Ida—from whom, be it added, she never received a single word of apology or explanation—and in a few months the world looked a brighter place than she had ever thought it could look again.

Maurice did not leave Cliffby at the end of his six months' term. He seemed to like the place, and observant eyes noticed he had become very fond of paying visits to the Convalescent Home about tea-time, when he was likely to be invited to stay and have a cup with the matron and her assistant, in Miss Maxwell's pretty sitting-room. And he was always to the fore when any entertainment was got up for the patients.

He felt it a fearful piece of presumption when at length he ventured to ask Connie to marry him, seeing he was not in the least good-looking, and his name was Steele. But she had wandered amongst the thorns and briars of life long enough to considerably change her views on many subjects; and to-day she thinks her husband the handsomest man in the world—although his name is Steele!

XUM

The Law of Junior Right.

By the Late
Rev. Hugh Macmillan,
D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

IN the touching incident of Jacob blessing his grandsons we are reminded of a similar incident in his own experience. History repeated itself. In his manhood he, the younger son, knelt beside his blind old father's knee, and by base deception filched the blessing of the elder son from his brother Esau. Joseph had intentionally placed his sons Manasseh and Ephraim in such positions that his father, whose eyes were dim with age, might be led conveniently to place his right hand in blessing upon the head of the first-born and his left hand on the head of the younger lad. But this arrangement came in the result to be actually reversed, not accidentally, but of full purpose and design by the aged patriarch. He crossed his hands, so as to lay the left hand on the head of the elder and his right hand on the head of the younger. And, just as it was long before in his own case, he predicted richer blessings for Ephraim than for Manasseh. As it was said of himself at his birth, that the elder should serve the younger, so was it said by himself of his grandsons; for Ephraim was destined to be the greatest of the tribes of Israel, ruling them by means of Joshua, and leading their devotions for several hundred years in the sanctuary at Shiloh; and Manasseh, in common with all his brethren, yielded the supremacy to him and bowed the knee before him.

The old-world scene at Jacob's knee is interesting, not only because it is a remarkable prophecy of the future destiny of the Egyptian-born younger son of Joseph, but also because it is a striking illustration of a custom that was older than the age of the patriarchs. This custom takes us far away from the land of Egypt to the grassy pastoral lands of the north, and from a highly artificial to a primitive state of society. In Egypt the right of primogeniture had long been established among its early civilised inhabitants. The elder son invariably succeeded to the father's property, and the younger sons were portioned off and sent out into the world to push their own fortunes. Joseph had become so familiar with this law of inheritance in the foreign land where he had so long sojourned that he forgot that there had ever been any other; and he was displeased, we are told, when his father set it aside and exalted the younger son above the elder.

Not only was Jacob by prophetic inspiration to do this, but he was also constrained by the traditions of his people. In that land from which the patriarchs originally came the inhabitants wandered over the pastures with their flocks and herds. Their families assisted them in this nomadic life. One by one the elder sons married, and with a fair share of the paternal goods went away to distant pastures to found homes of their own, and to extend their possessions. At last, of the once large and flourishing household only the youngest son remained. He grew from infancy to manhood in the paternal tent, and helped to tend the flocks and herds; and when the infirmities of old age came upon the parents, and they could no longer attend to the affairs of the estate, he managed everything for them, ministered to their necessities, and soothed their declining years with affectionate solicitude. It was natural, in such circumstances, that the paternal inheritance should go to him who had so long guarded and enriched it. His elder brothers had houses and possessions of their own; they were far away; they had already received their patrimony. There was, therefore, no one to dispute his right of succession, or to interfere with his entering at once into full possession of his father's estate and carrying on the practical duties of it in his own name.

In this wholly simple and natural way originated the vesting of the rights of succession in the person of the youngest son, who remained longest and last with the father, and took charge of the paternal inheritance at his father's death. From being a long-established custom it passed into an expressly enacted law, which, in primitive communities but little removed from the old pastoral life, regulated the transference of all property. Throughout the East it still exists among the Mongolian races, and especially the Tartars, who migrate over the vast steppes of Central Asia with their horses and their herds. In Europe the law has survived from far-off times in localities remote from intercourse with the rest of the world, especially among the Ugrian tribes on the slopes of the Ural Mountains, in the ancient villages of Hungary, and in Slavonic communities. Under the names of "Maineté" and "Madelstad," or principal dwelling-house, many examples occur in Picardy, Artois, Hainault, Douai, Amiens, Arras, Lille, and other places in France and Belgium. In Friesland what are called "Theel-lands" are held under a system which prevents an unprofitable subdivision of the inherited allotment, the whole estate passing intact to the youngest son on the death of the father; and in Westphalia and the other Rhine provinces which were under the Saxon law all the members of the family acquiesced as a matter of course in the passing of the undivided inheritance to the youngest son, even if no portion was left to them, and the father died without making the usual will. In Switzerland and Germany the old custom still influences the feelings of the people, although it has ceased to be legally binding.

Primogeniture and junior right can both be traced to the most archaic types of society; but the difference between them was always this: that primogeniture was established in connection with the succession to the headship of the family, or the chieftainship of the clan; while junior right applied only to the succession to the paternal property. Although the father's estate descended to the youngest son, the eldest son always assumed his father's position, as the representative of the family, and the successor to the family honours. It was the eldest son, as head or chief, who prepared the funeral feast and performed the religious ceremonies connected with the burial of his father, which were always regarded as of the utmost importance. Along with the possession of the family estate, the youngest born son carried on the domestic religious rites at the ancestral hearth, for what he virtually inherited was the hearth of the homestead called "The Covert of the Astre," which was regarded as representative of the homestead itself and the portion of ground around it which belonged to the father. This prerogative of the youngest born has received in our country the name of "Borough English," which is a mere accidental name and does not show its Anglian origin. It arose from the circumstance that at Nottingham, in 1327, a French borough, where the custom of junior right was unknown, happened to stand side by side with an English borough where the custom existed, and this special case was afterwards made of general application. Indeed, the custom of "Borough English" prevailed where there was no proper borough.

In our own country it is in the Saxon or southern districts, and not in the midland and northern or Anglian portions, that it is chiefly found. The earliest settlements took place in the south-eastern districts, and then the communities sent forth their eldest members to form new settlements in the yet unconquered country to the north, leaving the youngest sons at home to take upon themselves the duties of the family and to inherit and perpetuate the paternal estate. In the county of Kent, which is the nearest to the Continent, where the custom extensively prevailed, it was even in Saxon times of remote antiquity. Besides the old law of gavelkind, according to which the land was divided equally amongst the sons, and, failing them, amongst the daughters, on the death of the possessor, there was before the Norman Conquest a modification of the custom by which the youngest son took the dwelling-place as an exception to the general rule of equal division. Throughout the whole county this form of the law of junior right prevailed. In Sussex also some 140 manors were inherited according to the rule of "Borough English"; in Essex, fourteen manors; in Norfolk, twelve; and even in Middlesex, the most civilised and modern part of the country, there were twelve manors that were held by a tenure of this most primitive kind. In the cluster of manors round London, such as Islington, Edmonton, Wimbledon, the succession was through the youngest son; and in other places near London the law of junior right was put in force if the land to be inherited was under the value of £5. If it was above this value it was to be parted equally among all the sons. In Hampshire, where the custom is called "cradle-holding," a few instances occur; but through the large tract of country in Somersetshire known as the Manor of Taunton Deane, extending over no fewer than twenty-six parishes, the custom of preferring the youngest survived for a long time in a peculiarly definite form. In the Midland counties the four great Danish towns, Derby, Stamford, Leicester, and Nottingham, as well as the important borough of Stafford, and the city of Gloucester, were under the law in question governing the descent of freeholds.

A line drawn from the River Humber in the east to the Mersey in the west bounds the geographical distribution of this remarkable archaic custom. North of this line the usage is unknown. Although no modern instances can be found in Scotland, there is reason to believe that it was an ancient Celtic custom, existing in the northern districts; for in certain parts of Wales there is still a rule that the youngest son takes the "tydden," or dwelling-place. And the early age of majority in ancient Scottish law, guardianship ceasing and independence being attained at the beginning of the fifteenth year, which has always been a puzzle, may have had a Celtic origin, and may have had something to do with the custom of the youngest son taking the inheritance at his father's death; for in many instances the youngest son would be only at that tender age when his father died. The custom of junior right in nearly all the places I have mentioned has now only an antiquarian interest, for the feudal right of primogeniture has superseded it; but it is very extraordinary how a custom that goes back to an almost fabulous antiquity has survived until comparatively recent years, not only in remote localities where laws and manners are stereotyped, but even in the heart of our busiest centres of population, where the hurrying steps of the crowd speedily stamp out of existence the boldest landmarks.

It is a curious circumstance that in many of our best-known fairy tales, such as "Hop-o'-my-Thumb," "Puss in Boots," and "The Adventures of John Dietrich," whose authorship is lost in hoary and weather-worn obscurity, but whose charming Saxon simplicity of style and intense realism of narration makes them fascinating to every new generation, there is a marked preference of the youngest son, who does the cleverest thing and displays the highest virtues. "Puss in Boots" is especially suggestive in this connection. In getting, as the youngest son, the household cat as his share of his father's property, the owner gets, as it turns out, the most valuable possession, which gains for him, by its extraordinary skill and resourcefulness, wealth and rank sufficient to satisfy the most unbounded ambition. And it may be mentioned, as a curious coincidence in regard to the superiority of youngest sons, that the men of Kent, who held their properties by this peculiar tenure, claimed the right to fight in the van of the feudal army of England.

There are many other fairy stories of a similar character, belonging to the East, dating from a remote antiquity, and having in many cases a deep religious significance, which might be brought forward as illustrations of the law of junior right. But it is in the Bible that we meet with the most numerous and remarkable examples of it. The whole social fabric of the sacred Book seems to have been built upon this foundation. Although the privileges of birthright were as completely developed, and as clearly defined, and had the same importance and significance in the days of Abraham as in the days of Moses, we find, nevertheless, that it is most frequently the youngest member of the family who is chosen for distinction and privilege. The chosen people from Adam down to Isaac had not always descended from the first-born. Not to Cain, but to Seth, they traced their ancestry. Abraham, the youngest of his father's household, receives the Divine call; Isaac is made his father's heir instead of Ishmael; Jacob, the younger son, receives the blessing of the first-born; Joseph rises to higher distinction than any of his brethren; Jacob, as we have seen, on his death-bed lays his right hand on the head of Ephraim, the younger son of Joseph; Moses becomes the leader of the Israelites, and not Aaron; David, the youngest of the sons of Jesse, is selected to be the King of Israel; and his successor on the throne is Solomon, one of his younger sons. Jesus is descended, not from the first-born tribe of Israel, but from Judah, and becomes Himself the true first-born of many brethren, procuring for us the right of the first-born from God; and in the household of faith Paul, the youngest born of the Apostles, who laboured more abundantly than them all, and achieved the greatest success, illustrates the same principle. All these apparently exceptional cases seem to point back to a time when the youngest was universally recognised as the heir of the family inheritance, and seem to be reversions to the older institution.

We thus see how God poured His revelation into the mould of human custom, and made the law of junior right to be essential to the welfare of society and the development of His own scheme of grace. It is good for the world that primogeniture should exist, but it is not for the good of the world that it should be made a rigid and inflexible rule, like the law of the Medes and Persians that changeth not. When, in the great epochs of the world, God passed by the elder sons and chose the younger to be the heirs of His promises and the fulfillers of His designs, He did not act capriciously. The election of the younger sons was amply justified by their future career. They proved their superiority to their elder brethren by the nobleness and usefulness of their lives. The purchase of the birthright from Esau for a mess of pottage gave Jacob only a nominal right to it. He had to show by his subsequent action that he was worthy to hold it. The reality of the birthright and all that it implied had to be acquired by stern struggle with circumstances, by a noble endurance of manifold sorrows, by the victorious triumph of faith over the besetting sins and weaknesses of his nature. The whole history of Jacob shows to us how through the discipline of God's providence and the dealings of His grace he was prepared to use the privileges and advantages of the firstborn in the manner which God intended; and it was solely because he showed himself to be the wiser and godlier man of the two—the true first-born—that Esau bowed down to him, and the elder served the younger.

And so it is still. The lot of younger sons seems at first sight to be a hard one. While the elder sons are destined to a life of ease and distinction within the safe and sheltered bounds of their inheritance, the younger sons have to go out into the world, and amid its hardships and temptations carve a future for themselves. It is hardly in human nature not to be envious of the prestige which birth confers, when the father's estate and the family title pass to the elder son, while the younger son is obliged to shift for himself without any of these advantages. But in many cases God has chosen for the younger son, not the worse, but the better lot. What Jacob gained by his hard struggle every younger son may gain. The annals of the race are full of the triumphs of younger sons. The greatest things done in the world have been done by those who have had no birthright privileges. Many a younger son has had reason to bless God that the birthright of inheritance and title had passed to the elder brother, while the birthright of hard work and noble self-denial and persevering industry was left to him. The elder has often lived to serve the younger, and his sheaf has bowed down before the ampler sheaf that has been reaped with greater toil. The world, too, has had reason in many cases to bless the selection. It has reared its cheaper souls in palaces and under glass, to produce stunted, barren growth; while its nobler souls have been left to grow in the shelterless open, exposed to all the winds of heaven, to blossom and fruit richly for mankind.

The Pride o' the Morning

By Agnes Giberne

SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS I.—XIII.

The story opens at Castle Hill, where Mrs. Keith lives with a young relative, Giles Randolph, who was left an orphan in childhood. Her own son, Colin, returns from a long stay on the Continent, and proposes to begin a career as a sculptor, to the mother's obvious but unexplained annoyance. Giles goes to Yorkshire to arrange, if possible, for his second cousin, Phyllys Wyverne, to pay a visit to Castle Hill. Her elder cousin Barbara and her grandmother, with whom they both live, are not anxious for the girl to see more of her relatives, but they have no good reason for refusing the invitation, which is accordingly accepted. Meanwhile Giles, attracted by Phyllys, pays another visit to the village of Midfell, where she lives, and is instrumental in rescuing her from a bog on the moors into which she has wandered in a mist. Phyllys arrives at Castle Hill, and, displaying great interest in Colin's art-work, gives him sittings for a bust, to Mrs. Keith's great irritation. One day she is sent to her hostess's room to fetch some silks and, going to the wrong piece of furniture, sees a portrait with a strong likeness to Colin. When Mrs. Keith hears that her visitor has seen this she is much agitated and, having extracted a promise from her of silence as to her discovery, she locks the portrait in a chest and throws the key into a pond.

CHAPTER XIV.

OF DUTY versus DESIRE.

GILES had not meant to ask Phyllys for that walk.

Reasoning with himself, after the studio scene, he had come to the conclusion that his duty was to hold for the present aloof, until he should see which way lay Colin's intentions. But when unexpectedly he met Phyllys on the stairs, when he read pleasure in her smile, his resolution melted like ice in tropical sunshine, and before he knew what he was doing the request slipped out.

And though he realised what his action meant, he did not draw back.

The evening passed without incident. Mr. Dugdale and his daughter came to dinner. Colin was not well enough to appear. Giles made futile efforts to carry out his morning's intention, and only succeeded in seeing and hearing nothing and nobody except Phyllys.

Through the long night following he had no sleep. Two wakeful hours he spent in bed; then he got up and dressed, and let himself out of the house, to walk fast and far in moonlight, fighting a tough battle.

He had to come to a decision one way or the other. The morning's resolution had now no force. Its failure only served to show more truly how things stood with him.

On arrival he had made his way softly into the studio, as was his wont, expecting to find Colin absorbed in his beloved occupation, caring for nought else, wrapped up in his efforts to reproduce in clay some form of beauty. He had been told that Mrs. Keith was out; he had taken for granted that Phyllys was with her. And when he stood within the studio door, it was to see, not Colin only, but Phyllys also; the two seated near together—Phyllys with downcast eyes and soft flush, a half-shy, conscious look upon the sweet face which he had never been able to evoke; while Colin's rapt gaze, and the light in those clear blue eyes, told the worst!

At the instant Giles's one sensation had been of furious wrath against Colin for daring to interfere with his aim, his love—wrath that he would have felt towards any man who should have dared to come after his Phyllys. Already in his secret soul he looked upon her thus.

XUM

But in the silence of his own room before luncheon, and far more in the dimness of the moonlit lanes at night, as he strode along, other counsels succeeded—other elements would not be denied attention. It was no simple matter of two men, both in love with one girl, waiting to see which she might prefer. The question really was, If Colin had set his heart on Phyllys, ought Giles to seek her at all? Ought he not at once to give up the thought of her?

As an abstract question, this carried no difficulty. To his own mind the duty was plain. If Colin loved Phyllys, the right thing for him was to step back, to leave the coast clear.

Years earlier, under stress of peculiar circumstances, Giles had made a definite resolve never to stand in the way of Colin's happiness, never to permit himself any joy, any pleasure, any good, which might re-act in the form of pain or loss for Colin. He had registered this resolve as a solemn vow in the recesses of his own heart. The resolve rose up and faced him, while he hurried through lonely lanes, restless and wretched, unable to see his way. Cold moonlight, flooding fields on either side, seemed alive with one word—"Remember!" Black tree shadows, lying in patches at his feet, echoed, "Remember!" The creak of a heavy elm-bough, swayed by the breeze, groaned, "Remember!" The cry of an owl in a neighbouring wood sounded the same solemn "Remember!"

He did remember! He would never forget the long agony, the heart-breaking misery, the awful double load of woe, which had culminated in that vehement resolve. If life should last a hundred years, each separate incident of those days would remain fresh and vivid in his mind to the last.

That he should ever in years to come, under any imaginable provocation, be betrayed into wrath with Colin had seemed to lie beyond the range of possibility. And until the day just ended he had not only shown no anger, but had never been tempted to show it. He had found it easy to preserve his self-control, to feel no annoyance about aught that Colin chanced to say or do.

Now the testing time had come. Now in one fell moment his resolve had broken down. Now, not only had he under sudden stress given way to violent anger, but his temper was not conquered, and he found his past resolution madly opposed by the full force of his own being.

He was free to draw back. He had not yet openly and avowedly sought Phyllys. Thus far he had been outwardly, to the best of his knowledge, no more than cousin and friend. Whatever he had felt at Midfell, he had not shown it. He would do her no wrong by retiring in favour of Colin, by giving him the first innings. He would wrong no one but himself. And in the light of that past, which to-day was keenly present to his mind, he realised that it was only right—a matter of simple justice—that he of all men should refuse to stand between Colin and happiness. The question was not, "Ought he?" but "Could he?"

As he walked and thought, he made up his mind that he would do the thing that was right, that he would carry out his early resolution, that he would endure the cost.

So during hours of moonlight, followed by darkness. But in the chill light of dawn, as he tramped wearily back to his room—tired, not with bodily exertion, but with mental strain—another spirit took possession of him.

He had meant to get off taking his walk with Phyllys. Better for him, safer and wiser, that he should not go. Yet when it came to the point he made no effort. He let things drift. He had the walk for which he craved.

Then, for yielding, he was the weaker, as for yielding one can hardly fail to be. A paralysis seemed to lay hold upon him, though his had always been reckoned a firm and manly will. And when at length he sat by her side, on the river bank, seeing nothing but the outlines of that slim, girlish figure and the sweet girlish face, he knew that, even for Colin's sake he could not give her up. He could not! There was a limit to what might be expected of a man, and this reached beyond the limit.

In so short a space of time she had grown to be everything to him—to be his love, his life, his all. One little month before she was but a name—Phyllys Wyverne, younger granddaughter of his old great-aunt, living in the wilds of Yorkshire. He was vaguely interested in her, as his heiress-presumptive, and supposed that one day they might meet again. She was a pretty and winning child, he recalled. But whether they met or not was of no particular moment. Then they met, and his life was changed. Now nothing in the world was of moment, except the one passionate overwhelming desire to win her for his own.

Give her up to Colin! See those two by-and-by husband and wife! Her sweetness all for Colin! Her love, Colin's right! Himself, in measureless desolation!

He could not do it! The thing was impossible; the idea was preposterous.

Colin had been always dear to him, more dear than a brother. But beside this new absorbing passion, that quiet affection faded out of sight and became as nought. Not that he did not care for him still, but that Phyllys was everything to him, Phyllys filled his heart, Phyllys was his world, his universe.

True, even if he held aloof now, she might in the end reject Colin, and he would then be free to seek her. But of this he had small hope.

He also felt his own position with regard to Phyllys not unhopeful. She liked him, she was friendly, cousinly, even confiding. To persevere now might mean success.

And if success for him meant disappointment, unhappiness, perchance despair, for Colin! Again the past rolled up; again he saw his own resolve, and the causes which led to it.

"One may have strained ideas of duty," he muttered doggedly. "There is such a thing as common sense in the affairs of life."

Yes; and there is also such a thing as putting self aside for the sake of another.

This, too, he knew. But he saw once more her sweetness, and resistance collapsed. He acknowledged himself beaten.

CHAPTER XV.

OF A PAST EPISODE.

"So you are staying for some time at Castle Hill," observed Kathleen Alyn, with her gracious air of interest.

The two ladies were under a tree on the lawn, Mr. Dugdale having retreated, after tea, to a basket-chair and a book, within ear-shot. Giles had walked with Phyllys and Gordon to Brook-End Grange, and had stayed to luncheon. A business engagement now claimed him, and Mrs. Alyn would not hear of Phyllys going before six o'clock. Since she welcomed the delay, nothing remained for Giles but gloomily to depart alone.

"I'm afraid not. Mrs. Keith did ask me to stay longer, but Grannie gave leave only for three weeks." Phyllys did not hear her own sigh. "The days are going so awfully fast."

"You don't begin to feel home-sick yet?"

"No. Ought I?"

"It is natural that you should enjoy change. Midfell seems so out of the world."

"It is out of the world. It belongs to two centuries ago. Everything and everybody is half-asleep."

"So that even quiet Castle Hill seems almost gay by contrast."

Phyllys considered. "No, not gay, but awake—alive. One sees and learns here."

"You begin to know Giles and Colin by this time?"

"The one I don't get to know is Mrs. Keith."

"I doubt if Mrs. Keith knows herself. But Giles and Colin—I wonder which of the two strikes you on an early acquaintance as the finer character."

"Is it an early acquaintance?" Phyllys began to feel as if she had known them always. "But they are so unlike. One can hardly compare them."

"Colin is very popular."

Mr. Dugdale was peering over the edge of his book. "So is Giles among his own set. Which does Phyllys say she prefers?"

"I didn't say either," laughed Phyllys. "I like both, each in his own way.'"

"One feels so sorry for poor Colin," remarked Kathleen, and, as once before, the word annoyed Phyllys.

"I can't see why one should be sorry for him," she said warmly. "He is to be envied, not pitied. He is so much above ordinary men. I think he can very well afford not to be so—so——"

"Muscular," suggested Mr. Dugdale. "I see you rate a man's intellect above his biceps."

"Don't you?"

"Some do not, in this athletic age."

"But I do," decisively. "And Colin is a genius. That is a thousand times better than being able to walk thirty miles without feeling tired."

"Colin is to be congratulated. He has found someone to fight his battles." Mr. Dugdale lowered his book, and scanned Phyllys with quizzical eyes. She stood her ground, though not without heightening colour.

"I mean it. I would rather be a genius than anything in the world. Much, much rather than be rich and strong."

"Not that Colin fails in the length of his walks," murmured Mr. Dugdale. "It's rather in the extent of his mental exertions!"

"That was what I meant—that he cannot use his powers," put in Kathleen. "He has always been hampered by ill-health, ever since he was sixteen."

"Not before?"

"No. He was delicate-looking, but very wiry, and up to anything. Giles was the more robust in make, but Colin could outdo even Giles in endurance."

"Giles was not the more robust in their infancy," declared Mr. Dugdale.

"He was when I first knew them, father. But Colin had such spirit! He never flagged, and nothing ever ailed him, till that unhappy accident changed his life."

"What was the accident?" asked Phyllys. "No one has ever told me."

"Your grandmother must have heard at the time. You will hear no mention of it at Castle Hill. Mrs. Keith dislikes the subject, and neither Giles nor Colin ever allude to what happened. They were so devoted to poor little Elsye." A word from Phyllys made her add, "Did you not know that Elsye Wallace was killed then?"

"No. Please tell me about it."

"She and the boys were always together. It was pretty to see them—she like a little queen, and they her devoted knights. A lovely child, full of fun, yet always with that pathetic look in her eyes which you see on the memorial window. Quite unnatural, for there never was a happier being."

"But what was the accident?"

"They were at the seaside. Elsye had been poorly, and Mrs. Keith took her away for change with the boys. Rather unusual, for she has never liked Dr. Wallace, and I do not think she cared for Elsye. Still, it came about somehow—perhaps brought on by Giles. He was tolerably masterful even at sixteen, as you may imagine."

Phyllys assented.

"And he worshipped Elsye: it was adoration. Colin was very fond of her, but not in the same vehement style. One day they were on the cliff, and I suppose were playing too near the edge. Nobody ever seemed to know precisely how it happened, but Elsye and Colin fell over. There was a rough shingle beach below, with rock-boulders lying about. Elsye, I believe, slipped and dragged Colin with her; and Giles was just too late to save them. Elsye was undermost, and she never regained consciousness. Colin's head struck on a rock, and he was stunned; but at the time they did not think him so badly hurt. Everybody's attention was taken up with Elsye. She breathed for an hour or two, but died before her father could arrive."

"How dreadful for them all!"

"It was dreadful; all the more because one could not help feeling that the boys ought to have been more careful. When I saw them a fortnight later, Giles seemed all at once to have grown into a man—so grave and silent, so different altogether. Colin looked awfully ill, and we thought it was Elsye's death. We supposed that he was feeling it even more than Giles. But in time it came out that he was suffering fearfully from his head, and was making a desperate fight to keep about as usual, so that nobody might know. He soon had a complete breakdown, and was much worse than if he had been taken in hand at first. He had fallen with the back of his head against a boulder, and the doctors said that the front part of the brain had been badly jarred against the skull by the concussion; so there was double injury. For more than two years he was constantly ill, often kept for days in a dark room. The boy's patience was wonderful, and the pluck with which he would struggle to be well the moment he was a trifle easier! Of course, school was out of the question. He was hardly allowed to look at a book. Giles used to read to him when he could bear to listen, which was not for a long while. The marvel is to me that he has turned out what he is, considering his disadvantages. Still, there always is a something about him not quite like other men. He lives a life of his own; and he is so dreamy, so mystical, if that is the right word."

"He is a genius," remarked Phyllys, as if that explained everything.

"Public school life would have done his genius no harm. I wish he could have had it."

"He didn't model—then?"

"Mrs. Keith snubbed him whenever he began. He always was trying. Of course, as a boy, he could not take his own way as he can now. She tried him very much at times, made him ill when he might have been fairly well. The least worry always brings on his headache, and she can't help worrying. Colin somehow excites her, while she never minds anything done by Giles."

"My dear, she is a woman with a temper; but her material prosperity depends on her keeping straight with Giles," asserted Mr. Dugdale.

"Yet I have seen him furious with her, for Colin's sake."

"Is Giles a man with a temper?" suddenly asked Phyllys.

"I should hardly call him so," Mrs. Alyn replied indulgently. "He is not touchy about little things—not quick to imagine slights or to take offence. But if once he is upset——"

She made a significant pause. Mr. Dugdale's book had risen to its former position, and he looked anew over its edge.

"My nephew Jack was at school with Giles. He once remarked that it took a jolly lot to put Giles into a wax. But when once, by combined and sustained efforts, that feat had been accomplished, Jack's expression was, 'My eyes! we fellows take care to be in the tree-tops, out of his reach.'"

"Yes, I suppose he could be angry," murmured Phyllys.

"But never with Colin," added Kathleen.

Phyllys was silent. She knew better.

CHAPTER XVI.

OF A VANISHED PORTRAIT.

"ARE you really better? I'm glad."

Phyllys spoke warmly. Dinner was over, and she and Mrs. Keith had quitted the dining-room, leaving Giles with Mr. Dugdale—this evening, as often, a self-invited guest. Mrs. Keith had gone to her boudoir, and Phyllys, entering the drawing-room, found Colin.

He had been three days invisible, prostrate with headache; and she had been told that he could not appear. Here, however, he was, leaning back in the deep armchair, close to the oriel window. He stood up when she came in, despite an eager "Oh, don't!" but was evidently glad to go back to his former position. She sat down, and scanned the ivory-tinted face, which rested against a crimson chair-back.

"Ought you to have come down?" she asked, as one hand was pressed slowly over the fair hair, its slender fingers perceptibly thinner for three days of starvation and intense pain.

"Thanks, I'm all right now."

"You won't work again yet?"

"Not just yet." His look baffled her.

She glanced at a book lying on his knee, half-open, his hand between the leaves. "Have you been trying to read?"

"Not much. There's a paragraph by Kingsley that I thought you might like."

"May I see it?" She took the book, and read eagerly aloud the sentence indicated:

"'Never lose an opportunity of seeing anything beautiful. Beauty is God's handwriting—a wayside sacrament. Welcome it in every fair face, every fair sky, every fair flower, and thank for it Him, the Fountain of all loveliness, and drink it in simply and earnestly with all your eyes. It is a charmed draught, a cup of blessing.'"

Phyllys' eyes glistened, and her own face at the moment was very fair with thoughts evoked.

"I'm glad you've shown me that. Thanks very much. It is just what one wants to feel—to do. If beauty really is that, one can't possibly be wrong in loving it."

"One might rather be wrong not to value it," he suggested.

"But——" and a pause. "There are ugly things in Nature."

"Many things that we stamp as ugly are not so. Part of our condemnation is conventional. Part is due to our imperfect sight. We don't detect the exquisite finish, or the balancing of parts. What looks to us like ugliness may belong merely to roughness of outline, due to our blindness. Then, too, we fail to make out the true inwardness. The beauty of Divine handwriting may be there, yet the Key is wanting, and we can't translate into the vernacular."

"You wouldn't say that there is beauty in everything?"

"No. But there is an enormous amount more of it than men in general can see. It needs a trained eye and a brain awake. Form and colour are lost upon those who are Nature-blind and Art-blind. And for the most part you will find unlovely outlines—hardness and stiffness and angularity—in human conceptions, not in Divine."

"You once praised flat surfaces in sculpture," she suggested with quickness.

"Flat surfaces in sculpture and in Nature don't mean the rigid flatness of a sheet of iron. There are always delicate mouldings, roundings, the melting, so to speak, of one surface into another. Don't you see? Nature's divisions, like Nature's tints, merge softly by gradations. You don't find accurate squares and oblongs. And in a rainbow no man living can define where one colour ends and the next begins."

She smiled acquiescence. Colin's words had generally power to set her thinking. She did not know how rarely he opened out like this; how studiously was his true self hidden from the world in general. In Giles she saw the reserve of a man habitually silent; but she had not divined in Colin the deeper reserve of an apparent frankness which yet told nothing.

XUM

Once in a way he found it possible to be really frank with Phyllys; but she was almost the sole living exception. As a rule he never brought to the surface those things of which he thought the most, for which he cared the most.

He murmured another quotation: "'Nature is a poem written by God, and Art is man's translation of it.' I forget who said that. But if Nature is a Divine poem, the least we can do is to try to read it."

Phyllys repeated the words to herself, and considered them.

"I wonder whether all sculptors feel as you do?" she questioned presently.

"I was not speaking especially from the sculptor's point of view." His voice had altered, losing its earnestness, becoming indifferent. Without looking up, Phyllys knew that he and she were no longer alone.

Mrs. Keith had appeared, and it became evident that she was in one of her restless moods. She had not known that Colin meant to come down, and the fact of her own ignorance seemed to annoy her. She could not sit still, but fidgeted from chair to chair, talking in high-pitched tones without a break.

There was a draught from the oriel window, and would Colin mind its being shut? No, she really couldn't have any window open, it was so chilly. If he wanted more air, why did he not sit in the study? Mr. Dugdale would be in directly, and Mr. Dugdale was such a fatiguing person, particularly if one had a headache. Her advice had been that Colin should stay upstairs another night; but Colin never did take advice, as all the world knew; much better for him if he would.

All this and a great deal more was endured with a calm which Phyllys had earlier taken for unshakeable serenity. She knew better now. She had learnt to decipher the slight dent in his forehead, the slight pressure of his under-lip, the increased slowness of the soft dragging voice; and this evening, as she speedily saw, his self-control was more severely tested than usual from physical weakness.

But Mrs. Keith, whose one aim was to separate those two, to have Phyllys as a "close preserve" for Giles, saw nothing. She fidgeted, fussed, and talked till the door opened.

"Here they come!" And she started up. "Now we must have some music. I want Phyllys to play the Moonlight Sonata again."

Giles interposed curtly. "Not to-night. Colin can't stand it."

Colin frowned slightly. "Pray make no difference for me," he said. "If you do, I must decamp."

"But we don't want music. Nobody wants it. We all want to talk," urged Phyllys. "And I'm only too thankful not to have to play."

She greeted Giles with a smile, and he came to stand by her side, not speaking. She waited for him to begin, glancing from his tall, solid figure to Colin's thin outlines. Mrs. Keith was insisting still, energetically, almost loudly, on music. Phyllys played so prettily, and she and Giles loved listening. Colin would not mind, she knew.

"Of course not. Shall I get the sonata?" asked Colin.

"Nonsense!" There was a roughness in the timbre of Giles' voice which Phyllys had heard before, and it always took her by surprise; it was so unlike the voice she had learnt to know at Midfell. "Nonsense!" he repeated. "You must keep still."

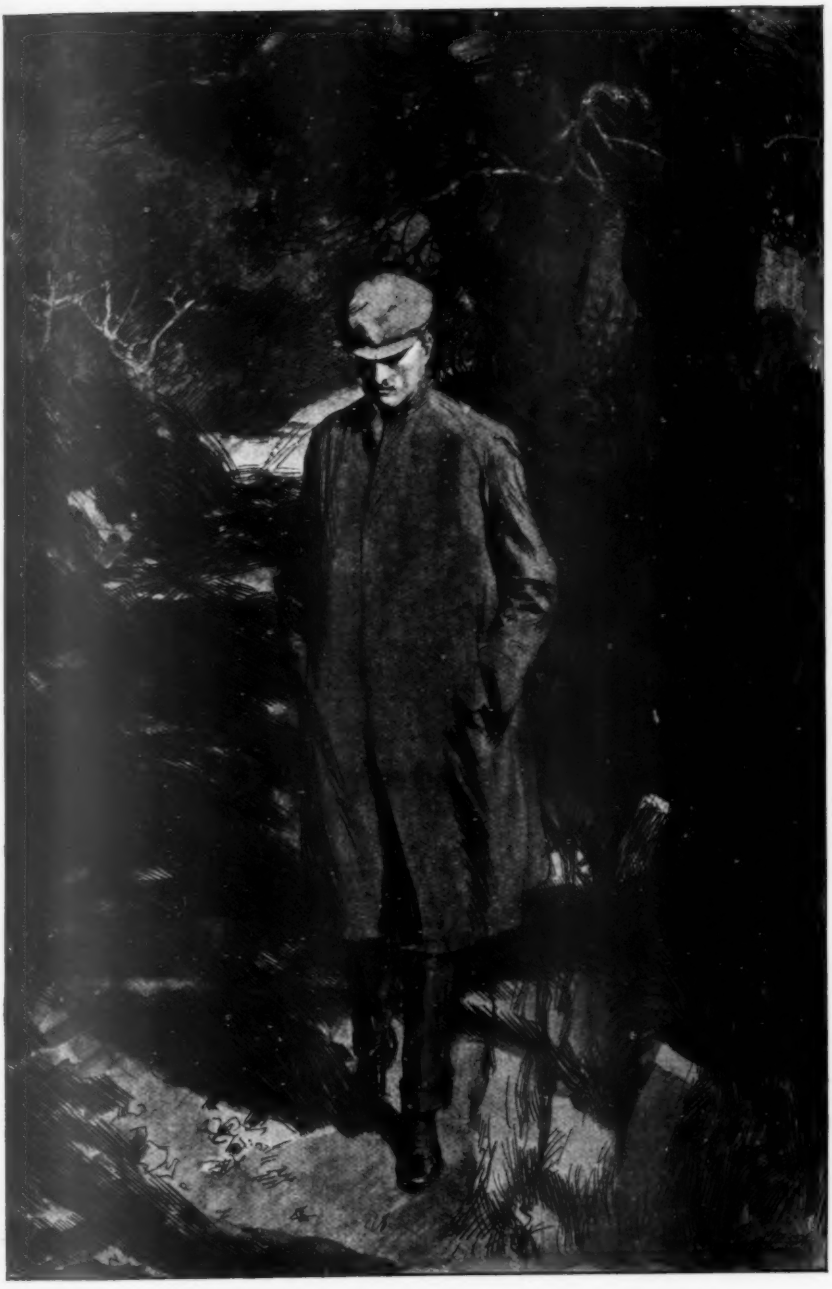
Phyllys gave the speaker one reproachful glance, then turned to Colin. He was submitting, but not as if obliged to do so. There was a curious reticent dignity in his manner at the moment. She met his eyes—clear, blue depths, steady and penetrative, full of expression—and wondered whom it was that he recalled. The hidden picture flashed up before her mind, and she forgot the question of music, gazing at him.

Somebody else gazed also. Mr. Dugdale broke into an exclamation which might have been an echo of Phyllys' thoughts:

"Odd! there's that look again!"

"Isn't he like?" Phyllys all but said. The words were on her lips, when she checked them, remembering that she had undertaken never to allude to the picture, and that nobody except herself and Mrs. Keith were supposed to be aware of its existence.

Yet plainly Mr. Dugdale was aware. What could Mrs. Keith have meant?



"Extraordinary!" continued the cool, cynical tones. "I've not taken a look at the portrait for ages, but my memory is good. Colin brings it back to me."

"I don't understand," remarked Colin.

"The Vandyke, of course—Giles's ancestor—in a corner of the gallery. Used to hang in this room once upon a time. You've developed a most astonishing resemblance to it."

Mrs. Keith stood listening, her face hard set, her fingers clutched about her fan.

"You had that fancy before," she said. "Utterly ridiculous and impossible!"

"Black tree shadows . . . . echoed Remember!'"—p. 984.

For once she made a mistake. Had she acquiesced, the matter might have dropped. Opposition made Mr. Dugdale eager to prove his point.

"We'll compare him with the original. Come, Colin."

Colin did not stir. "Another time," he suggested.

"Oh, ah! I forgot your head. Well, I'll take a look myself. Never can imagine why that painting should have been banished to the darkest corner in the house!" he muttered as he went—not the first time he had made such a remark.

He was gone a considerable time, and Mrs. Keith moved about restlessly, as if unable to sit still. Phyllys thought her looking old and haggard. The mouth had a drawn look. No further mention was made of music. When at length Mr. Dugdale returned, it was to say bluntly:

"Been moved again! Where, pray?"

"The portrait not there?" asked Giles in surprise.

"Not anywhere that I can discover. I've looked all round."

"But, of course, it is!" exclaimed Mrs. Keith, facing him indignantly. "It has not been moved."

"Not taken from that corner?" Mr. Dugdale gazed hard, and she met his gaze.

"Certainly not, unless Giles——"

Giles made a negative gesture.

"It is not there now," stated Mr. Dugdale in his most dogmatic manner.

"You are sure you have not overlooked it?"

"Come and see for yourself." The two went off, and Mrs. Keith sat down.

"How hot it is! I should like the window open!"

Phyllys started up, but was forestalled by Colin. He remained at the casement, as if thankful for the stream of outer air. Mrs. Keith moved again, wandering restlessly to the further end of the large room, and Phyllys asked in an undertone, "Why should Mr. Dugdale want to prove that you are like that picture?"

"I don't know." Colin spoke wearily, as if the discussion tired him. "I suppose, having once made the assertion, he is bent on showing himself to be in the right."

"You don't care whether you are like it or not?"

"Not a fig! Anybody may be like anybody. I've met a dog in a crowded street who looked at me with the very eyes of a worthy old aunt of mine. And an eagle at the Zoo was the counterpart in profile of an excellent Vicar. Why shouldn't I indulge in a passing resemblance to any old picture?"

She could not rival his indifference, and waited in suspense till the two came back, Mr. Dugdale saying triumphantly:

"Just as I told you! Vanished!"

"The picture gone? You really mean to say that it is not there?" Mrs. Keith drew near with amazed eyes. "My dear Giles! You must both be dreaming. Not there?"

"It is not in the gallery."

"But where can it be?"

"That is the question. We have to find out."

"Certainly you must find out," broke in Mr. Dugdale. "A valuable ancestral portrait can't be allowed to disappear."

Mrs. Keith gave an odd laugh, as if amused. "But, Giles, it is impossible. The thing can't have walked off of itself."

"No. To-morrow morning I must question the servants."

"The servants would not dare! And they could have no object in moving it."

"They might happen to know its value. Not that I suspect them. It is rather a question whether anyone has been in the house who might have walked off with it."

Her face lighted up, as with a brilliant idea. "Giles!" she exclaimed.

He waited.

"I remember now! That evening when we heard steps about the house! You can't have forgotten! When we thought a thief had got in."

Giles seemed half convinced.

"I've never noticed the painting since that day, and it seems that you have not either," added Mrs. Keith.

"I have not looked for it."

"It was in its place before. It is not in its place now. What other explanation is possible?"

"If it was taken then, I can't understand its not being missed sooner," objected Mr. Dugdale.

"Why should it be? Nobody has given it a thought."

Giles was silent, his mind only half-attentive. His glance had wandered to Colin, who was trying to decipher Phyllys' downcast face. She looked up, met his eyes, and blushed. Giles's sombreness increased.

"Great mistake its ever having been removed from this room," Mr. Dugdale declared.

"A mistake possibly, but a most natural one. The picture was utterly out of its place in a drawing-room. Mr. Penrhyn did not mind."

"Mr. Penrhyn never minded anything."

"At all events I acted for the best. One can't do more. Of course, I never dreamt of thieves getting to it."

"I shall not rest till it is found," said Giles.

In Phyllys' mind a thought had suggested itself. Was it possible that Mrs. Keith might be a trifle "peculiar" mentally—a degree "touched in the upper storey"? Could it be that she suffered from delusions; that she had herself hidden the lost picture, honestly believing it to be, as she had stated, the portrait of her own brother? Or were there two old portraits—the one of Giles's ancestor, stolen by a thief; the other of Mrs. Keith's brother, its existence unknown? In the latter case it would be odd that Colin should resemble both portraits, yet less odd than might appear at first sight, since one was the likeness of his own uncle.

"Poor thing!" mused Phyllys. "I dare say that is why Giles is so good to her, and hardly ever contradicts anything she says. And perhaps it is why Colin sometimes has to get the upper hand—not to give in too much."

One thing was clear—that Phyllys herself could not interfere. By definitely promising never to mention the existence of the picture she had seen she was debarred from saying anything.

The butler brought in a telegram addressed to herself, and she opened it with some trepidation, telegrams at Midfell being rare.

"Grandmother ill; come home to-morrow by early train," she read.

Her face changed, and she saw those around change also. That of Mrs. Keith might have expressed relief. Giles was silent, and he had the look of one who has received a blow. Was it her fancy that Colin's pale face grew paler?

Then she knew that Mrs. Keith was talking, was exclaiming, inquiring, protesting, advising, in a breath. Perhaps there was some mistake. Would Phyllys like to telegraph inquiries? It seemed such a pity to cut short her visit. She had intended Phyllys to stay at least another six weeks. There was a very early train, of course, if she had to go, but was it really necessary? One never could tell what telegrams meant, they were so curtly worded; still, it might not be anything serious.

"Grannie must be very ill, or Barbara would not send for me," Phyllys said gravely. She stood up, taking the decision into her own hands. "Could someone tell me the first train?"

"The 7.10," Colin observed.

"Is that too early for me to get to the station? Thanks. Then I will go by it. I had better put up my things to-night." She glanced from one to another. "I am so sorry. It has been a very happy time, and you have all been so good to me. But, of course, I have to leave."

She went quickly upstairs, and Mrs. Keith soon followed.

"Giles is looking out particulars for your journey," she said. "He will go with you to the junction, and will put you into a through carriage for the north. Your packing shall be done for you, my dear. It is early still, and you can come down for another half-hour perhaps; but, of course, you must get to bed in good time. We are all so sorry about this. I had written to Mrs. Wyverne to beg for a longer stay. No; I did not tell you. But you must come to us again some day."

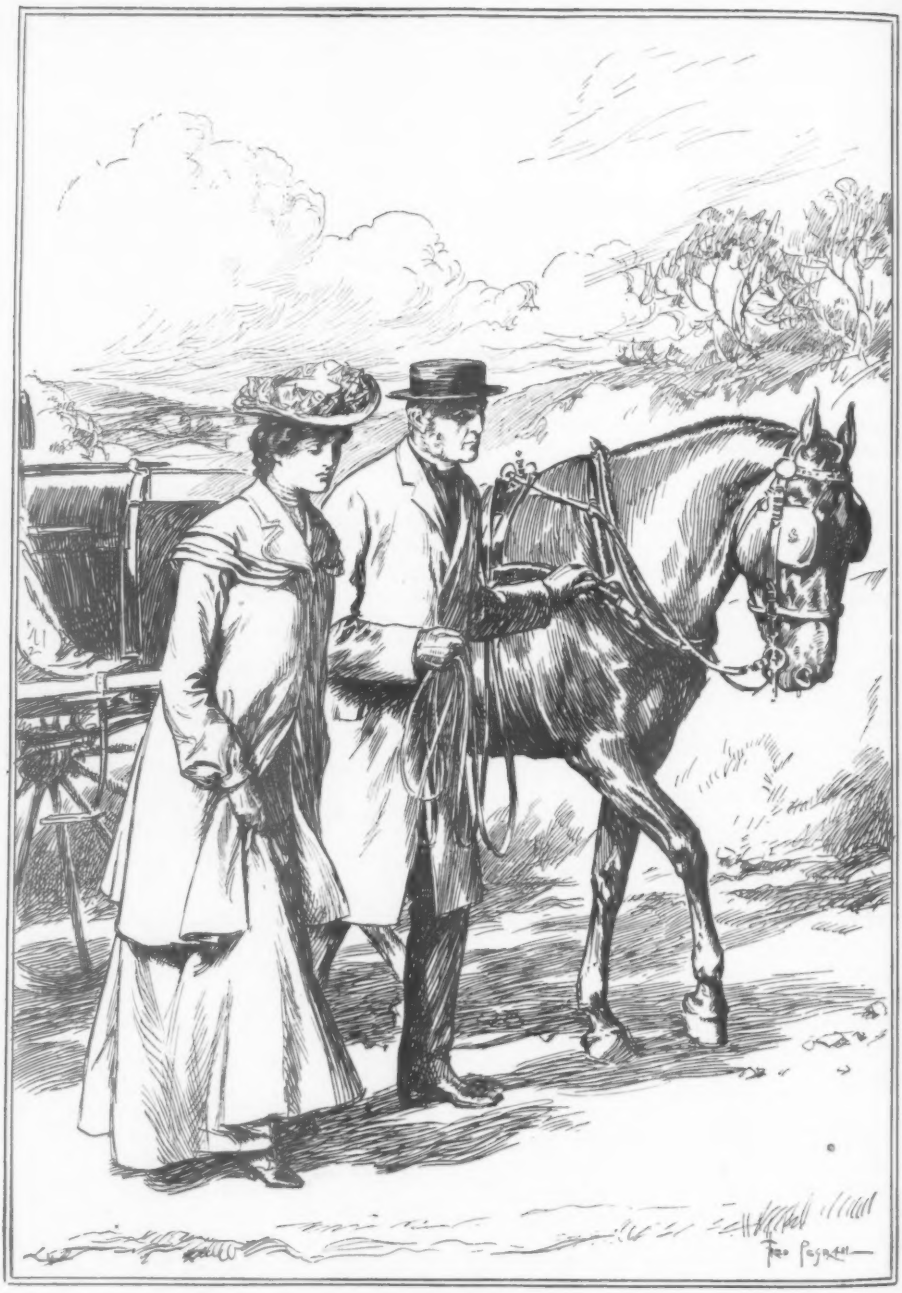
Phyllys tried to listen. She felt curiously stunned; whether more at the thought of her grandmother's probable danger, or more at the abrupt need to leave Castle Hill, she hardly knew. The former she did not yet consciously grasp; the latter was a pressing pain. She dimly wondered why the pain should be so acute.

Mrs. Keith moved about the room, restless still.

"About that picture?" she said. "Odd, isn't it?"

She broke into a laugh.

"I could not help remembering," murmured Phyllys. "Of course, I said nothing, as I had promised."



Mrs. Keith wore a look of astonishment, almost of perplexity.

"You could not help remembering—what?"

"The portrait I saw in your cabinet—the one so like Colin. Don't you know?" as Mrs. Keith seemed puzzled. "When I went to look for the piece of silk."

"My dear, how droll!" Mrs. Keith laughed again, rather loudly. "That you should think of the two together, I mean. It is quite comic. I am very glad you did not say what you thought, though, of course, you could not, because you had given your promise."

"No. I remembered."

"He offered no protest, and they mounted the stiff rise in silence."—p. 995.

"Besides, that is my own private affair altogether—the likeness of my brother, I mean. Dear fellow! how long it is since I saw him. But, as I told you, nobody knows of that picture, and it is worth nothing to anybody except myself. This unfortunate disappearance is another matter. The picture that we cannot find is a family heirloom by a famous artist, and is of great value—the likeness of one of Giles's ancestors. Mr. Dugdale's notion of its being like Colin is simply ridiculous. There is no likeness at all." Her cheeks had hot red spots, as if she were angry. "He is such a fanciful man, always imagining things. The resemblance that you saw is real enough, and only what one might expect. But this notion of Mr. Dugdale's: if it were less absurd, one might be annoyed at his persistency. But that is Mr. Dugdale all over. If once he says a thing, he sticks to what he has said for the rest of his life."

She paused for a moment.

"The loss of that picture is a real misfortune. Giles will never rest till he has found it. He has all the persistency of the Randolph nature. Not much chance of his succeeding, I am afraid, for the thief has had plenty of time to get rid of it—most likely has sent it to America for sale. But if you should ever be questioned, my dear—which is not very likely, as you do not even know the old painting—if you should be, please remember that there is no connection between the two things. You must guard yourself carefully, in talking about the family heirloom, not to allude to my brother's portrait—not to break your word."

Then she moved towards the door. "Now we will go down, and have a last little talk together."

CHAPTER XVII.

OF REVERSION TO A RUT.

BARBARA PRINGLE stood outside a small garden-gate in Midfell, interviewing her friend, Miss Robins.

"I felt it to be my duty," she was remarking, and grim resolution squared her jaw, perhaps auguring uneasiness of mind—"I felt it to be my duty to act. My grandmother has fretted quite ridiculously about Phyllys. The child never ought to have been allowed to go. Most undesirable influences! And the coolness of Mrs. Keith, asking to keep her another six weeks! Of course, Phyllys put her up to it. That was what made my grandmother ill yesterday. I telegraphed on my own responsibility. It seemed to be right."

"Unquestionably. Unequivocably," purred Miss Robins. "And really dear Mrs. Wyverne was very far from well."

"Yes; quite a sharp attack. At her age one never knows what it may mean. I did not mention what I had done till this morning's telegram told us when to expect Phyllys. By that time, of course, she was on her way."

"So she could not be stopped? How sensible!" declared Miss Robins approvingly.

"The fuss made with her at Castle Hill has been too absurd. Her head will have been completely turned. I wish I could have gone to meet her myself, but it was out of the question. When Mr. Hazel offered, one had to agree."

Meanwhile, Phyllys, reaching Garfield station, nearly ten miles off, looked out for some familiar face. If no "lift" were available, a cab would have been ordered; but those who owned vehicles at Midfell seldom failed to place them at the disposal of those who had none.

Nor was she disappointed. As the train steamed in, she caught a glimpse of the Vicarage pony carriage, then found herself face to face with the Vicar. His ruddy face was framed in soft grey hair; a shapeless wide-awake sat far back on his broad head; tan gloves of unknown antiquity were gripped in one rugged veined hand; the other was outstretched in welcome; and a beaming but embarrassed smile lit up his features.

"Well, little Pride o' the Morning," he said, using cheerily his favourite name for her, "so here you are! Bright and well, eh? We are glad to have you again."

"But Grannie?" she questioned anxiously.

Mr. Hazel, recalling his wife's injunctions—injunctions primed by Barbara—but forgetting exactly what he had been told to say, smiled perplexedly.

"Oh, ah! yes—to be sure, yes! She was rather ailing yesterday. Upset and out of sorts, your cousin said. They had to send for Mr. Jones, and he thought her——" The sentence died into a mumble. "But she is all right again to-day, so no need to worry your little head." Which was the very remark that Barbara had expressly stipulated should not be made. "Now for your luggage." And to escape further questioning he marched along the platform to the spot where her trunks lay waiting. The smaller could be carried with them; the larger was to be sent next day. Mr.

Hazel gave directions, and Phyllys stood by in silence.

She understood. His words had made all clear, bringing the truth before her in one sinister flash of revealment. She had been pale before; she grew now white to the lips.

It was Barbara's doing; Barbara had summoned her home, without need, without cause; Barbara had cut short her delight and happiness. But for Barbara's interference she might still be—might now at this moment be—at Castle Hill with her friends!

She saw the whole; yet at first she said nothing. She dared not say anything, dared not let herself go. So strong, so fierce, was the wave of resentment which rolled up in her heart that it all but had the mastery.

But she held herself in, following the Vicar, hearing the orders that he gave. She went out of the station by his side, listened like one in a dream to his remarks, and patted kindly her old friend the Vicarage "pony," so called, though really a fine cob, who lifted his head in pleased response at the sound of her voice. And all the while that great wave below the surface was surging to and fro.

It frightened her. She had never felt so wrathful. Hers was naturally a quick temper, quick to take fire, quick to burn itself out. "A flash in the pan," her father had laughingly called it. She had many a time been annoyed with Barbara, but never to this burning extent.

As they drove through the small town, calling at the post-office and at one or two shops, she was silent still, feeling rather than thinking, for her thoughts were in a maze of confusion. Pain was sharp. It seemed so hard that she should not have had to the end her little time of pleasure. The visit had meant so much to her!

And to have her joy cut short for nothing—absolutely nothing!—by Barbara's interference: she hardly knew how to endure it! Again and again that wave of passionate resentment all but mastered her.

Mr. Hazel, busy with the reins and with his shopping, did not at first notice that aught was wrong. Gradually it dawned upon him that the bright smile was lacking, the merry voice still.

He waited, as it was his way to wait; watchful, without seeming to watch. And not till they had left the town and had begun the first long, slow ascent after, did the storm that was raging find expression. He put some slight question to her. She turned a rigid face to him, and said in low, resolute tones:

"Then Barbara has cheated me out of my pleasure! Grannie has not been ill! There was no need for me to come home!"

Between the claims of truth and a desire not to compromise other people the Vicar was in difficulties. He gave a gentle jerk to the reins, and murmured indistinct words.

"Barbara is not nervous." Phyllys caught that suggestion, only to repudiate it. She sat bolt upright, looking ahead. "Barbara is never nervous."

Another murmur. This time she caught the word "mistake."

"No; there is no mistake. It is done on purpose. She knew how happy I was, how I wanted to stay a little longer; and she could not bear me to be happy. She loves to make me miserable. It is her doing."

The Vicar made no hasty rejoinder. He cast a concerned glance at the set face, commented silently to himself on the thunder-cloud overshadowing his "Pride o' the Morning," and chirruped to the cob. A fresh pull carried them on faster, till the increased gradient made slowness a necessity. Then he jumped out, lightly for his years.

"Take the reins, child."

"No." She was already by his side. "Cobweb has weight enough with my box."

He offered no protest, and they mounted the stiff rise in silence, the Vicar keeping up an easy, long-limbed swing, born of habit. No quickened breath troubled him, and the reins hung loosely over one wrist, or were flung upon the cob's back, a word sufficing for guidance.

Phyllys, deep in thought, showed no signs of fatigue, though this came at the end of a long journey. As they ascended, the widening view of distant moors, the rich tints of the fell over which their road led, spoke to her with the calming power which Nature has over some minds. Three times she forgot herself, standing lost in contemplation. Each time the Vicar halted, as if for Cobweb's sake, and the look which crept into her face gladdened his heart. A fourth time this happened, and she glanced towards him, smiling.

"I didn't know how lovely it was!" she said. "Must we hurry? There's plenty of time. I didn't know how dearly I loved it all. Those wavy lines against the sky! And the purples and greens—and the bracken!"

She remembered Colin's quotation, "Drink it in with all your eyes"—and into the words new meaning dawned. Eyes of the body, eyes of the mind, eyes of the spirit. Through the eyes of the body, to the eyes of the mind; through the eyes of the mind, to the eyes of the spirit. Had Colin opened for her those inward eyes? She saw with them as never before. Nature around was as it ever had been; but for her it held fresh charms, fresh perfection, fresh meaning. She was enchained by the exquisite mouldings of the hillsides, the delicate fadings of one surface, one tint, into another. Each hummocked fell demanded hours of study. She would be able now to give the hours, and Colin had taught her how to use them.

Through the railway journey her thoughts had been much with Giles and the look in his face when they parted. Sorry as she had been to leave, her sorrow was of a composite nature, made up of many elements. She began faintly to see a contrast between him and herself; to realise the simplicity, the homogeneousness, of his mental make. She wanted many things—Castle Hill, Colin, freedom, art, fresh ideas, as well as Giles. He wanted one thing—herself. She perceived this, after a fashion, without grasping that his "want" meant something infinitely beyond mere "friendship"—she still used that word to denote the link between them. She had a sense, not yet definite, that Giles was giving her more than she could consciously give him. Her feelings towards him were mixed; his towards her were unblended.

Now, instead of thinking about him, she was thinking about Colin, recalling what he had said, studying old scenes in the new light of Colin's teaching, wishing she could be again in the studio with him—as at this moment she might have been, but for Barbara.

Uprolled another wave of anger, and the Vicar saw. He had known that it must return, that she was not yet victor.

She met his glance, and knew that her kind old friend understood. "Why are people allowed to do such things?" she asked abruptly. "Such a beautiful world! And such people in it!"

"Try to be fair, my child," he said—rather irrelevantly, some might have thought.

"But it is she who is not fair to me. She never was fair. It isn't, indeed, that I'm sorry to come back to you and Mrs. Hazel—or—to Grannie! It is the being made like this—forced!—without having any choice. She has no right; I am not a child now. And I did so count on the next few days—if it might not be more, just those few days. I was learning so much—oh, so much that was new and lovely! I wanted to learn more."

"Yes. But the lessons we want to learn are not always those that the Great Teacher sets us." He spoke in a natural, everyday tone; not as one preaching.

"It isn't that. It is Barbara!"

"It is always 'that,' my child—no matter how the disappointment comes."

"If she had explained, if Grannie really needed me. It is the being made like this that I hate. Wouldn't you, in my place?"

"Yes," he said at once, and her face grew softer.

"I'm glad. Then it isn't altogether wrong of me to be vexed?"

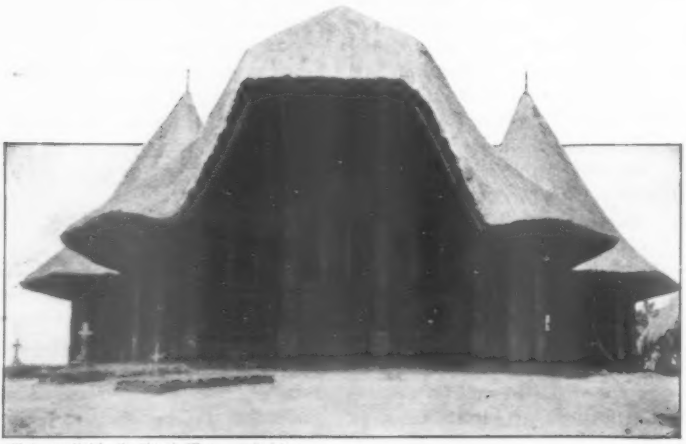
"No; perhaps not. But if I were you, child, I wouldn't waste too much time over your cousin's share in it. If she has wronged you, she has to be forgiven; and it is more dignified to overlook an injury than to show offence. People make foolish blunders, but one may generally credit them with at least a right intention."

"Ought one? Only, I'm so sure she did mean unkindness." Then, with a laugh of apology, "Perhaps I am as unfair to her as she is to me."

"That's good!" They were now moving on. "To see in oneself the possibility of unfairness is the first step towards gaining a fair spirit. Nine-tenths of the disagreements in this world—family, social, political, religious—rise from a want of fairness in judging others. We have too often one rule for ourselves, another rule for other people." He flipped off a dandelion-head with the tip of his whip. "One should be fair towards everybody." And he could not resist adding, "Even towards Miss Pringle."

Phyllys' eyes twinkled. She knew that her cousin and her cousin's friend were perpetual thorns in the Vicar's side, for whatever he did they opposed and whatever he said they contradicted. But he met their opposition in a large and manly way, and smiled at their contradictoriness.

"I'll try," she said. "I will really."



"She means well, child. Think the best you can of her, and make infinite excuses. That's the best plan."

"I will try," she repeated. And when they reached the cottage no trace of annoyance remained in her manner. Barbara had expected at least a storm in a teacup; and, though she would not admit the fact to herself, she was a trifle relieved.

OUTPOST CHURCHES.

By D. L. Woolmer.

EAST END OF THE NEW CATHEDRAL, NAMIREMBE HILL, MENGO, UGANDA.

"LISTEN," says a venerable guide to a party of tourists standing under the dome of one of Italy's grand cathedrals, and he lifts up all that remains of a voice in a sort of chant. The rough, quavering tones are unpleasing to the ear; but as they cease an echo repeats them softly. Again and again the chant resounds on the marvellous fabric. As it rises higher it becomes more sweet and melodious, until ears are strained to catch one last refrain. The old guide has unconsciously illustrated a parable of Nature. In the moment of listening a tourist realises that although the noblest of earth's many voices is unworthy to reach the throne of God, the poorest and meanest when directed to Him grows heavenly in its upward flight.

Far away from triumphs of architecture, rough attempts to raise songs of praise familiar in the homeland resound through colossal columns of ice, grand beyond the chisel or design of a human sculptor. The same strains float through leafy isles of equatorial forests and melt above burning sandy plains. The evolution of first places of Christian worship—strange and diverse in character—may be traced in all its stages in the outposts of the Empire. An infant church has sprung into existence when two or three persons meet together for praise and prayer, perhaps in the open air, like the Pilgrim Fathers; it is clothed by pitching a tent, erecting a snow house, or some shed or shelter where God Who fills space can be worshipped undisturbed. A temporary chapel rises, and gives place sooner or later to a permanent building.

THE ENGLISH CHURCH AT ENTEBBE.

Each one is a landmark measuring the advance of the all-conquering and all-embracing Kingdom of Christ. The pioneers of the Gospel are often in advance of the bearers of the British flag, for they press into the very heart of heathen and hostile countries.

Uganda, the Switzerland of Africa, possessed a flourishing Christian Church before it became a part of Greater Britain. It was of rapid growth, for at the time when Stanley's book, "In Darkest Africa," appeared, few places more thoroughly deserved that adjective than a hill to the south of Mengo, the capital of Uganda. Even yet the spot is ghastly with bleached bones of miserable victims, barbarously murdered not more than twenty-five or thirty years ago. That mount of royal execution now looks upon another named Namirembe, meaning Peace-Conspicuous on the slope of Namirembe is a building which is the pride and delight of the Protestant Christians. The Baganda, as the natives of the country are called, have built for themselves a "great house to God's glory," the first brick church ever erected in the country. With the exception of the vane and lightning conductor, all the materials are the produce of their own soil. A fabric of golden reeds, woven together by their skilful fingers, lines the roof and overlays the Gothic arches and all timber above the walls. The first service was held in this church on June 26th, 1902, the day originally fixed for the Coronation of King Edward VII.

INTERIOR OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH, ENTEBBE.

In January, 1902, the British Government officials and employés raised funds to build a church for themselves at Entebbe, the Residency, on the northern shore of Lake Victoria Nyanza. The following May the first English service was held under its thatched roof, which is supported on bamboo pillars outside the walls. The low building, with seating accommodation for forty, is modest compared with the native cathedral. It was at first in a humble position of dependence on the Church Missionary Society for services. The congregation were desirous that the Rev. J. J. Willis, who came to their aid, should remain in charge of the Church, so the Colonial and Continental Church Society made a grant which enabled him to shepherd the white as well as the black sheep. Here are the English in the centre of the Dark Continent reaping benefit from the society founded a century ago for the evangelisation of Africa and the East.

The British flag waves from torrid zones to frozen seas, and in both climates corrugated iron houses of prayer claim its protection. That ensign is not equal to defend wooden churches from the army of insects that revel in the heat of the vertical sun; neither does its prestige impress hungry dogs when the frost king drives them in desperate hunger to devour walls of sealskin. Still it floats on, advancing into regions where aborigines are oblivious of the existence either of a Union Jack or of a map on which the land where they hunt the polar bear is painted red

In 1899 the Rev. Canon Pilot, Inspector of Schools in Newfoundland, discovered that, stretching away to the north of Rama, the most northern of the Moravian settlements in Labrador, along a coast line of five hundred miles, barren, bleak, and desolate in the extreme, were scattered at least 1,000 Eskimo to whom the saving grace of Christ had never been preached.

The same summer a clergyman in Newfoundland, the Rev. Samuel Stewart, of Belfast, Ireland, accompanied the Hon. Captain Blandford, who was in search of new fishing grounds, to Ungava Bay. Whilst the ship remained in the bay, Mr. Stewart daily lived on shore with the natives. He found them, unlike the better-known aborigines of the more southern districts, fully the height of Europeans, some measuring over six feet. Some who acknowledged to having eaten their own children in times of starvation, and others accustomed to engage in fights often ending in bloodshed and death, entertained him in heir hovels. They were invariably gentle to him, however fierce amongst themselves, and they begged him to stay and teach them. The only director of the conscienee that these dirty, oily, degraded specimens of humanity had ever known was the Angekok, the high priest of their god Torngak, who, like other witch-doctors, exercised a cruel tyranny over them. Eager, wondering natives listened to the white stranger who, by the aid of an interpreter, one of their countrymen from South Labrador, talked to them, preached to them, and prayed with them. The first Christian service ever known in the district was held in a tupek, a sealskin tent, which is the Eskimo's summer residence.

THE REV. S. STEWART, IN HIS ESKIMO DRESS.

Ungava Bay is said to enjoy ten months of winter and two of bad weather. The heat of the brief summer is often sufficient to make mosquitoes a positive torment; but it is quickly over, and then the natives build themselves snow houses. Their architecture is on the model of a beehive. The entrance, just large enough for the inmates to crawl through, is protected by a porch similar in shape, which affords a shelter for the dogs. The window is glazed with a sheet of ice. When the ice in the bay gave the ship notice to quit or suffer the penalty of one year's imprisonment, Mr. Stewart returned to Newfoundland to offer himself to the Bishop as a missionary to the Eskimo of Ungava Bay. He counted the cost. He must live in hovels like theirs, eat the same food, be content to regard bear as a great luxury and fox as a delicate morsel. He must, above all, face the fact that when landed on the wild shore he would see the ship disappear, taking with it all chance of communication with the outer world for at least a year, possibly two. During that time he would never see a white face. The ice prevents navigation in the bay except during the summer; sometimes for two seasons the frozen gates remain sternly locked. None of these considerations moved Mr. Stewart from his resolve, and when it was known in England the Colonial and Continental Church Society guaranteed £300 a year for a mission to Ungava Bay and Battle, two places which represent to Labrador what Dan and Beersheba meant to Palestine. On August 15th, 1900, he left the shores of Newfoundland. The bergs which stand as sentinels at the sea gate of Ungava Bay permitted him to pass in; the steamer landed him and hastened away; and the ice barred the entrance behind her. The land of mystery, where the great Torngak is supposed to reign supreme, was closed against all intruders. When it opened in the summer of 1903 Mr. Stewart emerged to report himself and his work. His little Church consisted of twelve baptized and consistent Christians. Many more were asking for baptism, but they were on probation. The reality of their faith had to be tested by their conduct. It is no light thing for men and women described as "half animal, all uncivilised and brutalised by idolatry," to show themselves worthy of the name of Christian. But the members of the first Church at Ungava Bay have given evidence of the transforming power of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and they exercise an influence over the outsiders. The solitary missionary pledged himself to return to them as soon as the icy gates of Ungava Bay should re-open. He sailed for Fort Chimo on June 9th.

"It is the first time we have heard such news. Why did not white men tell us before?" inquired an Eskimo woman in Blacklead Island, a whaling station in Cumberland Sound, when in August, 1897, the Rev. E. J. Peck landed and told her of a God of love and a Saviour. It is not easy to explain to a person who has never seen a tree nor conceived the life of a white man at home that everyone is not equal to bear seventy or eighty degrees of frost and other hardships that an arctic climate involve. The islanders were so anxious to hear more that tent-to-tent visitation did not satisfy them. They sewed forty sealskins together, stretched them on a frame, and set up their first church. Old provision boxes and a few boards formed the seats, two lamps were suspended from the roof, and a slow combustion stove made all comfortable. The Eskimo proved regular attendants and diligent students. Scarcely a child in the island was absent from the first meeting when the missionaries offered to teach them. In a short time out of an average of forty-five on the roll, thirty could read and had a fair knowledge of the leading facts of Scripture history.

A "TUPEK," IN WHICH WAS HELD A SERVICE IN UNGAVA BAY.

November came in with snowstorms, which swept the island with terrific force. The ice-bound sea relentlessly cut off the Eskimo's avocation of seal-fishing. Hard times for man, hard times for dogs had come. The silence of the frozen night was broken with howls of hunger. At last matters reached a climax, and the endurance of dogs found its limits. Howls grew into a deafening chorus of growls and barks of canine warfare. The pale moon shone dimly, and in its light the missionaries discerned about a hundred hungry animals on the roof of their tabernacle. They had discovered that church was good to eat, and were tearing it to pieces and fighting for the scraps. The defenders of the church were soon on the spot, and in the sharp battle that ensued they were victorious and drove off the dogs. They patched up the holes with old bags and bits of canvas. The church which now stands there is covered and lined with canvas, a present from friends in England. And now Mr. Peck feels that Christianity has such a hold on the Eskimo of Blacklead Island that the time has come for him to leave them in charge of a younger man. In order that he may working men with small sugar farms, who were so short of money that they had absolutely none to spend on materials for rebuilding. In anticipation of a visit from the Bishop, they cut down timber, sawed planks, carted it, and set up and roofed a new and superior building, and it stood above the parched ground firmly on its piles with windows open, but ready to close if needful, all in the space of eight days. In less than a week after the congregation had met together for their first service in the new church a gracious rain fell and the disastrous drought of the previous months was at an end.

rest? No; only to press farther north, and plant a church eighty miles within the arctic circle.

In sharp contrast with native churches are the neat British-workmanlike houses of prayer, set up by independent settlers who take their own ways and ideas with them to the Colonies. St. Andrew's, Dow's Creek, North Queensland, for instance, partakes of the character of the square-shouldered church building committee who stand erect at its entrance—erect as workmen who have no need to be ashamed. If this church boasts of no traditions and makes no pretence at picturesque effect, its brief history is highly creditable. It was a time of drought in Queensland. A forest fire rushed on its devouring way and sprang upon the little house of prayer at Dow's Creek, a colony of

If grit and a good will can produce something better than a nine days' wonder, why are enormous districts in Australia still waiting for their first house of prayer? Chiefly because a wish for one is lacking. Perhaps, like other good desires and purposes that immigrants brought with them from the Mother Country, it died of starvation, and a generation has grown up in absolute ignorance of the duty and delight of worship. It is hard to realise that in a "back block" of North Queensland children of thirteen or fourteen years of age have never consciously seen anyone at prayer. It is a revelation of white heathenism to hear of a mother apologising to an itinerating chaplain for her family's ignorance that "Christmas was coming," and explaining that in the bush they seldom saw a newspaper. It is pathetic to hear of a poor woman in New South Wales, fifty miles from any church, driving through overpowering heat to Wyalong and begging that a clergyman there would baptise the lifeless body of a child that she held in her arms. The precious burden had been living, though sick, during the first long miles of the journey. The assurance that the innocent little redeemed spirit was in arms even more tender than her own was new and strange to her, but it brought her comfort at last.

At the report of room and advantages for emigrants, overcrowded Europe pricks its ears. Thousands go to the Colonies to scatter in the bush or on the vast prairies as sheep without a shepherd, and sink into forgetfulness of God. Others, whilst they build up the Empire, strengthen the stakes and lengthen the cords of that tabernacle in the wilderness, the Kingdom of Christ. Too often the first road to a new settlement is a dray track, and the first building a dram-drinking saloon. But, contrary to general rules, the first of any description in the new Britannia colony, Saskatchewan, is a rectory church.

In April, 1903, Nature ruled supreme over hundreds of miles of the valley of the great river which gives its name to the province. Man had not made the lovely landscape vile by the worship of demons, mammon, or appetite. Settlers arrived, and whilst they lived in tents Indians from Onion Lake Reserve hauled down logs and set them up in a two-storeyed building, the lower part to be used for religious services. This building is the centre of a village which the colonists named Lloydminster after their chaplain. An enterprising journalist improved on the name; he considered Mudminster more appropriate. The minster is 22 feet by 28 feet outside, and a foot less each way inside. This space by some means accommodates a congregation of seventy-six, and every Sunday and Wednesday night sees it well filled. The aisles are narrow passages between packing cases and chests. Its measure of capacity was not equal to the requirements on the first Christmas Day in the colony. Brilliant blue overhead and glittering white underfoot, the occasion was sufficient to make even the "bob-sleigh," of amateur construction, and its sober oxen cheerful. Bells tinkled merrily, and worshippers assembled in such numbers from outlying districts that a church was improvised out of a partly finished store. Who cared that planks on nail kegs constituted the choir stalls whilst forty men and women, accompanied by a portable harmonium and four violins, led off the grand old hymns and psalms which have united scattered members of Christ's visible Church on earth for centuries? It mattered little to the worshippers that flags, cloths, and decorations of all kinds concealed boxes of canned goods. Willing hands and a reverent spirit combined to produce an effect which was highly satisfactory.

The success, and, indeed, the very existence of a colony depends on their uniting forces. It would be hard for any building to spring into being without the institution of a "raising bee." All the company come together to put up the first "shack," and one modest dwelling soon follows another. A catalogue of the various genera of "bees" familiar in the great Western continent might puzzle students of natural history. Dr. Watts would be probably willing to classify a "stone-hauling bee" in the particular genus which improves the shining hours. One at Black Fald, Calgary, owed its origin to a lady's letter. A mother wrote to the secretary of the Colonial and Continental Church Society to ask if anything could be done for her two sons in Canada who were far away from any place of worship. The Bishop of the huge diocese, Dr. Pinkham, inquired into the matter, with the result that a service was held once a fortnight in a school house. But this was not sufficient. "Stone-hauling socials" were instituted with a view to erecting a permanent house of prayer. Neither grey hairs nor multitudinous duties prevented the Bishop himself coming to the first and setting an example of manual labour. The chaplain, the Rev. W. George, and his flock, including ladies, took their share. Arms of different strength carried stones of different size and weight. Such scenes are a figure of the work of the great Master Builder Who through His toilers gathers living stones for His spiritual temple from remote quarries of the earth.

Whether regarded as permanent or temporary, sooner or later the first churches in the outposts of the Empire pass away. Time, the great leveller, will not spare even a St. Mark's, Venice. His scythe is sharpened in the tropics by the four elements. The open warfare of fire, floods, cyclones, and earthquakes is not more to be feared than the secret destruction of Liliputian enemies that devour the fabric. But the most transient shanty that stands to confess that honour and glory are due to God's holy Name serves its age. The voice of praise rises above roofs of tin, thatch, or shingle to mingle with angel choirs. Like the first little church of wattles which missionaries set up at Glastonbury, it may be the humble ancestor of a noble structure. Successors of a design yet to be conceived may rise on the foundation of sheds, and remain until the last living stone has been built into the universal Church of Christ.

A "STONE-HAULING BEE" FOR A NEW CHURCH IN CALGARY.

ON A LONDON ROOF.

A Complete Story by Ethel F. Heddle.

I.

THE PATTERN GIRL'S FRIEND.

"IT was very smutty at first," said the Pattern Girl. "Then Maggie McAlister—hers is that window with the pot of geranium, and she's Scotch—said she couldn't live in dirt, and she comes and sweeps every now and then. That's like Maggie. She is always sweeping something. I wish she'd try the church steeple. By-and-by Bessie Bowden came too, after her work was over. She said she got more air here than on the bridge. It was nearer the sky, and quieter. Except for St. Barnabas's noisy steeple there—grimy old thing!—we are quiet on the roof."

Innocent Lovel smiled faintly.

"St. Barnabas has a great many services," she said. "I often wonder what kind of people go to these lonely London churches. They are lonely, in the middle of London; and dusty and deserted. Still, I like to hear the bell; it reminds one that all London isn't money-making, breaking its heart over the world's problems. Like the cross of St. Paul's, it reminds one that faith is in the heart of London, after all."

"You do say odd things, Innocent," the Pattern Girl said. "You are odd—like your name. Bessie says all Americans are a little queer."

"I've often been laughed at about my name," the American girl said. She was seated near the coping of the dingy roof, one small white hand laid upon it. "I have an uncle, Uncle Josiah, who calls me his 'Red Cent'—my hair, you know—and the Italians in Venice used to call me 'Innocenta.' My mother was dying when she chose my name. 'Little Innocent,' she said; 'call her Innocent.' But of course, it isn't a very work-a-day name."

"Like mine—Susan!" the Pattern Girl said. "Half the girls in our office are called Gladys, and Hilda, and Dorothy. I don't think they go with standing in a stuffy room, and cutting out patterns, do you? I'd sooner be called Susan. The people here call me the Pattern Girl. I don't mind. It's only on the roof here with you that I ever get away from the patterns. My goodness, how I hate them."

"Poor little girl!"

Innocent looked up gently, still with a faint smile lurking in her deep grey eyes.

In her quiet, well-cut frock, worn as only French and Americans know how to wear their clothes, with the ruddy and glorious mass of Venetian red hair low on her neck, and her deep grey eyes, she was a great contrast to Susan Gale. Susan was the usual anæmic London girl, pale, and small of face and of figure, large-eyed, narrow-chested, with a certain cheap style and prettiness in her attire, shabby though it was. She had a small resolute mouth and a bitter, rather determined expression. Hers was not a happy outlook on life. But then, five years of cutting out and stitching up patterns, she would have told you, in a very questionable atmosphere, is not conducive to much gaiety of heart. A working girl's youth dies soon in London, if it ever lives at all.

"Fancy your being in Venice," she remarked now. "Travelling round like a princess, and then—ending here! On the roof of Embankment Buildings!"

"Life has odd contrasts," Innocent said. "Ups and downs. I suppose we equalise things somehow."

"Then it should be my turn for the ups," Susan remarked, with her little bitter laugh. "Were you very rich, Innocent?"

"English people called us rich," Innocent said. She was watching the river, the Imperial highway of the great city. A sparkling, molten river it was to-day; and her eyes were calm, but rather sad. "I never thought in America that we had very great wealth. We did things comfortably. Everything just came to us. I don't think I ever imagined trouble, till it fell upon me suddenly, like a great black cloud. Father came to me in the hotel, with the open letter in his hand. He didn't seem so much, so very much worried. 'Guess I've got to go to New York, little girl,' he said, 'right away. But you stay, and go round with Mrs. Joseph P. Marks. I'll leave you enough money to carry on with, and cable you more whenever I've put things right.'"

"Yes?"

XUM

The Pattern Girl had never heard the whole story in detail; she was seated on a broken backed chair near Innocent, sewing a piece of lace on her Sunday frock, but the needle fell from her hands in her interest. "And then?"

"I saw him off, and he kissed me the last thing. 'Don't worry, little girl,' he said. That was like father. I didn't worry—I'd never been allowed to all my life—till the news came. He died before New York was reached, of heart failure. His affairs were all wrong. Things had smashed up—I don't know how—and Mrs. Joseph P. Marks had gone to Egypt suddenly; and the day after father sailed my new French maid ran off with every penny I had. I'd left the money, foolishly, in a drawer, and she stole the key. But still I'd my jewels, all the little things I wore, and I wrote to Uncle Josiah. But they say he's gone to the Philippine Islands to start a new railway there, and he doesn't answer. I was rather desperate till I met Netta, and she offered me her room here. She rented it for ten shillings a week, so as to paint the river, but her aunt was taking her to Rome. That's all, Susan I was very lonely until I met you."

"I'd been very rude to you," the Pattern Girl confessed. "I knew you were different from us in the Buildings, and I thought you'd put on side. So I snapped at you, and sneered. Then you came over with your Florida water in your hand, the day I had a headache and was sitting here. 'You do look so white and tired,' you said." Susan gave her short laugh. "It had never happened before that anyone cared about my looks, one way or the other. Well, after that I was your chum, if you cared about it."

She was still just a little suspicious of her own unworthiness. She was sure that some day the fairy godmother would turn up for this strange little enchanted Princess.

"You are a very good chum," Innocent said, looking at the other's thin face. "It was you who got me the work at the shop. But for that I'd have starved, now that my last bangle is gone! I haven't anything left, Susan, but this ring, and I couldn't sell it."

She turned the ring over slowly; a little colour crept into her pale face.

"Someone gave it me who is fighting in the Philippines, and I don't know whether he's dead or alive. When I'm down, in the dark, I think he must be dead. I never used to imagine the saddest things; but London—this great London of yours—presses upon one at last, and weighs down one's heart. One loses what poor Goldsmith called the 'knack of hoping.'"

"Don't you do that!" the Pattern Girl cried suddenly. "Don't you do that! It's kept my head above water just to think of you many a day, always with that smile, even when your eyes were sad. Don't lose the knack, or you'll pull me down too. Things don't look so bad on a day like this: Saturday evening, with the river there, and you, and the fresh air about one's head; but when I look forward and think of the long August days, and those great piles of patterns—Cut, cut, cut! Stitch, stitch! 'Seam and gusset and hem!' It's like the song that man wrote! Wonder if he knew Pattern Girls? We often turn faint in the evening, and need to go out into the air. I don't suppose it's worse than many and many a girl's work. We must live—at least, I suppose so. I—what do you suppose is over there, Innocent—at the end of it all?"

She had turned suddenly, her work falling on the flat piece of roof on which the two girls sat. The daylight was fading, and St. Barnabas's steeple was silhouetted against a daffodil sky. On the river the fussy steamers had ceased for the day; only a few barges, slow and languid of motion, passed now and then, or a little boat. Innocent's eyes followed Susan's pointing hand over the bridge to the sunset glory—a sunset such as Turner might have painted from such a spot.

"I don't know," Innocent said softly. "We used to be told there was a city of gold, and gates of pearl, and a River of Life. I suppose that was only part of the Apostle's dream, the beautiful dream that was meant to comfort us all. But I am sure of one thing. I've grown to be sure, just because I was in the dark, deep down. I learned to be sure in the dark! At the end there will be somehow, and somewhere, the answer to the puzzle of life!"

The Pattern Girl did not speak. Perhaps she expected more, perhaps the answer seemed scarcely sufficient; but Innocent seemed to forget to say more. She sat on, dreaming, till the light all went, and the yellowish-grey edge of the ugly brick stack of chimneys beside them seemed close, and dark, and forbidding. The distant dull roar of the bridge's traffic grew less and less; lights sparkled out all round the wide sweep of the water—a bracelet of gems. London gathered herself into filmy robes of violet black, sparkling with lights, as if with jewels.

XUM

"It's time we went in," Susan said. "You ate next to nothing at tea, and we've got to eat. I'll boil the kettle on my stove and make a cup of tea. I bought a pennyworth of cress. At least, it's something green."

She took up the broken chair and pushed it back. She disappeared through her window, which opened on the roof. But Innocent sat dreaming still.

The end of the puzzle? Yes, but she was young, and sometimes the puzzle pressed hard. St. Barnabas's clock struck ten slowly, and she turned and went in.

II.

A VISION OF THE SEA.

"OUR spirits are all a matter of circulation at the office," the Pattern Girl said. "If the circulation keeps up, we're all in good tempers; and just now—whether it's because women buy more papers when they're travelling or no, I don't know—but the circulation is high! And the head of the firm is going to be married. He's in a splendid temper, and it oozes down all over the office. But really, when Miss Martin—that's our superintendent—told us to-day what he was going to do for us, we thought she'd got sunstroke."

"I was very lonely until I met you."

"What was it, Susan?"

They were sitting on the roof again, and it was Saturday evening—a late Saturday in August. Innocent, very pale and weary, with feverish cheeks and heavy eyes, was sewing a thick crash shirt, work which rasped her fingers, and made her back ache. Susan was leaning against the end of the chimney, in a new pink blouse, unusually bright of aspect.

"They are going to send us down in tens to the seaside for a week! 'Thirty shillings in your hand,' Miss Martin said, 'and lodgings found at Margate.' My! you should have heard the row! It was like a lot of parrots! I've never seen the sea. And Margate! It's better than Southend. I knew a girl who went there once. I often dream of the sea. Waves, like a picture, all creamy froth, breaking on the sand! Cool, cool air! I got very bad to-day, and nearly went off in a dead faint. I came to, thinking I heard the waves in my ears. The only thing is leaving you, and you are looking so bad."

"I don't think I'm quite well," Innocent said, her hand at her head for a moment; "but I've no business to be ill. Susan, dear, I'm so glad that it's your turn for a little of the 'up' of life's see-saw. It will be better than going myself to think of you sitting on the sands."

"I'll write to you every day," Susan said; "and you'll be out on the roof as much as you can. I wish that old church bell would stop ringing. To think of all the money there is in London, and yet I can't get the little that would take you too."

Innocent looked up for a moment, and she sighed.

"Bond Street is in that direction," Susan continued, pointing over the chaos of chimneys and buildings below, "and the shops where people buy pearls and diamonds. One little pearl, Innocent, and you could sit and hear the waves too."

"But I had my turn of so many waves," Innocent said. "Dear Susan, it is your turn. Don't let us think of Bond Street and the shops. Let us talk of the shells you will bring back for your window."

For many days after this nothing was talked of but Susan's visit. She said the Pattern Girls talked of nothing else. The weather, as September came in, grew, if possible hotter; the atmosphere in the pattern room was insupportable. Travelling womanhood all seemed to want the pattern of the new blouse. Increased circulation meant increased work. But the waves on Margate sands echoed loudly in their ears; they heard her sea-breezes a-calling.

But for Innocent, her "chum" Susan would have been perfectly happy. Night and day the dream of the sea was with her. But Innocent was ill; she had constant headache, she ate next to nothing, her hands were hot and dry, her lips were parched. The very last of her money was nearly at an end. She could not earn enough to buy necessities. She was unused to such work. It was killing her. And, day by day, as the few shillings grew less, Innocent looked at her troubles in the face and saw no way out—no open door. There was no word from Uncle Josiah. She had no other relative. She could not beg; she could not borrow. No word came from the Philippines, where Conrad fought.

So many died there of fever, or in battle, or through native treachery; he would have written at once, if he had been alive, upon hearing of her trouble. It was three months since she had heard. They had been betrothed when his regiment was ordered to the East; when America drew her sword to enter upon the wars of the world, and take upon her broad shoulders "the white man's burden." Was Innocent's life, once so rose-tinted, to end like this? Dying, unknown in London; no friend near, no friend in the great wide city except the Pattern Girl, loyal Susan Gale?

She made little of her headache, of her sleeplessness and fever. She had had an attack of the same kind once before in Italy, it would pass off; but the Pattern Girl saw with anxious eyes that there was no betterment, no sign of "passing off."

"She hasn't got it in her to fight as we can," Susan said to herself. "We are tough. We get inured to bad air, and bread-and-butter dinners, and long hours. She hasn't got 'a back with a hinge to it.' She's ill, really ill. If I had a spare half-crown, I'd call in a doctor."

And then? "I know what he'd say," she would continue, watching Innocent lean back with closed eyes for a moment. "He'd say, 'Feed her up, take her away, and stop work!'" She laughed bitterly. "And I'd thank him, and he'd take up his hat and go. It can't be that she's going to slip out of the ranks and die, just like an ordinary Pattern Girl. Innocent! I always made sure she'd be rescued by the fairy god-mother. I always made sure of it."

But at last the day came when Susan's worst fears were realised. She came home and received no answer to her tap at Innocent's door. Her friend was not on the roof. Susan had looked. No one was there, and St. Barnabas's bell was ringing for service with no apparent response of any kind. On the small bed near the window—the canvases of her artist friend stacked on the floor—Innocent lay, tossing her arms in delirium. The window was open, and the river and the Embankment lay stretched out like a picture under it. Just opposite were hideous tall brick chimneys and coal sheds; the low sound of the girlish voice, full of a strange new vacancy and inconsequent lightheartedness filled the room.

"Of course you must go, Conrad! But I'll be quite brave—and not say a word! The war will be soon over, and you will be back. Strange, the Stars and Stripes in the Far East! The dear flag! We might come—and bring you home. Father says not to worry—things always come right—he says—but he is dead—Conrad—dead!—I never dreamed—of that—when I saw him off—and laughed, and waved my hand!—The river—yes, we see it—and the sunset—and she wants to know—Susan—you know—the Pattern Girl—what is the end—of it all—on the other side?"

"Innocent," Susan cried, laying her hand on the burning forehead, "you've been sewing too long. You are ill!"

Innocent looked up, and seemed to know her.

"Is it time for your train?" she asked, quite consciously and brightly. "I'm so glad, dear, so glad. Do enjoy yourself and come home with red, red cheeks."

She sank back on the pillow again. Susan stood quite silent for a moment, then she walked to the window. The light died out of her face. To-morrow they were to start. She had been given her thirty shillings. It was in her pocket. She looked over at the great pile of chimneys opposite, and a long slow breath parted her lips. She gave her little shrug, but no bitter laugh. It was not bitter to help Innocent.

"I'll go for the doctor," she said. "They must go without me, that's all. Thirty shillings will go quite a long way. She shan't slip under and die while the Pattern Girl has an inch of fight left in her."

The train steamed out from Victoria next day—a noisy group of girls in a third-class carriage. They talked, and laughed, and sang. They all bought a copy of the paper, to "increase the circulation." They were full of small jokes and witticisms. Life, for once, had a purely humorous side; patterns were far, far in the background.

But Susan was not there.

She was stitching at Innocent's work, while Innocent tossed on the pillow and talked of Venice and the lighted gondolas, and Jupiter blazing in the sky.

III.

THE FAIRY GOD-MOTHERS.

"IT seems impossible, sir, impossible, that a girl should disappear without leaving a trace, in London."

"The people who disappear in London, my young friend"—Mr. Josiah C. Warner spoke deliberately as usual, though his grim, sallow face was troubled and perplexed—"would surprise you. Would make you feel grieved. I made all the inquiry possible. The police said they would track her, if they could. They didn't strike me as hustling much. No; New York could teach them a thing or two!"

"She was last seen walking out of the hotel with a small handbag, after the theft of her jewels," Conrad said, going over the details miserably. "That was three days after the cable came telling me of her father's death. You and I were in the Philippines. And she doesn't know a soul, I suppose, in London. Still, she couldn't disappear. And she must have written to us."

"Letters are following us round, I guess," Mr. Warner said. "It's a good few blocks over to the Philippines and back. We'll hear, sonnie, we'll hear."

"In time, I suppose," the tall American said sadly; "but the question is, what is she doing now? Without money, in this great noisy Babylon?"

He looked out almost vengefully from the court of the "Cecil," where the two men were talking, to the noisy line of the Strand; and Mr. Warner began to put on his gloves deliberately.

"I'm going along to insert more advertisements. I could teach these newspapers here a thing or two, as I told them. 'Guess you think you can hustle,' I said. 'You don't know the meaning of the word. I guess New York——'"

"She may not see newspapers!"

Conrad Deane was too depressed even to smile at his friend. Mr. Josiah C. Warner's belief in his own powers of "hustling" was like Charles I.'s head: it usually entered into his conversation with every individual he came across.

"Oh, she'll see them. Not that I'd read the newspapers here, for I never know where I am. 'You should see the weekly special editions of our New York papers,' I said to that man I told you of. 'Guess the paper alone of that would make you sit up!' 'It's what's on the paper we think of, sir,' he says. British cheek, that! 'Allow me to tell you, sir,' I said, 'that in the United States——'"

"Mr. Warner, I think I'll take a 'bus, and go and call on that private agency." Conrad evidently could not be distracted from the engrossing topic any longer. "I'm sorry to interrupt you——"

"Oh, I know, I know. She's your girl. You're bound to fret. Nerves not quite strung up, too, after that illness of yours; and you'd have been in Manila yet if I hadn't taken her out of the hospital by main force! 'I've made you sit up here, and fixed your railway for you, and now I want him to come home and help me spend a few dollars!' I said. A 'bus? All right. And I'll go down to those newspaper offices and tell 'em——"

The rest of his projected instruction, however, was lost in the roaring current of the Strand, and the tall and bronzed American soldier climbed on to the top of his 'bus, and then sat looking before him gloomily, as he passed through the "superb medley" of Trafalgar Square, where Nelson's figure, poised high and silhouetted against a saffron September sky, seemed to watch over the great throbbing heart of the Empire still.

"Innocent! Innocent!" Conrad's heart was whispering. "Is she somewhere here? Somewhere lost in this great, cruel city? Where no one cares?"

He was quite lost in his bitter brooding, when the high sound of two London voices pierced suddenly through his reverie, and he looked languidly at two girls seated before him. They were talking rapidly.

"Fun! Oh, yes, it was fun! I liked the bands, and the piers, and the niggers! Some of the girls sat on the sand all day. That silly Rose Smith never moved. Said she was 'laying up ozone'!"

"Did Susan Gale go in your lot?"

"Susan didn't go at all! Didn't you hear?"

"Goodness me! For all her talk? I thought she was mad to go!"

"So she was; but that American girl with the outlandish name, who stays in the same house, got ill, and Susan stayed and nursed her. Paid her food, too, I think. 'You must be precious fond of your Innocent!' I said. Oh! what is it?"

She got such a start, this Pattern Girl, when the brown face was thrust eagerly between them, that she clutched her friend violently, but Deane made his request known in a quick rapid whisper. He did not waste many words. Would she kindly give him the address of this girl with the outlandish name? Did she know it?

It was given him at once. The girls peered down with great curiosity as the tall figure stopped the 'bus at the foot of Whitehall, and they saw him hail a hansom.

"He's 'Amurrican' too!" Lottie Gibbons said. "I say, what a good-looking man! Perhaps it's a story!"

* * * * * *

Innocent was sitting up in the long cane chair, dressed for the first time, and Susan was sewing at the window. The window was thrown wide open, and it was seven o'clock. A cup of weak tea and a little bread stood on a side table—Susan's supper. She had just come in from the office, too tired to eat. Innocent was speaking.

"It's all like a dream, Susan. I wish you'd disentangle things a bit. How long was I ill? Was it while you were away?"

Susan threaded her needle carefully, a little flushed. She expected and rather dreaded the examination.

"I think you were delirious about a week—not yourself, that's to say—wandering a bit and talking nonsense. But don't let us speak of it, Innocent. It's past. Things that are past don't matter."

"Do they not? I have such an odd feeling, as if I'd been born again. As if I'd come up out of the dark, like Persephone, into the light. It is a beautiful world, Susan. She looked happily away over the river. "And I can't help feeling as if God was keeping happiness for me somewhere in it. I don't know why I feel that, but I do. I don't worry, though I don't know where the next shilling—and that reminds me. Hand me over my purse, please. You said you took the money from it."

XUM

"Innocent," Susan said firmly, "if you begin worrying about shillings I'll go away."

"Ah, I see! You have been paying things for me. Susan, who nursed me while you were away?"

"You were—looked after," Susan said.

Apparently the seam needed close attention at the window.

"Did I tell you our people have started a new paper? It's called Boys at Play, and there's a pattern blazer——"

"What did you think, the first time you saw the sea?"

"I thought it was—very green," Susan said weakly. She had long ago made up her mind Innocent must know nothing of her staying at home. She grew scarlet as she spoke. Poor Susan! The other Pattern Girls said she had "no imagination."

Innocent sat up. Her eyes were bright, her cheeks flushed.

"I know," she said spasmodically. "I know. You never were there! You stayed and nursed me! You spent the money—like that. Oh, Susan, Susan!"

"If you cry," Susan said defiantly, "I'll go away, and never come back. Besides, there is someone at the door."

She threw down her sewing, and went to answer a knock. Two tall men stood there—one elderly, and oddly like the caricatures Susan had seen now and then of a typical "Uncle Sam," with a goatee beard, and a pointed felt hat, crushed against his coat; the other was bronzed and eager-eyed.

"Does Miss Innocent Lovel live here still?"

"Yes; but she's been very ill. She——"

"I guess she'll see us. I guess she'll——"

"Uncle Josiah!" There was a wild cry of joy. Innocent rose unsteadily, and stood by the couch, her arms outstretched. "Oh, Uncle Josiah, is it you? But where is Conrad? Have you news of him?"

It was not Uncle Josiah who reached her first and was pressing kisses on her sweet, pale face. It was not Uncle Josiah who held her in those strong arms and who made her feel that all her happy presentiment had come true, and that there was indeed happiness for her in the new world, a great and glorious happiness already in her grasp.

* * * * * *

"I haven't been introduced to this young lady yet," Uncle Josiah said, when at last he looked round and could take in something beside his niece's pale face. "I guess she's been looking after you a bit, eh? And would be the better of change, too? Guess we'll take her off to the hotel, with you, right now, and start for Brighton to-morrow—if she ain't tired of London seaside resorts, that's to say."

Innocent's happy eyes met Susan's. The girl laughed—quite a new laugh, a laugh that was glad and anticipatory, and had a ring of youth.

"I've never seen the sea," she said. "I'm a Pattern Girl in Blake's, that's all. Please don't make any mistake about me!"

"She was going to the sea, and had looked forward to it all summer. She stayed behind and nursed me, and spent every penny on me. She——"

"I require to hear no more, Innocent," Mr. Josiah Warner said, and he advanced to Susan solemnly, his big hand outstretched. "Shake!"

Susan looked up, bewildered. Her hand was lost in the big one held out.

"We know friends when we find 'em, British or Yankee," Mr. Josiah Warner said. "We don't part from 'em easily. Guess we'll be friends, you and I; and a pretty complete party of four. Go down, Conrad, and fetch a carriage. It's time I bossed this show! And Messrs. Blake will do without your services, young lady. My compliments, and tell 'em so!"

It was like a fairy tale after all, if Mr. Josiah was not precisely one's conception of the fairy god-mother.

Susan said so to Innocent, when they took Uncle Josiah and Conrad out on the roof before leaving town a few days later, and showed them London and the river, stretched out like a map underneath the grimy black building. St. Barnabas's bell was tolling solemnly. The river swept on in a deep grey current, the light catching its ripples under the bridge, and the dark edges of the mud on the other side.

"Sad London! Great London! Cruel London!" Innocent whispered. "Lord Rosebery calls it 'Awful London!' But just about there"—pointing with a slim hand—"must be St. Paul's, and the little gold cross raised on high, for all who understand."

ILLUSTRATIONS. Special Answer to Prayer. While travelling on the borders of Italy, writes a Christian friend, we heard that a young soldier was to suffer death at nine o'clock that morning. The thought rushed into my mind, "How dreadful that this young man should be thus hurried into eternity, perhaps unprepared!" I retired to my room, and there I felt compelled to wrestle and plead with God for the salvation of the doomed soldier. The burden of my prayer was that if he were not prepared to enter into the presence of his Judge his death might be averted and time given to him for repentance. I continued thus in prayer till I heard the sound of a volley. In a few minutes I was obliged to join my friends who were leaving the town. About two months after, when in a distant town, I one morning took up a newspaper, and the first thing that caught my eye was the account of an extraordinary event which had occurred at the town we stayed at—viz., that a young soldier, having been sentenced to death, was brought out for execution in the usual manner by his comrades, twenty-four of whom were to fire at his heart. The signal was given and the guns fired, but, to the amazement of all, every bullet missed its aim! He stood unhurt, and his escape was considered so miraculous that his pardon was granted and he was permitted to live. His subsequent history is unknown.

The Undecided and Irresolute. At the critical moment of that night, in the year 1741, when Count Lessoch went to conduct the Princess Elizabeth of Russia to the palace to assert her right to the vacant throne he found her irresolute and refusing to go. He thereupon produced two pictures which he had prepared, and placed them before her. In one she saw herself under torture, and the Count on the scaffold. In the other she saw herself ascending the throne amid the applause of the people. The Count bade her choose. She chose the throne, and on the next day was Empress of Russia. The Israelites were bidden to make a choice between Baal and God. Some of them had long been halting between serving Baal and pleasing Queen Jezebel or serving the God of their fathers. And so it happens, sooner or later in the life of all, that they must make a choice between sin and holiness, between the devil and God. "How long halt ye? If the Lord be God, serve Him; if Baal, then serve him."

God the Source of Blessings. During the cotton famine in Lancashire a few years ago the mills in a certain village were closed for many months, and the people were in a state of semi-starvation. The first waggonload of cotton which arrived before the mills were started again seemed to the people like the olive branch "newly plucked off," which told of the abating waters of the Deluge. The waggon was met by the women, who laughed and cried by turns, and hugged the bales of cotton as if they were dear old friends, and then ended by singing that grand old psalm—a great favourite with Lancashire people—"Praise God, from Whom all blessings flow." The feeling must have been much the same with the Israelites when they saw the first rain after three years.

The leech draws blood to satisfy itself, but the doctor desires to do the patient good. So is the difference between God's ends and the wicked person's ends in the persecution of the righteous. God, by letting His people be persecuted, desires to make them better men by their afflictions, but evil men trouble the righteous to satisfy their rage and malice upon them to their ruin. As Joseph said to his brothers, "You did intend me hurt, but God intended me good." So it is with all persecutions and troubles. Allowed by God, they work for God. There are multitudes of Christian men and women who can say with David, "Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept Thy word."

Discouragement. One Monday, after a very discouraging Sunday, I could not keep back my tears. It seemed as if there was no pleasure in working for God if there was no fruit. One of my Sunday-school teachers came in, and he said to me, "Well, what kind of a time did you have yesterday?" "Truly," said I, "about as dark a Sunday as I ever had. What kind of a time did you have?" "Oh, one of the best times I ever had in my life," and he added, "I was teaching about Noah yesterday. Did you ever preach on his character?" I said, "No, I don't think I have ever studied it particularly." "Now," said he, "if you think you are not doing anything, read it and study it a little." So when he left I opened my Bible, and the thought came over me, "Here is a man who preached for one hundred years and didn't get one convert and yet was not discouraged. Here is a man who never led one soul to God outside his own family." I closed my Bible. The darkness was all gone. I went to the meeting, and a man came and said to me, "I am lost. Will you pray for my soul?" I thought to myself "What would Noah think of that? He was at work for one hundred years, but no one ever asked him that, and yet he was not discouraged." (Moody.)

Angels Ministering Spirits. I went once to see a dying girl whom the world had treated roughly. She had never known father or mother. Her home had been the poorhouse, and her life a sickly one; and yet she had learned a little reading, enough to spell out the New Testament, and she had touched the hem of the Master's garment, and learned the new song. As she came near the crossing of the river, she said: "Oh, sir, God sends His angels. I have read in His Word that they are ministering spirits sent forth to minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation. And when the heavy darkness comes, and this poor side aches so severely, He comes Himself, for He says, 'Lo, I am with you,' and He slips His soft hand under my aching side, and I rest."

It is recorded of him that if, while reading, he heard the sound of the wind, he would stop and utter a short prayer that God would be merciful to His people. If it increased, he would close the book and, falling on his knees, would remain fixed in prayer. But if it grew into a violent storm he would then go to his church and pass hours in earnest supplications and psalms. "Have you not read," he would say, "'The Lord thundered in the heavens, and the Highest gave forth His voice'?"

A Good Reason for Praying. A little girl, about four years old, being asked, "Why do you pray to God?" replied, "Because I know He hears me, and I love to pray to Him." "But how do you know He hears you?" was the next question. Putting her little hand to her heart, she said, "I know He does, because there is something here that tells me so."

Duty to be Done and Left with God. In 1799, when the armies of Napoleon were sweeping over the Continent, Massena suddenly appeared on the heights above the town of Feldkirch at the head of 18,000 men. It was Easter Day, and the rays of the rising sun glittered on the weapons of the French as they appeared drawn up on the hills to the west of the town. The Town Council was hastily called together to consult what was to be done. To defend the town was out of the question. What, then, were they to do? After much discussion, the old dean of the church rose and said, "My brothers, it is Easter Day! We have been reckoning our own strength, and that fails. Let us turn to God. Ring the bells and have service as usual, and leave the matter in God's hands." They agreed to do as he said. Then from the church towers in Feldkirch there rang out joyous peals in honour of the Resurrection, while the streets were full of worshippers hastening to the house of God. The French heard the sudden clangour of the joy-bells with surprise and alarm, and, concluding that the Austrian army had arrived to relieve the place, Massena suddenly broke up his camp and gave the order to march.

Joseph sent messengers to Jacob and waggons to fetch him. And Jacob not only heard the words, but saw the waggons. "Oh, these are really to carry me to him. I shall soon see my son, and die in peace." Death is such a messenger to a Christian. "Come," says God, "you have toiled long enough; you have feared long enough; your warfare is accomplished; enter into the rest which the Lord your God giveth you. Come, for all things are now ready." "But," you say, "the swelling river rolls between." "Fear not; say farewell for a time to your friends. The river must be passed; but the presence of the Lord will be with you. In His name you will divide the waves and pass over dry-shod. The chariots of God are waiting for you, and heaven's glory opening." (Rev. W. Jay.)

Voice from the Dying. Perhaps there is scarcely on record a more beautiful anecdote than that which Bishop Middleton relates of a most exemplary soldier of the Cross. He was lying, apparently lifeless, when a worthy fellow-labourer in the work of the same society, who imagined that the immortal spirit of his friend had actually taken its flight, began to sing over his remains a verse of the favourite hymn which used to soothe and elevate him in his lifetime. The hymn was finished without a sign of recognition or sympathy from the still form before him, but when the last verse was over the voice which was supposed to be hushed in death took up the second verse of the hymn, completed it with distinct utterance, and then was heard no more. His dying hymn was merged into the angels' eternal songs.

LETTY'S SECRET.—p. 1014.

LETTY'S SECRET.

A Story for the Little Ones by Jean Courtenay.

IT was such a great, big, beautiful secret that Letty, who was just six years old when Father cut the first rose of summer and carried it indoors to Mother, had to shut her little red lips as tight as tight for fear it should escape her, after all.

You see, it happened in this way.

Letty was to learn geography because she was six years old and a big girl. She thought it the very nicest of all her lessons. She opened her blue eyes very wide indeed when Miss Wynne told her that the earth was round —like an orange!

"Has it got pips?" was all she said.

And when she looked at the fields and long, straight flat roads, with houses and gardens each side of them, that afternoon when she was out for her walk, she shook her golden curls till they tumbled all over her face, and Nursie put her hat straight and said:

"Big girls of six who learn geography ought to walk along properly, and not shake their heads till they look like a doormat."

Now Letty had just caught sight of a patch of brilliant yellow shining under the afternoon sunshine away across the fields—it was really a field of barley ripe for the sickle—and she only answered:

"I do b'lieve I can see a bit of the peel showing!"

Which Nursie thought was a very silly thing to say!

But when they had walked a little further Letty could see that it wasn't orange peel, and she was as puzzled as ever. Miss Wynne must be mistaken! And yet Miss Wynne was so clever and kind. She told Letty everything she asked her, and she never said, "Don't worry, child," or "I'm too busy to tell you now," or "Wait till you're a bigger girl, and then you'll know."

If only she could jump off this orange of a world for a teeny-weeny minute and send it rolling along in front of her, Letty thought she could believe that it was really round; though even then she couldn't think why she didn't tumble off and hurt her knees and scrape the skin off the palms of her fat little hands, as she did when Cousin Jack persuaded her to ride standing on the garden roller while he pushed it along the drive.

But the next day Miss Wynne told her something else. She said that if Letty could look right through the earth-orange just before she jumped into bed at night, she would see all the little boys and girls on the opposite side getting up, because it was the next morning with them!

Letty clasped her hands tight and said "O-oh!" and as she said it the secret crept into her head.

You see—like some other children I know—Letty was not fond of bedtime. She used to blink very hard, and rub both fists into her eyes, for fear Mother should say, "I think the dustman is coming, girlie!" Nurse always seemed to come just at the most exciting part of the fairy tale Mother was telling her, and say, "I'm quite ready for Miss Letty, Ma'am," and then off she had to go.

Then when Nurse had bathed her and combed out those tangled curls, and had shown her how to fold up her clothes and put them all neatly on a chair ready for the morning, Mother would come in, looking like the prettiest and sweetest fairy in the whole book, in her soft silk dress and bare, white neck and arms, round which the baby-star stones twinkled, and she would hear her little girl say her prayers, and "Gentle Jesus," and then kiss and tuck her into bed. No one could make you so comfie as Mother, Letty thought.

That part of bedtime was nice; but when Mother had drawn down the blinds and shut the door behind her, and Letty was left in the dark till sleep came, that part was not so nice. She wanted to run downstairs in her night-gown, with those little pink toes peeping from under it, and see what Mother and Father were doing, and who was singing so high, and whether anyone was sitting in her favourite little chair in the drawing-room.

You mustn't think that Letty was afraid of the dark. Oh dear no. No little children need be afraid of that unless they have done something very naughty during the day, and have not told God and Mother that they are sorry.

XUM

And if this is the case, they should ask the dear God to forgive them and keep His arms round them all the night, and in the morning tell Mother all about it.

Letty knew, too, that there was only one sun, and she was too unselfish to wish to keep it all the time, because those little girls and boys on the opposite side of the earth must have it sometimes, and when it grew dark with her she knew it was growing light with them.

That was another of the wonderful things she had learnt in geography.

But the night after Miss Wynne's words made the secret come Letty was quite ready for bed, and after Mother had gone she lay and planned how she could do it.

"Do what?" do you say?

Well, it was just this. Letty thought how lovely it would be if she could dig a little hole just big enough for her to creep along) right through the earth to those other little children on the opposite side; and then, instead of going to bed, she could slip away and play games with them, and slip back just in time for her bath in the morning!

Wasn't it a glorious secret? They might know the nicest games on that other side, and she could teach them "Blind Man's Buff" and "Oranges and Lemons," if anyone there could help her with the words.

The great question was, When could she dig it?

But before she could find an answer she was sound asleep, too sound even to dream.

The very next afternoon Mother and Nursie were both very busy making a little blue coat for Letty to wear when the days grew colder. It was a lovely afternoon, and Mother said:

"Run into the garden, girlie, and play quietly there till tea-time."

Letty ran as fast as her little legs would carry her. Now was the time to dig. The garden was not a very large one, but Father had given Letty a corner for her very own, and showed her how to keep it nice. Letty ran down the winding path till she reached the place where the bed on one side spread out like a fan. That was her garden.

It was also the only spot in the garden where she was allowed to dig by herself. So it was quite certain that the hole through the earth-orange must be made there.

She had a dear little spade of her own, and a hoe and a rake. They had been Father's birthday present to her. She fetched them from the tool-house and began at once.

The afternoon sun shone very brightly, and Letty grew very hot and rather tired. But she looked at the hole she had made, and the big heap of brown earth beside it, and her heart beat fast. Surely she must be very near the other side! She bent down in the hole and listened very intently. Perhaps she would hear those children playing and laughing. How surprised they would be if they knew she was coming to join them. Perhaps sometimes, when the sun was on Letty's side, they would like to run through her secret way and play with her. If they were good little children, and not rough, Mother would ask them to stop to tea, and then that would be fun. And perhaps, while they were all playing in Letty's garden, they would hear the nurses on the other side calling them to come to bed! But they couldn't come and fetch them, because the secret was only big enough to hold children "as big as me and weenier," said Letty.

She couldn't hear anything, however, though she listened very hard. Perhaps the children were doing their lessons with their Miss Wynnes, and so were obliged to be very quiet.

Then the tea-bell rang, and Mother's voice called:

"Tea-time, girlie! Come along in."

And digging had made Letty so hungry that she ran gladly. She gave one last proud look at her hole, and expected that she would be able to finish it the next day, and perhaps spend the very next night on the opposite side of the earth!

After tea came a cuddle with Mother, and a lovely fairy tale. Letty loved fairy tales. She couldn't understand those little children who didn't care for them. She fancied she saw the dearest little fairies laughing at her from under the leaves in the garden, and peeping at her from inside the half-opened flowers. She thought the little brown sticks in the woods that lay on the ground were sleeping fairies, who had made themselves look like sticks for fear someone should take them home and want to keep them as dolls. She felt sure a tiny fairy rode gaily on every butterfly's back as it flew hither and thither, though she couldn't see it very plainly. And she just longed to see the dear little fairy nurses who kept the baby birds from tumbling out of the nests when their mothers were out paying calls.

While Mother was telling the story, Father put his head round the corner of the door, and with a shout of joy Letty scrambled down from Mother's lap and ran to kiss him.

Letty loved her Father very, very much.

Sometimes she tried to think which she loved better—Father or Mother—and when she was well she never could tell ; but when she was feeling a little bit ill then she always fancied she loved Mother best. Father was so kind and good. He was the grandest playfellow, she thought, in the whole world ; or, at any rate, in the side of it that she knew at present.

"Well, little woman, not in bed yet? Why, I thought all little birds were asleep before this."

"But I'm not a bird, Father dear," cried Letty, laughing. "I'm a big girl now."

"Oh!" said Father, pretending to be very astonished and making such a funny face that Letty screamed with laughter. "Well, look here, big girl, you be off quickly now, because I've got a surprise for you in the morning, and the sooner you go to sleep, you know, the sooner to-morrow will be here."

"A surprise for me!" echoed Letty, growing rosy all over her dear little face with pleasure. "Oh, Father, what is it?"

"You'll see in the morning, girlie," was his only answer, and then he shut the door and went out into the garden.

You can fancy what an excited Letty went to bed that night. With her own beautiful secret nearly finished, and Father's surprise soon coming, she felt as if she should never go to sleep. But her afternoon's work had so tired her that almost before she began to try to go to sleep she was there.

The next morning Letty begged Nursie to dress her very quickly, so that she could go into Father's room and see the surprise while he was dressing. But when she knocked at the door, he called out :

"Up already, girlie! Well, run into the garden and look at your own little piece, and you will see the surprise."

Away went Letty down the stairs so fast that she almost tumbled on to her nose, across the slippery hall, out by the wide open door and down the fresh-smelling garden. She was wondering—oh, so hard!—whether Father had guessed her secret and had finished it for her, so that she could go and see those little children at once.

But when she reached the spot in the winding path where the bed spread out like a fan her face lengthened. Where was the secret way she had almost finished? Gone! Where was the beautiful heap of brown earth by the side of it? Gone!

And what was there instead? The ground had all been smoothed and raked, and Father's surprise laughed at her from the scarlet petals of a row of dear little geranium plants that went all round her garden. One was planted just over the secret, and Letty almost gave a little sob as she looked at it.

She wanted to cry dreadfully, and I believe she would have done so if she had not reminded herself that she was a big girl of six years old who learnt geography, and then she winked back the tears so hard that they couldn't drop. And she thought how disappointed Father would be if she were not pleased with his surprise. It was so kind of him to buy her the geraniums which she had been longing for before she heard about those children underneath. And he must have been tired after business all the long hot day, and yet he had tidied up her garden and planted them all so carefully! She must never let him guess that she had almost cried with disappointment when she saw them.

So, like the brave little maiden she was, Letty kept the spoilt secret right out of sight, and made up her mind to wait till she was older, or till the frosts came and nipped the geraniums, before trying to dig her way through the earth-orange, and then she ran back to the house and met Father just as he was coming into the garden to see how she liked his surprise.

"Well, girlie, was it a nice surprise, eh?" he said, as he stooped to kiss her.

And Letty threw her arms round his neck and said, "Very nice, Father dear. You are the most remembering father a big girl ever had."

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A WELSH ORATOR.

ONE of the most esteemed and deservedly popular Temperance workers in the Principality is Mr. Henry J. Williams, who is so widely known under his Bardic title of "Plenydd," which was conferred upon him many years ago at one of the great national festivals which are a characteristic feature of Welsh activity. Mr. Williams comes of a Temperance stock, his father and grandfather before him having been total abstainers and zealous promoters of the cause in the early days of the movement. He was born in 1844, and is one of the oldest and most highly respected representatives of the United Kingdom Alliance. He is a poet and a musician, as well as a born orator. To be seen at his best, one should find "Plenydd" addressing a great meeting of his fellow-countrymen in his native language. Then it is that all those inspiring appeals and outbursts of fiery passion find their full play! Then it is that as a man speaking to men "Plenydd" irresistibly compels that spell-bound attention which none but front-rank orators can secure. As a member of the Calvinistic Methodist body, Mr. Williams has taken an active part in the work of his denomination, and it is no exaggeration to say that few men have done more than "Plenydd" to popularise the principles of the United Kingdom Alliance throughout Wales. More than once attempts have been made to induce him to transfer his services to other parts of the kingdom, but he has felt, and apparently still feels, that there is plenty to be done in Wales.

SEVENTY YEARS AGO.

"Are we better than our fathers?" "Do we seek to promote the Temperance cause with as much intelligence and sagacity as the great pioneers of the movement?" One need not answer these questions, but we may be permitted to recall the fact that just seventy years ago Joseph Livesey, of Preston, in his Temperance Advocate, submitted the following propositions for the earnest consideration of the Temperance people of that day:—

1. You must not violate the vow of abstinence contained in your pledge.
2. You must discountenance all the causes and practices of intemperance.
3. You must make your family a Temperance family.
4. You must be regular in your attendance at the Temperance meetings.
5. Do all you can to convert drunkards to the paths of Temperance.
6. Exercise charity towards your fellow-members.
7. Seek fresh company.
8. Never be ashamed of Temperance.
9. Pay all your debts as soon as possible.
10. Cultivate every personal and social virtue.

Each of these points was enlarged upon with homely counsel expressed in terse English; and the Christian character of the movement was enforced with special emphasis. Those of our readers who address Temperance meetings might do well to consider these ten points as a suitable basis for a new speech. Is it heretical to say that some of our audiences will not grumble if the coming winter's work is heralded by some new speeches on the very old lines, which are erroneously considered to be out of date?

A GOOD CREED.

The Rev. Dr. Dawson Burns, who has the happy gift of epigrammatic expression, says his Temperance creed consists of three short articles:—

1. "All Christians should be teetotallers."
2. "All teetotallers should be Christians."
3. "All men and women should be both."

"THE GOOD OLD DAYS."

Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb, in their concise and most valuable little book on "The History of Liquor Licensing in England, principally from 1700 to 1830," have brought together some striking word pictures of the state of London in the seventeenth century. Quoting from a pamphlet on "Distilled Liquors the Bane of the Nation," published in London in 1736, we read: "Everyone who now passes through the streets of this great metropolis and looks into the distillers' shops . . . must see, even in shops of a creditable and wholesale appearance, a crowd of poor ragged people, cursing and quarrelling with one another over repeated glasses of these destructive liquors. . . . In one place, not far from East Smithfield, . . . a trader has a large empty room backwards where, as his wretched guests get intoxicated, they are laid together in heaps—promiscuously, men, women, and children—till they recover their senses, when they proceed to drink on, or, having spent all they had, go out to find wherewithal to return to the same dreadful pursuit, and how they acquire more money the sessions paper too often acquaints us." "Such a shameful degree of profligacy prevailed," writes Smollett, who saw the London of that date with his own eyes, "that the retailers of this poisonous compound set up painted boards in public, inviting people to be drunk for the small expense of one penny, assuring them that they might be dead drunk for twopence, and have straw for nothing. They accordingly provided cellars and places strewed with straw, to which they conveyed those wretches who were overwhelmed with intoxication. In these dismal caverns they lay until they recovered some use of their faculties, and then they had recourse to the same mischievous potion." ("History of England," by Smollett). We are bad enough in some parts of London still, but, on the whole, we can say that the efforts of religious men and women and the general betterment in the conditions of living have brought about a decided improvement upon the much-belauded "good old days."

A QUARTER OF A CENTURY'S WORK.

Some time ago we inserted a portrait of Mrs. Hind Smith, the founder of the Young Abstainers' Union, with a few particulars of the important work accomplished by the Union; but we do not like to let the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Union pass by without offering a word of congratulation. The hospitable doors of the Mansion House were thrown open to the Union and its friends for the celebration of the event, and the beautiful Egyptian Hall was filled to overflowing with a thoroughly representative audience. Mr. Alderman T. Vezey Strong, J.P. (Treasurer of the Union), presided, and addresses were given by the Hon. Mrs. Eliot Yorke and the Dean of Hereford. The proceedings included a presentation of purses, which were received by Mrs. Hind Smith, and medals and a banneret were presented by Mrs. Vezey Strong to the successful competitors. The membership of the Union now reaches a grand total of 10,524, with branches in all parts of the United Kingdom, and many corresponding members in various parts of the world. A feature of the year's work has been the raising of a "Thousand Crowns," upon the initiative of Miss Salmon, the editor of the Society's capital paper, The Young Abstainer. The fund has been a great success, the amount asked for having been exceeded by 247 crowns, and reaching a total of £311 16s. 3d. The largest contribution from a branch was sent in by the Clapton and Stamford Hill branch, which contributed £60. A Prayer Union has been formed to offer special prayer for the work every Friday morning, and 1,700 members have been enrolled. That the educational features of the movement are kept well in view is shown by the fact that two members of the Union passed the first examination of the Central Temperance Education Board. Two cots have been permanently endowed in the Temperance Hospital, and arrangements have been made to raise a sum to endow a third cot. Branches have been established in several important boarding schools, and it is intended to develop this department as much as possible. This excellent record of work has been accomplished on an income which barely reaches £850, including the exceptional help of the Crown Fund; so it need scarcely be added that the administration of the Union is a model of careful economy and wise expenditure. The Executive takes a personal interest in the work, and has a most capable Secretary in Miss S. E. Hooker. It may be said that this lady is an earnest total abstainer, who has for many years been an active worker in the Temperance cause. Before taking up her present position, which she has held for some time, she was a worker in the famous Dove Row Band of Hope in the East-End. Her training among the children of the very poor has no doubt given her exceptional opportunities of getting experiences which she now employs for drawing out the sympathies of the children of the middle and upper classes. Miss Hooker is a capital speaker, and is equally at home with a company of lively nimble-witted schoolboys or a more sedate gathering of parents and friends. We may add that The Young Abstainer is steadily increasing in circulation, last year's issue being the largest ever recorded.

SHORT ARROWS

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

A Notable Missionary Exhibition.

AT Bromley, Kent, there was recently held a Missionary Loan Exhibition, which represented the work proceeding in the mission fields under the influence of the various British societies. The exhibition was the outcome of a combined effort on the part of the principal churches of all denominations in Bromley, and its success may be gauged by the fact that during the six days on which it was open (April 18th to 23rd) it was visited by no fewer than 7,000 persons. A photograph which we reproduce of a corner of the African Court will give an idea of the exhibits which the organisers were able to bring together. A series of meetings was held in connection with the exhibition, which were addressed by missionaries and native pastors.

A "Prisoner of Hope" in Japan.

"I HAVE just seen a very interesting visitor," wrote lately a missionary in Japan, "a Mr. Kojima, an elderly man, one of seven or eight converts whom the first C.M.S. missionary in this country baptised more than thirty years ago. He tells me he believes 600 or 700 Japanese Christians now living are the ingathering of that worker's faithful ministry through the little band baptised by him. Yet a past record of this missionary's labours ran, "He brought in a few converts, several of whom have been lost sight of." Mr. Kojima suffered for Christ's sake, in earlier days, loss of inheritance and ancestral name, willingly relinquished that his Christian profession might not bring utter ruin on his relatives. Cruel imprisonment befel him. Laden with iron chains and bars, he was carried to Tokyo in a closed palanquin, in which, confined for a month, he almost died of suffocation. Very touching is the account of his contriving, when passing through his native town, to slip through his carriage shutters a note to the missionary. "Though I should be put to death in Tokyo, I pray you will stay and still enlighten Japan." Now, after thirty years, through which his Christian hope has burned brightly, he is rejoicing in the spread of Gospel truth in his beloved country. In controverting some recent statements as to the "failure" of Christian missions in Japan, reliable and remarkable statistics in their defence have been published. Even more deeply convincing seems to us such a testimony as this incident supplies.

Sham Resignation.

We lately read a village anecdote somewhere which reminded us rather of one of Æsop's Fables. Old Betty, who was a confirmed grumbler, was always telling her neighbours that she longed for death, and wished he would come and take her. A practical listener resolved to put this heroism to the test. Betty was resting her rheumatic bones in bed one evening, when there was a loud knock at the cottage door. "I am Death," cried an awful voice behind the chink, "and I have come for old Betty." "Oh," replied that trembling worthy, "you have mistook the house. Betty lives a good bit further up the street."

The "Hopeful" Treatment.

"A well-known authoress was discovered to be suffering from anæmia of the brain and consumption, and to be living entirely alone in a remote village on five shillings a week, of which one shilling was devoted to rent. Formerly her works had sold well, but she had outlived her popularity." Picture to yourselves what this means, for this is no flight of fancy, but a genuine case relieved quite recently by the Committee of the Royal Hospital for Incurables. This wonderful Home stands on West Hill, Putney, and within its spacious walls 208 poor mortals, condemned for life to incurable illness, find a haven in which to spend their remaining years. Besides this band of sufferers, over 600 outside the institution, scattered all over the kingdom, receive an annual pension; which dispels the terrifying spectre of "the Workhouse" that looms before so many who have known days of ease. To the authoress in question this pension came like a heaven-sent gift. Nor is her case singular in its misery; it can be paralleled—can be surpassed, in fact. "I must stay in bed to keep from fainting for want of food," said a girl, discovered by the Committee in Maida Vale, starving on two shillings a week. She had lost one leg from cancer and was alone in the world. And a £20 pension—the price of a dress or a trinket to some—brought her courage to work as ardently as her enfeebled health would permit, and to support herself with this help. For not all can be received into the Home itself, with its wonderful view across the valley to Southfields, with its lofty halls and sitting-rooms, its broad verandahs, its dainty bedrooms, its cheerful nurses. A grievous sight it must of necessity be to see these 200 doomed men and women, but all that can conspire to make their lives bearable is done, and in the words of the Committee, "Every case will be accepted as incurable, but will be treated hopefully." And many of them are cheerful—many who have never left their beds for twenty or thirty years are as keenly alive to the beauties and wonders of the world as we, who can go where our fancy takes us. "I make up my mind to be cheerful," said one old lady, who had seen twenty-five years come and go from her bedroom window, "and I never talk of my ailments; it does me no good, and only worries others." Said a man, with a head Rembrandt would have delighted to paint, "I have sat in darkness for twenty years; my sense of touch is gone, too, so I cannot read, but kind friends read to me, and tell me of all that passes here and in the Far East, and there is much to think of." His keen face was lit up by the wondrous light from within. His speech was sonorous as the Scriptures.

SUNSHINE FOR THE AFFLICTED.

"And now that spring is coming (he went on), I long to be sitting under the trees and listening to the song of the birds. Soon we shall be able to do this, and after the long winter there is joy in it. It is pleasant, too, to hear a fresh voice. There is much to think of. I wish sometimes I could see, if only a shadow, but it is blankness—first a white day, then a black day; and yet I have my thoughts. There is, indeed, much to think of." I left him sitting in his chair, blind and helpless, among so many others, crippled by rheumatism, paralysed, grievously afflicted in divers ways—and went out into the sunshine and the budding beauty of a spring day. Surely, if this beautiful haven brings to these stricken ones such contentment and peace of mind, it is a work that should not be allowed to flag. What would life be to them were they condemned to suffer in close and poverty-stricken lodgings, to suffer uncared-for and untended, dependent on strangers for a few grudging services—to drift perchance, at last to the Workhouse, having survived friends and kindred—frail ships adrift on life's so stormy sea?

"THE QUIVER" MISSION BOATS.

DEDICATION OF "THE QUIVER No. 1" BY THE BISHOP OF DURHAM AT SOUTH SHIELDS, JUNE 14.

I.—A Letter to the Children.

MY DEAR CHILDREN,—This is the first time we have met in the pages of THE QUIVER, but I shall hope to hear soon that I have many friends and helpers amongst you. Now I must explain how and why I am writing to you. Many of you, whose parents and friends take in THE QUIVER, have doubtless seen the pages which tell of the Mission Boats for Seamen, for which collections are being made in this magazine. The first boat was given by the proprietors of THE QUIVER; the second was given by a lady in memory of her little daughter Mildred, who had passed away—alas! You will have seen in the July Number an account of the launching of the first boat, the Quiver No. 1; but I must explain the object of the boats to those of you who may not have read about them till to-day.

By the time these lines reach you many of you will be spending your holidays by the sea. How you are enjoying yourselves! I can just picture you paddling in the sparkling waves, building sand castles and trenches, bathing and wrestling with those foamy breakers (if you are old enough), going out in boats to fish—never weary of that wonderful restless, ever-changing sea. And many of you, as you turn your faces towards school again, when the holidays are over, sigh and think regretfully, "I wish I were a sailor!"

At those moments I don't think you remember that, like everything in this world, the sea has a pleasant and an unpleasant side, and that a sailor's life is not all shining waves, and sunny skies, and light breezes, and "Cheerily, my lads, yeo-ho!" No; the men of the Merchant Service can tell a different tale. Not for them is the great battleship, with its well-ordered arrangements for food and sleeping and sickness and health, nor the regular hours and regular pay. For them, too often, the ocean tramp—poor food, poor pay, poor treatment all round. Month after month rolling on the waves from port to port; month after month of discomfort and hardship, on which "Jack" puts a brave face. This is the lot of many hundreds of men who help to make the trade of the Empire. And it is these men I wish you to help.

After all the long, long weeks at sea, at length our ocean tramp comes to port—at Falmouth, say, or Queenstown, away in Ireland. And to the men on board, who have not forgotten in time of danger to call upon One above Who watches over "those in peril on the sea," and those who have no thought save for evil words and food and drink—to good and bad alike the mission boat comes. Hardly a man but welcomes the chaplain with joy, for he brings not only the Word of God with him, but comforters, letters, and magazines. Oh! the joy of it all after those long days and nights of sea—nothing but sea—and the same faces and voices, and the creak of the ropes, and the rattle of the engines!

In every port of the British Isles there should be a mission launch and a row-boat, and a meeting-place on shore for these toilers of the sea. It is the aim of THE QUIVER at present to provide a mission launch and ten row-boats. The launch, it is hoped, will be contributed by the grown-up readers of the magazine. It is to you children that I appeal for the eight remaining row-boats. The cost of each is £25, so you have before you the task of raising £200. It is a large sum, but it is not beyond your powers. If only you all help—"a long pull, a strong pull, and all together" works wonders. And do not forget that every penny is welcome. Of course, the larger the sum the greater the help; but I shall appreciate the small sums every bit as much.

How proud you will feel when your first row-boat is launched! You will know that when the big "grown-up" launch cannot make her way through the masses of shipping your little boat will slip through and bring comforts for body and soul.

I feel sure I shall not ask you in vain, and I shall be glad to hear from any of you who care to write to me when you send the money. I shall answer your letters in the magazine in one corner of my page, which I shall call "Answers to Correspondents," and you must not be disappointed if you do not hear for a month or two. You must remember that a monthly magazine has to be prepared some time in advance.

Before I finish my chat this month I wish you to read the following letter, which will, I am sure, interest you. It is from the father of a young contributor, who has already helped the Row-Boat Fund. He writes:—

"Dear Sir,

"I have received your acknowledgment of £1 forwarded by me to "THE QUIVER Mission Boats Fund," and also "The Light of the World," which you kindly give to subscribers to this fund. I would like to explain that this small contribution originated with a gift of 2s. from my little boy of ten, who, on buying a QUIVER for May at a railway bookstall on his return to school, was much interested in the fund, and said he would like to give 2s. towards the mission boats. The remainder of the £1 sent by me was made up by relations and friends, and some money found in a drawer in this house. I thought you might be interested to know this.

"To the Editor of THE QUIVER."

And now good-bye till next month, my dear children. I shall hope to hear from many of you, and I think we shall soon become firm friends. Your affectionate

AUNT GRACE.

Collecting forms will be found in the advertisement sheets of this number, and should be sent with the money to Aunt Grace, c.o. the Editor of THE QUIVER, La Belle Sauvage, Ludgate Hill, London, E.C.

II.—Friends and Foes in Sailor Town: Old Fairy Tales Told Anew.

Once upon a time, says an ancient writer, there lived in an island off the coast of Italy a sorceress named Circe. So extraordinary was her power that, when the great Ulysses and his companions landed there, she turned into swine all those who ran headlong into pleasure. Only the hero himself, who was fortified by a herb divinely bestowed, could resist her enchantments.

A grain of truth has been embalmed in more than one of the old Greek fairy-tales. The seamen of the age in which they were written must have had many complaints in common with those of the present day. A modern representative of the wicked Circe can be found with little trouble in the neighbourhood of the docks in the most famous island of the world. The story of the fabled voyager being robbed by harpies has a moral which is thoroughly up-to-date. Those daughters of Neptune and Terra, with heads of women and claws of vultures, whose mission in life was to ruin and plunder sailors, can be recognised in nearly every port of the world. In the greatest of all, the port of London, the old fairy tales are told over and over again. Where the river widens and fills miles of docks thousands of ships come and go. Every night 18,000 seamen sleep ashore in the neighbourhood which is known as Sailor Town. There they meet with dangers more to be feared than the cruel, curling waves. The sorceress Circe and the harpies were not more pitiless than some of the men and women who watch for the arrival of the merchantmen.

In they come, those noble ships, drawn by panting steam tugs. The towering warehouses are awaiting the treasures of the Indies. The markets are eager for the supplies of food and clothing. In the lands where the vertical sun produces dates, spices, quinine, and castor-oil the crews have borne heavy burdens, and now they richly deserve to enjoy the accumulated wages due to them. Some of their mates who started from home in the full enjoyment of health and strength have found a grave in the distant lands, where many die of sunstroke or fever. During the long voyages—some, indeed, extending to two or even more years—the men's wages are withheld by their employers until their return, and may be further kept back until two days after their discharge. Perhaps as much as £500 may be waiting for the crew of one ship, which is paid by the agent of the employers in the Board of Trade office. The harpies want to claw that money. The newspapers give the list of ships' arrivals. From this list the length of the voyage can be estimated, and only the long-voyage crews receive attention. Jack steps on to the quay. He has a chest too large to carry far on his back. Besides this, there is his bedding, and perhaps a pair of bright-coloured parrots, a monkey, or a soft little mongoose, which he has brought as presents for his wife and children. The thought of seeing them and the home possibly one hundred miles away, the idea of a holiday, and the sensation of treading on firm ground, make him almost giddy. Friendly men and women greet him. What if their faces are red and bloated? It is good for a lonely man to meet with a welcome and hand-clasp.

"Here you are!" cries one, perhaps addressing him by his name. "A friend of yours told me to meet you. You want a nice clean lodging and a truck for your kit. I can take everything for you. Take care; don't listen to that man, he is not to be trusted. You have no ready money? That does not matter. I can wait for the pay until you get your wages."

Poor Jack! How is he to distinguish friends from foes; crimps from respectable boarding-house keepers? Trustful by nature, impatient to stretch his legs in the great world, to see new faces and new dresses, instead of the limited view of bulwarks, and the circle of sea, he follows the truck and his new, obliging friend, scarcely waiting to inquire where he is going. The time comes for him to draw his pay. His host goes with him to the door of the shipping office. When he comes out into the street with the accumulated earnings of the voyage in hard cash in his pocket, his landlord presents his bill. Jack cannot remember all that has happened since he landed. His host and hostess plied him with drink. Having been long an abstainer, it affected his head, or it may have been drugged. He knows that he has been wild and foolish, but he cannot dispute any charge that the boarding-house keeper brings against him. There are instances in which £50, the earnings of an engineer or officer, are spent or stolen within a few days. His money is so reduced that he is ashamed to take it home and face his relations. There is just enough to find him amusement until he gets another berth; so he does not break away from his new acquaintances. His pockets are soon empty, for he is robbed on all sides, and then he wanders about the docks, asking for a ship. He must take what he can get. Hunger stares him in the face, and he realises that the harpies will clutch his kit if he stays on. So he signs an agreement to sail before the mast, possibly with a drunken captain in command of a miserable old boat. He has gone one step down the road to ruin. And what becomes of the wife and children who have watched and waited for his return, and fear he has been lost? Many a story quite as true and terrible as the old legends of mythology can be told of Sailor Town.

Whilst a seaman was hidden away in the neighbourhood of the docks, his poor old mother watched and hungered for news of him in another district of London. She clung to her patient faith in his affection. Richard was such a good son, she said; she knew he would never leave her without a letter unless he was ill or dead. After losing his wife, he had left his one afflicted child in her care. He had sailed to New York, promising to send money to keep her and his little boy; for some ship-owners give their seamen a form of monthly allotment by which they can have part of their earnings paid over to relations at home as they become due. One letter only reached her, and then she heard no more. Though old, and stiff with rheumatism, she earned what she could by her needle and charing. It was not enough to feed her and a hungry child. Bit by bit the furniture which had helped to make two rooms a home was sold. Her poor old face grew white and thin as the wolf starvation sniffed at her door. When news came at last from her son, he was in South Africa, and it was too late to save the home, and too late to save his mother from the effects of the long, sorrowful months whilst her heart grew sick with hope deferred. She still maintained that he was a good son, only seamen met with so many temptations to drink. She made the discovery that even the son whom she trusted and loved with all her heart could forget both mother and child when he fell into intemperance.

Temptations to drink so constantly beset a sailor in port that experienced men believe their only safe course is total abstinence. One part of the work of Missions to Seamen is to promote temperance. During the last twenty-one years it has been the means of 166,982 pledges being taken by seamen. Crimps find their business far more difficult than in days gone by, and many of them have left London in disgust. They do not like those interfering persons who meet the ships with a brake, and take the seamen to a Sailors' Home.

Much has been done to guard seamen against their enemies in British ports, but in order to fortify them to overcome the temptations of the modern Circes and harpies all over the world they need a divine gift, of which the herb granted to Ulysses by Mercury is an illustration. The life of a sailor is short, but more men of the Merchant Service are lost through the perils in port than on the high seas. Perhaps those who have learnt most of the secret of strength are readiest to look for help to lay hold of it. "I will be sure to hail the mission cutter," writes one seaman to the Missions to Seamen reader at Par, where he hoped shortly to return. "Sir, I trust it will never be my lot to desert my Master. There's trials, but was not He tried for my sake and the world's?"

This seaman is only one of many who watch for a boat with a dark blue-and-white flag when their ship enters port; "Richard" is typical of hundreds of widows' sons, who only need a good friend when they land, to save them from breaking the faithful, yearning hearts at home. Where are these sailors to be found? Wherever a white sail glistens against the azure of sea or sky. The sea is the fair-weather friend of August holiday crowds. Under its smile, fagged townsfolk sink into restful musings. Perhaps a streak of vapour on the horizon conjures up pleasant dreams of England's glory, her merchandise, and the extent of the great empire on which the sun never sets. In its turn, the frown of the sea may awaken thought to the serious side of a maritime calling.

Whilst dreaming of great things, the chance of doing practical service ought not to be allowed to slip away. The day soon closes and the summer draws to an end. Whilst men slept, the enemy of souls was active in mischief. Whilst the world lay dreaming, the Master saw His well-loved fishermen toiling in rowing, for the wind was contrary to them, and He came to them. He calls His servants now to follow His footsteps in the waters. During this holiday month the white sails, gaily painted boats, and blue jerseys add to the picturesque effect of shore and seascape; the very sight of them is worthy of accomplishing still more. It may remind readers of this magazine that the May Number announced the opening of a QUIVER Fund for supplying the Missions to Seamen with one motor launch and ten row-boats, and the July Number described the first of these Quiver row-boats. The Mission vessels are given to the service of God amongst men entirely dependent on voluntary effort for the comfort of religion and the friendly aid that landsmen find in connection with their own places of worship. To realise their need will be a sufficient inducement to support this scheme. But will all who care for seamen observe the notice in our advertisement pages, where the collecting paper is printed, and make known as widely as possible not only that subscribers of half a guinea will receive a Rembrandt photogravure of Mr. Holman Hunt's picture, "The Light of the World," but that sixpence out of every shilling received by the publishers for the sale of copies of this picture is devoted to the Fund?

JACK'S PALACE.

SOME STORIES OF SAILORS ASHORE.

By F. M. Holmes.

(With Illustrations from Photographs by Cassell and Co., Ltd.)

ONE day three sailormen came to Jack's Palace at Limehouse, and asked for board and lodging under its hospitable roof.

"Certainly," replied the manager. A bedroom for each, as neat and clean a little cubicle as anyone would wish to see! A shilling a night, or five shillings for the week. Cheap enough—eh, Jack?

Oh, yes; that would suit, for they were men of money, they were. No paupers, wanting to beg everything for nothing. They had just been paid off, and two of them had no less than sixteen pounds apiece, and the third twelve pounds. Oh, yes, they could pay.

Well, if they were so rich, would they not deposit their money in the safe, or they might lose it all?

A SAILOR IN HIS CUBICLE.

Looks passed from one to another, and then the money was deposited and receipts given, and Mr. Lear, the manager, also locked up Number Three's watch.

Not long afterwards Number Three returned very drunk, and with blood flowing from a nasty cut over the eye. But Mr. Lear was quite equal to the occasion, and dragged him in, washed the wound with cold water, bandaged the gash, and with the help of the porter put him to bed.

Next morning, of course, Number Three felt very bad. He had the most confused remembrance of what had taken place. He searched in his pockets and found them empty. He confessed with sorrow that all his money was gone—and even his watch. A reg'lar clear out. What was he to do? He could not even pay for his bed and food.

Miserable, indeed, must have been the man's feelings. Not only was he suffering from his wounded head, and the reaction of his drunken debauch, but he experienced the wretchedness of penury, when only yesterday he had been rich—penury caused by his own misconduct. And now starvation stared him in the face.

Then the kindly manager told him.

"Your money is here, and your watch also. We have them both in safety; you deposited them with us."

Thankfulness took the place of despair, and hope sprang up again in the sailor's heart, and, that day being Sunday, he attended the services at the Palace and signed the total abstinence pledge. "Never no more," was his word. Never no more would he make such a fool of himself, and he would leave his money with Mr. Lear and draw it out as he wanted it.

Many sailors seem quite unable to take care of money when they are ashore, and, notwithstanding all that the Board of Trade has done—and it has done much—they are still too often the prey of harpies belonging to both sexes who infest the ports where sailors land.

The most extraordinary stories are told of their credulity. A certain Jack, whom we will call F., left the pay offices one day with two five-pound notes and something over in his pocket. He was met by two respectable-looking women who professed to be his friends. Particularly they warned him against the crimps and bad people who would rob him of his hard-earned pelf.

"We know," they said, "how hard you have to work for it, and we should so grieve if it were to be stole from you. And the place swarms with them as would steal it if they could."

Jack was very pleased with these two respectable women. He thought it very kind of them to interest themselves in his welfare. Would they take a cup o' tea?

Well, yes, they were not above doing that. In fact, they knew of a nice, quiet, respectable place where they would be well entertained. And they would even take care of his money for him if he were obliged to walk through these wicked streets alone, otherwise he would be sure to lose it before nightfall. There were such shockin' wicked people about.

So guileless Jack deposited his money with the respectable women, and presently one said to the other, "Hold my umbrella a minute, dear. I must just go round the corner to see a friend o' mine."

But many minutes passed without her return, and Jack remarked to the other woman, "Your friend is a long time comin' back. Where's she gone?"

"Ah! I must go after her and see. I shall only be a minute. Hold my umbrella, will you, good sailor-man?"

Minutes grew into hours, and the respectable women did not appear, and Jack grew very suspicious.

"Hi!" said he to the restaurant keeper. "Where are those two respectable women gone? They've got my money."

"Women?" cried the man. "I don't know nothing about no women. Pay up what you owe."

And presently Jack found himself in the street with only a couple of old umbrellas in exchange for his ten or twelve pounds of money.

"Well," said he, "this shall be a lesson to me, no mistake."

Many men say that, but forget the resolve at the close of their next voyage. Jack F., however, did not forget, and he turned over the proverbial new leaf, and kept it fairly white and clean.

Why is Jack so foolish about money matters when ashore?

I believe one reason to be that on his voyages he has no responsibility. Everything is provided for him; he has no use for money, and probably has no money, even if he had use for it. He has simply to obey his officers in working the vessel.

But immediately he steps ashore the circumstances are entirely different. He finds himself in possession of money, and with no one to safeguard, or to guide him. Temptations throng around, human hawks pounce upon him as their prey, and too often Jack falls, and is cruelly robbed and entreated.

THE MISSIONARY SUPERINTENDENT AND FINNS.

He is frequently as much sinned against as sinning. An American lad came one day to the British and Foreign Sailors' Society, who now fly their flag at Jack's Palace as their headquarters, and told a strange story.

He had signed-on a ship the other side, he said, which brought him to Hamburg, and when he reached that port, instead of receiving wages, as he expected, he was told nothing was due to him. He had been sent on to London, where his language at least would be understood and, having heard of the Society, he came thither to seek its aid. What was he to do?

He was sheltered until a ship was found for him whereby he could return to his native country.

The lad was unfortunately a type of many. Sailors are still "Shanghaied." That is, a ship is found for them by a crimp, or some middleman, who represents to them that they are to receive wages at the journey's end, whereas the real arrangement is that they have to work their passage and are to receive no pecuniary remuneration whatever, unless it may be a small sum through an advance note, which the crimp takes care to secure. The Board of Trade has practically stopped this nefarious business in Great Britain, but it still flourishes in some ports abroad.

A man is Shanghaied through his advance note. Jack finds himself in a foreign port without a ship, and his money runs short. His boarding-house keeper gives him credit, and when at length Jack gets a berth—perhaps through his host's assistance real or assumed—he is confronted by a neat little bill.

"Hold!" exclaims the boarding-house keeper to the captain. "I've been feedin' this man for days. He owes me six pounds. How am I to get my money?"

The end of the matter is that the captain gives an advance note on Jack's wages, and when the sailor arrives in port he finds the crimp on the other side has got all, or nearly all, of his hard-earned cash.

A SHIPWRECKED CREW.

Even in England these advance notes are made the occasion of extortionate demands.

"Can you cash this bill for me?" said a sailor, entering Jack's Palace one day and presenting an advance note for four pounds. "The man where I've been staying wants to charge me a pound for changing it!"

The manager of Jack's Palace cashed it for nothing, though if the sailor chose to give a shilling for the accommodation, that was his affair. The crimp would probably defend his extortionate demand by pointing to the excessive risk he took.

CASHING AN ADVANCE NOTE.

"How am I to know," he would say, "that Jack will actually sail? When he has the money he may get drunk, and the ship sail without him, and then the owners will not cash this note—and where is my money?"

The shipowners grant these advance notes, but will not honour them until three days after the ship has sailed. They adopt this plan to protect themselves. If some specimens of the genus Jack were to get their money before they start, they might never start at all, and the owners would be grievously defrauded. They can scarcely be blamed for refusing to pay a comparatively unknown man until he has done a certain amount of work. If Jack could become more thrifty, and live on his pay from his last voyage until he again sets sail, the difficulty with regard to changing these notes would largely disappear. As things are, institutions such as Jack's Palace render a great service in acting as Jack's banker.

But another type of sailor presents himself at the hospitable door. His face is pale and his clothes are ragged. He is a Consul passenger.

Far away on some foreign shore he has suffered shipwreck, or maybe he has lain weak and ill in a distant hospital until at length the British Consul sends him home. Yet, being now at home, the question presses with cruel severity—Where is he to go, and how is he to live, until his ship's owners pay him his wages—if any be due—or until he can get another berth?

Even sailors who have met with no such misfortune are obliged sometimes to wait for their money, and the watchful crimp finds here the opportunity for his nefarious frauds.

"You come with me, Jack. I'll put you up fine. You shall live like a fighting-cock with me, and you need not trouble about the money till it suits you."

But when the day of reckoning comes, as it inevitably does come, Jack is confronted by a big bill which is little better than downright robbery.

The Board of Trade has done much to protect Jack, and has succeeded greatly in its praiseworthy efforts (as, for instance, in arrangements made to send his money to him at his own home); but no regulations can wholly protect him, and it is to offer him a place of safety and of pleasant social recreation, as well as to afford him spiritual and temporal help in every way, that institutions such as Jack's Palace have been built.

It occupies a commanding position at the great centre where the Commercial Road meets the East and West India Dock Roads and the Burdett Road in the midst of sailordom at Limehouse, and forms the new headquarters of the well-known British and Foreign Sailors' Society, which has been established for more than eighty years. As Mr. Passmore Edwards gave a considerable portion of the building money (£14,000), the handsome structure is officially called after his name—the Passmore Edwards Sailors' Palace.

The cost has been more than double that amount, and it may be interesting to record here that on the day—a few years ago—when the Duchess of Teck went down the river to open the Society's Millwall Rest, a sailor's mother and widow—who had previously given the late Mr. Spurgeon £50 which she had saved up for the Society—took £10 in a piece of paper, which she gave to Mr. Matthews, the Secretary. "This sacred sum," as Lord Tennyson described it, "was paid the next day as a deposit to secure a site on the East India Dock Road, which ultimately led to the Passmore Edwards' Sailors' Palace." Many other donors have rallied round the Secretary, until on the day in May, 1903, when the building was opened by the Prince of Wales, the total sum required was nearly all subscribed.

Mr. Passmore Edwards also considerably enlarged the library, giving some 5,000 volumes, from which bags and boxes of books are lent to sea-going vessels, so that the work of the old library is merged in the new, and is known as the Passmore Edwards' Ocean Library.

"Why cannot we have a bag?" asks a sailor in the docks as he leans over the side of his ship and sees the librarian's assistant carry one aboard the neighbouring vessel.

"You can, if you like, mate," he replies. "Captain Custard's our man up at Jack's Palace; he's got charge of the library, and he'll be glad to lend you any book we have got for your voyage."

"Have you anything which I can read up about the sea?" another may ask. "I want to study my profession."

"Plenty," would be the reply. "We have books of all sorts, religious and scientific, as well as stories. But if you want to study up the sea, why don't you join our Nautical School? We have some splendid rooms at the top of the building, and a fine observatory, and the captains in charge teach many a mate and master, so that they can take their Board of Trade certificates. It is called after his Majesty—King Edward VII. Nautical School. You should see the handsome young chaps that come there to study under Captain Nicholls!"

"And when you've got your certificate, what then? How do you get your ship?"

"Jack's Palace helps you there. The Shipmasters' Society has got an office at the Palace, and already shipowners are telephoning, 'I want a mate, or a second officer, for my ship.' We have an officers' department in the Palace, and to have your tea in the conservatory is like Paradise, especially when yarning with Captain Custard or Captain Munro Reid."

"Well, I am not likely to be a ship's officer," said another. "Maybe it's a bit too grand for me."

"Not it. There is a pretty garden and greenery if you like a smoke out o' doors, and snug reading rooms if you want to stop indoors, with a bagatelle-board if you should desire to knock the balls about."

"Oh, I like a good old sing-song, I do."

"Well, you can have it. Mr. W. F. Haine, the Missionary Superintendent, has generally got something going on in the beautiful new hall of the Palace almost every night. The Jack's Palace Good Templars' Lodge meets there alternate Thursdays."

IN THE KING EDWARD VII. NAUTICAL SCHOOL.

"Ich kann nicht speak de Engleesh," remarks another man, popping his head up above the bulwark.

"Then we have just the place for you. I s'pose you are a Finn. We have a Finnish service on Sunday nights before the usual bright service for Jack and others, and on Wednesdays a meeting for Finns; but you look in on Tuesday nights too, while you're lyin' in the docks, and—my word, but I think you'll like the Seamen's Pleasant Evenings, for music speaks many languages."

"That's true," pipes up another. "I've bin at sing-songs in furrin parts, when I did not catch on to a word, but I enj'yed it all the same. Do your folks have any Jack's Palaces abroad?"

"Lots. If you cannot exactly call them Palaces, they are Sailors' Rests and Rooms, and may be found in every part of the world. You ask our Secretary, Mr. Matthews, and he could talk to you for an hour about the numbers o' ports where our flag flies."

Talking in this way, the representative of Jack's Palace moves through the docks, ever ready to recommend his institution as he goes. It is not necessary that Jack should lodge at the Palace in order to enjoy its advantages. By no means. It is open to all seamen, of all nations, and at any time, a night watchman being on duty after eleven o'clock.

The sailor who is waiting for his money and the sailor who has none to expect, the sailor who desires a comfortable home and the sailor who merely wants to pass a pleasant hour, the sailor who has fallen among thieves and he who desires to avoid the thieves, all find a welcome. For to help Jack religiously and socially is the object of its managers, and to assist him ashore or afloat is its gracious work.

A ROMANCE OF OLD FRANCE.

By Christopher Hare, Author of "Dreams to Sell," Etc.

CHAPTER XXIX.

IN that wintry afternoon, more than two hundred years ago, the river Loire meandered idly along the middle of its broad, sandy bed, through the heart of France, even as it does at this present day. The splendid Château of Blois reared its head above the river and the town with a majesty all its own, and every grey tower and pointed roof was gilded with the ruddy light of the setting sun.

A rough barge, laden with timber, floated down as on a golden mirror, and at the prow sat a young girl, who gazed with wistful eyes upon the scene before her. Yvonne de la Féronniere had obeyed the priest's bidding, and with the help of her faithful friend, the ferryman, had set forth on her journey without delay. The old ferryman was a chartered denizen of the river, and knew every craft that sailed between her banks. The captain of this barge was a friend of his, and readily promised to take Jean's dear daughter, as he called her, in safety as far as Tours, which happened to be his destination; but part of the cargo was to unload at Blois.

Yvonne was still too much stunned and bewildered by all that she had gone through to have any will of her own beyond the one thought, "Away from Paris, on to Poitou—to the dear west country!"

She had heard, scarcely heeding, that Orleans was not safe for her, even to pass through, as a fierce, fanatical persecution of the Huguenots was at that time raging through the city. She was still in a state of half-dreamy consciousness on the afternoon of the second day, when the towers of Blois came in sight. It was so restful to float slowly down the broad, silent river, to be at peace once more, with no heart-rending claim upon her sympathy, no self-sought duty almost beyond her strength.

She was so weary that she seemed to crave for nothing but rest and silence, and of the future before her she dared not think. How delicious it would be to drift on thus for ever!

The girl was roused by a voice at her shoulder.

"Here we are, close upon Blois, my child. Come ashore with me, and we will see the sights. It is market day, and so many people you never beheld. We have time to spare while they unload the timber."

It was the bargeman's wife, who had mothered her on the voyage. But the name of Blois touched some chord of memory. Ah, yes; surely it was here that Monsieur de Vaudreuil was Deputy-Governor!

What evil chance had brought her here, of all places? What if by chance he should be in the city? To go ashore would be madness, and yet how could she refuse the kind woman's offer without rousing suspicion?

As Yvonne paused, uncertain, her eyes wandered idly over the crowded landing stage, a scene of bustle and confusion, full of market folks. Then for a moment her heart almost stood still, for surely she recognised that homely figure, sitting apart as though waiting to embark.

It could be, it was, none other than her dear Madelon! She never knew what excuse she gave, or how she reached the shore, but hope lent wings to her feet, and in another minute she stood on the wooden pier, trembling with fear lest such happiness were too good to be true. To her dismay the woman looked up at her with cold, irresponsive gaze.

"Madelon, dear Madelon, do you not know me?" she cried, pushing back her hood, careless and forgetful of all bystanders.

When the first gladness of the meeting was over, Madelon explained that she was waiting for the boat which carried the mails and a few passengers, and that she was going to Orleans, for the second time, in search of her lost mistress.

"But now all is changed, and I will go on with you to Tours in the timber barge. Blois is the most dangerous place in the world for you, Mamselle. I will tell you all on the way."

This proved easy to arrange, for the good people on the barge had pitied the girl's loneliness, and were only too glad that she had found a friend. Not until they had actually started, and were once more slowly floating down the river, did Madelon dare to feel safe. As for Yvonne, when she found herself once more tenderly watched and cared for, only then did she fully realise how terrible had been her past loneliness and isolation, and her unspeakable joy and relief found expression in a fit of sobbing.

"My poor Mamselle! I should never have known you till I heard your voice. Your face is so thin and pale, and all your golden hair hidden away. Tell me what they have done to you," murmured the old servant.

Then, little by little, the young girl told her story; but when she came to the description of her arrival at Orleans, and the abrupt summons which her uncle received, Madelon broke in with a smile:

"Ah, yes; I know how that came to pass. It was Mademoiselle Louise who insisted that Pierre should start at once."

"Was it all a plot of hers to befriend me? Was there no message from the King?" asked Yvonne in alarm. "Her father would never forgive her."

"Do not fear; there was a letter from the King, sure enough. But I must tell you from the beginning. When Mademoiselle Louise learnt that you were gone she was in despair. It was long afterwards that I heard all this from her own lips.

"Her first passionate desire was to discover her father's destination, for to this she had no clue. The secret had been kept from her, as she was known to be your friend. While she was seeking some possible means to help you, suddenly there was a clattering of horse's hoofs and a commotion in the courtyard, and she soon learnt that a despatch had arrived from his Majesty the King.

"Here was her opportunity. She hastened to find Madame, who was flurried at having to decide anything in her husband's absence.

"'We must open the letter at once!' exclaimed Louise. 'It is doubtless most urgent, and my father must receive it without delay. Where will it find him?'

"Taken by surprise, her mother replied in a fretful tone, 'Somewhere on the road, I suppose. I shall have to spare Pierre, and one of the best horses, and he may be away for days. I know it is somewhere below Orleans.'

"Mademoiselle Louise had learnt all she needed. Meantime she had broken the seal and read the parchment. It was but a general order to all provincial governors that they make ready, without undue delay, to return to their provinces lest there be trouble with the Huguenots since the new edict.

"Now, if this letter were sent to her father he would continue his journey, but if only a bare message were sent after him he might return at once with Yvonne.

"'You are right, my mother,' she said quietly. 'At any cost, my father must be summoned back instantly, but we will not trust Pierre with so precious a document as the King's letter.'"

"Ah, that was like Louise; she has a ready wit," said Yvonne. "So that was how Monsieur came to leave me at Orleans?"

"Yes, Madame was quite willing to trust all in the hands of Mademoiselle. She cares for nothing but her toilette and her amusements," replied Madelon. "After Monsieur came back, all the household removed to Blois. A letter was left for me with the concierge in Paris from Louise, bidding me follow her there. 'Be swift and secret!' were her words."

"Then where were you, Madelon?" asked the girl, in surprise.

Chevalier ere he should set sail for the Paynim land."

Even in the dim light she could not fail to see the sudden start and flush as of a rosy dawn which overspread the young girl's face. She added quickly:

"Ah, Mamselle, I had been wiser not to tell you, for no reply hath come, and from that day to this there has been silence as of the grave."

"'Madelon, dear Madelon, do you not know me?' she cried."

There was a moment's pause, and the reply came in a low, uncertain voice:

"Mamselle, do you remember that ring which you gave into my keeping? I took it to the Duchesse de Maillebois, and she pressed me to abide with her."

Again there was silence, until Madelon set aside all scruples and answered the question which her mistress had not courage to ask. She must run the risk of raising false hopes.

"Madame de Maillebois sent a special messenger to bear the ring in haste to the

But Yvonne turned to her with a radiant countenance, like a lantern lighted from within by some intense steadfast glow.

"You did well to tell me, for when my token reaches him he will come to me from the ends of the earth. Nothing will daunt him, and he will seek, unwearied, till he find me.'"

While she spoke, her shining eyes had a rapt expression, as though they could pierce the mists of time and space, and read the unknown future. But Madelon shook her head and murmured to herself.

"Heaven grant that the search take not a lifetime, and that the meeting be on this side the gates of Paradise! But indeed, Mamselle, you are not easy to find," she continued aloud. "These weeks past you have hidden securely in Orleans, alike from the eyes of hatred and of love. Monsieur de Vaudreuil has offered a great reward and left no stone unturned; and as for me, I have paced every street, and worn myself out with seeking. Tell me, where have you been?"

Thus abjured, the girl told her strange, pathetic story, and the old servant listened with streaming eyes and upraised hands.

"Ah, ma chérie," she sobbed, "the angels must have taken you under their guidance, for never was so sure a hiding place dreamed of as the home of a leper. And you never thought of the danger, the awful risk?"

"I had no choice. It came upon me unawares—the knowledge that this was my work. Anyone else in my place would have done the same," was the simple reply.

"Try to forget it all, dear Mamselle," said Madelon, with a shudder. "Let us look forward, and not back. Now, at least, we are together, and I can watch over you."

Yet when they came to discuss the future they had no definite plan; only a vague desire to escape to the dear familiar land of Poitou and to seek out long-forgotten friends, who might but greet them with alien looks, if, indeed, they were still in the land of the living.

With much to ask and much to tell, they wiled away the long chill hours of that wintry night on the timber barge, when sleep was hard to woo. On the morrow's dawn once more the grey mist rose from the river, flowing like a broad silver ribbon through the garden of France, with its vineyards and background of forests, and ever and again the grey towers and turrets of battlemented towns.

It was late in the day when Tours was reached, and the barge at length moored against the quay on the river side. The travellers were sad at heart to leave the calm security of that ark of refuge, for the dreamy floating down the stream had been an ideal rest to body and mind. They parted with regret from their homely friends, and Yvonne emptied her purse into the woman's hand, in disregard of the whispered warning that such lavish generosity would arouse suspicion. She would take no denial, and made her peace afterwards with Madelon.

"I can never show how grateful I am to all these dear people who have befriended me. And, amongst other things, I still have my pearl necklace and a little sapphire brooch, which was my mother's. You must sell them for me in the town!"

"Ah, Mamselle, that may not be easy where we are strangers; but I will take you to the house of a cousin of mine, from Poitou, who was apprenticed to a silversmith. There, I trust, we shall find a shelter for the night, and a warm welcome from his young wife Françoise. They live in the Ruelle d'Olon, out of the Rue St. Martin."

It was already dusk, and there was no time to lose; so they hurried up from the river, past the Tour de l'Horloge and the Tour de Charlemagne, and on between the crooked houses which almost met across the black shadows of the footway. Then Madelon dived into a dark narrow bye-road, and at length came to a pause before a certain number twenty-seven. The house looked gloomy and forsaken, the windows were black and unglazed, and the much-battered door was barred on the outside.

There were no signs of life, and the expectant guests, after rapping sharply against the panels, stood back on the pavement, doubtful and uncertain. They looked at each other in dismay, when a woman's head was thrust stealthily out of an adjoining doorway. After glancing furtively up and down the alley, she beckoned to Madelon and whispered:

"Are you looking for the Aubertins? Hush! Come within. I will tell you about them."

With some hesitation, they followed her inside a low, dark room, where a guttering candle threw a lurid glare on a child's cradle standing near the dying embers of a wood fire.

"Philemon Aubertin is my cousin. Can you give me news of him?" asked Madelon anxiously.

"Ah, the poor fellow!" was the reply. "I know it is a sin for me to trouble about heretics, but my heart aches sorely for him and his poor wife and dear little Babette, with her curly hair and smiling face. You should have seen her play with my little one yonder!"

She was interrupted by an eager cry.

"What has befallen them? Where are they? Tell me, for the love of Heaven!"

"It was like this," began the good woman, who could only tell the story her own way. "When the Dragoons came with the King's order that all the Huguenots were to be converted by any means, there were a dozen or more quartered on my neighbours next door, who were known to go to the meeting. But they would not sign the paper or go to Mass, as many others did. So poor Françoise, just off a sick bed, had to find food and cook for the soldiers, and serve them, till she was ready to drop. And the Dragoons plundered and destroyed everything, even the linen she had woven herself they would take and use to litter their horses. I saw it, I who tell you!"

"Is it possible?" sighed Madelon. "But I doubt not you were a kind friend, Madame?"

"It was little enough I could do! And things got worse. One day, clinging to her mother's hand, Babette went by the church of St. Clement. There was a procession going in with lights and singing, and the dear child cried out 'Ah, that is beautiful!'

"That was quite enough, for the leader of the Dragoons was standing by, and he said the little girl had chosen her religion, and they carried her off to be brought up a Catholic! The mother, half distracted, followed her wailing. Ah, I can feel for her. I, too, have a child.

"Then, as ill-luck would have it, Philemon met them, and he struck a soldier who was rough to his wife, and—that was the end, for we saw them no more. And now their house is taken by the State, but I have a tender heart, and I grieve for them."

"Alas! my poor cousins!" sobbed Madelon. "This is terrible beyond words."

"Hark! someone is coming," interrupted the woman in a startled tone. "I must not be seen with you. You must go!"

"But where can we go, Madame?" asked Yvonne in alarm. "It is so late and dark!"

"Try the 'Âne Rayé,' farther down the street, at the corner," was the last whispered advice as the two lonely women found themselves pushed outside into the street, and the door was closed against them.

They shed tears over the sad fate of sweet little Babette and her parents, as thus for the first time was the bitter reality of religious persecution brought home to them in all its awful vividness. They knew that these things happened, they had heard of them from afar, but now they were face to face with fire and sword.

Silently, with sinking hearts, they turned their steps through the darkness, in search of the tavern where they might find a refuge for the night.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE "Âne Rayé" of Tours was a very fair example of the mediæval hostel, yet it was a strange experience for a delicately-nurtured girl like Mademoiselle de la Féronniere to find herself a guest under its roof.

"She alone was an outcast."—p. 1039.

But in these latter days she had seen so much of life's vicissitudes that now she felt safe, with Madelon by her side, even in the mixed company of roysterers, who crowded the inn parlour.

In the darkest corner of the dimly-lighted room, whose fitting was scant and beggarly, their supper was served in pewter plates on a rickety three-legged table, and they were thankful to get napkins of sailcloth, while an intolerable odour of cooked fish and garlic pervaded the whole place. Happy to escape notice while the drinking and singing and quarrelling went on around them, and the rafters rang with the tumult, the two women were able to steal away, up the dark steep staircase, into a dingy garret under the roof, which they could share for the night with the children of the landlady.

She was a friendly soul, and showed them much simple kindness. They learnt from her that in two days' time the waggon which carried the public mails would start from their street corner for Poictiers; and she promised to secure places for them. Madelon fully realised by this time how dangerous was every hour's delay, for she had discovered that the captain of the Dragoons, who had been so cruel to little Babette, was none other than Adolphe de Vaudreuil.

But there was no help for it. Meantime, she found means to raise money on the pearl necklace from a Jew merchant in a back street of the town, the man probably thinking that she was a waiting maid, who had stolen it from her mistress. But the pearls were fine and precious, and what concern was it of his how she came by them if he made his usurious profit?

After that many hours were spent in a vain search for any trace of the Aubertins, and Yvonne was only induced to give it up when she saw that their quest was already arousing suspicion. The pitiful fate of that Huguenot family still remained an unsolved mystery.

Madelon was now in a fever of anxiety to continue their journey, and drew a long breath of relief when at last they had paid the reckoning at the "Âne Rayé," and had actually started in the mail waggon; but at the city gate they barely escaped a fresh danger, for Madelon's papers were made out in her own name alone, and they were only saved by the carelessness of a drowsy sentry, who probably could not read. But this was a fresh warning to them, and they decided that henceforth they must avoid high roads and towns, keeping to the villages and the bye-ways.

After two long, weary days' journey, they took leave of the friendly mail driver just outside the old turreted walls of Poictiers. There they could see the fair city rising on the hill slope above the winding river, with its pleasant gardens and orchards, its gates and its bridges.

The most difficult part of their journey now lay before them, towards the coast of Poitou, some sixty miles or more to the west, and there was no public conveyance by road or river.

It would be too long to tell of all the perils and adventures which befell them on the way—how at times a churlish refusal would drive them to seek another refuge, but how more often they met with a kindly welcome, where the scattered homesteads were not ruined and deserted. For in no part of France had the persecution of the Protestants been carried on with greater violence.

The hapless fugitives, young and old, rich and poor, sought safety in flight, but here they were too far from the frontier to escape by land. The sea was their only hope. They stole through the open country by night until they reached the coast, where they bribed the sailors, and some were shipped with bales of goods for England, while many others embarked in small craft and braved the perils of the stormy seas.

But, fortunately for Yvonne and her old servant, by this time the first fury of pursuit was somewhat abated. They made their way, sometimes in a rough country cart, but mostly on foot, through the open hilly country, wooded here and there with forest trees amid the low copses and underwood. They would find shelter at times in a narrow lane, hollowed out between two hedges, where the trees joined overhead, like a cradle. As they travelled on, past the woodland, they came upon a bleak and desolate scene, where the wintry winds swept upward from the broad plain and the low marshy land by the sea-coast.

One night the wanderers, footsore and weary, came upon a lonely farm which had been ravaged and partly burnt. Here they were driven to seek shelter for the night in a ruined barn, to find it already occupied by other fugitives. Their fears were set at rest when they found this was a Huguenot family, on the way to La Rochelle, but the father had fallen ill and they had found this resting place. The mother told her sad story, and ended thus:

"All that terrible time when the dragonnade lasted we were hidden in a cave near the forest, and we should have died but that Madame d'Olbreuse sent us food and clothing."

"Madame d'Olbreuse!" cried Yvonne. "Why, she was a dear friend of my mother's, and I remember her well. Where is she now?"

"At the Duke's country house, the Château d'Olbreuse, near Ussieu, not more than a day's journey from here," said the woman.

"Madelon," exclaimed her mistress, "we will go there to-morrow. We shall be safe in her care, even if she has to shelter us also in the cave.

The girl's hopes rose high, for now she trusted that the end of their toilsome pilgrimage was in sight. Their path on the morrow lay through her own estates and past the Château of Croisette, the dear home of her childhood.

Ah, what would she not have given to cross the threshold and revisit every familiar chamber, and call up the blessed memory of her loved ones! She dared not linger long in the one spot where she would most surely face the danger of recognition. Yet as she stood by the great iron gates and gazed with wistful eyes at the grey lichen-covered walls and the barred windows, through which she dimly realised the faded tapestry of the walls within, and then looked round at the tangled wilderness which had once been a smiling garden, her five long years of exile seemed to melt away, and the happy past rose up before her, vivid and radiant.

She, she alone was an outcast on the borders of Paradise, some pale ghost suffered to haunt once more the scene of her earthly joys.

Meantime, Madelon had found out the custodian of the château, a deaf old woman, who told her that the rents were paid to the Marquis de Vaudreuil, the guardian of their young lady. He was a hard, relentless man with the tenants, and now, alas! there was little hope for them, as she heard tell his son had married the heiress, Mademoiselle Yvonne.

So history is made!

That night found the weary travellers safe at length in the grand old Château d'Olbreuse, where all their hopes of welcome were more than realized by Madame la Duchesse d'Olbreuse, the noble lady whose devotion to the help of the persecuted Huguenots will long be remembered in Poitou.

The King's minions did not dare to interfere with her personally, as she had powerful connexions, her husband being the brother of the Duchess of Brunswick; but her house had been frequently searched for refugees.

After all that she had gone through, these were halcyon days for Mademoiselle de la Féronniere, in peaceful seclusion with her mother's friend, who lavished on her the warmest affection and sympathy. As she listened to the simple story of Yvonne's life and love, and watched her day by day, this woman with the understanding heart learnt to know the young girl as none had ever known her before, and could read her white soul like an open book.

If this Chevalier de Beaumanoir were worthy of her, he should win her; or, at least, it would not be the fault of Madame d'Olbreuse if she did not bring it to pass.

She had many friends in Paris of high position and influence, through whom she could obtain information and send messages. But she kept her own counsel, and the more surely to do this she resolved to send Yvonne away. Already she gave shelter in her house to many Protestant refugees, who to the outside world were numbered amongst her servants as a more complete disguise. Amongst them were some young girls of gentle birth, and she knew that there was always danger of a chance word and unconscious betrayal.

On the Olbreuse estate was a cottage at St. Michel, by the sea, which had more than once been a safe refuge. Yvonne knew it well, from happy days spent there in her childhood, and once again she sought for rest and healing on that lonely shore.

One spot above all others had a strange fascination for her. On the rising ground above the sand dunes stood a ruined chapel, built of granite, which was called after "Notre Dame de Bon Secours." Around it had once been an enclosure of dwarfed wind-swept beech trees, but of these only a scattered remnant survived On every side were grey moss-clad tombstones, half buried in the drifted sand; and small wooden crosses, inscribed with a few touching words to the memory of sailors and fishermen lost at sea.

On the highest point stood a few ancient pine trees, mostly stripped of their branches, and tormented by the gales into weird, fantastic shapes; while beyond, a great Calvary, with outstretched arms, rose gaunt and black against the sky.

It was a haunted place, and Yvonne loved it. Late in the month of January it happened one day that she sat there, searching the horizon with wistful eyes. She wondered dreamily what message yonder little sail in the distance was bringing to some waiting heart—but not to her! She had hoped against hope these many weeks past for news of Réné. He was not fickle or false; on his loyalty her faith was rooted.

"One glance was enough. Réné had come; he had kept his tryst."

No; some disaster must have befallen him in those perils by sea and land, where an officer with the King's commission ever carried his life in his hand. Alas! he must have joined the great company of those whose memorials were all around her, the men who had sought their bread upon the waters, and whose place on earth would know them no more.

Yet God was merciful. He would never suffer such love as theirs to be wasted. It would find its full fruition when she and Réné, her well beloved, should stand together in brighter dawn.

The touching lines of a favourite writer—Marguerite de Navarre—came to her lips:

"Répondez moi! o, douce âme vivante,
Dites comment en la cour triomphante
De votre Roi et Père êtes content?
En déclarant comme amour vous enivre,
Répondez moi!
Pour soulager ma douleur véhémente,
Répondez moi!" *

Ah yes, she craved but one word. It was he silence of death which was so terrible.

Courage! She must buckle on her armour and school herself to the thought that she had lived her life. Henceforth she would be but a looker on at the feast. In the drama of this world her part was that of the handmaid who would bring joy and gladness to others, but look for none herself.

Still the girl sat and gazed, careless of the waning day, for she seemed to gain strength from the solemn stillness and immensity of God's world around her. Then slowly before her eyes the clouds lifted, the mist of pearly grey was seen to roll away, and a flood of ruddy gold poured over the white landscape. The sea deepened to the blue of a peacock's breast, and the flaming sky seemed to build up with burnished gold the vaulted roofs and great naves and myriad columns of some glorious temple in the Apocalypse, whose mystic visions filled her soul.

Yvonne turned away her dazzled eyes—the radiance was too much for them—and saw that she was not alone. Someone had approached from the sea-coast with silent footsteps on the soft, drifting sand, and was already close by her side.

One glance was enough. Réné had come; he had kept his tryst. Bronzed with exposure, unchanged save that he seemed to have gained a new and nobler manliness, he came swiftly forward in eager, tremulous expectation. She felt no doubt, no surprise; his coming came upon her as no new thing. She seemed to have known it through all time.

There are moments in life of such rare and exquisite happiness that they rise beyond the touch of pen or pencil—words are powerless to reach the height, and silence best becomes us.

To a stranger it might have seemed that the girl was pale and worn, and that the trouble and hardships of the last few months had robbed her of all bloom and freshness. But to the eye of her lover that dear face which he had shrined so long in his memory was ennobled by some strange unearthly beauty, and was to him the loveliest in all the world. Illumined from within, her expressive countenance showed the promise of character fulfilled, the perfect flower of achievement where once had been but the hidden germ.

And now joy, that marvellous healer, had driven away the shadows and brought back the fleeting sunshine to her smile.

Their last meeting had been in a stately palace, in the company of royal guests and amid the festal pomp of wealth and magnificence. To-day Réné and Yvonne stood together on a lonely sea-coast, in exile and peril. In the place of brocade and costly gems she was clad in a simple peasant's dress, and all his gallant and courtly array was changed to the worn and travel-stained suit of one who had come in haste from a journey. But they would not have had it otherwise.

Love chastened by sorrow, by sacrifice, by the nearness of death, at last had met with its reward.

In that hour of supreme content it seemed to the happy lovers that a hush came over the listening world; the waves were stilled, and the seagull's cry took a new note of exultation. Fresh gladness lay on sea and sky, and all nature was at one with them in the joyous spirit of eternal youth.

[END OF CHAPTER THIRTY.]

* "Answer me! O sweet living soul,
Tell me if in the court triumphant
Of your King and Father you are happy?
Say how love has filled your soul—
Answer me!
To comfort me in my passionate grief,
Answer me!"

THE GREATEST RESCUE WORK IN THE WORLD.

A TALK WITH MR. SAMUEL HADLEY, OF THE JERRY McAULEY MISSION, NEW YORK.

By David Williamson.

DOWN a dark street, splashing along through the mud, under Brooklyn Bridge, round a corner, and then in front of one's eyes there flashed a brilliant transparency with the words: "Jerry McAuley Mission." Out of the pelting rain and the darkness, I went into a hall filled to the last seat with men, many of them the most wretched objects you could find in New York. In the chair, presiding over the meeting, was a short, sad-faced man known as "Barney." A few years ago he had been partner in a great firm with a reputation through America, but he had sunk down until he was rescued in this Mission, where he now labours to redeem the past. All round the hall were portraits, and over the platform was the one word "Jesus," the key to the whole method and inspiration of the work. A tablet to the revered memory of Jerry McAuley and the old chair in which he had been accustomed to sit reminded me of the founder of the beautiful work which has been in progress "down Water Street" for so many years. The only statistics that I shall give in this article I may as well mention at once, as a proof of the extraordinary extent of the Mission. In 1902 the attendance at the meetings reached the largest total in its history—over forty-five thousand coming to the hall. Of these, over four thousand publicly professed conversion. Over thirty thousand men were lodged by the Mission, and it provided forty thousand meals. These facts speak for themselves, and when you remember that the men are the flotsam and jetsam of New York, you will be able to clothe the figures with something of the romance and pathos they represent.

MR. S. H. HADLEY.

I listened for hours to Mr. Samuel Hadley, who has been at the head of the Mission for many years since the death of Jerry McAuley, as he gave me "human documents" drawn from his wonderfully full experience of life and rescue work. A man who has touched certainly a million of men, and helped many thousands to a better life, has material which not a single living novelist or student of crime could possess. Mr. Hadley's own story is of misery and shame changed into joy and triumph. He never minces matters in relating the depths to which he had sunk. "I have proved beyond a doubt," he wrote on the twenty-first anniversary of his deliverance, "that the Lord Jesus Christ, and He alone, can by His own Almighty power, without the aid of drugs and nostrums of any kind, in a moment, and for ever, kill and cast out from the brain, the blood, the stomach, and above all else the imagination, the hell-born appetite for whiskey or alcohol in any shape whatsoever, and by faith in His atoning blood a soul can be kept free as a little child from its dreadful power." You look at his fine, healthy face, and hear his stirring words, and it takes a real effort to imagine that Mr. Hadley was only twenty-one years ago dying of delirium tremens in a Harlem saloon. In the midst of all the drinking, he suddenly determined that he would rather die than touch another drop of alcoholic liquor. He fled to the nearest police-station, and asked the superintendent to lock him up, so that this part of his resolution might be kept. When they let him go the next day, he went to the Jerry McAuley Mission, and then and there gave his heart to God. Year after year he has gone to the very cell in the police-station, so that he might remind himself of the wonderful freedom and gladness which came into his heart. He is the rightful successor of Jerry McAuley, for he is as filled with pity and love as was that fine rescuer of humanity. The New York police recognise that when a man has sunk to his lowest depth, there will be still one man in the city who will stretch out a kindly hand to him, and the police frequently direct such a wanderer to Water Street as a last resource.

"People are fond of calling themselves specialists," said Mr. Hadley to me. "Well, I'm a specialist in rescuing men. If ever Paul was called to preach to the Gentiles, I have been called to preach to the drunkard, the lost man, the man whom nobody helps and nobody wants. When I have seen anything fail, or have got tired, or when my faith goes, I remember the words, 'Love suffereth long and is kind,' and I go back with new hope to my work. The hardest cases are the men who have fallen from a high position into deepest degradation. Let me tell you one story. A man who had graduated at one of our best universities came into the Mission one night. He had become a victim to morphine, and had just lost his situation. The people who employed him said, 'Go to Hadley; that is the only place for you.' So to Water Street he came. I made him assistant janitor, and let him live in my own house and take all his meals with us. He was a gentleman and a scholar, but I was never sure of him because he took morphine. At last his appetite for the drug grew so terrible that he asked me to prevent his getting it. I hired two men to look after him, but he evaded all their vigilance. When he was under the influence of the drug he would abuse me terribly. He would slyly talk to visitors who were inspecting our premises, and would say to them, pointing to me, 'Don't you speak to that thief; his very touch will contaminate you.' You can imagine my embarrassment. Oh, what a fight I had to win that man. He left our Mission, and I lost sight of him for a while. Then I heard that he had been run over by a carriage, and had been taken to a hospital. He could not get away from me now, so I went to the hospital, and had the joy of leading him to Christ. I buried him—for he had no friends left to care for him—and I shall never forget standing by his coffin and rejoicing that the poor wayward soul was past all fighting, and was safe at last from the world's snares."

I asked Mr. Hadley if he was able to visit the prisons. He replied: "It costs me a thousand dollars every time I go to Sing Sing Prison. I will tell you why. When I go there I am permitted to address the prisoners from a gallery overlooking their promenade. The men can listen to me or not, but they usually crowd to hear what one who has conquered drink and crime has to say to them. I end my address by asking any of them to come and see me in Water Street when they are released. In order that I may know when they come to our Mission, I tell them to whisper in my ear a password which I give them—a different one every time. After every visit we receive so many hundreds of ex-prisoners, that I reckon it costs me a thousand dollars to meet their needs. One man came to the hall, and was converted. Some time afterwards I noticed that he was not looking happy, and asked him if there was anything on his mind. He answered that he wanted to confess that he had deceived me. He had whispered a password which I had given at Sing Sing, and had pretended that he had heard me speak there; whereas, in reality, he had been told the password by a friend of his who had been in Sing Sing. I forgave him readily, and he was once more happy. Every day there are extra guests at our table, for I like to ask a man who is down on his luck to stay and have a talk with me, so that the helpers of the Mission may be able to do their best to find him employment, or aid him in other ways. Ah, those meals reveal some strange facts, and prove how sin drags a man down to the lowest depths.

"We lost, a few months ago, one curious character. He was a relative of General Logan, and retained to the last, after all his falls, a certain refinement which told of good upbringing. Oh, what a victim to drink that man was! He commenced life in the Government service in Washington; then he obtained a splendid position on the Southern Pacific Railway Company, in California; but everywhere whiskey defeated him, and caused him to lose his work. He began coming to Water Street twelve years ago, and was with us almost every night. Some of our poor fellows seem to feel as if they were only safe when they are within our walls. People gave him odd jobs, but he was not to be trusted. Fifty times he started to live the Christian life; and sometimes he would keep from drink and wickedness for two months. Then he would fall; and yet we all pitied him and loved the man. It was a sorrowful night when we looked on his face for the last time. He had fallen ill in a lodging-house, and had died before I heard he was ill. I discovered his body in the morgue, for the police make a point of telling me of any unknown men or women who are without friends, and I bury them. Some of our most impressive services have been at such funerals. How thankful I am that it is the Blessed Saviour who has to deal with these people, and not a human being."

"Do you ever get thoroughly defeated by a man, Mr. Hadley?"

"Not very often; but sometimes, when I have forgotten the everlasting patience which Christ requires us to use, I have repulsed a man where I ought to have waited for the Spirit to convert him. One such instance was of a man whom I called 'the Old Colonel.' He came into our meeting in a shocking state of raggedness and physical misery. He came again and again, and was always asking for money. One night, when my temper had been unusually tried by some disorderly behaviour in the hall, the Old Colonel entered, and began to worry me. I lost my temper, and told him to get out of the place. He said, 'Do you really mean that?' I said, 'I will show you if I mean it or not. Get out, or I will put you out.' The old man started to walk down our hall; he stopped at the door, and declared he would never cross the threshold again. We ended the meeting; my mind was already miserable at the thought that I had turned away the Old Colonel, but my pride was uppermost. At night it was our custom to read the Bible aloud; it was my turn to read, but I said to my wife, 'You read to-night; I don't feel well enough.' All that night I lay awake, haunted by the memory of that old man's face. When the morning came I was just as wretched as could be. All my happiness was gone, and I began to feel that my usefulness would end if I could not rescue again the Old Colonel. I went to a prayer-meeting, and asked them to pray for me. I told my story, and they entreated God to send the Old Colonel back. Not long after my return home there came a knock at my door, and in came the Old

THE GREATEST RESCUE WORK IN THE WORLD.

Colonel. I hugged that old man for joy, and then I set to work to help him. He had a good bath, and I gave him some warm clothes; his long hair was cut; he was made to look quite a handsome old man. If you look at his portrait taken not long before he passed away, you would never imagine he had been in the gutters of New York. That experience taught me that 'Love suffereth long, and is kind.'"

"You keep in touch with those who are converted and set on their feet?"

"Oh, yes. We get our best workers from the very men who have gone through all kinds of sin. I am a great believer in setting them to work. Most of the speaking at our meetings, held every night of the year, is done by men who have been brought back from the Far Country. It is much more encouraging to the class who come to Water Street to hear from the lips of men who have been saved from sin the story of Christ's power to save than it would be for them to listen to addresses by preachers who have never known what crime and want are. We make a great point of celebrating the anniversaries of the conversions of the men who are rescued. We print tickets, which they can give to their old friends, inviting them to come and have supper at Water Street, and celebrate the conversion of Jack Burrows or Tom Edwards, or whoever it is. These men are brave enough to invite even the keepers of the saloons where they used to drink, and the suppers are a remarkable proof of the sincerity of the change which has taken place in the lives of the men. I keep my own anniversary on April 23rd, and we have a happy evening talking of what God has done. Here is the letter which I circulated freely last year. I sent it to Mr. Rockefeller, the richest man in the world; to the editors of leading newspapers; and to my friends all over the States." The letter was headed thus: "April 23rd, 1882—April 23rd, 1903. Twenty-one years old to-day. Praise the Lord!" It concluded with the appropriate text: "Come and hear, all ye that fear the Lord, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul."

The Jerry McAuley Mission has now completed thirty years of service as a lighthouse for saving wicked humanity. When it was first started by Jerry McAuley, it was regarded as a passing fad which would fail. Now it is known all over the world as the spot where probably more souls are redeemed from wickedness and misery than on any other spot in the whole world. Visitors of all classes come to see the hall, and if they enter it at night, as I did, they will see it under the best conditions. It is holy ground, for here, night after night, men come to Christ, and put off the grave-clothes of sin, and rise to a new life of Christianity. The usual testimonies by men who had been saved had just concluded when I entered the hall, and the president now called for any who were seekers to come to the front seats. At once a dozen men—two or three of them bearing the marks of depravity, and all of them the marks of wretchedness—advanced up the hall, and knelt in prayer. Then the leader of the service proceeded to pray with each one, and to speak separately with each. One by one, as time passed, rose and declared, with a ring of sincerity in the voice, his determination to make a new start in life under the banner of Christ. Many of those who come to the hall prove to be backsliders, and there were some at the meeting that night. "I've been set on making money," said one man who looked like a saloon keeper. "I've thought that money was the one thing to get; but to-night I have been convinced that I am a sinner, and I mean to put God first in my life."

Following this testimony, a young man rose and said: "I have been an agnostic, and have done just as I liked, without thinking of God at all. On Decoration Day I got right off the track, and went down to Chinatown [the low-class resort in New York], and I have been drinking there for a week. I came in here to-night in misery, but I am going to make a new start as a Christian now, and I ask you all to pray that I may be kept." The others told their stories, nervously, and in low voices. Some will backslide, others will give Mr. Hadley and his helpers much anxiety; but a large proportion of the thousands who annually profess a change of heart in these meetings stand firm on the Rock which is never submerged by the heaviest seas of temptation. Think what a test it is for a man who is known to his comrades in crime and sin to stand up and profess conversion. The news soon spreads, and if he is a hypocrite he will have a rough time of it. But if he is in earnest, even the saloon-keepers who have fattened on his drinking habits will admire the man's change of life.

"One more story, please, Mr. Hadley."

"Well, I will tell you about a man who was known as 'Slippery Dick.' He was a German, neat and tidy in his appearance, and not given to drinking, but a born thief. I met him first in a home for ex-convicts, and got to like him. After that, he went to prison several times, serving altogether thirty-six years in gaol. He began to frequent our hall, and used all his arts on me to get all he could out of me. I must say he usually succeeded, for he was so plausible, I gave him practically all he asked, and he went away, chuckling at his success. But gradually he became ashamed at the way he was treating me, and he stood up one night, and said, 'I have been trying to be a Christian for a good many years, but I am going to quit trying now—I am going to be a Christian, and I won't take anything from Mr. Hadley, even if I have to starve in the streets.' He went out that evening, and had to walk the streets all night. Next day he went to the minister who keeps some restaurants for poor men in the Bowery—one of the lowest parts of New York. He said to this good man, 'I want work, and if you don't give me work I will rob you.' Mr. Hudson looked hard at 'Slippery Dick,' and said, 'Who are you?' He answered, 'I am Slippery Dick, one of the biggest thieves in town; but I made a resolution at Jerry McAuley's Mission to live a Christian life, and I will be a thief no longer if you will give me some work.' Mr. Hudson set him to wash dishes for ten shillings a week, and his board and lodging. He had at that time a cashier who had come with a long string of recommendations, but who was robbing him. So, having given an 'honest' man a trial, he decided next to give a thief the position of cashier. 'Slippery Dick' was therefore made cashier, and he had large sums of money passing daily through his hands. But he was true to his promise never to be a thief again. After some time he fell ill, and I got him into a hospital. Soon he passed away, but rejoicing in his Saviour, and thankful that during the last years of his life he had been kept from falling. It is a wonderful work, and every year I live I realise that there is no such word as despair in the vocabulary of Christ. When I look at the men in the hall, I think of that verse:

> "'The worst unto My supper press,
> Monsters of daring wickedness;
> Tell them My grace for all is free,
> They cannot be too bad for Me.'"

If men want the proof of the truth of the Gospel, they had better turn from all their theological disputes and critical studies, and look at such a work as that which has been done for thirty years at Jerry McAuley's Mission in New York or in the Pacific Garden Mission in Chicago. I do not mean to imply that there is not similar work for rescuing men in our own country, but, as the Rev. F. B. Meyer said when he visited Water Street, there is none quite on the same lines as the Jerry McAuley Mission in England, and none which has achieved more triumphs of redemption. It is "Love to the uttermost" in daily action. Those who have been interested in this story of Mr. Hadley's labours may like to know that he has written a thrilling volume of similar narratives under the title of "Down in Water Street," which will still further illustrate the beauty and success of personal work among the lowest of mankind in a great city.

"IN CAME THE OLD COLONEL"

THE IDEAL NATION AND CHURCH

A PROPHET'S VISION.

By the Rev. J. S. Banks, D.D., Ex-President of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference.

"In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, HOLY UNTO THE LORD; and the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar."—ZECHARIAH xiv. 20. (R.V.)

THE day spoken of is the day of the Messiah. With wonderful insight the prophet describes how the religion of the future would mark an advance in spirituality and influence on that of the Old Testament. "Holy unto the Lord" was the inscription on the high priest's mitre, expressing the idea of complete consecration to God. "In that day" the same inscription was to be on "the bells of the horses," on all the instruments and possessions of common life. The every-day life of the world was to be as sacred as the high priest's temple-service. Here the truth suggested is the hallowing of the secular. Further, "the pots," the commonest vessels, "in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar," the most sacred sacrificial vessels in the temple-worship. Here the situation is different. In the first clause we are outside the temple, here we are within; and the truth suggested is the abolition of lower degrees and standards of sacredness, the universal adoption of the highest law of holiness.

Incidentally we learn that Old Testament conceptions of religion were not as narrow and material as is often thought. Undoubtedly form and ceremony filled a larger space in the religion of early days. But the more the Old Testament is studied the more spiritual it is seen to be in its central teaching. The psalmists and prophets abundantly show that religious forms and rites were only regarded as means to an end, and that end is the experience of inward, spiritual religion. In this respect no other ancient faith comes within measurable distance of Old Testament teaching. The prophets are constantly denouncing the inclination of the Jews to substitute the form for the life of religion, (Isaiah i.11.) "What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" (Micah vi. 8.) Even within the Old Testament there is great progress in this respect. The prophets represent a great advance upon earlier days; yet Zechariah, one of the last of the prophetic roll, foresees that the religion of the Messiah's days would surpass the best of his own day in spirituality and power.

It may be said that the prophet is sketching only an ideal state. This is true; but the same may be said with even greater force of the prayer, "Thy kingdom come," the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount, and the ethical teaching of the Epistles. "Only an ideal!" What would life be without ideals to aspire to? Every form of human art and toil has its goal in the future. The prophet's ideal is no idle fancy. It simply anticipates the perfecting of what already exists.

1. The Hallowing of Common Life. "Holy unto the Lord" on the bells of the horses. This is to be the inscription read not only on churches and chapels, but on house and shop, on school and college, on courts of justice and halls of parliament. There is to be no longer any distinction of sacred and common. And the equality is to be reached, not by abolishing the sacred, but by abolishing the common; not by the easy method of levelling the higher down to the lower, but by the hard method of levelling the lower up to the higher; not by secularising the holy, but by sanctifying the worldly. In other words, the life of the home and mart and exchange is to be ruled by the law of God and the spirit of religion. Master and workman, buyer and seller, soldier and sailor, doctor and lawyer, are to be as intent on doing God's will in their daily work as in their hours of devotion.

How is this state of things to be brought about? By all men becoming Christians. This is no doubt one condition, but it is not enough. Experience shows that all Christians do not live up to the prophet's standard. There is need that Christians should be educated to see the sacredness of common life and the universal claims of God's law. The apostle's words, "Whatsoever ye do, whether ye eat or drink, do all to the glory of God," quite express the spirit of all New Testament teaching. There all moral precepts are placed on a religious basis. The two great commandments of the law are nearly akin. The same authority which speaks in the first table speaks in the second. In both cases alike transgression is sin against God, and obedience is obedience to God. Religion, the fear of God, regard for His authority, desire of His approval, is to enter into everything. God must enter into every experience of life, every sphere of duty, every joy and sorrow, into work and play, business and politics. So much the worse for wealth and policy with which God has nothing to do. We serve God and please Him as much by truth, by uprightness, by fidelity, by honour in the transactions of ordinary life, as by prayer and worship.

There cannot be a greater mistake in principle and policy than to divide life into two compartments, one ruled by religion, the other by selfishness and expediency. This explains the inconsistency and hypocrisy with which religion is so often reproached. Carefully to leave religion out of our worldly calling, out of our bargains and dealings with our neighbours, is to strip it of half its value. The power of religion in the world would be enormously increased, not merely by a great accession of new converts, but by all Christians realising the breadth of the demands of the Christian law. To remember that I am Christ's follower, and to act as His follower as much in the home, the factory, the school, in party politics and matters of public life, as in hours of worship and divine communion, is the way to increase the world's respect for religion. "Is not this the fast that I have chosen? To loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the bands of the yoke, and to let the oppressed go free?" "Pure religion and undefiled before our God and Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

No one would deny that religion is, in the first instance, an inner life and power; primarily it is "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." Its secret is in the spirit of man. Even a life of good works without an inner spring of divine principle and motive is fatally defective. But religion is not only inward faith and love. It is "faith working through love." The good tree is evidenced by the good fruit. There is always need of the homely virtues—love of truth and right, the passion for justice, admiration of the pure and lovely. A headstone in a Wensleydale churchyard bears the inscription, "An honest attorney." Oh, for more honest lawyers, politicians, merchants, manufacturers, workmen, tradesmen—honest up to the standard of Christianity and Scripture! "Lord, who shall sojourn in Thy tabernacle? Who shall dwell in Thy holy hill? He that walketh uprightly and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart."

The ideal, though lofty, is practicable. It is already realised in part. The hallowing of every-day life has greatly advanced since Christ's days. Much of the world's wealth and art and service is consecrated. In the Washingtons and Gordons and Gladstones the saintly and the practical life are blended; prayer and great achievement meet together. Let this become universal, and God's kingdom has come, earth is turned into heaven, Eden is brought back.

2. The Perfecting of the Sacred. This part of the prophecy refers to the Church. The common vessels of the Lord's house shall be like the sacred vessels of sacrifice. Distinctions of less and more holy shall vanish. Here, again, this takes place by the raising of the lower to the higher. There is to be one law of holiness, one level of religious attainment, and that the highest.

As regards New Testament teaching, the prophecy is amply fulfilled. There the standard of righteousness set up is the highest. Anything loftier in motive than the ethics of the Sermon on the Mount and the Epistles is inconceivable. And there is one standard for all. In the life of the Lord Jesus the ideal is attained. In Him, Heaven's law of perfect love is seen in bodily form. To return love for hate, blessing for cursing, is to be perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect. And to this all are called. The later division of Christians into "saints" and non-saints has no foothold in the New Testament. The same precepts are addressed, the same promises are given, to all. In the Epistles all the members of the Church are saluted as "saints"—"called saints," saints by divine calling (Romans i. 7). The use of the term to designate eminent Christians is much later than New Testament times.

As to practice, the Church has not been altogether true to Scripture. Her inclination has been to set up two standards of holiness and recognise two classes of Christians—one class reaching, or at least earnestly seeking, the highest life of holiness; the other satisfied with average or even minimum measures of grace. This is the old distinction of sacred and secular in another and even more mischievous form. It is to set up one law for Christians and another law for others. This distinction of higher and lower is the vice of the monastic system and of the division between "the religious" and ordinary Christians in Roman Catholic circles. It may be said that whether we recognise these differences or not, they exist. But whether they exist or not, to legalise them, to give them a place in the Church, must tend in the most direct way to the lowering of Christian practice. Instead of encouraging failure by establishing a lower standard, our business is to bring up the weak and laggard to the higher law. Second-class Christians are not good enough. Directly we recognise these as having of right a place in the Church, we need some auxiliary means of perfecting them in holiness. Purgatory is for the benefit of second-class Christians.

At the same time, we have no doubt that the highest forms of Christian character are realised far more commonly than is often supposed. "Saints," in the ordinary sense of the term, are more numerous than calendars say. If long experience of Christian life brings us the knowledge of inconsistency and unfaithfulness, it also discovers more cases of Christ-like living than many of us dream. The perfect lives which were exceptional in Old Testament days are now common. Enochs, Abrahams, Elijahs, Pauls, and Johns are no longer the rare products of grace they once were. The Christian age is richer in self-sacrificing love, in spiritual heroism, in "the work of faith and patience of hope and labour of love" than any age of the past. Thus, even as to practice, in the raised moral tone of the world, in higher attainment and still higher aims, the prophet's vision has been abundantly verified. The gain of good upon evil, of love upon hate and cruelty, of reason upon brute force, has been immense.

The raising of the Church's life to the highest level is of the first importance. Here is the secret of its success in all aggressive work. Low moral tone means clouded vision and lessened energy; intense spiritual life in all its members means the maximum of courage and progress. The Church's power is in exact proportion to its realised holiness, because a Church entirely sanctified is a Church in which God dwells and works without hindrance. All growth in holiness means additional influence for good on the world. Hence the supreme importance of the Scripture standard of holiness being sedulously kept before the Church. Even if attainment were doubtful, we must as Christians aim at the highest. The goal set before us is our high calling of God in Christ Jesus. But we know that attainment is not doubtful. To hunger and thirst after righteousness is to be satisfied. As sure as we forget the things that are behind and stretch forward to the things that are before, we reach what we desire. "The pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar." All shall seek and attain to the supreme levels of spiritual life. There shall be no higher and lower, no first and last; the best shall set the standard for all. The Church, outgrowing its days of weakness and failure, shall be without spot or wrinkle, and so respond to the love and fulfil the purpose and reflect the glory of its Saviour and Lord. Then the ideal Church shall be the real Church, and God's will shall be done on earth as it is in heaven.

"GOOD-NIGHT!" SHE SAID.

BY L. G. MOBERLY.

A Complete Story.

"GOOD-NIGHT!" she said.

Her voice was clear and very refined. For more years than he cared to count no such voice as this one had spoken to the man. That clear intonation, that vibrating tone, that ring of something fresh and hopeful, carried his thoughts back to days and places which he thought and hoped he had long ago forgotten. From some hidden corner of his memory they came trooping back, called out of their hiding places under the dust and debris in his mind by the voice of a passer-by who had only said "Good-night!"

The loafer pulled himself into a more upright position against the parapet of the bridge, and peered through the murky dimness to watch the girl's vanishing form. He had not seen her face, he had not even observed her approach, nor heeded her rapid, light footstep, until she was actually passing him, until her voice fell on his ears. Now it was in vain that he craned forward to catch any glimpse of her that would enable him to recognise her, if chance should throw her across his path again.

Across his path? Pshaw! It was out of the question that chance could perform any such feat, seeing that to-night was the time he had chosen to take his fate into his own hands once and for all, and put an end to the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune by bringing his profitless existence also to an end! Long before this time to-morrow he supposed they would have found him in the river, another unidentified being who had forcibly cut the knot of his own miseries, and under such circumstances it was highly improbable that he would ever again have an opportunity of seeing the girl, who was fast vanishing amongst the shadows on the north side of the bridge. Nevertheless, his eyes strove to pierce the shadows, a faint hope that she might even turn and look back at him awoke in his breast. But she neither stayed her steps nor paused to look behind her. The only impression gathered of her by the man upon the bridge was of someone tall and slight and upright with the easy walk of one who walks well by Nature.

"Walks as if she couldn't help doing it," the man muttered. It was a carriage that oddly matched the clear, buoyant tones of her voice.

On the far side of the bridge the shadows seemed to thicken, and almost before the man had grasped the salient points of the woman's bearing the shadows had swallowed her up, and she passed for ever out of his ken.

His alert pose relaxed; he dropped back into his former listless position against the wall, trying to hark back to the thoughts and resolves that were in his mind before the girl's voice had struck across the foggy night air; striving to determine whether the first streak of dawn should witness the closing scene in the tragedy of his wasted life; struggling to push away from him the echoes that had been set ringing by the voice of a casual passer-by!

The bridge was very silent and deserted. Traffic had long since ceased; late stragglers had wandered by and gone home to bed an hour or more ago; and the policeman who, when he last crossed to the Surrey side of the river, had flashed his lantern suspiciously over the listless figure by the parapet, had not yet returned.

The only sounds audible were the usual sounds of a London night, intensified by the great stillness on the bridge. Railway whistles shrieked now and again; from the street up which the girl must have gone came the jangle of a hansom's bells, growing each second more and more indistinct; a dog barked in one of the slums by the riverside; and a child's wailing cry, muffled by distance and the fog, floated out upon the night.

Underneath the bridge the water lapped the stones, gurgling softly as the stream flowed swiftly between the piers. The tide was running out, the current was very strong; any object which might drop into it to-night from the parapet of the bridge would be carried very far down before——

The man had turned and was leaning over the wall, watching the swiftly-flowing stream, the tips of whose dark waves were touched with the light that fell in broken reflections from the Embankment lamps.

The dark swiftness of the water, the broken reflections of light fascinated him; but his thoughts were no longer as completely under his control as he could have wished.

He could not eject from his mind the memory of that girl's voice; the clear buoyancy of the tones lingered in his memory, and remembering them he smiled. After all, there must be some good in life, some hope, some chance, if anybody could speak with a voice so full of sunshine!

Then, too, she had spoken to him—to the man who felt himself an outcast, a pariah, one of Fate's derelicts; and the tone of her voice had implied a friendly recognition of him as a fellow-being with whom she was linked by some kind of fellowship.

The wonder of it lingered with him, and remembrance awoke.

The old garden of the country house? Was it the same as ever? The same as when a laughing, reckless boy had played upon its lawns, and climbed its trees, and wrought havoc amongst its trim borders!

The woman's form that rose out of the dim mists of memory must perforce have changed. Was it whitehaired now? And old and bent with the weight, less of years than of sorrow, because her prodigal son—her prodigal son——? There was the terrace where she was wont to sit and to walk, under the house over which the Virginia creeper must be crimsoning fast—where, perhaps, a late rose yet lingered—his mother's favourite flower, a Gloire de Dijon rose.

Upstairs there was the room that had once been the nursery. Perhaps the little empty cot stayed there still, in the corner by the fireplace, just as it had always stayed, long after the baby who had once been its occupant had passed from babyhood to boyhood, despising nursery things. Did she go into the nursery sometimes? Just to forget the son who had spoilt her life; to remember only the baby boy who had chuckled and cooed his happy greeting to her in those innocent days before he had learnt the way to break her heart?

Her voice, too, had been clear and fresh, buoyant with hope, vibrating with gladness, like—like the voice of the girl who had passed over the bridge!

Curse that girl for awaking this train of long silence memories! Curse her for stirring the ashes of the dead past into hideously vigorous life! Curse her for spoiling his game, for hindering that cutting of the knot—for preventing——

Preventing? He laughed faintly. No, she should not prevent the carrying out of his resolve, however tiresomely she had hindered its prompt fulfilment. But prevention? That was anothe thing. No one should prevent his doing what he chose with his own life and fate. He would end both in his own time—in his own way.

And that other woman with the voice like the girl's? Was she asleep at this very moment in the big bedroom whose windows looked out across the beech tree on the lawn, to the down along which the white road wound its way? "Mother's room," in which no impetuous intruder was unwelcome, where mother was always ready to greet one, in the voice that—the voice that——

Asleep there now, no doubt; possibly dreaming, as mothers dream, of the little feet that had beaten their music upon her knees, of the little hands that had clutched at her gown; of the eager voices to whose clamorous demands she had never been deaf. Dreaming of the baby boy whose manhood had brought her heartache; dreaming all this whilst a loafer in loafer's rags leant over Westminster Bridge, waiting for the first streak of dawn to let the river end it all!

Well! What, anyhow, was a girl of that class and kind doing by herself on Westminster Bridge in the middle of the night? Her people ought to look after her better; ought to see that she was not wandering about London alone, and a prey to any evil-minded nightbirds lurking in the darkness. Well, and what if she was in charge of a factory girls' club somewhere Lambeth way? A probable enough solution of her presence. Still, a girl with that carriage and that voice had no business to be alone on Westminster Bridge long after midnight, spoiling the legitimate end of a spoilt life!

"The wonder of it lingered with him, and remembrance awoke."

Her voice had set chords vibrating that refused to be silenced.

He had not kept the letter! Why should its words stand before his eyes to-night in letters of fire? It was monstrous that because of a stranger's voice he should recall that letter torn into tiny fragments and scattered to the winds long and long ago.

"Come back to me, my dear boy; come back to me.'

The hand that wrote the words must have shaken as it wrote, for the usually firm lines were wavering and uncertain; the last word was blotted and blurred, as if——

Go back? The idea was preposterous! His hand mechanically went to the fastenings of his coat, buttoned tightly to the chin to hide the fact that a tattered shirt was the only garment below it.

Impossible to go back without a waistcoat! He touched his neck, round which a handkerchief was loosely knotted, and without a collar too! Impossible—utterly impossible!

And his boots? He tried to catch a glimpse of them through the gloom, but in order to remember that they were full of holes and trodden out of all recognition, it was quite unnecessary to see them. He could feel the cold paving stones through their inadequate soles.

Yet mothers—somebody said mothers—were a race apart; they would not be affected by a mere question of clothes. Mothers were not influenced by such considerations. They never bore malice; they never forgot. "And a sword shall pierce thine own heart also."

Who had forged the sword which pierced the heart of that woman who walked on the terrace where blossomed the Gloire de Dijon roses? Had her voice lost all its buoyant hopefulness because of the pain of that piercing? And then, besides everything else, he had no money to take the train for the little country station nearest to the house where the Virginia creeper must by now be blood-red; and to tramp the twenty miles was—was——

"Well, what was it? Utter insanity, or deepest wisdom?

To tramp out of this hungry city that devoured the souls and bodies of weak fools such as he; to see the dew lie heavy on country fields—the dawn break over hazel copses; to hear the calling of birds across the woodland when daylight came; to watch the sun leap up from a horizon bounded, not by streets of dreary houses, but by dim blue hills. Curse——

He drew himself away from the parapet, and turned his eyes towards the east, where as yet was no promise of dawn. What had possessed that girl to pass across the bridge to-night? Still more, what had induced her to speak to one of the submerged—a miserable wretch, who might, for all she knew, have flown at her to rob and murder her?

"Good-night!" she said; that was all. Only "Good-night," in a voice that held all the promise of youth and hope and gladness.

Curse——

No, O God! No—not curse her! Bless her—bless her—bless her, for that second's tender thought towards a man who had come through hell, and was facing the great unknown. Bless her!

The man lifted his torn and battered hat, his eyes looked away from the murky shadows and the swiftly flowing river towards the deep sky overhead.

"Bless her!" he said aloud.

The returning policeman watched him keenly, suspicious of that strangely uplifted hat, of the murmured words he could not quite hear.

"Time you was moving on," he said, not unkindly, his lantern's rays flashing up and down the deplorable wreck of humanity. "Got somewhere to sleep, to-night?"

"Not to-night." The policeman started at the refined accents of the man's voice. "I've got a bit of a walk before me to-night. To-morrow I shall be at home. My mother's waiting for me at home."

With a smile on his lips, the man moved away across the bridge to the Surrey side of the river, stepping out with a new manliness, his face set toward the open country where a new day was soon to begin—the day that would bring him to country fields and breezy uplands; the morrow that would find him—at home.

Yet she had only said "Good-night."

HYMNS: AND THEIR LIFE-STORIES.

By the Rev. H. B. Freeman, M.A., Vicar of Burton-on-Trent.

"The whole life of the Patristic Church is in the 'Te Deum'; the whole awfulness and pathos of the Middle Ages is in the 'Dies Iræ'; the whole Gospel of Evangelicalism is in 'Rock of Ages.'"—JOHN ELLERTON.

"ONE of the great merits of hymns," the present Prime Minister of England has written, "lies in the associations which attach to them." To every burst of sacred song it must add a value and a poignancy when we discover at what point it has touched some striving, or suffering, or triumphant human life. Doubly precious would the Psalm-Book of the Hebrews be to us, if scholars could exchange reasonable conjecture for certainty as to the "hymn" which the Master and His disciples sang on the supreme night of history. We should like to know what were the "praises" uplifted by Paul and Silas from the stocks at Philippi, just as in later centuries Madame Guyon composed some of her sweetest lyrics in the cells of the Bastille, or Adoniram Judson made melody in the prisons of Burmah, or Samuel Rutherford, confined for conscience' sake within the dungeons of St. Andrews, told how "Glory, glory dwelleth in Immanuel's land."

Of the Psalms, those noble progenitors of the hymns of Christendom, Baldwin Brown well wrote that they "have rolled through the din of every great European battlefield, they have pealed through the scream of the storm in every ocean highway of the earth. Drake's sailors sang them when they clave the virgin waves of the Pacific. They floated over the waters on that day of days when England held her Protestant freedom against Pope and Spaniard. They crossed the ocean with the Mayflower pilgrims; they were sung round Cromwell's camp-fires, and his Ironsides charged to their music." Not only in English military crises, as when the Lord Protector exclaimed: "Let God arise!" at the battle of Dunbar, have the Psalms been prevalent. It was the same chant of triumph which helped Henry of Navarre and his Huguenots to win, in 1589, a fight near Dieppe, in which they were outnumbered. "Lift the psalm," cried the King to his attendant pastor; "it is full time." Like two iron wedges, Henry's soldiers, few but strong, and singing as they went, split the hosts of the League, and when the psalm was raised the fog suddenly cleared away from a fort which commanded the position, so that the gunners could take aim.

And to select only two instances out of many, the Psalms have sombre as well as jubilant associations. Froude tells us that Darnley, during the dark and mysterious hours before his murder at Kirk-o'-Fields, was said to have read over the Fifty-fifth Psalm, which, by a strange coincidence, happened to come in the English service for February 10th, 1567. When one remembers the black suspicions which have always attached to the Queen, there would be a sinister significance in the words, "But it was even thou, my companion, my guide, and mine own familiar friend." That grand burial psalm, the ninetieth, can seldom have been recited amidst surroundings more sublime than when the young clergyman Hudson was killed on the Matterhorn in 1865. Canon McCormick, one of the search-party, was retelling the sad old story only last year. "Imagine us standing," said the friend who read the service from the dead man's Prayer Book, "in the centre of a snowfield, with that awful mountain above us, under a cloudless sky, in the very sight, as it were, of the Almighty. 'Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever the earth and the world were made, Thou art God from everlasting, and world without end.'"

Almost the earliest authentic account we have of the introduction of hymns into Christian worship has a romantic side. Augustine tells us how the Arian mother of the reigning Roman Emperor endeavoured to depose orthodox Ambrose from his bishopric at Milan. The devoted congregation rallied round their beloved bishop, and kept guard in the great church. It was during these faithful but weary vigils that, as St. Augustine relates, hymns were first appointed to be sung, lest the people should faint through sorrow. The effect which he describes upon himself by these hymns and canticles has been shared with him by millions of worshippers since. "I was moved to tears. The voices flowed into my ears; the truth distilled into my heart, and I was helped."

It is a long step (and one traverses more than centuries) from Augustine to Martin Luther; but the hero of Wittenberg and of the Reformation was a mighty man of music. Stories abound of his belief in its influence, and of his susceptibility to its power. During the Diet at Augsburg he once fainted from strain and mental exertion; but as soon as he was brought round, he said to his friends, "Come, let us defy the devil, and praise God, by singing the hymn, 'Out of the depths I cry to Thee.'" An anecdote of his favourite production, "Dear Christian people now rejoice," provokes a pardonable smile, in spite of the laudable and Teutonic gravity with which it is always told. A large congregation had met together in the church of St. Bartholomew at Frankfurt, where some princes, recent adherents of the Reformed Faith, desired to have a service in accordance with the Protestant religion. A Roman Catholic priest, however, had previously gained possession of the pulpit, from which he proceeded to promulgate many exceedingly unpalatable views. When the patient audience could endure the infliction no longer, an adventurous voice struck up "Dear Christian people," and the hymn, swelling to a thunderous volume, finally drove the baffled Papist out of church. But it is perhaps Luther's hymn, "A sure stronghold our God is He," which has enshrined the most varied and pathetic German associations. The composer is said to have sung it each day to his lute, and its heartening words were for ever upon the lips of the populace. It cheered Melanchthon after Luther's death, to hear it trilled by a girl's voice, as he was wandering in the streets at Weimar. Gustavus Adolphus had it chanted by his soldiers before his victory over the Catholics at Leipzic, and its strains more than two hundred years later cheered on the German army in many moments of discouragement during the campaign against France.

"'Let me play one more tune.'"

In "Cassell's History of the Franco-German War" we read how the day after Sedan some of the victorious troops were too wearied to march to Paris, and too excited, it would seem, to sleep, billeted as they were in the parish church of Augecourt. It was a happy thought of a musical sympathiser to steal to the organ and to strike up the old loved words of Luther, which were as life-blood to the spent and harassed men. They listened awhile; their hearts were soothed and their nerves steadied, and they sank upon the stone floor into the slumber they needed so sorely. It would be hard to find a prettier hymn-story of the land of Luther than an adventure of which we hear just after the Thirty Years' War. A poor musician at Hamburg, named George Neumark, who lived by his violin, fell into sickness and poverty, and was compelled to part with his cherished instrument for a sum far below its value, to a rapacious Jew. "Let me play one more tune," he asked, as he fingered the strings lovingly and with tears. "Of all the sad hearts that have left your door, there has been none so sad as mine." He began the words and tune of one of his own hymns, "Life is weary—Saviour take me." After a stanza or two the plaintive notes changed, and with a smile of resignation upon his face, he made his violin sing forth another of his melodies—"Yet who knows? The Cross is precious!" As he laid his bow down and rushed into the night, he ran against a man who had been listening at the door, enraptured by the hymnody. Neumark's unsuspected hearer was in the employ of the Swedish Ambassador, whom he persuaded to relieve the youth's necessities, and to enable him to take back his violin. Good fortune followed rapidly on the heels of evil, and George Neumark, whose beautiful hymns were most popular among his countrymen, became librarian of the Archives at Weimar.

Of the modern hymns familiar to us in our own places of worship and in our homes, the most precious must always be those which have spoken special comfort to us and to those whom we love; but it is instructive to observe their influence in wider and more remote spheres. Among the tens of thousands to whose faltering lips "Rock of Ages" has risen in their last moments, must be numbered the father of King Edward VII. "If in this hour," he said, "I had only my worldly honours and dignities to depend upon, I should be poor indeed." Dean Farrar has described—not in his fiction—the consolation which this hymn was to a lad dying from an accident. He asked his young sister to sing it to him, and his spirit seemed to depart just upon the line, "When mine eyelids close in death." An appropriateness is added to the grand and familiar prayer, "O God of Bethel, by Whose Hand," when we are aware that it was the chosen companion of Livingstone during his lonely travels in Africa, and that it was used at his funeral at the Abbey. Gladstone and Gordon were men of diverse characters, and the chief historic link which binds their great memories is not the happiest, but the lion-heart that died for England at Khartoum prepared itself by that same hymn, "Praise to the Holiest in the height," which was the continual solace of the Christian statesman in his long-deferred but painful passing. We all love Dr. Neale's tale of the sick child who would stay quite still amid bitter pain to listen to the whole four hundred lines of Bernard of Cluny's immortal rhapsody about "Jerusalem the golden." The translator might well be proud of such a triumph. It is touching to think that Sir Henry Baker, to whom we owe "The King of Love my Shepherd is," went peacefully out of the world with the lines upon his lips, "And on His shoulder gently laid, And home rejoicing brought me." When we upraise "The Sower went forth sowing" at our harvest festivals, to the tune "St. Beatrice," it is solemnising to reflect that Sir Frederick Bridge named the melody after his little daughter, beside whose dying bed the music was composed. Those baby words, which so many mothers have taught their children, "Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me, Bless Thy little lamb to-night," were written by a young lady, Mrs. Duncan, a couple of years or so after her marriage. Two or three months later she died from pneumonia before she could ever have heard her own little ones prattle her hymn. Speaking of children's hymns, Mrs. Alexander thought out "There is a green hill far away" while she was nursing the daughter of a parishioner. The patient, fortunately, recovered, and always regarded this poetic gem as in some way her particular property. Two ladies in a country house were spending a vigil of terrible anxiety by the couch of a girl who had met with a dangerous injury. The last ray of hope seemed to sink out of their hearts as the agonised night shuddered at last into the grey dawn. They will never forget how, from the nursery near at hand, was suddenly heard ringing through the house the clear fresh voice of their charge's little brother, singing as he sat up in bed, "Now the dreary night is done, Comes at last the glorious sun." A glow of new confidence revived the spirits of the watchers, and the happy augury was fulfilled. Hymns, there can be no question, have often struck the first true Gospel note in hearts which more elaborate admonitions have failed to stir. We can credit the report of one who watched a young man weeping with gratitude beside H. F. Lyte's grave at Nice, because he was conscious that his first hope in the Redeemer had come from "Abide with me."

Charlotte Elliott's "Just as I am" has many fruitful memories. A torn and dirty piece of paper was once held up by a waif in the street to a New York city missionary. It turned out to be a mangled page from a leaflet containing the precious verses. "Please, sir," begged the urchin, "will you give father a clean bit like this? Sister was always singing it when she was ill, and we found it in her pocket—afterwards. She wanted father to get a clean bit, and have it stuck in a frame to look at."

A sailor who could not read, and who knew next to nothing of his Bible, found himself face to face with a death for which he was unprepared. It was the chance recollection of the line, "He was slain for us," which, associating itself with some Sunday school teaching of his childhood, at least suggested God's plan of salvation, and kept his lonely soul from going down into the utter darkness. Another hymn by Isaac Watts, "Not all the blood of beasts," is the pivot of the curious conversion of a Jewish lady, once affluent, whom a colporteur discovered poverty-stricken and deserted by her Hebrew husband in the East-End of London. The first verse, which she came upon accidentally, among some waste-paper, possessed her, and she had no peace till she had convinced herself, by a study of the Scriptures, of the truth of the Christian Faith, for the sake of which she was compelled to sacrifice her worldly all. We have a vivid remembrance of the impression made upon us in our own extreme youth through the casual recitation by a guest of Miss Cary's exquisite stanza :—

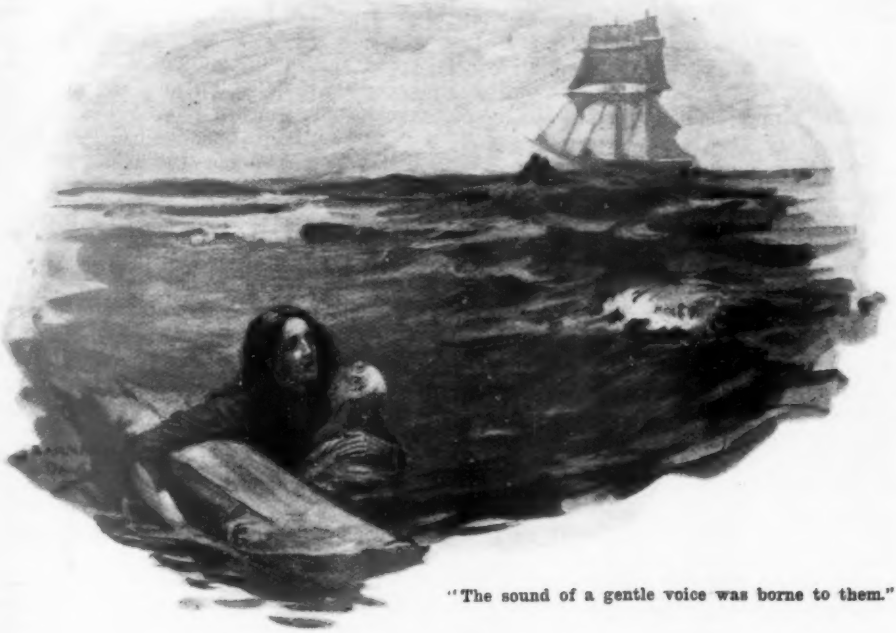
"Nearer my Father's home,
Where the many mansions be;
Nearer the great white throne,
Nearer the crystal sea."



Two Americans, one young, the other of middle age, were drinking and card-playing in a Chinese gambling house. While the elder was shuffling the pack, the boy unconsciously began to sing some of these words in a low voice. In his absen-mindedness he did not even know afterwards what he had been humming. But his companion was recalled to thoughts of holier and happier days. Flinging the cards on the floor, he exclaimed, "Take back your money, lad. I have done my last gamble." The eye-witness from whom the story came had opportunities of observing that this speedy and strange reformation was lasting.

Visitors to the Metropolitan Tabernacle in Pastor C. H. Spurgeon's later days may remember the magnificent effect when the massed thousands would rise and sing, with no accompaniment, Mrs. Conder's "Lord, I hear of showers of blessing." The authoress records that she has had many cheering evidences of the good which this evangelical outpouring has accomplished She has heard of a young officer dying in India, and sending home his Bible with this hymn gummed within the cover, as a token for those who lamented him, of what had brought him reconciliation and peace. "Thank you for making that hymn," a correspondent wrote, "for it was those words which saved me. I was a lost woman, and I have stolen and lied; but that hymn seemed to reach my very soul, and I feel the burden of guilt removed." For ourselves, whenever upon a winter Sunday evening we give out "Showers of blessing" at a crowded church in the Midlands, our memory harks back across the years to a yet larger congregation at Newington Butts, and we seem to see, standing in front of his platform, the bent, pained figure of the mightiest Baptist, save one, who ever prepared the way of the Lord.

It must be with mingled feelings of humility and joy that a writer listens to one of his hymns which has passed during his own lifetime into the heritage of Christendom. Bishop Heber said that he once heard a composition sung by his native converts at Meerut more finely than ever he had in England. The authorship of hymns may have its lighter aspect. The Rev. G. R. Prynne has told the tale against himself that he heard with some natural pleasure the incumbent of the Protestant church at Rome give out his hymn, "Jesu meek and gentle," when he was helping in the service He discovered afterwards that the clergyman was perfectly ignorant that he was the author. A curate of our acquaintance once ventured to hand a book to the late benignant Bishop Wordsworth of Lincoln, at a church opening, while his Sunday hymn, "O Day of rest and gladness," was being rendered. The gesture of refusal, fine and courtly, seemed nevertheless to imply, "Do you suppose, young man, that I want a book for my own hymn, or do you mean to say that you are not aware I wrote it?"

With those who go down to the sea in ships hymns have many solemn and striking associations. Of all the life-stories which have clustered round Charles Wesley's world-famed "Jesu, Lover of my soul," we will only tell how, several years ago, a father got separated from his wife and baby daughter during the confusion caused by an outbreak of fire in their ship as they were nearing Liverpool. Mother and child failed to reach the boats; they were carried overboard and drifted far out into the Irish Channel, the woman clinging to a fragment of wreck, with her infant clasped to her breast. At last the crew of a passing vessel sighted the floating object, which they hardly supposed could be a human being. But as the sailors who were sent to investigate approached, the sound of a gentle voice was borne to them upon the breeze—"While the gathering waters roll, While the tempest still is high." The family was subsequently reunited in America. A friend has furnished us with the following personal experience. He was attending a Sunday evening service at a small fishing town on the north coast of Yorkshire. In the middle of the sermon the bell of the lifeboat rang; the Vicar closed his discourse, pronounced the blessing, and dismissed the congregation, who all hurried to the wind-swept, wave-lashed shore. By a vivid flash of lightning the lifeboat was seen pushing forth upon her errand of mercy; and, as though moved by one instantaneous and united impulse, the spectators burst into the hymn, "Eternal Father, strong to save."

"The sound of a gentle voice was borne to them."

Few poets have been more widely contrasted in their life-stories, their talents, and their destinies than John Newton and William Cowper, the joint writers of the Olney Hymns, a first edition of which, dated 1779, happens to be lying at our hand. They were a strangely assorted pair—the converted, swearing slave-dealer and pirate, and the gentle, morbid, and at times partially insane, recluse. Each was in love with his cousin, and the one married, but not the other. We only need to glance through a few pages of this Olney Hymn Book to see that, while the industry and good intention were Newton's, the poetry was decidedly Cowper's. But it is possible to bear much indifferent verse for the sake of "Hark, my soul, it is the Lord," or, "There is a Fountain filled with Blood," a hymn which has been both detested and adored; a hymn which C. H. Spurgeon cared for above all, and which is engraved upon that tombstone in Norwood Cemetery, where his wife has been lately laid by his side. Infinite are the pathos and reality contained in Mrs Browning's verses on "Cowper's Grave":—

"O poets! from a maniac's tongue was poured the deathless singing;
O Christians! at your cross of hope, a hopeless hand was clinging!
O men! this man in brotherhood, your weary paths beguiling,
Groaned inly while he taught you peace, and died while you were smiling!"

Of the finest hymn-writers it is true that (as one of them has said), their hymns have been "pressed out of them by the Cross."

INDIAN SUMMER.

A Complete Story by Nora O'Mahony.

IT was a glorious noonday in mid-October, one of those rare days in which autumn seems to have cast aside her customary dull and russet garments and put on the summer's most radiant golden raiment in their place.

To Major John Lister, sauntering through a shady path in the Phœnix Park, the day had a peculiar charm. He had just returned to his native country after an absence of nearly twenty years, during which time he had travelled through many lands. As he looked about him, drinking in the fragrance and beauty of the autumn day in full measure, he thought that, after all, there was no place in the world like this dear old Ireland.

He was a handsome man, six feet high and built in proportion; well-tailored, excellently groomed, he looked quite a young man still, for all his forty-five years, and a tell-tale iron-grey head and moustache.

He took a seat at last under the shadow of a huge chestnut tree, throwing away a half-smoked cigar as he did so. There were already two other occupants of the seat—a young girl and a very small boy, a restless little creature who could, indeed, be hardly said to be the occupant of any place for any length of time. In his blue sailor suit and straw sailor hat, hunting for chestnuts through the withered leaves, which he kicked delightedly with his little feet, sending them flying in a cloud about him, he seemed to the major's amused eyes more like an elf than anything human.

Suddenly the little fellow ran over and climbed upon the major's knee in the most intimate and confident way imaginable.

"Do you like chestnuts?" he asked, looking up at the man, with blue eyes which held not the faintest trace of shyness.

"I used to, when I was a little boy," the major answered gently.

"That was a werry long time ago, I suppose. Where was I then? Did God have me then?"

The major laughed.

"I suppose He had, little man," he said.

The girl looked at the major with a deprecating smile, half apologetic for the child's intrusion. What was it about her eyes, and in the soft mouth, with its beautiful curves and short upper lip, that brought back old memories with a sudden sharp pang at his heart?

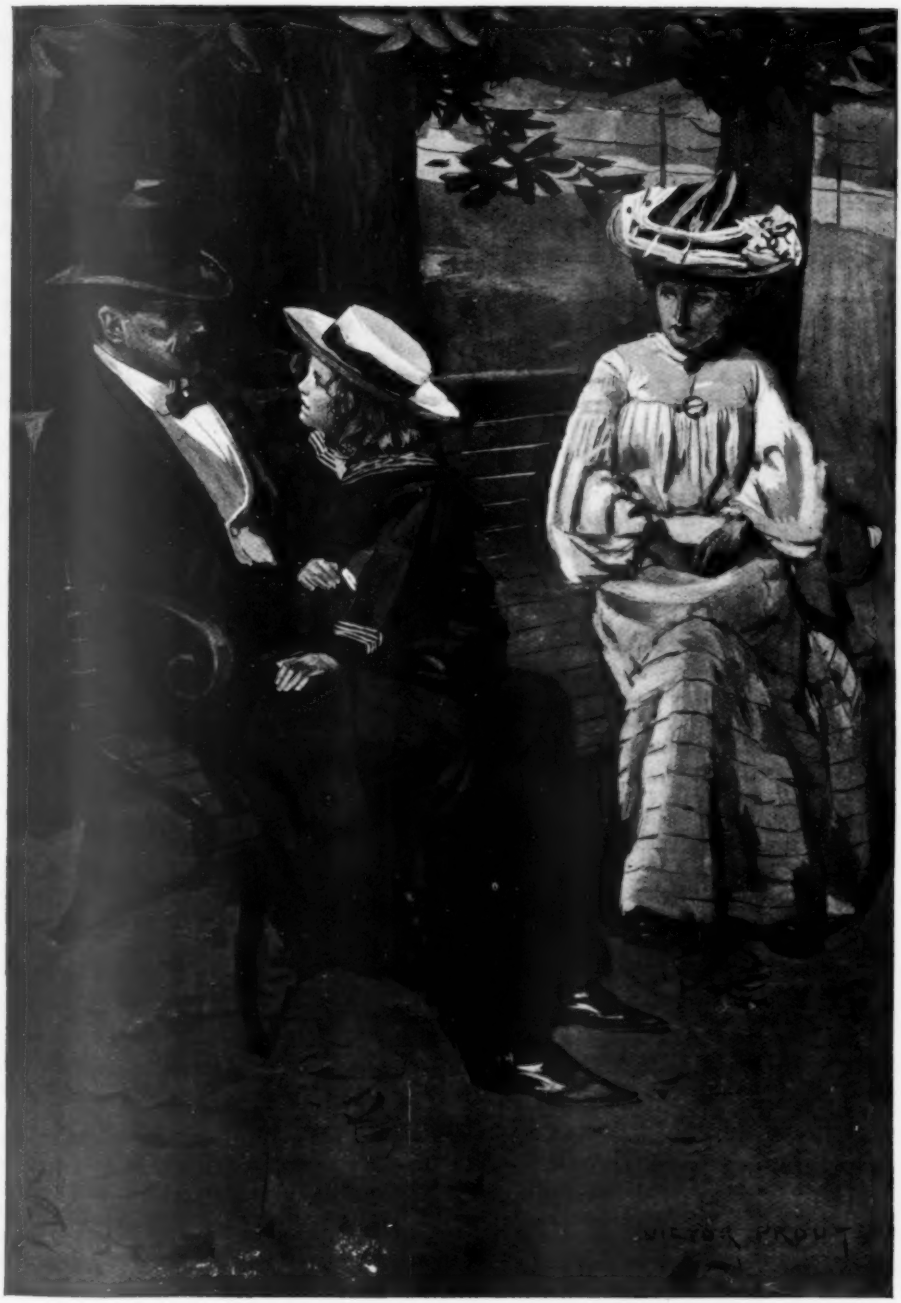
Those eyes were Mary's eyes, that mouth was Mary's mouth—the Mary Gray he had loved twenty long years ago, who had died of consumption within twelve months of his departure for India. Her death had made a barrier against his coming back to Ireland during all those years, and had turned the huge fortune which a relative bequeathed to him afterwards into Dead Sea fruit. He thought he had forgotten, but the pain of it came back now as sorely as ever, and mists rose before his eyes.

Presently an old lady, leading a very fat pug dog by a string, came and took possession of the one vacant space beside him. The girl rose to go, and, calling the boy to her, went swiftly away across the green park.

His eyes followed her blue gown and the boy's sailor hat, twinkling in and out through the foliage, till they were at last irrevocably hidden beyond the woods. Then his eyes went to earth once more. He saw only the withered leaves, emblems of hopes long dead. All the sunshine and the summer seemed to have gone; the wind suddenly grew chill, the sky became overcast.

With an effort he tried to cast aside his sudden depression. He made half-hearted advances to the pug, who would not notice them, but looked superciliously, with a very bored expression, around the landscape, that had suddenly grown bleak. A drop of rain fell. The old lady hastily unfurled an umbrella, and rose to go. As she went off, carrying her beloved pug sheltered under her arm, the major saw a parcel on the seat beside him.

He took it up and ran after her.



"Pardon me, madam," he said, lifting his hat. "You have forgotten this."

"No, sir, thank you, it's not mine. I thought it belonged to you," she answered.

"It isn't mine," he said, mystified.

"Then doubtless the young lady who went away left it," she said, and, bowing her acknowledgments, she sailed off, leaving him in doubt what to do with his new-found possession.

Clearly it belonged to the young lady, and

"'I used to, when I was a little boy.'"

the obvious thing to do was to give it up to the police. But that was the last thing that he contemplated doing. He had suddenly become possessed of an overwhelming desire to see the girl in the blue gown once more, to look into her eyes, and hear her thank him with her beautiful lips.

Perhaps he might find her address, or some clue to it, in the parcel, he thought. He opened it slowly, with reluctance.

Within its brown paper wrappings and another inner wrapping of tissue paper, lay three lace fans, beautiful, filmy, transparent things, hand-painted in delicate designs of wild roses, woodbine, and clematis. He turned them over, looking in vain for any name or even initial to guide him; there was nothing. He fastened them up reverently, with a discouraged air.

That evening he sent to each of the daily papers an advertisement of the lost fans; but the very next morning, as he looked over the columns of his own morning paper, his eyes were caught by another advertisement, just above his own. It ran:

"Left on a seat in Phœnix Park, Thursday, the 14th inst., a parcel containing three hand painted fans. Small reward offered. Finder will please communicate with Mrs. Fitzmaurice, Laburnum Cottage, C——."

The name of the village was that of a place lying beyond the outskirts of the Park.

The major ate a very hasty breakfast that morning. It seemed to his man Morris that his master was unusually and somewhat unnecessarily particular as to the manner of his toilet. By half-past ten he had mounted a car, and was driving rapidly in the direction of the Phœnix Park, his precious parcel grasped in his hand. It was an unconscionable hour, of course, to call on ladies; but he felt he must restore that parcel and relieve their anxiety at the earliest possible moment.

The door of Laburnum Cottage was opened by a trim maid-servant, who, on being told that he wished to see Mrs. Fitzmaurice, showed him into a tiny drawing-room. In the few minutes in which he had to wait he had time to observe his surroundings. Despite the well-worn carpet and old-fashioned furniture, the room had a daintiness and artistry all its own. Beautiful pictures, quaint bits of china, flowers, and growing plants, all contributed to make it lovely and homelike. He thought of Mary and all he had missed, and a sigh escaped him as the door opened softly and Mrs. Fitzmaurice entered.

"You wished to see me," she began; then stopped and stared at him. "Why, Jack! Jack Lister! Is it you?" she cried in astonishment, taking both his hands in hers and shaking them heartily.

"It seems so," he answered, in bewilderment. Now he understood.

"You must be Clare Gray, who married Gerald Fitzmaurice and went to live in Galway some years before I went away. Why, to be sure: you are just the same Clare, very little changed during all those years. I had better not say how many, I suppose," he added, as she pointed reprovingly to her own white hair.

"And you! You look almost as boyish as ever," she said, returning the compliment. "And what have you been doing with yourself ever since? Sit down now, and tell me all about it, about yourself."

"There is not very much to tell," he said deprecatingly. "Five years at Aldershot and ten in India account for the greater part of it. I was a year in Egypt, and after that had two years' campaigning in South Africa, where, like most other fellows, I had a rough time of it: got shot twice, then had fever. I retired this year, and came home to rest and look about me. It is my first visit to Ireland for twenty years, since——"

He stopped, and they looked into each other's faces sadly.

"Ah, yes!" she sighed. "Poor Mary! You aren't married, are you?"

"No, I never married, never felt tempted to, since. And you? How has the world been treating you?"

"I suppose one mustn't complain, but—but—I may tell an old friend like you—we haven't had an altogether prosperous time of it. Gerald, poor fellow, has been paralysed for the last three years. Of course, he had to give up his work, and lost a great part of what would have been his pension by doing so. We have lived here since his illness. It is so much quieter and cheaper than living in town. I have three boys and two girls to look after, too."

"That reminds me," he exclaimed, in some confusion. "Why, how stupid of me not to have said what brought me here!"

He drew the parcel from the depths of his great-coat pocket. "These are the fans which were lost. I happened to be sitting on the seat when your daughter—I suppose she is your daughter?—left them."

"Yes. That was Alice. She will be so glad to have them back. Thank you so much Alice is a good girl, a clever girl too. I could not tell you what a help the dear child has been since her father's illness. She gives lessons every morning, besides painting fancy things for the shops—fans, Christmas cards, and that sort of thing. These were samples she had taken into the shops yesterday. She's rather lucky in getting orders," she added, as she touched the bell.

The servant appeared at the door.

"Tell Miss Alice to come down," Mrs. Fitzmaurice told her. "She will like to thank you in person," turning to him again.

Her daughter entered the room a moment later, and held out a friendly hand as her mother introduced the major and explained about his bringing back the fans.

"I almost feel as if I knew you already," she said. "It was so good of you to bring them back all this way. It was very stupid of me to forget them, and I'm sure mother and I ought to be very grateful to you."

"Alice, dear," her mother said. "Major Lister happens to be a very old friend of your father's and mine. I think it a great piece of good luck that has brought him back to be friends with us again."

The major thought so too. And when Mrs. Fitzmaurice asked him to dine with them on the following Sunday, which was really Alice's only day off work, he accepted eagerly.

After that it seemed the most natural thing in the world that Major Lister should spend every Sunday evening at Laburnum Cottage. It was a great boon to poor Gerald Fitzmaurice to have an old friend to talk to him, and soon the major felt quite at home with all the inmates of the cottage, with Fred and Charlie, Nora (a younger and darker-haired edition of Alice), and Barry, the three-year-old elfin sprite who had hunted for chestnuts that memorable day in the park, and who speedily became first favourite with the major.

No, not quite the first; for Alice, sweet, sensible, motherly Alice had from the beginning taken complete hold of his big lonely heart. Almost insensibly she had begun to fill the great void in his life, till by degrees the image of Mary, who was dead, had resolved itself into the image of the girl who was so like her.

There was a great difference in their ages, as he sometimes realised and with fear; but if the child could love him, what matter for that? He would be good to her, he would make her happy, he would win all she had to give him. There would be no need for the long hours of hard work, lessons, and painting, straining her dear, beautiful eyes over those poor little Christmas cards for a miserable few pence apiece. It would be a new sweetness in life to him now to think his hitherto useless wealth would bring joy and comfort to those old friends who belonged to the girl he loved.

One day on calling at the cottage he found Alice alone in the garden. It was early in December, and she was picking some sprays of holly with bright red berries, not for decoration as yet, but as seasonable models for painting. She looked up with a glad smile and just a suspicion of a blush as he came towards her.

"Always at work," he said, looking down tenderly at the sweet face, its pale cheeks tinged with the faintest wild-rose colour. "Will you never rest, little woman? You will make yourself pale and ill sitting all day over that tiresome painting."

"I haven't time to rest yet. I must get all I can done before Christmas. After that I'll have more easy times than I care for," she said, with a solemn little shake of her head. It hurt him to see it. She was getting far too wise and careworn for a child of her age.

"Alice, little sweetheart, will you be my wife?" he cried, impetuously, taking her hands in his. "I have loved you, dear, since the first day I saw you. Will you stoop to me? I am much too old for you—I know that—but I will be good to you and will do all I can to make you happy. Say you love me, dear one, just a little bit," he pleaded.

"I think I love you a great deal," Alice whispered, almost lower than he could hear. He caught her hands and kissed them, then drew her golden head to his heart, and held it closely there.

Suddenly a small figure in a sailor suit appeared before them, and looked up with an expression of the highest approval.

"Me and Alice both loves you, Major Lister," Barry said, in a shrill, small voice.

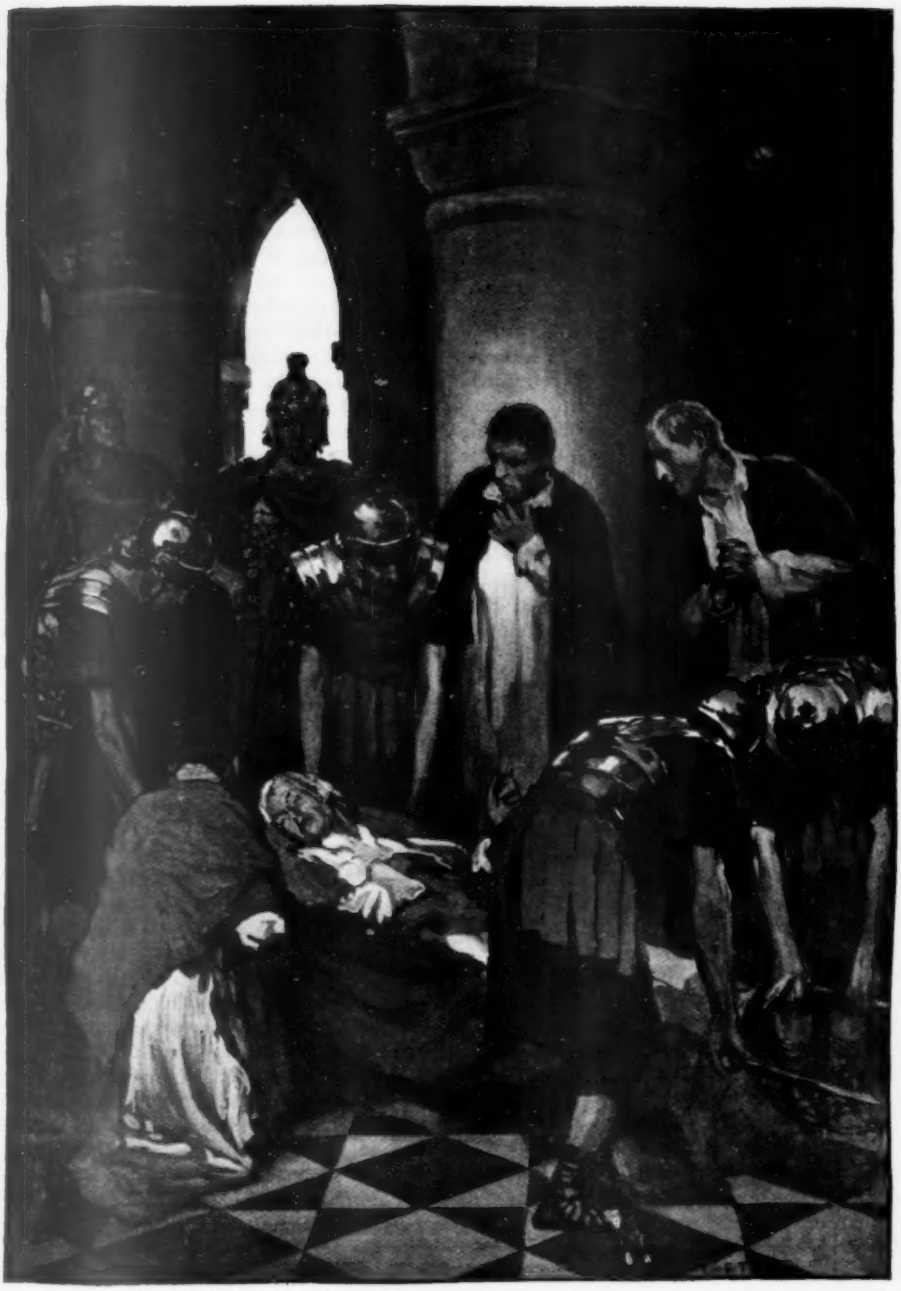
The major was too happy to be even annoyed at this interruption.

"Do you, Barry? How much do you love me?" he asked, lifting the child high in his arms.

"Two quarts," said Barry, who measured everything by the standard of his bosom friend the milkman; and with this magnificent assurance Major John Lister had to be for the moment satisfied.

THE MAKERS OF MODERN CHRISTIANITY.

CHRYSOSTOM: III.—THE EXILE.



By the Very Rev. H. Donald M. Spence, D.D., Dean of Gloucester.

THE sixth year of Chrysostom's archiepiscopate witnessed the formation of a formidable league against the stern ascetic. He had, indeed, with his uncompromising policy, excited strong and bitter hostile feeling. Many of his own clergy hated the stern prelate with an intense hate. His ideal life was, indeed, a very different one from theirs; and he made no secret of his determination to inflict punishment and degradation in the cases of those who deliberately refused to reform their lax and worldly way of living. Among this class of ease-loving clergy, Chrysostom was universally feared and disliked. Palladius, his friend, tells us "to them he was like a lamp burning before sore eyes," for he rigidly carried out in his own life the stern precepts he pressed upon others. He set an example to the worldly clergy of the city by giving up the greater part of his official revenues, and by living with studied frugality, and by declining altogether to mix in the Society of the capital. But he had deeply offended other members of his order, besides those clergy in the city with whose luxurious living and doubtful morality he was so deeply grieved. Presuming upon the uncertain supremacy which was possessed by his Metropolitan see, he had listened to grave complaints made against the Bishop of Ephesus and certain Asian prelates, and considering the charges proved, had not hesitated to depose several of these Bishops who were accused of simony and other grave offences. These deposed prelates and their friends determined to bring about his fall.

But by far the most dangerous members of the league thus formed against the Archbishop, were the powerful leaders of Society and the Court party, headed by the Empress Eudoxia. These considered themselves personally aimed at and insulted in the brilliant and popular sermons of Chrysostom. These various hostile factions found an able and willing helper in Theophilus, the Archbishop of Alexandria, ever the deadly, jealous enemy of Chrysostom, who, it will be remembered, in the first instance had strongly opposed his election to the Metropolitan see.

Theophilus came to Constantinople, and, under the protection of the imperial Court, in the neighbouring Chalcedon, in a suburb called the "Oak," assembled a synod packed with prelates bitterly hostile to Chrysostom. This synod presumed to sit in judgment on the Archbishop of Constantinople, and deliberated upon a number of charges brought against him, charges mostly frivolous, and some of them absolutely false. Naturally, Chrysostom refused to plead before such a "packed" and unfair tribunal, contenting himself with protesting, with imprudent eloquence, against his foes in his pulpit in the Cathedral. "What have I to fear?" he exclaimed, in one of these discourses. "Is it death? You all know that Christ is my life, and that for me to die is gain. Is it exile? Surely the whole earth is the Lord's. Is it the loss of my worldly goods? Surely we brought nothing into this world; it is certain we can carry nothing out. I fear no loss of goods, no exile, no death. I only care to live that I may help you, my people; and you know well what is the true reason of all this bitter enmity against me? It is that I have hung my house with no rich hangings; that I wear no robes woven with silver or gold; that I have never flattered any, never spoken soft and pleasant words? Yes; the descendants of Queen Jezebel still survive among us. God's grace still wars for Elijah. Herodias, too, is with us. Again she dances, and claims as her guerdon the head of John."* Some have questioned the authenticity of these terrible words. Something, however, was certainly uttered by Chrysostom, most likely the very words above quoted, which enabled his enemies in the synod to charge him with having used

* The authenticity of the "Homily" containing these celebrated words has been questioned. Some writers, too, place it somewhat later in Chrysostom's life—viz., after his return from his first short exile—when Eudoxia had erected the silver statue of herself in the square in front of St. Sophia. Villemain and Thierry, writing quite lately, however, place it here, during the sitting of the synod of "the Oak," and assume without question the authenticity of the allusions so insulting to the Empress.

THE DYING CHRYSOSTOM.—p. 1068.

treasonable expressions against the person of the Empress. He was condemned, deposed, and arrested, and, as a prisoner of State, was hastily removed from the city.

Deep was the indignation of the people of Constantinople when the news of the arrest and exile of the loved Archbishop became known. The various churches were thronged by the crowds praying for their friend. A great concourse gathered round the palace demanding his restoration. A terrible shock of earthquake, which almost immediately followed the arrest, changed the whole aspect of things. The Empress was terrified at the portent which she interpreted as a sign of the wrath of heaven at the removal of Chrysostom from the scene of his oratorical triumphs. The threatening aspect of the impulsive city showed how widely popular among the masses was the Archbishop. Eudoxia at once gave up the contest, and, indeed, personally interceded with the Emperor for the recall of Chrysostom from banishment, and the exile was forthwith hurried back; vast crowds, we read, welcomed him on his return. Theophilus of Alexandria, his deadly foe, secretly left Constantinople in the dead of the night, fearing the violence of the people. The proceedings of the synod of "the Oak" were solemnly declared illegal by an assembly of some sixty bishops; and once more Chrysostom resumed his position as Metropolitan of the chief see of the East.

Eudoxia for the moment was reconciled to the man she had hated and persecuted with so much rancour. But in less than two months the old enmity blazed up anew more fiercely than ever. Chrysostom, for his part, took no pains to conciliate the Court party, but renewed his strong invectives against the luxury of Society and the laxity of life too common among a portion of the clergy. The Empress especially incurred his wrath by sanctioning the erection of a silver statue of herself in the great square immediately in front of St. Sophia. The inauguration of this statue was celebrated with the noisy semi-pagan ceremonies which usually attended the adoration of a new imperial statue—a strange relic of the old pagan worship of the "divine emperors." The noise and tumult of the inauguration ceremonies disturbed the sacred services in the great Basilica. The indignant Archbishop denounced these proceedings, and once more the old feud between the Empress and the Archbishop disturbed the peace of the city. The many enemies of Chrysostom were emboldened to begin anew their intrigues. A hostile synod was hastily gathered together, and the decrees of the discredited Council of "the Oak" were reaffirmed. Serious disturbances also in the churches followed. Blood was shed, and many acts of violence were committed.

Arcadius, the Emperor, was eventually induced by the party of the Empress to sign a decree which deposed the Archbishop, and which banished him for ever.

Chrysostom, dreading any further popular tumult, and feeling it was hopeless to dispute the imperial order, inspired as it was by the irreconcilable hatred of the Empress and her party, quietly submitted to the sentence of banishment, and surrendered himself to the guards charged with the sad duty of escorting him to his place of exile. The last beautiful words spoken by the banished Archbishop to a group of his friends in Constantinople have been preserved. "Come, let us pray and say farewell to the Angel of the Church. At my own fate I can rejoice; I only grieve for the sorrows of the people."

An old man, Arsacius—he was eighty years of age—a person of no distinction, save that he was the brother of the late Metropolitan Nectarius—by the will of the Emperor Arcadius was at once elevated to the throne of the exiled and deposed Archbishop.

Chrysostom had been consecrated to the archbishopric early in the year 398. After a little more than six years he was unlawfully deposed and exiled about the middle of A.D. 404.

A few hours after the Archbishop and his guards had left the city a terrible fire broke out, which almost entirely destroyed the magnificent Basilica of St. Sophia and its priceless contents, the Senate House, and other buildings in the same great square. It was suspected that the disastrous conflagration was the work of incendiaries, and futile attempts were made to connect the exile and his friends with this grave calamity. All the clergy in Constantinople and other eminent persons of both sexes who refused to join in the anathema pronounced on the dethroned Archbishop, and who further declined to recognise the validity of his deposition, were exposed to bitter and relentless persecution.

In the meantime Chrysostom was strictly guarded at Nicæa, while his enemies were debating as to the place of his exile. The evidences of his extraordinary popularity with the people, and the contempt with which his successor, Arsacius, was regarded, were manifested in the emptiness of the churches and by other unmistakable signs. It was decided to banish him to distant Cucusus, a poor desolate little town situated in a valley of the Taurus range, far away on the Cilician frontier. The climate of Cucusus was singularly unfitted for one who was weak and constantly ailing, being liable to great and sudden changes of temperature, intense heat and bitter cold rapidly alternating; it was also exposed to frequent raids of wandering robber Isaurians, who frequented the mountainous and exposed region. His guards, regardless of his ailing condition, hurried him across the hot plains of Central Asia Minor. Seriously ill, the illustrious prisoner arrived at Cæsarea, the chief city of Cappadocia. Many influential people received him with the deepest respect and kindness, but Pharetrius, the Bishop, was his implacable enemy, and withal a creature of the Court. While resting at Cæsarea, the sick man was harassed by the intrigues of Pharetrius, who stirred up a number of ignorant monks to attack the house where he had been received and entertained. The guards in charge, fearing for his safety, hurried their prisoner away, and continued the long and weary journey to Cucusus. Their orders were to avoid all towns, hoping thus to escape the demonstrations of regard which were so generally shown to the banished Archbishop. In the villages which were chosen for halting-places, often the only provision that could be found was hard and mouldy bread, and brackish, unwholesome water. Chrysostom suffered sadly from fever and a complication of maladies; but at length he reached the inhospitable goal of his long, weary journey, sick almost to death. But, strange to say, his feeble frame partially recovered, and for two to three weary years the old man disappointed his cruel adversaries, who were hoping that the end was near at hand.

From that desolate and dreary town, far away from the haunts of men, he carried on a notable correspondence with most of the leaders of the Church of the East and West, and he also received visitors from all parts of Asia, and even from distant Europe; while, to use the words of the famous historian of "The Decline and Fall," "every tongue repeated the praises of his genius and virtue, and the respectful attention of the Christian world was fixed on a desert spot among the mountains of Taurus." A considerable portion of these two or three last years of Chrysostom's eventful life was spent on a sick bed.

His restless energy, though, never failed him; the brave devout spirit which animated the dying body lives still in that famous correspondence which has come down to us, and which he carried on with monks and eminent persons in Syria, Phœnicia, and Egypt, with the Bishops of Rome and Carthage, Milan, Brescia, and Aquileia, and with various Christian ladies at Constantinople.

The letters to two of his correspondents at this time are especially memorable. Olympias had been, during his archiepiscopate, his dearest friend and helper. Once a great lady in Constantinopolitan Society, a possessor of vast riches, and of the highest rank, she had devoted her wealth and influence to the service of Chrysostom and the Church, and as a deaconess had been the most prominent of his helpers in his Cathedral. We have seventeen of his letters written to her in these sad days. Olympias, as the well-known friend of the exile, was cruelly persecuted, and the letters of her master breathed the loftiest spirit of hope and comfort. They bade his faithful disciple to take courage and faint not, remembering whence came all those earthly trials and sufferings. "Only one thing, Olympias," wrote the brave old man, "is really terrible; there is only one real trial—and that is sin. All things else—hate, calumny, confiscation of goods, exile, even the sword, endure but for a season; they are perishable, they last but for a little season, they only touch the mortal body, they do no injury to the watching soul. . . . He, Jesus Christ, is waiting. He will suddenly change the storm into a calm."

But the words of the noble and harried exile to Innocent I., Bishop of Rome, have had a more far-reaching effect than his beautiful and comforting letters to his friend the deaconess Olympias. His simple, touching appeal to the most prominent of the bishops of the West, moved Innocent to range himself on the side of the persecuted Chrysostom. The Roman prelate took upon himself to ignore the decrees of the iniquitous synods which had condemned Chrysostom, and he sternly reproved the conduct of the Archbishop of Alexandria, the evil Theophilus; and though his power, owing to the strained and jealous relations of the Courts of Honorius and Arcadius, the Western and Eastern Emperors, failed in securing the meeting of a general council of the Church which would have judged the cause of the injured Archbishop of Constantinople, still, the appeal of the virtuous and innocent Chrysostom to the tribunal of the Bishop of the great Western see, and the determined and generous conduct of Innocent I., enormously increased the power of Rome, and were powerful factors in the subsequent rise of the Bishops of Rome to the position of commanding influence to which the prelates of that see eventually attained, when the old secular dominion of the Western Emperor was shattered.

It has been sadly remarked that the Catholic Church, after its general recognition in the fourth century, all through the Middle Ages has been strangely lacking in missionary zeal. Of the few great Church leaders who have been noble exceptions to this general forgetfulness of a very solemn and inescapable duty, Chrysostom in his day of power is a notable example. In his exile he continued these missionary efforts, and his adherents in various parts of the Christian world under his direction carried on missionary work, especially among the East Goths, in Arabia, and even in distant Persia.

Thus publicly, in various and varied spheres of activity, and privately over the souls of men and women, it is probable that the influence of Chrysostom was even greater in exile than it had been when he was the acknowledged Metropolitan of the capital of the East.

Suffering, baffled hopes, cruel persecution, constant sickness, purged that noble character of many of the faults which even his most enthusiastic admirers recognised as grave blemishes in his most brilliant days when he was the orator of the Christian Church. It was this widespread and ever-growing influence which determined his powerful enemies to subject him to a still more painful persecution, with the hope of bringing to a speedy end that busy, restless life, and the exile was banished to a yet more distant and inaccessible place of captivity. They ordered his removal to Pityus, a small and desolate place on the east of the Euxine, on the extreme frontier of the Empire.

Palladius, his faithful friend, to whom we owe so many details of the last years of the great life, tells us that secret instructions were given to the two prætorians who had the charge of the prisoner during his last sad journey, to hasten, if possible, his end. The rough soldiers seem to have too faithfully carried out their cruel orders. The old man, worn out by constant illness, was hurried along the rough mountain roads, now exposed to the rays of a fierce sun, now to drenching rain. At Comana in Pontus he was lodged for the night in the precincts of a little church where rested the remains of Basiliscus, who had suffered martyrdom in the reign of Maximin Daia. At night, so runs the story, Basiliscus stood by him and said, "Be of good cheer, my brother John. To-morrow we shall be together." The day following he begged to rest awhile, but was forced to proceed. Soon the burning fever which consumed him increased so alarmingly that the guards were compelled to retrace their steps to Comana. The dying Chrysostom was brought into the church of Basiliscus. He asked for some white garments, and then for the Holy Eucharist; and as he prayed the words "Glory to God in everything," his soul passed away. This was in the year 407.

* * * * * *

His remains were laid at Comana by the side of the martyr Basiliscus, but not for long. The world soon came to see how great a one had lived among them, and no honour was deemed too great for the poor ashes of that true saint of God, whom men had come to call "John of the Golden Mouth."

After some thirty years, with all reverence and honour they brought the dead back to the great city he loved so well, the city where that winning voice had so often pleaded for the poor and sad-eyed ones, which so often had urged men to live closer to God.

An enormous crowd, hushed with sorrow, received the coffin which held the mouldering remains of what once had been John Chrysostom. Emperor, senators, nobles—none were missing in that vast mourning throng. They brought him to that stately church of the Apostles, where the Emperors of the House of Constantine were laid, and in that lordly Basilica, with its storied memories, in a tomb by the side of the last resting-place of Arcadius and Eudoxia, his persecutors, they left the great dead to sleep.

"I WAS A WANDERING SHEEP."

By the Author of "Beneath the Banner."

I.

THE WANDERING SHEEP.

"I was a wandering sheep,
I did not love the fold,
I did not love my Shepherd's voice,
I would not be controll'd."

AL yawned.

"Don't want to learn no more," he said.

"Oh come, Hal, you are such a big boy now; you're over four years old," said Ella, "and big boys should be earnest and persevering. Why, you've been three days learning this verse.

"I don't understand it," said little Hal, still indifferent.

"Well, we will just read to the end of the verse, and then we can go for a little walk before breakfast."

Mother had only just sacrificed that long, curly hair, which had given her such joy to see. Many tears had been shed in secret when the golden ringlets were shorn off, but Hal rejoiced. "They hurted me with the comb," he said, "and I didn't like it, and I'm glad they're gone."

With the prospect of a little walk, Hal went on:

"I was a wayward child,
I did not love my home,
I did not love my Father's voice,
I loved afar to roam."

The eyes were still listless, and when he put down the book and tried to say it he stumbled continually.

Then sister Ella, who loved Hal, and knew it was no use driving him, put on his cap, and they went out in o the country lanes and both thoroughly enjoyed the lovely morning air.

It was only a little past seven o'clock, and no one was up yet. They were keeping holiday hours, and after having had a grand blackberrying excursion yesterday, the other children were tired.

"What a jolly time we're having in the country, aren't we, Ella?" asked Hal.

"Yes, dear; the weather is glorious, and it's just lovely down here."

"I don't want never to go back," said the little boy.

"Well, we've a whole three weeks yet."

"Oh, look at the sheep coming along. Aren't they pretty?"

A flock of sheep was being driven along the road, ewes and lambs together. Some of the ewes wore bells round their necks.

"How pretty it is to hear the bells, Ella. What are they for?"

"I suppose that's so that the shepherd may know where to find them if they stray."

"Oh, and look, Ella. There's a man with a lamb under his arm."

It was so. Old Mr. Slater, whom they had met before and liked very much, was driving the flock, and had a lamb under his arm. It was a dirty, miserable-looking little animal, muddy and wet.

"What has that poor little lamb been doing?" asked Ella.

"Oh," said the old man, "it's been wandering from the fold."

Hal pricked up his ears.

"Why, it's a wandering sheep."

"That's just it," said the old man. "This little one thought it would like to leave the fold and roam about all by itself. So it wandered off, and when its mother bleated it didn't pay any attention; it pushed its way through the hedge into the next field, and when I counted the lambs before taking them to another field it was missing. We had a fine search for it. We looked all over the field, but there was not a trace of it; then I noticed a little wool on the brambles, and saw it must have pushed its way through the hedge. So I went and looked on the other side, and there, dirty and cold and almost dead, I found the lamb. It was so faint and ill it couldn't walk, poor thing; but it will get over it presently.

"Poor little lamb," said Hal; "but how silly it was to go wandering alone."

"Yes, little master, it was," said the old man; "but lambs aren't the only things that are wayward. Even little boys wander at times."

On the way home Hal said:

"I'm not a wayward child, am I, Ella?"

"Sometimes you are, I'm afraid; but I'm sure you don't wish to be."

"Oh no; I wouldn't wish to be like that little lamb, all dirty and miserable."

"If you obey Father now you are young, you will not be a wandering sheep."

"Do you mean Dadda, or 'Father which art in Heaven?'" asked the boy.

"I was thinking of Dadda then; but our Father in Heaven is even nearer to us, and we can speak to him when we can't even speak to Father or Mother, because He is near us always."

"Not when we are all alone."

"Yes; when we're all alone, by day and by night, always; and if we go astray He seeks us and finds us just as the shepherd sought his little lamb."

"But we wouldn't get muddy and dirty like the little lamb, anyhow."

"Perhaps not; but the hymn speaks about the sheep being 'famished, and faint, and lone,' which means that it was hungry and tired and all alone, and I expect the lamb we saw was."

"Yes; but little children don't wander."

"Yes, they do sometimes; but the loving Father brings them back to His fold."

"I'll learn my hymn to-morrow quite by heart," said the boy. "I think it's a very nice hymn."

II.

THE WAYWARD CHILD.

ALTHOUGH Hal learnt his hymn perfectly, it wasn't quite at the time or in the way he intended.

There was great excitement in the household that day. News was brought that on the village green not far from the farm house at which they were spending their holidays, a fair would be held on the morrow.

The children went down with Ella and Aunt Bessie in the evening, and saw a scene of great commotion. There were grand preparations being made for the musical roundabouts, stalls were being put up, flocks of children stood peering and gaping, and chattering men and women were gathered together in groups talking about the fair and what was going to happen on the morrow.

The children were so excited they could scarcely be got to bed, and then only when they had made Dadda promise that they should go next day and ride on the roundabouts.

Next evening at tea Father said to them:

"Now, children, I'm going to take you to the fair; but you must all do exactly what you are told. Is that a bargain?"

"Yes, yes, yes," was the ready response.

The answer was quite unanimous. The elder boys, Arthur and Jack, shouted at the top of their voice. Ella didn't shout; she never did, and, besides, she was such a good girl she always did what she was told. Hal, too, and Baby Bunting cried "Yes," so there could be no doubt that everyone intended to do just as Dadda told them.

"Now," said Father, "Mother will look after Baby Bunting, I will take Jack and Arthur, and Hal and Ella will go with Aunt Bessie."

"We shall all go together," said Father; "but you children are to keep close to the person who has you in charge, and if there is a crowd you are to hold hands fast, and not on any account to lose sight for a moment of your guardian."

"We shall come away quite early before there is any crush; but, don't forget, keep close together, and be sure not to stray."

"Now, little Hal, be careful not to leave hold of Aunt Bessie's hand on any account. If you should do so, cling to her dress."

Hal nodded wisely. He quite understood, and fully intended to carry out Father's instructions.

Then they set out. They were all so happy that they could scarcely walk, but wanted to run and dance all the way down to the village.

Before they arrived there they could hear the music of the roundabouts, and as they drew near they saw them whirling round with dozens of people on the horses, and in the carriages fixed to the iron poles.

They were so astonished, too, to hear the music and the drums, and yet to see no one playing. Then Father told them the music was played when the machine went round just like their musical boxes when they turned the handle.

They all had rides except Father and Mother. They could not help shouting a little as they were twisted round, but they all enjoyed it immensely.

Arthur and Jack rode in a car that had a little tower inside fitted with a handle, by turning which the inside of the car moved round. Thus they got two motions. "A good lesson in astronomy," remarked Arthur. "A journey round the sun, and the daily motion which gives us day and night." Jack nodded wisely, whether or not he fully understood the astronomical lesson, he was immensely enjoying the ride. Hal rode on a pig; it was such fun; the pig jumped backwards and forwards whilst it was going round, so that it was really rather like a ride on horseback.

Ella and Baby Bunting preferred a car in the form of a swan, which did not prance about, but slowly swam round to the strains of the music and the beating of the drums.

Oh, it was a splendid treat!

After that they all went to see the Punch and Judy show. How they laughed and clapped. It was the first time Hal and Baby Bunting had seen it.

Then Father said it was time to go home, but they all begged so hard that he gave them another quarter of an hour, and then gathered together the party and made a start.

"Take hold of hands and keep together," was his word of command as he led the way through the gathering throng.

There were such crowds of people that the little parties soon became separated. Aunt Bessie and her charges being in the rear.

Hal caught sight of the Punch and Judy man as they were pushing their way along.

"Oh, Auntie, do stop for two little minutes!" he exclaimed.

"No, Hal, not one," she said. "Father wished us all to go back together."

"Just one tiny little second, and let me see that funny white dog; and, oh, I want to see old Punch get a crack on the head," said the little boy, pulling back.

"Not one little tiny second, Hal. Now, hold on tight to my hand, and we'll push through this crowd, and if you should by any chance lose my hand, cling on to my dress."

But Hal was naughty. He wanted so much to see it, he protested, and though Auntie and Ella were resolute they were delayed in their progress, and got still further behind the others. Then they found themselves blocked by the crowd. They could not get on for a few minutes, as there was a waggon passing which hemmed them in so that they could not move at all. Father and Mother had meanwhile passed along before the waggon came, so that Ella, Hal, and Aunt Bessie were left alone.

"Oh, you are unkind," cried the boy, "not to let me see old Punch a little minute."

Just then a rough boy, jostling through the crowd, squirted Ella in the face, filling her eyes with water.

Aunt Bessie turned to wipe her face, saying to Hal, "Cling on to my dress, dear, a minute."

But Hal, seeing a chance of another sight of Punch and Judy, instead of doing as he was told, edged away a little so as to get a better view.

At that moment a cart came rattling down the street, and the people scattered, pushing and crowding in all directions.

When Aunt Bessie looked down after wiping Ella's face, Hal was not there.

III.

LOST.

THE rush which had separated Hal from Aunt Bessie had carried the boy up the slope of the road to the neighbourhood of the gipsies' carts. He could only just see Punch and Judy now, and turned to find his Aunt. But, alas! he was alone. Thoroughly frightened, the little boy began to cry.

How he wished he had obeyed! The more he thought about it the more frightened he became. He looked about in the gathering gloom, but not a sign could he see of his Aunt or Ella.

He was still weeping bitterly when he heard a voice say:

"What's amiss, dearie?" and turning round, he saw an old gipsy woman speaking to him.

"I'se lost," said Hal. "Auntie and Ella was here a moment ago, and now they're gone."

"How did you lose them?"

"Oh, I wanted to see Punch and Judy, and I left Auntie, and I oughtn't to have," said the boy sorrowfully.

"Come into my house, and you'll have a splendid view of the Punch and Judy. They'll soon be looking for you," said the old woman, "and I'll keep watch outside."

Hal stepped up. Through the curtained window he had a splendid view of the Punch and Judy show, and for a few minutes he forgot all his troubles.

But the light was growing dim, and the show was soon over.

Then the old woman said, "You rest here a little while, dearie, and I'll wait till your Auntie comes."

It was such a funny little house he was in. He was on a tiny bed, and after watching for a time he again got frightened. He stepped down and tried to open the door, but could not; then he kicked at it; then he called, he shouted, he cried and sobbed; he tried to open the window. Every moment he got more frightened.

The waggon was dirty and dusty, and his white dress became filthy, his face and hands became black and grimy, and a nail hurt his hand and sent him into fresh floods of tears.

"Hal edged away a little so as to get a better view."—p. 1071.

Oh, how he wished again and again he had never let go of Auntie's hand.

At last, worn out by his struggles, he lay down on the floor in utter wretchedness and sobbed himself to sleep.

Meanwhile the gipsy woman was faithful to her promise for a few minutes.

Then some of her friends came along and asked her to join them. She soon forgot all about the little boy.

IV.

THE SEARCH.

WHEN Aunt Bessie turned and found Hal was not holding to her dress, she was terribly frightened.

"Ella, where is Hal?" was all she could say.

Ella, too, was greatly alarmed. "He is looking at the Punch and Judy show. We'll find him in a minute," she exclaimed.

As soon as the cart had passed and the crowd thinned a little they pushed their way through to the Punch and Judy show.

There was a big crowd, a hundred people or more, all intent on looking at the show. They asked everyone, and described the little boy. Then they went to a policeman and told him of their loss.

"Well, Miss," he said, "that's very strange, but the boy can't have disappeared. Don't you be alarmed, he'll soon turn up, and I'll come and help you to look for him."

But so far as any trace could be found, Hal had vanished from the face of the earth.

* * * * * *

Meanwhile, Father and Mother, with the rest of the party, after getting clear of the crowd, waited for the stragglers to join them.

As time passed and they did not appear, Father and Mother naturally became uneasy.

Now there were two ways home to the farmhouse, the nearer was by a side lane just beyond the crowd, but Father and Mother had taken the longer way, as they thought the lane might be muddy.

They waited a few minutes, then Father went back and looked; but there were too many people about to make a thorough search. He thought it most probable they had gone back the shorter way, and hastened so as to meet them where the two roads joined.

But still they did not come. Mother was alarmed, but he soothed her by suggesting they would find the missing ones waiting at home.

Sending on the other members of the party, he returned to the village in search of them.

In the town he met Aunt Bessie and Ella, accompanied by a policeman.

"The little boy is all right, Sir, you may depend upon it," said the policeman. "Had any accident happened, we should have heard of it long ere this."

"I should think it most likely," he added, scratching his head, "he's in one of those gipsy waggons. They aren't a bad lot of people, and they'll have taken care of him."

"But why should they not have taken him to the police station?"

"That's more than I can tell," he answered. "Perhaps they hoped to get a reward."

It took the party some time to visit all the vans. They had made inquiry at all, save one, where no one seemed to be in charge; but the policeman climbed into this and waved his lantern around.

"Here's a little boy," he called out, "who doesn't look like a gipsy child."

Father climbed into the van, and there, fast asleep on the floor, with traces of tears still in his eyes, was the wandering sheep.

* * * * * *

"I was a wandering sheep,
I would not be controll'd;
But now I love my Shepherd's voice,
I love, I love the fold.
I was a wayward child,
I once preferr'd to roam;
But now I love my Father's voice,
I love, I love His home."

Hal had learnt his hymn by heart. When he had repeated the last verse to his mother without a mistake, he said:

"I have been sorry again and again and again, Mummie, about the fright I gave you that night."

"Well, dear, both Father and I were terribly alarmed, to say nothing of Auntie and Ella."

"I know I oughtn't to have disobeyed," said the child, "but oh, Mummie, I was so frightened when I found myself alone, and I hope I'll never, never roam again."

"I hope not, dear; but as you grow up, remember the Good Shepherd is always near you and watching you, and if you ever stray from the fold, look to Him for help."

"I think I understand," said Hal. "Oh, I do like that hymn, where it says:

"'But now I love my Shepherd's voice,
I love, I love the fold.'"

RIVERS OF LIVING WATER.

By the Venerable William Sinclair, D.D., Archdeacon of London.

"In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying: If any man thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink. He that believeth on Me, as the scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water. (But this spake He of the Spirit, which they that believe on Him should receive)."—ST. JOHN vii. 37.

THE last day of the Feast of Tabernacles was a specially great celebration, for it was alike the close of the festival itself and of the festal season of the year. Another distinction which it possessed was that it was a Sabbath, a day on which the congregation was obliged by law to be present, and was therefore honoured by a special sacrificial ritual. But one thing the day lacked which marked the other seven days of the season. On each of these, in the morning, occurred the festal water-drawing. Each morning there was a solemn procession, with music, headed by a priest, which passed from the Temple down to the Pool of Siloam on the Temple hill. From the shining depths of the pool the priest filled a large golden vase with water, brought it into the Temple, and poured it out, mingled with sacrificial wine, into two perforated dishes at the left side of the altar. The ceremony was accompanied by the sound of cymbals and trumpets, and the singing of the words of the third verse of the twelfth chapter of Isaiah, "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." This beautiful ceremony was in celebration of the miraculous springs which God opened for the people on their pilgrimage through the wilderness. It was because the eighth day symbolised the entrance into Canaan that the water of the wanderings was held to have ceased. On the eighth day the springs of the Promised Land gave their own fresh and abundant waters to the people, and became an earnest of the streams of spiritual blessing which the Lord had promised. "The Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought: and thou shalt be like a watered garden and like a spring of water, whose fountains fail not" (Isaiah lviii. 11). "It shall come to pass afterwards that I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy" (Joel ii. 14). "The words of a man's mouth are as deep waters, and the wellspring of wisdom as a flowing brook" (Proverbs xviii. 4). "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground; I will pour My Spirit upon thy seed, and My blessing upon thine offspring" (Isaiah xliv. 3).

It was because there was no water-drawing on the eighth day that our Lord stood and cried with a loud voice the invitation to come to Him for living water. He cried with a vigour which all could hear: He used a strong metaphor which the crowd of common folk could understand. It was the same invitation that He had given to the woman at the well of Samaria, and with the same invitation the New Testament ends: "Let him that is athirst come; and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely" (Rev. xxii. 17). We understand but little of the meaning and power of Christianity unless we realise that there is an inner thirst just as there is an inner man. The inner thirst is deeper and stronger than the thirst of the body, and can only be satisfied from the fountain of life in God. "Under the imagery of one thirsting for water, which everywhere, and especially in countries like Palestine, where the want is so often experienced, would be well understood and appeal to human needs, the Lord offers to all such persons that which will for ever satisfy the longings of the soul," the peace, the power, the life of God. Just as the body of the rock gave streams in the desert, just as the body of the golden vase poured out the water of Siloam on the Altar of the Temple, so the body of each Christian, as the type of his being and character, would be, in a smaller way, a reviving and refreshing power. The whole Christian is to be like a consecrated flagon, emptied of vanity, filled with the Spirit, a wholesome, life-giving influence wherever he may be. "Rivers of water" says our Lord, to show the copious and overflowing power of God's grace, not merely a draught as from the golden vase; and living water, water of life, life-giving; for when the grace of the Spirit has entered into the mind, and settled in it, it flows all around freer than any fountain, and neither falls, nor empties, nor stagnates. From the life-giving water of the Spirit came the wisdom of Stephen, the tongue of Peter, the strength of Paul, the love of John. Nothing hindered them; but like strong, clear torrents rushing from perennial springs, they went on carrying all before them.

"This He spake of the Spirit, which they that believe on Him should receive." We are under this special relation to God's Spirit, and we do not think enough about its reality. God's human manifestation could not stay amongst the sons of men beyond the limits of a natural lifetime. When the day had come for Christ's death there remained nothing else but that He should come forth again from the grave to show for our sakes His power over sin and death; and then that for our sakes also He should take with Him our nature, His human personality, human soul, human body, into His own proper home in the region of eternity. He was not to prolong an unnatural existence on the earth. We might have thought, indeed, that could He but have lived on, could He but have been heard and seen by generation after generation, His kingdom might have come in a surer, speedier, and purer way than has been the case with His poor, erring, sinful, fallible church on earth.* We know how, soon after our Lord's departure, heresies sprang up, divisions grew, and His words were distorted and forgotten. We might regret that His earthly presence did not continue at least as long as that of His beloved disciple. But this would have implied a continuance of the working of those unseen and hidden laws of nature which had marked His short ministry, and which had shown Him to be the Lord of light and love; a prolonged modification of the ordinary working of the world, for which there would have been no sufficient reason, and which was not suited to the steady, independent growth of His kingdom. With the lives of His own friends all the higher and unusual powers which had been granted them passed away also. The true children of the kingdom would no longer require signs and wonders, but would be led into the way of life by the appeal of the Gospel to their conscience, and the evidence of those who had gone before. They were to do greater and more effective works in their own kind even than their Lord and Master. Only a lasting spiritual influence was needed. It was actually expedient that Christ should go away in order that this spiritual influence might remain for ever with the people of God. "If I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you."

* Cf. Salmon's "Infallibility of the Church."

It will be wholesome for us to ask ourselves whether we can feel any confidence that our risen Lord is abiding with us, by this text; the presence of the Spirit, which He has given us, as evidenced by our life, work, and influence.

And first of all, for our encouragement and consolation, do not the common feelings and affections which make up the higher life, the highest life, of us men living in Christian countries, point to a more than human spirit breathing one breath into men's souls? Is there not something about even the most careless of us, in a land where Christ is preached, which now and again raises us out of ourselves? Christian teaching, for instance, has made us know that when men are living at their very best, it is just when they are least selfish, and caring most in one way or another for the welfare of others. There is the Spirit.

It has been well said that when we are at our best, when we are most filled with the feeling that we do not live to ourselves only, but that we are one with all our fellow men, then it is that we are also entering into feelings which are nobler than such as belong to us as single, separate individuals. We recognise them as something finer than what the most illustrious of our race and kind have ever really reached, but in which all may to some extent share. There is a sympathy which flashes about from one example to another with a strength and warmth that belong naturally neither to those examples nor to our own hearts. And when we yield ourselves to that strength and warmth, and are encouraged and led on to acts of kindness, goodness, usefulness, self-denial, then we know that we are raised by an influence to which we do homage in our hearts, and which is so much better than ourselves that we can rejoice in it without risk of pride or self-complacency. It comes through men, but is not of men. There are the rivers of living water. There is the Spirit.

And not only so, but in our dealings with others we count on such a common, purifying, elevating, ennobling spirit. We expect to find it. We are sure that others may be awakened by it. In every exhortation, in every rebuke, in every act of sympathy, we take it for granted that men are not necessarily and wholly selfish, undutiful, ungrateful to God; but that there is a common spiritual air in which we live and move and have our being. Is it easy to understand and explain these experiences which men have felt, and these demands which they are now accustomed to make, without plainly confessing a heavenly Spirit, the Spirit of God, the Holy Spirit, which shows itself in the better life of Christian men and women? May we not appeal from the rivers of living water which we see in their daily, personal influence, to the indwelling presence and power of God through faith? Yes! Christendom, modern Christian civilisation, has indeed received the Holy Ghost since it believed.

But to be of value to our own souls and character this influence must not be merely general, but personal. By looking steadily and daily at the glory of the only-begotten Son, man becomes transformed after His image. By knowing this surrounding, supernatural, divine inspiration of goodness, man is able to approach Him, to address Him, to talk with Him, as friend talks with friend, to obtain His guidance and direction. When the heart looks up to Him, and forgets itself, it receives an answer of peace. The greatest joy in life is to be conscious of the Spirit present in the heart, and leading the soul on from righteousness to righteousness. It is no doubt a good thing to have a secret friend, even if you do not know him, who works for you, and does his best to help you; but how infinitely better to know that he is actually working and helping! How much more ready you will be to work with him! Such fellowship and communion with God is to feel the heart warmed and purified with no passing excitement, no foolish heat of superstition, no fanciful riot of unreasoning devotion, no wild bubble of sentimental weakness, but with the strong consent of the wisest and best of men that God is about us It is given to the disciple of Christ to be sure that, however small his powers may be, however unworthy the disposition he has received by nature from his ancestors, whatever faults he may find within himself of temper and mind, however busy he may be, whatever impressions he may have received from the events and surroundings of his life, and from the moulding of his character by education or by want of education, nevertheless he is ever being born again by the very Spirit of God. He may be certain that as long as his soul sometimes thirsts after being better, after real happiness, after God, he is sure of finding within himself the well of water springing up unto everlasting life. To him alone of all the world is given the utter satisfaction of believing that the stains on his imperfect life will be no more remembered against him, because Christ has borne his sins and carried his iniquities. The purest and most self-denying heathen might well shrink from the thought of appearing face to face with the God of all Justice and Purity; but the humblest follower of our Lord, who has received ever so small a portion of the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him, is assured that he has become an heir of God. Other faiths, having an element of truth in them, may hold out dim hope of a change after death, or of happiness hereafter; but in some it is very faint, and in others it is very unworthy. The creed of our Lord alone, the all-embracing creed, tells us with the authority of the witness of the Spirit: We know that we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is!

Rivers of living water! It is a plain matter of history that through the faith of Christ, the one true world-wide and eternal religion which embraces all others, there have been numberless humble lives of almost perfect righteousness, numbers of characters of almost faultless nobility, numberless examples of a reasonableness of principle and conduct far other than has ever elsewhere grown up, numberless deeds of heroism, self-sacrifice and charity purer, more enlightened, more effectual than can be found in rare scattered instances in other histories; while even those who are in part opposed to the Christian faith have been unable to escape its influence, and by their lives show that they, too, have been with Christ. For we know the Spirit of God; for He dwelleth in us, and is amongst us. Hereby we know that God abideth in us, by the Spirit which He hath given us.

Rivers of living water! Have you never in your daily occupation, in the book you have been reading, in the train of thought which has been passing through your mind, felt the refreshing of the Spirit giving life to something in you better than was there before? When you have been looking at some divine charm and beauty of nature, or heard some grave and penetrating sentences of the Word of God, or after weariness and trouble have felt grateful for the peace and consolation of home, have you never seen the Spirit pass by? When your whole being has been filled with delight at some deed of courageous unselfishness, or at some character of remarkable wisdom and generosity, or at some life that is more godlike than the lives of most men and women, have you not heard the voice of the Spirit calling out all the warmth of the better part of yourself? Or when you have gone forth from yourself in prayer to your Father that seeth in secret, in the morning, or in the evening, or in the daytime as you are about your work, or in the place where men meet to worship God, have you not come back into you self calmed, strengthened, refreshed, purified, seeing the light dawning upon you and the shadows fleeing away, and have you not felt that the Spirit of Christ and of the Father has been with you? Or when in some acute grief, or bitter disappointment, or (it may be) some dreadful unnerving shame, you have not known where to lay your head, where to bury your sorrow, where to get rid of the numbing load of pain which seemed to be crushing all the life out of you; and then something quiet and tranquil has taught you patience, and you begin after a long time to look forwards as well as backwards, to hope as well as to regret, and to realise that after all your life is not so utterly broken off from all that made it happy in former days—at such times have you not been sure with a security beyond all doubt that the Spirit of God "knoweth our downsitting and our uprising; He understandeth our thoughts afar off; He compasseth our path and our lying down, and is acquainted with all our ways; He is indeed a well of water springing up unto everlasting life"?

Rivers of living water! What a blessing and comfort unspeakable, in all the changes and chances of this mortal life, to feel that when you are established and settled in this faith your character and influence are refreshing and invigorating others! What father or mother would not rejoice to know that all their example was for the lasting good of their children! Who would not be glad humbly to believe that he was, in his small way, of them that are the salt of the earth and the light of the world? Who would not thank God in all the fervour of a grateful heart, if with his dying breath he could say that neither by word nor act had he ever caused his brother to stumble, or put temptation in his way, or done aught but make his path smoother, and help him on his road to heaven?

Who cannot write from his own life-story some such experience as this:

"She passed—she went to other lands,
She knew not of the work she did;
The wondrous product of her hands
From her is ever hid.

"For ever, did I say? O no,
The time must come when she must look Upon her pilgrimage below
And find it in God's book.

"That, as she trod her paths aright
Power from her very garments stole;
For such is the mysterious might
God grants the upright soul.

"A deed, a word, our careless rest,
A simple thought, a common feeling.
If He be present in the breast,
Has from Him powers of healing."*

I will end with the prayer of St. Augustine for this divine indwelling, which may well be repeated by each one of us:

"O Holy Spirit, Love of God, Who proceedest from the Almighty Father and His most blessed Son: powerful Advocate and sweetest Comforter, infuse Thy grace and descend plentifully into my heart! For in whomsoever Thou dwellest, the Father and the Son come likewise and inhabit that breast which is honoured with so glorious and divine a visitor. O come, Thou cleanser of all inward pollutions and healer of spiritual wounds and diseases! Come, Thou strength of the feeble knees and raiser up of them that fall! Come, Thou star and guide of them that sail in this tempestuous sea of the world, Thou only haven of the tossed and shipwrecked! Come, Thou glory and crown of the living, Thou only stay and shield of the dying! Come in much mercy. Come, and make me fit to receive Thee!"

The Pride o' the Morning

By Agnes Giberne

CHAPTER XVIII.

OF AN AWAKENING.

IF Giles had lived through years in a week, when first he awoke to his love for Phyllys, Phyllys lived through months in the next three weeks, while trying to "think out," as she expressed it, the new ideas and experiences which had lately come to her.

From an artistic and contemplative atmosphere, from a home where the cult of beauty ranked as a foremost aim, she was back at a plunge in the old contracted circle, where love of Nature and of Art were a synonym for wasted time, and where everything was regarded from the severely practical standpoint.

The contrast tried her. With the unbalanced eagerness of youth, she expected to find all good on one side, all evil on the other. Yet she was beginning to grasp that much good might lie on both sides; she was beginning to feel the need in herself of a wider, a kinder, a fairer spirit towards others; she was beginning more fully to appreciate the saintly goodness of her stern old grandmother, little though she could at times agree with that grandmother's dictums.

The old Vicar, looking on, observed far more than many suspected. He drew her out, gradually, and helped her on by a word here, a pregnant suggestion there.

They were having a chat together one day, while the Vicar in his oldest coat tended his beloved rose-bed; and a sound made Phyllys suddenly turn.

"Oh!" she exclaimed.

For Colin stood on the gravel-path, with lifted cap and a light in his eyes. "I have come to finish the bust," he observed.

And Colin conquered them all "straight off," as the Vicar said, though with variations of rapidity, and apparently without effort.

First to succumb was the Vicar himself, and that after five minutes' talk. He gave unqualified approval to the slight, delicate-looking, gentlemanly young fellow, whom nobody would have taken at first sight for more than three or four and twenty. The Vicar's wife promptly followed suit. "He is the sweetest boy I ever saw in my life," she declared, with an enthusiasm which roused her husband's laughter, though in other words he said the same.

"Giles knows nothing about my coming," he stated. "I'm supposed to be in the Highlands, abjuring work. Don't betray confidence, please, anybody. I wrote yesterday, and needn't again for some days."

Phyllys supposed that he was under orders not to model, and that he intended to disobey.

Mrs. Wyverne next fell a victim. She was fascinated at first sight, like the Vicar. She had given in to Giles, partly out of respect to the head of her family, partly as a result of infinite pains on his part. Colin seemed to take no pains at all. He walked in, was introduced, smiled, announced that he had arrived to complete a work of art, Phyllys being the subject of it, and opposition collapsed like a pricked bubble. The old lady could hardly take her eyes from him. "I suppose you are not counted like your mother," she said in unbelieving tones. "Not like what she was when she and I met—but perhaps——"

"My mother says I am like everybody in turn, which is much the same as being like nobody."

"You certainly remind me of someone."

Phyllys wondered, but would not suggest, —was Mrs. Wyverne dimly conscious of his resemblance to the lost painting? She might have spoken her thought, but for the second idea which sprang up—could Mrs. Wyverne ever have seen that other picture, hidden away in the cabinet—if, indeed, it was "another?"

She took an early opportunity to inquire whether the lost portrait had been found, and Colin replied in the negative. He showed little interest about the matter.

Barbara gave in more slowly. Colin was a man, and she detested men; he was an artist, and she despised Art. The bust aroused her righteous indignation; not altogether righteous, since jealousy of Phyllys had a share in it. Though not great in self-knowledge, she knew this. But she gave the reins to what she felt, ruthlessly stigmatised sculpture as worldly, wasteful, an encouragement to vanity—not sparing her words, till the silence on his part grew impressive, and she met full those clear blue eyes, looking straight, not at, but into her, with a depth of understanding which brought her to a dead halt.

"Yes," he said slowly, and waited.

She had no more to say. Did those penetrating eyes read to the very ground of her motives? Was she to him a transparency?

Then came his most winning smile; a smile which few could withstand. It took her captive on the spot.

"Try for yourself," he said sweetly; and the household stood open-mouthed to see Miss Pringle seated before the improvised modelling stool which—with Mrs. Wyverne's permission—Colin had set up in the small study. She clumsily fingered a lump of clay; she submitted to be lectured and exhorted. The results of her fingering need not be described. The result of his mental manipulation was that he thenceforth dragged her, a helpless victim, at his chariot wheels.

"It's too comical for anything," declared the Vicar, his shoulders shaking with laughter. "Miss Pringle—of all people! That lad could make the very trees run after him if he chose."

How much Colin laughed privately no one knew. He maintained in public his gentle and detached demeanour.

Difficulties were cleared away so far as might be from his path, the household uniting to supply his wants. He had the exclusive use of the little back-room, with a water-tap just outside the door. Phyllys was allowed to sit to him for two hours or more each day, Mrs. Wyverne being usually present with her knitting, while Barbara came in and out, hanging round in wordless admiration, never dreaming how her fidgety movements and creaking shoes tried the young sculptor.

She did not agree with him in his views; she counted still that Art was in the abstract a delusion, a mistake. But Colin Keith himself she confessed to be the one really agreeable man whom she had chanced to find on the face of the earth.

For nearly a week all went well, and the bust made steady progress. Colin was unusually vigorous—perhaps from the light moor air, which seemed to keep headache at bay. "I shall know where to go next time when I want change," he sometimes said. He looked his best—active, eager, joyous, full of delight in his work, full also of a delight and bright expectancy in another direction, which the Vicar saw with gladness, which Mrs. Wyverne saw with anxiety.

Phyllys enjoyed having him. She delighted in his artistic talk; she found pleasure in his suggestive ideas; she chatted freely to him as she sat for her clay portrait; and the hours slid by smoothly. It was a reflection of Castle Hill happiness.

After five or six days of busy work and serene intercourse, a change dawned. Mrs. Wyverne had been called away; and Phyllys was in the usual attitude.

"I've had to write at last and to let them know at home where I am," he remarked. Then —"You are tired. Take it easy for five minutes. You want to rest."

She had found it out herself earlier. A weariness had taken possession of her, a great longing for something—she could not define what. All this seemed not worth while. She stood up and stretched herself, while he turned away to do something with one of the little wooden instruments.

And the thought came—If Giles had been there, instead of Colin?

It was like a great wave of understanding poured over her. In a moment she saw clearly that she was tired of having Colin only, of having Colin in place of Giles. She liked Colin, admired him, appreciated his gifts, enjoyed his conversation. But her real want was for Giles. She wanted him, not for his mental gifts, not for aught that he might say or do, but for himself. She wanted the strong and manly presence, the grave and wordless devotion. Was it devotion? That question arose. Did he truly care for her, further than as a friend? How was she to know?

Friendship alone would not suffice. She had wished for his friendship, and she had received what she sought. Now she craved for more.

Colin by comparison was nothing to her. Suddenly she seemed to have grown satiated with Nature and Art, and with his thoughts about both. At first he had fascinated her, and he might fascinate her again; but he could not give all she wanted. Not Nature, not Art, still less theories about either, could meet her deeper claims. It was love that she needed—Giles' love.

To her artistic, her intellectual, her imaginative sides, Colin appealed strongly. But these were not the whole Phyllys. A more powerful claim rose up and would not be silenced. Her real inner self cried out for Giles—Giles, with his faults, his hot temper, his difficulty of expression, his silence—just Giles Randolph as he was.

As soon as she could escape she went to her own room, recognising calmly that Giles was more to her than any other in the wide world. The discovery brought something of dread, lest her love should be unreturned; yet it shed a new radiance on life. She had not known before the strength with which it was in her to love. A pent-up flood had burst its barriers, pouring in a rush throughout her being; and the loosened flood freshened everything it touched, glorifying the world around. All had become new, all beautiful. Colin had brought new meaning into Nature and Art for her. But Giles had brought new light, new love, into the very springs of her existence. Life itself was transformed by this emotion. Even if Giles should never return what she felt, still nothing could rob her of the added power of loving.

Did he care? She put the question soberly many times. Only a few days earlier she had believed herself to be more to him than he was to her. But in the light of this vivid realisation she saw both him and herself from a new standpoint. His grave reticence made it difficult to gauge what he felt. Yet things might be as she hoped. She would wait, and would hide her love until she knew.

There was a glow in her eyes that evening which awoke hope in Colin, and which aroused Mrs. Wyverne to serious uneasiness, since, much as she herself liked Colin, she did not wish him to be the husband of Phyllys. She had her own ideas in that direction—ideas of a vague somebody imbued with Midfell ways of looking on life, more her own "sort."

One day later, to the extreme surprise of everybody concerned, Mrs. Keith appeared. She gave no warning, but came for a night to the inn, and presented herself.

Three days earlier she had arrived in York, and had been very much "taken aback," to use a popular expression, by the news forwarded from home, that Colin was at Midfell. It was most wrong of Colin, just when he had been ordered complete rest. He would suffer for it, etc., and she had come to see about him herself.

That Colin showed gratification at her advent could hardly be said. He was, as always, inviolably courteous; but her arrival broke into a plan of his own for remaining longer. Last touches having just been given to the bust of Phyllys, he was on the point of proposing to make a cast of Mrs. Wyverne's fine old head, which might well repay the trouble. Now he waited to watch developments.

They were not long in appearing. Mrs. Keith had come primed with a scheme to circumvent him.

The friends with whom she was staying in York—an old school chum and her husband—had lately bought a châlet on the border of Lake Thun, and had asked her to return there with them for a month. She now brought an invitation also for Phyllys. Would Mrs. Wyverne spare her? Mrs. Keith promised every care; and she could undertake that the excursion would be enjoyable. The expense should be her own. She would be glad of a young companion; it made travelling so much more cheerful.

All this passed in public, and Phyllys naturally was charmed, though indulging in but faint hopes of being allowed to go. Another chat in private settled matters as she wished.

"Colin will not join us," Mrs. Keith said decisively, in reply to an anxious query. "He is due in Scotland. Besides, these people are

"'I have come to finish the bust,' he said."—p. 1078.

my friends, not his ; and unless I wished it, they would not ask him. I will take care as to that. I see what you fear, and though he is my own boy, I understand. Nay, I agree with you. The two are not suited to one another. It would not be for their happiness. If Colin chooses to stay on in Midfell, neither you nor I can send him away. But I can take Phyllys out of the country, and I can undertake to keep the two apart."

This explanation induced the old lady to give in, despite Barbara's remonstrances.

CHAPTER XIX.

OF A FAMILIAR HANDWRITING.

PHYLLYS sat alone in the garden of Châlet St. Jacques, deeply intent on the scene before her. Ah ! but it was lovely—lovely ! She murmured the word many times.

Ten days earlier she and Mrs. Keith, travelling with Mr. and Mrs. Forsyth, had reached this villa, or châlet, lately purchased as a summer resort by Mrs. Keith's friends. Here they would remain at least another ten days. After that, possibly, Mrs. Keith and she might move on to another part of Switzerland before returning home.

The wailing of an ill-handled violin from behind rather disturbed her musings, though she did her best to ignore its existence. Mr. Forsyth, one of the kindest of men, never dreamt that his tuneless dirges could affect other people unpleasantly. He was always happy himself, violin in hand. So was his wife, so long as she could talk. A ceaseless murmur of voices—buzz, buzz, and purr, purr—travelled through an open window underneath that which held the violin. The elder ladies had been hard at work for an hour, discussing the latest fashions in toques and bodices, one of the two with her back to Nature's sublimity, the other with eyes bent on her knitting. But, of course, they had both looked out earlier, and had said how pretty it was.

Phyllys was well content to be left to her studies of that sublimity. They were always fearing that she might be dull, with no young companions of her own age. She laughed privately at the notion. Dull, with this to look upon ! Dull, with Giles to think about !

It could hardly be called a "lawn" on which she sat, using the word in its English sense. It was more like a bit of field, sloping downward at an abrupt angle. Two small trees sheltered her head. Below the garden lay more grass-land, descending still ; and then came the road which skirted the lake, and then some rough wooden structures, with a vegetable garden; and then the lake, and then the mountain amphitheatre.

Prominent in front, across the translucent blue-green water, stood a great green hummocky mass of pyramidal shape, by name the "Niesen ;" a useful friend to the neighbourhood, acting as weather barometer by the simple process of putting on and pulling off his cloud cap. He had slipped it on and whisked it off three or four times this day, as if unable to make up his mind. A range of slight, half-cumulous clouds was creeping along the mountain-sides ; and above it towered high the hoary mass of the Blumlisalp, one keen-cut edge over a dull barrier of rock glowing like a piece of white enamel.

More away to the left stood forth the three chief giants of the scene—the mighty Jungfrau, sharply outlined, pure and snowy, with grey hollows and shades ; the white Mönch, and the rocky Eiger.

Phyllys drank it all in eagerly, finding each minute some new beauty, some fresh dent or fold, some perfect moulding, some wonderful contrast in light and shade, some unexpected finish or harmony of form.

"One would never get to the end of it !" she whispered. "Not in years and years."

The doleful wailings ceased, and hardly had she congratulated herself before she found Mr. Forsyth at her side.

"Well, Miss Wyverne. Tired of sitting here all alone ? Fine view, eh ? Very fine view. I've been trying that tune over again—you know it." Phyllys had vainly sought to pin a name to the concatenation of wails. "First-rate thought of my wife, hiring that piano. A little music, always cheerful. Would you like a run into Thun, get tea, and come back in time for dinner ? We can catch the next boat."

Phyllys jumped up readily. A "run" to any part of the lake was charming, and in a few minutes they were off, hurrying down through the village of brown and yellow châlets, with their typical verandahs and over-hanging eaves. It was about ten minutes' walk to the boat-station, and they caught easily the next steamer, zigzagging to and fro from side to side of the lake, in its progress from Interlaken to Thun. She had been to the quaint old town more than once, but one could not go too often, and Mr. Forsyth made an excellent conductor. They wandered through the old streets, visited the old castle, admired the scenery, and enjoyed themselves.

"Pity Randolph refuses to come out! Great pity!" remarked Mr. Forsyth casually.

Phyllys made a sound of inquiry. She had not heard this.

"Mrs. Keith was so sure he would come. Can't understand it at all. She didn't want her own son—odd, rather, come to think of it. Bent on having Randolph. My wife and I quite willing, of course; room enough for both. Mrs. Keith seems to have urged it pretty strongly, but letter this morning decisive, I believe. No, yesterday was it? I've no memory. He says he has too much to do—can't get away. Mrs. Keith will have told you."

"No. Was I meant not to know it?"

"She told us—spoke openly. By-the-bye, that wretched memory of mine! she did say at first she wanted his coming to be a surprise. I declare I forgot. But now, of course—no matter, since he can't come."

"It would have been nice if he could," she said gravely

A shadow had fallen, like a grey veil. This might mean much to her. Mrs. Keith had tried to persuade Giles to join them—here, where she was!—and had urged him in vain. It looked as if he did not very greatly care to see more of Phyllys. Was he really so overwhelmingly busy, that he could not spare a few days for Lake Thun? She found it hard to believe. He was his own master.

She recalled the scene in Colin's studio, when he had broken into passionate resentment about—what was it? Because he found her and Colin on too friendly terms? This explanation had naturally suggested itself. Not, as for a moment she had supposed, the sight of the child's bust. He had not seen that when he first showed anger. But if, indeed, he had been wrathful with Colin because of her presence in the studio, it seemed doubly singular that he should now refuse to be with her.

"Getting tired, eh?" demanded Mr. Forsyth.

"Oh, no," and she roused herself. "It is a dear old place. But ought we not to go back?"

He assured her that there was no hurry, and started for a fresh tramp through a part not yet visited that day, talking all the way. She did her best to seem interested, to laugh at his little jokes; but the strain became severe, and soon she could not hide that she really was tired—tired with a heart-sickness which he did not suspect. None the less, he grew concerned, and took her to the nearest inn, making her sit down in the stuffy little parlour, and insisting on a fresh supply of tea, though they had had some earlier outside a shop. She remonstrated in vain. He wandered presently into the passage, and came back laughing.

"Now how has this come about?" he asked, holding towards Phyllys a letter. "Sent to this inn, of all places in the world! 'To be kept till called for.' What chance that Mrs. Keith ever would call for it?"

Phyllys' heart gave one great throb. "From Giles!" escaped her lips.

"Giles Randolph? Is that his handwriting?" Mr. Forsyth examined the envelope. "Now you mention the fact, I do see a likeness. Characteristic and vigorous. But I say"—turning the letter round—"if it is his, he is in Switzerland. The postmark is Swiss—'Interlaken.'"

Another throb, this time of hope.

"But you said he would not come."

"So Mrs. Keith assured me yesterday—or was it the day before? I'm wretched at dates. He may have changed his mind and rushed out here. Though why he should stay at Interlaken and should address a letter to Mrs. Keith at a Thun hotel beats me altogether." Mr. Forsyth passed a puzzled hand across his lined forehead. "Beats me!" he repeated.

Phyllys' colour was bright enough to win his attention

"Beats me utterly!" he said a third time. Then, carelessly, "Fine fellow, Randolph."

"He and Colin are both so nice."

"Well, yes—Colin rather handicapped, poor chap! But Randolph, very fine fellow. Good landlord, good shot, makes himself liked."

Phyllys had lost her tired look, and was now only eager to get home. They went straight to the boat-station, and caught the next steamer.

"We'll have a little fun with her about this," suggested Mr. Forsyth as they mounted the hill. Phyllys smiled, full of the thought that Giles was at hand—perhaps still at Interlaken, perhaps already on the way to join them. He would surely come that evening. No doubt he meant to take them by surprise—all except Mrs. Keith, who, of course, was cognisant of his plans. How much there would be to say to him!

The two ladies were in the drawing-room when they arrived—a pretty little room, furnished so far as might be in English fashion, Phyllys' colour was commented on by Mrs. Keith. "Swiss air is doing you good," she said.

"By-the-bye, did you say that Randolph was still at home?" asked Mr. Forsyth. "Not able to come out?"

She gave a glance towards Phyllys. "I have been in hopes that he might join us, but he said he was too busy. Another letter to-day says the same." She tapped the floor impatiently with her foot. "Absurd! I am writing to say that I don't mean to let him off."

"How would you like to find him already in Switzerland?"

"Giles in Switzerland?" She raised her eyebrows. "Certainly he is not! I wish he were."

"But he must have come out—he must have changed his mind," said Phyllys, smiling with happiness. "He is at Interlaken."

"Nonsense, my dear! Of course, he is not. Why are you both trying to take me in?" with a suspicious look at each.

"We are trying nothing so unkind," laughed Mr. Forsyth. "It is the oddest thing. We happened to go into an inn at Thun, just for a cup of tea, and we found a letter for you waiting there 'till called for.'"

She made a sudden movement.

"How ridiculous! I must have given the wrong address to some friend or other. A fit of absence of mind!"

"But Giles knows your address." A strong sense of Mrs. Keith's untruthfulness took possession of Phyllys. She could conjecture no reason for false statements on the part of the latter at this moment; but that something of falsity underlay Mrs. Keith's last utterance she could not doubt.

"I was not speaking of Giles, of course——" hurriedly.

"And this letter is from Giles," added Phyllys resolutely. "It is his own handwriting, and it has the Interlaken postmark. He must be there himself—at Interlaken."

Mrs. Keith received the envelope from Mr. Forsyth, turned it over, looked at the postmark, muttered something indistinct, and then, to the amazement of all present, she fainted dead away.

CHAPTER XX.

OF GILES—OR SOMEBODY.

"MY dear, it is absolutely unimportant. You make such a fuss about nothing. I have told you before more than once, that I have a weak heart, and I must expect little attacks of this kind once in a while. The fact is I ought to be more careful, and I have walked too much. These steep hills try me. I shall endeavour to get a quiet day to-morrow."

Mrs. Keith spoke in hurried, feverish accents, her pale lips working. She seemed utterly unstrung. She had rallied soon from the faint, and had insisted on going to her own room, carrying the unopened letter, and begging to be left alone for an hour's rest. Phyllys, anxious and perplexed, crept softly in at the hour's end and found her on the sofa. A whisper of inquiry brought the above remonstrances.

"The attacks seem to come without warning and without cause, so I shall have to be more particular." Had there been no cause, no connection between the sight of Giles' handwriting and the swoon? Yet, what connection could there be? Why should the news of Giles' presence at Interlaken startle her, when it was her particular wish that he should come?

"And really," she went on, "they are of no consequence so long as I do not do too much. But I feel that I must have a time to-morrow of real rest, all to myself." She sighed, as if oppressed. "These dear good people are most kind, but I get so worn out with the perpetual talk and restlessness. I want you to help me, dear. If you could only contrive to get them both off my hands it would be an unspeakable mercy."

She fixed troubled eyes of appeal on the girl.

"I don't think they would like that."

"They would not mind. I have thought it out. We will persuade them to go to St. Beatenberg for a good long day; then at the last moment I shall slip out of it and stay at home. You must give them no hint that I mean to do so. I hate the idea of that funicular railway, and they are bent on going some time or other. So I shall suggest the plan, and you must support me."

"But, if Giles were to come——" The words fell from her lips before she knew. "Only, of course, you will be here, so that will be all right."

Mrs. Keith looked amazed. "Giles?" she said. "I only wish he would."

"Perhaps he will look in to-night—if he is still at Interlaken." The other's bewildered face constrained her to add, "The letter we brought from Thun—don't you remember? In Giles' handwriting."

Mrs. Keith broke into a loud laugh, then put her hand to her head.

"These fainting fits leave me so confused. Yes, now I remember. You did say something of the kind. But, my dear, that letter is a mere business epistle—from quite another person. A man with a perfectly different name. That was a mere fancy of yours."

Phyllys felt sorely disappointed, and Mrs. Keith, pulling herself up, brought out of her pocket a torn envelope.

"Now you can see for yourself. Not Giles' writing at all, though I grant there is a rough resemblance. One of those odd, accidental likenesses that one so often sees, with nothing to account for them. Some letters are a trifle like, the rest quite different. Giles is at home still, and the tiresome fellow seems determined not to come out. I am beginning to think"—and she smiled—"that my best plan will be to cut short the Swiss trip and to take you there. Would you like to see Castle Hill again? Ah, I thought so! I have you with me for a month, and I do not mean to be cheated out of any part of it again. Well, we shall see to-morrow. These attacks leave one hardly up to travelling. I begin to feel only fit for home."

For Castle Hill—and Giles! Had it not been for the thought of Giles, a cutting short of the Swiss visit would have meant dire disappointment to Phyllys. Things being as they were, she only hoped that her eyes did not betray too much gladness. She lowered them for a critical examination of the envelope, and again the extraordinary resemblance to Giles' writing impressed her forcibly. Two or three letters were differently formed, but the remainder she could have declared in a court of justice to be his.

"A mere chance likeness, you see," Mrs. Keith said lightly, and Phyllys forbore to contradict her.

The proposed excursion was taken up by their host and hostess, though not without hesitation on the score of Mrs. Keith's unfitness. It was something of a shock to Phyllys' sense of honesty, when the latter cheerfully assured them that she was "perfectly well," that "nothing would do her so much good as a trip up the mountain," and that she was "longing to try one of those charming little mountain railways." Phyllys, of course, said nothing, and the plan was arranged.

Next day proved fine, and Mrs. Keith went so far as to dress for the start. Not till the last moment did she draw back, sinking into a chair, and faintly professing herself so much more fatigued than she had expected, that she hoped they would excuse her. No, she would not let Mrs. Forsyth remain at home. Rather than that she would go, though it might mean another fainting-fit. All she needed was a quiet day on the sofa.

Very reluctantly the Forsyths yielded, left her in charge of the two Swiss maids, and went off without her.

Not, however, to St. Beatenberg. No sooner were they on board the steamer than Mrs. Forsyth suggested a day at Interlaken, deferring the St. Beatenberg excursion until Mrs. Keith could form one of their party. She had wanted so much to try the "funicular."

Mr. Forsyth at once agreed, and Phyllys offered no objection. It was not her place to set them right. So instead of landing below the heights of St. Beatenberg, they steamed to the farther end of the lake, amid a goodly number of excursionists, though not so many as would have been there a few weeks earlier. It was a cool autumn day, and the woods were gay with tints of red and gold.

At Interlaken they wandered along the quaint old streets, poked in and out of shops, and picked up presents for friends at home. It was all too smart and fashionable, Phyllys privately decided, and not to be compared with the village where they stayed; yet she enjoyed it much, having a large capacity for enjoyment. The Jungfrau, solemnly overlooking the town, had not here so much the aspect of a white guardian angel as when viewed from Châlet St. Jacques. "In fact, more like a huge lump of chalk," suggested Mr. Forsyth, and though Phyllys repudiated the suggestion, it recurred to her mind.

One way and another the hours slipped by. Late in the afternoon they had tea outside a shop, and then went to the chief promenade, the Hoheweg, where they encountered some English friends. Mr. Forsyth disappeared with the gentleman of the party, and Mrs. Forsyth sat down for a good talk with the two elderly ladies. Phyllys listened and joined in for a while, then finding herself unnecessary, wandered a short distance, and gave herself up to the study of the grand Jungfrau. No look of "chalk" now. Something in the state of the morning atmosphere must have caused that aspect. The mountain mass reared its mighty head, and broad reaches of snow descended low in parts, like trailing skirts of white. Higher peaks were partly hidden by drifting greyish clouds, but one and another appeared from time to time. Each moment there were changes, the shapes of rifts and hollows varying as she gazed. A clear basin of snow, for a time visible, vanished utterly.

She watched also with interest the Schynige Platte, up which the Forsyths had promised one day soon to take her. In the far distance she could just make out a tiny mountain train creeping slowly up its steep sides, carrying a minute cloud of white steam.

Presently, glancing back to make sure that she was not wanted, she received a nod from Mrs. Forsyth, and then she wandered farther, getting among some trees, partly out of sight. It was evident that her friends were in no hurry to make a move.

Suddenly her heart gave a hard throb, stopped, then beat furiously.

Could it be—Giles ?

A big man, broad-shouldered, sat alone at a small table, his face turned half away. The shape of his powerful shoulders, the attitude, the manner in which he leaned his head on one hand, the grave silence and immobility—all indicated Giles. He seemed to be deep in thought, lost to his surroundings.

She was not near enough to make out more than this. She stood half behind a little tree, gazing hard. Whether in consequence of her gaze, or from no particular reason, he turned slightly in her direction, and she caught sight of a strong sunburnt profile.

"Giles!" she whispered.

Why had Mrs. Keith denied his presence there ?

But the face looked older than when she had seen him last; not thinner, not paler, only markedly older. She almost thought his hair had gained a touch of grey. Could he have been in some terrible trouble lately ? Was there some mystery about him, hidden from her by Mrs. Keith, but sufficient to account for his refusal to come to St. Jacques ?

It was all bewilderment, and she began to wonder if she were dreaming. She put her hands over her eyes for three or four seconds. When she looked again the figure was gone.

She went slowly back to Mrs. Forsyth in a dazed condition, questioning whether it had been a delusion, a trick of the imagination. She wished now that she had at once gone nearer to make sure. Yet no; for if Giles indeed were there, and desired to avoid her presence, she could not go after him.

She said nothing to the Forsyths of what she had either seen or imagined. In no long time they started for home, and on arrival they found that Mrs. Keith had retired to her room. "Madame" had been a long time away, the Swiss girl said, when questioned. She had twice been out in the morning, and had received two telegrams; and then she had said that she would get some fresh air on the lake. She had returned but lately, by the boat preceding that which had brought back Monsieur and Madame and Mademoiselle. Yes, surely Madame had returned by that boat, for she would not all these hours have walked about Hilterfingen and Oberhofen, not once entering the châlet.

Mrs. Forsyth and Phyllys made their way to the bedroom, to find Mrs. Keith hard at work packing up. Her cheeks were flushed; her manner showed suppressed excitement.

"Yes, I went out," she said. "I thought it might do me good. My nerves seem all to pieces, and I could not keep still. So I took the boat to Interlaken and back for the sake of the air. You there, too!" with a start. "Then you gave up St. Beatenberg. What a pity! No, I did not see you, of course. I was no time ashore. Just for a cup of tea."

"I think you would have been better quiet," remarked Mrs. Forsyth, with a glance round the disorderly room.

"Perhaps you are right. It may have been a mistake. But something in Swiss air does not suit me. I seem to be a wreck of myself," and she laughed nervously. "So I have decided to go home—to start to-morrow. Phyllys will not object, and you must not think me ungrateful. I have quite made up my mind."

Had she seen Giles ? Phyllys all but asked the question, and then something in that strained, unhappy face, with its haggard flush, held her silent. As once before, the wonder arose—was Mrs. Keith perfectly sane ? Could it be that her brain was ever so slightly "touched ?" Phyllys decided not to risk exciting her further.

CHAPTER XXI.

OF AN UNQUIET MIND.

NO persuasions would induce Mrs. Keith to put off her departure more than one night. The Forsyths had a fight to gain that concession.

"But I must, and will, have a clear day for the Schynige Platte," Mrs. Forsyth declared to her husband. "Phyllys has been promised that excursion from the first."

She gained her point, though probably, if Mrs. Keith had guessed what the extra day would involve, it would not have been granted. When she discovered the plan—too late to draw back—she first hotly combated it, and then insisted on being one of the party.

Phyllys, always an early riser, did not fail next morning. She sprang out of bed and went to the open French window in her frilled nightdress, with chestnut hair falling loose.

It was a sight worth waking for: the pale lake lying in shadow, with the pyramidal mass of the Niesen rising darkly beyond. Further distant shone the snow-peaks of the Blumlisalp, and one or two tips of the Jungfrau range, with a marvellous silver glow from the coming sun. The tint could hardly be otherwise described. It was not rose or gold, nor was it ordinary cold silver, but a pale rose-silver, if such a colour exists. Phyllys watched it breathlessly, kneeling, lost in admiration, unknowing whether the sight appealed more to her artistic or her spiritual self. It made her think of Colin and his ideals. It made her think of Giles. It lifted her heart to the Divine Source of all earthly and heavenly beauty. She whispered her prayers softly, looking with bodily and mental eyes on that indescribable light, while her spiritual eyes were uplifted to her Father in Heaven.

Then the ascending monarch of day crushed out the delicate tinting, and flooded heights and vales with gold.

A sharp air assailed them on the lake, and Mrs. Keith was blue, by no means in condition for the day's exertions. She held to her point, however, and refused to turn back.

Phyllys could have been in dancing spirits. The beauty of lake and mountain, the charms of the coming ascent, the prospect of Castle Hill, with reviving hopes that her fears would prove groundless, and that Giles would be in the future all he had been in the past—these buoyed her up. And the one wet blanket on her delight was Mrs. Keith's pallid face and evident depression. As they neared Interlaken, she did indeed force a measure of cheerfulness; but when they landed, her eyes were everywhere, nervously on the look-out. Phyllys could not but notice this, could not but conjecture possible explanations.

From Interlaken they went by train to a small station at the base of the mountain, where they entered the tiny mountain train, seen earlier by Phyllys creeping up the height.

"Schynige Platte, not far from seven thousand feet high," announced Mr. Forsyth, dividing his attention between his guide-book and Phyllys. "Subtract from that the eighteen hundred feet altitude of the lake—leaves a respectable bit still to climb. Engine worked with a cogwheel—very safe—all precautions taken. Ascent lasts about an hour and a half, or less. I beg your pardon," at a gasp of protest from Mrs. Keith.

"I thought it lasted twenty minutes!" in dismay.

"Dear me, no. You are thinking of St. Beatenberg. This is a longer affair."

"It won't seem any time at all—there is so much to see," murmured Phyllys joyously.

As they slowly rose, in turns and bends, the landscape widened by leaps and bounds. On one side, then on the other, they gazed downwards over a vast and growing expanse. The Lake of Thun soon lay far beneath. The Lake of Brienz had shrunk to a large puddle of dull greenish water. There was an overmastering sense of loftiness as they looked into sheer depths, across valleys, over precipitous walls of rock, falling abruptly from the very verge of the slender line on which they travelled. Most of the travellers took the journey composedly. It was the correct thing to do; everybody did it, and nobody expected to be the worse. To Phyllys the whole outlook was too wonderful, too fascinating, to whisper of fear. But she became aware that the lady on her other side was growing nervous, and that Mrs. Keith trembled like a leaf, staring with wide-open fixed eyes.

Three or four tunnels had to be gone through, and the breaking out from each into a wider world of mountains was grand. Ascent by rail has an unromantic sound; yet no man, climbing slowly on foot or on mule-back, gains these marvellous effects.

The nervous lady fidgeted anew. "Well, one comfort is," she remarked, "if anything did go wrong, it wouldn't be a case of getting mangled only. It would be—the end!"

"My dear, don't talk nonsense. Nothing is going wrong," a decisive man's voice beyond made reply.

Mrs. Keith clutched the window, breathing hard, and Phyllys slipped a hand through her arm. "It's all right," the girl said cheerily. "Nothing to be afraid of. These trains go all day long, all through the summer."

"'Giles!' she whispered"—p. 1086.

She met the large, hollow, haggard eyes, with a look in them which she would not easily forget. A look of dread, of shrinking, of horror.

"But—if it did——" she heard.

They stopped at a small station, and Mrs. Keith started up. Phyllys caught her hand.

"No, this isn't the top yet."

"Sit down, Mrs. Keith. A little longer. We are two-thirds up," added Mrs. Forsyth.

But she dragged her hand from Phyllys, and pushed her way out wildly. "I must—I must! I can't stand this any longer," she panted "It terrifies me! I can't stand it!"

Remonstrances were useless. She stood on the platform, trembling, her face a mottled pallor.

"I can't—I tell you, I can't! I won't!" she declared. "I haven't the nerve for it. No use asking me. I'll never in my life again get into a funicular train after to-day. You are all to go on without me, and you can take me up again as you come back. I shall be all right till then. No, I won't have any of you stay. I won't allow it, and I won't go any higher."

So excited and imperious was her manner, that it admitted of no resistance. Mr. Forsyth had sprung out, but she almost pushed him back, with insistence, in the face of his polite desire to remain with her. He had to yield, and she was left standing alone on the platform.

Since she refused their help, all they could do was to put aside the thought of her for awhile, and to enjoy the views. Another tunnel was gone through, and as they emerged, the Jungfrau burst upon them in dazzling radiance.

When the last little station was reached, a walk of some twenty minutes brought them to the top. A party of loud-voiced Germans, who had kept up a ceaseless rattle during the ascent, now did their best to mar the solemn grandeur of Nature. Phyllys and the Forsyths moved to a little distance, where they might study the scene in comparative quiet.

Far below, branching different ways, lay the Lauterbrunen and the Grundelwald Valleys; and in front, from right to left, swept a mighty range of snowy heights and towering peaks, including the three giants daily scanned in the far distance from Châlet St. Jacques—the Jungfrau, the Mönch, the Eiger—a lordly trio. These, and other mountains of the Bernese Oberland, seemed here to have placed themselves in a stately order, on view. It was a perfect day, some few clouds floating, but all the greater heights clear and sharp in definition. Through a good binocular Phyllys could see the very crevasses in the Grundelwald glacier, the tiny châlets dotting the valley.

When the time came to return, they kept a look-out for Mrs. Keith at the first station, and she was not visible. Mr. Forsyth left the train to inquire, and came back.

"She has set off to walk down," he said, with a lined forehead. "Very unwise. Of course, she's not equal to it. Over four miles! I must go after her. She might have a fainting-fit on the road."

There was no time to discuss the question, for the train was starting. Mrs. Forsyth could not resist a murmur of, "Really too bad!"

The small engine, which had puffed and snorted fiercely on its upward way, kept silence in the easier descent. Down, and down, and down they slipped—softly and steadily, winding to and fro from edge to edge, the dark mountains gaining in height as they slid into valleys between, the distant views contracting, the horizon narrowing.

On reaching the base, nothing was seen or heard of either Mrs. Keith or Mr. Forsyth, and Mrs. Forsyth decided to go on to Interlaken, there to await their appearance. In Mrs. Keith's present condition of health, it was impossible that she should yet have walked the whole way.

The wait was a long one. Mrs. Forsyth and Phyllys had tea, then hovered around and about the boat station, till patience was nearly exhausted. When at length the absent pair drove up, Mrs. Keith, drooping and feeble, seemed not to realise the trouble she had given. Mr. Forsyth had overtaken her not far from the foot of the mountain, and she had been so ill with over-exertion as to make a considerable halt needful. She was barely able now to drag one foot after the other. They helped her on board, and placed her comfortably, Mr. Forsyth then moving away for a low-voiced talk with his wife.

"Not at all grateful to me for going after her, I assure you," he murmured. "You'd have been astonished if you had seen the pace at which she was going—before she saw me. After that she was all weakness and faintness. My dear, your friend is rather eccentric, to say the least. She had hardly a word to say to me all the way here. However, not a word of this to anyone. She is bent on starting for home to-morrow still."

Phyllys meanwhile had taken a seat close to

XUM

Mrs. Keith, and the latter presently murmured, "You are a kind girl."

"I am sorry you are feeling so ill. Would it not be better to put off our journey for a few days?"

"No, certainly not. Everything is arranged, and I cannot alter. I cannot wait a day longer. My nerves seem all to rags," and she tried to laugh.

The laugh turned into a shudder. "Was that thunder?" She sat up and gazed around. "I have such a horror of a storm in a boat—all the iron about!"

Phyllys had hoped that she would not notice the state of the weather. A rapid change had developed after the brilliant day, and lurid cloud masses covered the summits, broken by yellow streaks.

"I don't like that. How long shall we be? An hour? More than an hour! Ask somebody if the storm will hold off so long. Find out, pray!"

Phyllys went obediently to inquire, though aware that "somebody" was not likely to have positive information. She came back to her seat, remarking, "I dare say it won't be much."

"What does Mr. Forsyth think?"

"He says it looks rather threatening."

They ploughed their way steadily through the grey waters, zig-zagging as usual from side to side of the lake; and the cloud-capped heights grew more densely black.

"If it gets worse, I shall land. I won't be stopped," Mrs. Keith muttered.

But for a while the storm held off, and when it broke she seemed to be paralysed, unable to act.

The solid Niesen, always a prominent object on their way from Interlaken, showed now no pyramidal form. From summit to base it was one mass of black vapours. Soon within the shrouding canopy rolled heavy peals, each one louder and longer than the last.

Then a dazzling double-forked arrow leaped from the veiled pyramid, accompanied by a crashing roar, which all but drowned Mrs. Keith's scream. She clutched at Phyllys' wrist, holding it with a force which gave pain. Mr. Forsyth came to ask if she would go into the cabin, but she shook her head, moaning.

"No, no! The boat may go down. We may all go down!"

Another resplendent flash, lighting up the dense and murky scene with intense rose-colour; and another burst of heaven's artillery, reverberating in dying echoes. Mrs. Keith hid her face, while Phyllys watched, fascinated. The black-clothed pyramid, the issuing sword-flashes, the rolling peals, had a stately grandeur, which brought to mind the giving of the Law from Mount Sinai in days of old.

"Phyllys, if death came, would God have mercy? If one had not meant—had not meant——"

"Had not meant to do what was wrong?"

"Yes—that is, had not wished, had not intended. Circumstances sometimes, you know——"

"But circumstances never can make one do wrong," the girl said staunchly.

Another dazzling sword of light, another echoing crash, and the long repetitions rolled from mountain to mountain. Mrs. Keith stooped forward, shaken by a sob.

"But if one cannot—cannot confess—would He have mercy?"

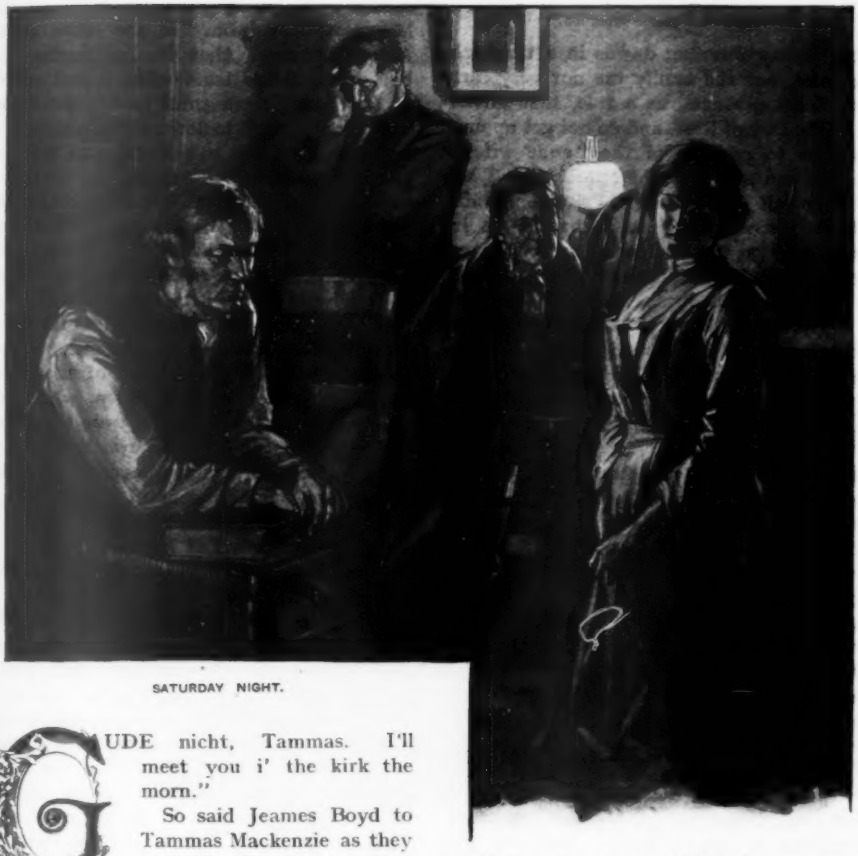
"He knows if you really cannot. If it is for the sake of another—not yourself—that you don't speak." Afterwards she wondered what had made her say this. At the instant the words sprang to her lips naturally. "I think one should always tell—if not openly, at least to someone. And then one might be helped."

No reply came. Mrs. Keith remained in the same position, till they reached their station, and she had to move. By that time the storm was lessening, and she walked from the boat with little help, her face averted from Phyllys. The girl wondered—had she given offence?

On reaching the châlet, a fresh effort was made to induce Mrs. Keith to put off her journey home, if only for two or three days, but she was obdurate. She meant to go; she would go! She was fit only for home.

Then, in her own room: "Did I talk nonsense on the boat, Phyllys? Lightning affects my head so strangely. I never know what I am saying in a storm."

Phyllys looked at her with serious eyes. "I don't know," she said. "It didn't sound at the time like nonsense."



"I've no doubt it was, whatever I chanced to say, if it makes you so tremendously grave. Well, thank goodness! this is nearly the end. I shall never in my life attempt another funicular railway, and I have had enough of Switzerland. Now you must go to bed. Most of your packing is done, I suppose. You said you would do it yesterday evening. That is right. I long to be safe at my beloved Castle Hill."

And the next day they started.

[END OF CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE.]

IN AND ABOUT THE KIRK.

By the Rev. Dr. W. W. Tulloch.

SATURDAY NIGHT.

"GUDE nicht, Tammas. I'll meet you i' the kirk the morn."

So said Jeames Boyd to Tammas Mackenzie as they parted with each other on a Saturday afternoon at the close of their work for another week.

"A' richt, I'll be there," was the response. Such had been the manner of their parting week after week for many a year.

Saturday afternoon was the only "bit" holiday these two douce old Scots ever had or ever thought of. For the rest of that day each did little "orra" jobs in their homes or in their gardens befitting the season of the year. Then they read "the Word" and offered prayer with their respective households, and had their weekly shave—an essential preparation for going to the kirk next day, and which it was not permissible to put off until "the Sawbath." Shaving was too secular an occupation for that day, and had to be got through on the Saturday night.

It may be interesting, by the way, to note that though Sunday is not so well observed in the lowlands of Scotland as it was wont to be, its sanctity is still rigorously maintained in many parts of the Highlands.

Mr. Alexander Carmichael, in his great work, "Carmina Gadelica," gives a poem on the Lord's Day, which he thinks can be traced back to the eighth century. Sunday in the Highlands then and now lasts

> "From setting of sun on Saturday > Till rising of sun on Monday."

Though its injunctions are very rigid, the following occupations are permitted:

> "To keep corn on a high hillock;
> To bring physician to a violent disease;
> To go with a beast to the cattle-fold;
> Far or near be the distance,
> Every creature needs attention."

The Sunday morning dawns in a true Sabbatic calm, but the family are not very early astir. Scots peasants, as a rule, take advantage of the Day of Rest, and do not get up until it is time to partake of the "gude wife's" breakfast and get dressed for the kirk. While his better half is preparing the simple morning meal, the father will perhaps bundle on his trousers and go to the door to look out, and after meditating some time he may give a yawn, and stretching his arms, say to himself at last, "I think I maun awa' in and rise!"

After breakfast and worship the family proceeds to church, perhaps having a distance of several miles to walk. The mother and the girls will walk together, the key of the house having been carefully hidden under the feet-scraper; the laddies by themselves, and the father by himself, picking up a crony or two on the road. Their salutation is generally in regard to the weather. As Sir Archibald Geikie says, in his very charming "Scottish Reminiscences,"* to which this paper is greatly indebted "In Scotland, as in other countries having a variable climate, the weather has long been a staple subject with which to introduce a conversation, and it is common that even when the sky is overcast, with a threatening of rain, the usual greeting, 'It's a fine day' may not unfrequently be heard at the beginning of the colloquy. So inveterate is this habit that the observation is apt to escape from the lips, even when the meteorological conditions make it grotesquely out of place—as in the case of the man who made use of it on a day of howling tempest, but immediately corrected himself, 'It's a fine day,' said he, 'but coorse."

As the friends meet or overtake one another on the road, and salutations are given and received, their snuff-mulls are exchanged, and huge portions of "Taddy" are shovelled up noses, often with a horn spoon.

"Ye dinna snuff! Then that's a peety," said one worthy to another, "for you've grand accommodation," in reference to a particularly large nasal organ. Sometimes a woman takes a snuff, but not frequently, though it is recorded of an old lady that she "like't snuff and like't it scented."

And talking of snuff, that was a most extraordinary will lately published in which a Mrs. Margaret Thompson, "in the name of God, Amen," directed that in her coffin should be buried all her handkerchiefs and sufficient of the best Scotch snuff to cover her body. This she preferred to flowers, "as nothing could be so fragrant and so refreshing to me as that precious powder." Further, the six greatest snuff-takers in the parish of St. James's, Westminster, were to be her bearers. Six old maids, each bearing in her hand a box filled with the best Scotch snuff, to take for their refreshment as they walked, were to carry the pall. Before the corpse the minister was to walk, carrying and partaking of a pound of snuff. At every twenty yards a large handful of snuff was to be delivered to the bystanders, while at the door of the testator's house were to be placed for gratuitous distribution two bushels of the same quality of snuff. Several legacies depended on the fulfilment of the will, and all concerned were bidden to regard the powder as the great cordial of Nature.

Then the talk of the church-goers may revert to ministers, ever a fruitful subject of conversation in Scotland. And à propos of this and snuff, the following remark might quite well occur. It is related by Sir Archibald Giekie thus: "Now and then a reproof from the pulpit has drawn down on the minister a sarcastic reply from the unfortunate sleeper, as in the case of the somnolent farmer who was awakened by the minister calling on him to rouse himself by taking a pinch of snuff, and who blurted out, 'Put the snuff in the sermon, sir!' an advice which found not a little sympathy in the congregation." As a rule, there is no sympathy in the minds of the Scots country people with ministers of broad views, and they frequently come in for severe criticism at the hands of the gathering congregation, the precentor, as a sort of secondary dignitary, being often one of the severest critics. It is related of one such that he said he would not go to sing for certain ministers because they were Latitudinarians. "And what," he was asked by a bystander, "do you mean by that?" "I mean," said the ill-taught and ignorant precentor, "by Latitudinarians those who go about preaching the gospel for nothing." "This is an awfu' parish," said another worthy. "The gospel is not preached here, and they whatter the whiskey."

When a young minister was preaching in a famous and historic church, of which the beadle was the most imposing functionary, far more so than its incumbent, "Now," he said, "I am going to take the books up to the pulpit. Don't follow me too close. Come at a respectful distance!"

But now the last hurried tinkle of the bell has died away, and there is a rush into the church. The minister, p eceded by the beadle with "the books," soon appears, and all is attention. He engages for a moment in silent prayer, and then, rising, says, "Let us worship God," or, as they used to say in olden times, "Let us compose our minds for the worship of God by singing the —— Psalm." He reads all the portion that is to be sung. The precentor strikes his tuning fork, and begins, being allowed to sing the first line alone. "It is not always easy to secure a precentor," says Sir Archibald Geikie. "He must, in the first place, be a man of tried good character; and, in the second place, he must of course be able to distinguish the metres of the psalms, and have voice and ear enough to raise at least three or four psalm tunes. His répertoire is seldom much more extensive. Occasionally he begins a tune that will not suit the metre of the psalm, or he loses himself altogether. A precentor in the North Highlands to whom this happened suddenly stopped and exclaimed 'Och, bless me, I'm aff the tune again." Another more sedate worthy struck up the tune three times, but always lost it at the second line. He paused, looked round the congregation, and after solemnly saying, 'Hoots, toots, toots!' went at it the fourth time successfully. When the precentor at Peebles had failed twice in his efforts the old minister looked over the pulpit and said aloud to him, 'Archie, try it again; and if ye canna manage it tak' anither tune.'"

"A precentor,' continues Sir Archibald, "is naturally jealous of any more practised and clear voice than his own, which he rightly thinks ought to predominate. In the little Free Church of Raasay Island, the precentor had it all his own way until the minister's sister came. She sat at the far end of the church, and having more knowledge of music and a good voice, she made herself well heard as she sang in much quicker time than the slow drawl to which the people had been accustomed. Before the precentor had done a line she was ready to begin the next, and the half of the congregation ne rest to her followed her excellent lead. This was too much for the precentor. He raised his voice till it almost cracked with the strain, and for a few notes drowned the rival performer at the other end. But he could not keep it up, and as his notes dropped, the clear, sweet voice of the lady came out as before. Sitting about the middle of the church, I was able to appreciate the strange see-saw of the psalmody."

"The two cronies walking home together."—p. 1096.

After the psalm has been duly sung in the Highlands, the people frequently sitting, "the first prayer is said by the minister, the people standing or lounging about in their pews in various attitudes. Then "the chapters" are read and another psalm sung. A short prayer is followed by the sermon, the great event in worship of the kirk.

"From the time of the Reformation onward the sermon has taken the foremost place in the service of the Church of Scotland. There was a time when a preacher would continue his discourse for five or six hours, and when sometimes a succession of preachers would give sermon after sermon and keep the congregation continuously sitting for ten hours. Those days of perfervid oratory are past; but a sermon of an hour's duration or even more may still be heard, and when the preacher is eloquent, will be listened to with deep interest."

Our late dear Queen did not like long sermons, and many hints were given to the special preachers by the minister of Crathie, the parish in which Balmoral is situated. Mr. Campbell, its late minister, and my dear friend, used to say the Queen had three preferences in a sermon. The special preacher would look up eagerly, wondering if the sermon he had chosen with much care and trepidation satisfied the royal requirements. "What are they?" And the good Campbell, with a smile on his honest, kindly face, would say, "Brevity, brevity, brevity!"

I believe that I owed my being asked back to preach before the Queen every year for nearly twenty years to the fact that I never transgressed this rule. Some ventured to do so, wishing to air their eloquence and trot out their best galloping Tom. Well, they had their reward. They were never asked back.

On the only occasion on which I had the honour to preach in the presence of our King, then Prince of Wales, the late Queen and the present Prince of Wales were at the service, so if I am spared long enough I shall be able to say I have preached before three sovereigns of this realm, though I trust our King may be spared to be an old man. Before dinner at the Castle at night, the King was good enough to say to me, "You don't preach long sermons." "No, Sir," I replied, and I fear there was a twinkle in my eyes, "not before the Queen." The King smiled, and said, "Do you know that when I first came to this part of the country the ministers used to preach such long sermons that the very collie dogs walked up the pulpit stairs and yawned in their faces." And the King bent back and laughed his hearty laugh, which, along with his conversation, takes everyone captive who has the honour to listen to it. I well remember how affable and gracious he was at dinner that evening and afterwards in the smoking-room. It was the year the Church of England lost the great Irish prelate, Magee, Archbishop of York for too short a time. The King spoke to me of his death, and told me the following story about him. He was once at an hotel, and was "teased"—such was the word his Majesty used—to write his name in the visitors' book along with something complimentary to the hotel, so he complied. He wrote, "I, So-and-so Magee, came here." Then the King tapped his forehead and said, "I must tell you the story correctly. Oh, yes:

"'I, So-and-so Magee, came here for change and rest:
The waiters got the change, the landlord got the rest.'"

Well, to return to the sermon in the kirk, Sir Archibald Geikie says, "Scottish sermons have always had a prevalent doctrinal character and a markedly logical treatment of their subject. It has never been the habit, north of the Tweed, to think that 'dulness is sacred in a sound divine.' The clergy have appealed as much to the head as the heart. In bygone generations the doctrines evolved from the text were divided into numerous heads, and these into subordinate sections and subsections, so that the attention of those listeners who remained awake was kept up as at a kind of intellectual exercise. If anyone wishes to realise the extent to which this practice of subdivision could be carried by an eminent and successful preacher, let him turn to the posthumous sermons of Boston of Ettrick. There, in a sermon on "Fear and hope, Objects of the Divine Complacency," from the text, Psalm cxviii 11, this famous divine, after an introduction in four sections, deduced six doctrines, each subdivided into from three to eight heads. A sermon on Matthew xi. 28 was sub-divided into seventy-six heads.

Talking of old sermons, Dr. Boyd, especially in the summer season, when his church at St. Andrews—or rather churches, for he had two, in which he and his colleague used to preach alternately—were crowded with summer visitors, not only used very frequently to preach his old sermons, but his published sermons as well. And, indeed, we never could hear some of them too often. They always seemed quite new. He threw all his heart into the preaching of them, and his spirited manner and graceful style were most attractive. Ah! how well I remember some of them, full of a humour that would set his congregation into an audible titter, and again so charged with pathos that there was not a dry eye in the church, his own voice breaking with tender emotion! His predecessor, the gifted Dr. Park, musician, composer, and artist, the centenary of whose birth, by the way, falls this year, used also to repeat his magnificent discourses very frequently. We students used to make copious notes from them, and by hearing them repeated many of us could reproduce the whole sermon; and at the present moment they are lying in I know not how many students' old note-books.

One wonders how in the old days those long sermons could have been listened to. In my young days I suffered much at the hands of dear good Dr. Buist, the professor of Church history in the University of St. Andrews, who also held the second charge of the parish. He used to give us expository lectures on the Acts of the Apostles of terrible tediousness and of an hour's duration. The soporific tendencies of these discourses were great. "Oh, for an hour of Dr. Buist!" exclaimed a poor Professor, suffering in his old age from insomnia.

Even Dr. Chalmers must sometimes mildly have tried the patience of his hearers; and one, at least, was not impressed with his preaching, for in "The Creevey Papers," edited by Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart., I find the following: "Raith, January 18th, 1825.—On Sunday I went to kirk to hear the great luminary of this country, Dr. Chalmers, Professor of Humanity at Glasgow, and an author upon many subjects. He dined here on Saturday, and was treated as a regular Jeroboam. His appearance on that day was that of a very quiet, good kind of man with very dirty hands and nails; but on Sunday I never beheld a fitter subject for Bedlam than he was. The stuff the fellow preached could only be surpassed by his manner of roaring it out. I expected he would carry the poor Kirkcaldy pulpit clean away. Then his Scotch, too! His sermon was to prove that the manner of doing a kindness was more valuable than the matter, in support of which I remember two notable illustrations. 'If,' said he, 'you suppose a family to be suddenly veesited with the calamity of poverty, the tear of a menial, the fallen countenance of a domestic, in such cases will afford greater relief then to the family than a speceefic sum of money without a corresponding sympathy.' A pretty good start, was it not, and for Scotland too, of all places in the world! But it was followed by a still greater flight. 'Why,' said he—or rather shouted he—'why is it that an epple presented by an infant to its parent produces greater pleasure than an epple found by the roadside? Why, because it is the moral influence of the gift, and not the speceefic quality of the epple that in this case constitutes the pleesure of the parent.' Now what think you of the tip-top showman of all Scotland?"

These long sermons of the old days must, indeed, have been a trial when the kirk was uncomfortable, dirty, and cold; and many of the churches of those days were all three. Sir Archibald Geikie tells us of a certain parish church in Carrick, which, like many ecclesiastical edifices of the time in Scotland, was not kept with scrupulous care. The windows seemed never to be cleaned, or indeed opened, for cobwebs hung across them, "and half-starved spiders prey'd on half-starved flies." There was an air of dusty neglect about the interior, and likewise a musty smell. One Sunday an elderly clergyman from another part of the country was preaching. In the midst of his sermon a spider, suspended from the roof at the end of its long thread, swung to and fro in front of his face. It came against his lips and was blown vigorously away. Again it swung back to his mouth, when with an indignant motion of his hands he broke the thread and exclaimed, "My friends, this is the dirtiest kirk I ever preached in. I'm like to be poisoned wi' speeders."

"In the same county, where it had been the custom from time immemorial to winnow the corn with the help of the wind, a farmer, alive to the value of modern improvements, procured and began to use a machine which created an artificial and always available current of air. He was at once rebuked for an impious defiance o' the ways of Providence.

"A proposal to put a stove into a Fifeshire parish met with the opposition of one of the heritors, who, when the minister came to him for a subscription towards the warming of the kirk, indignantly refused, asking, 'D'ye think John Knox asked for a stove, even for the cauldest kirk he ever preached in? Na, na, na. Warm the kirk wi' your preaching and they'll never think about the cauld.'"

Another clergyman was apt to forget things, and, on remembering them, to blurt them out at the most inappropriate times. On one occasion he had begun the benediction at the close of the service, when he suddenly stopped, exclaiming, "We've forgot the psalm," which he thereupon proceeded to read out. At another time, in the midst of one of his extempore prayers, he was asking for a blessing on the clergyman who was to address the people in the afternoon, when he interrupted himself to interject, "It's in the burgh kirk, ye ken."

Then follows another psalm or paraphrase; the "intimations," as the notices are called, are made, and the collection is made. Many are the stories I have "concerning the collection," but here I must confine myself to what Sir Archibald Geikie says about it. "A characteristic feature of many churches in Scotland is the 'collection'—that is, the gathering of the contributions of the congregation for the poor of the parish or other purpose. In the Highlands, where there are services both in Gaelic and English, the performance is repeated at the end of each. One or more of the elders, attired in Sunday garb, and looking as sad and solemn as if they were at a funeral, take the 'ladle,' or wooden box, at the end of a pole and push it into each pew. The alms, as they are dropped into the receptacle, make a noise so distinctly audible over the building that a practised ear can make a shrewd guess as to the value of the coin deposited. Nearly the whole contribution is in coppers, only the larger farmers and the lairds' families furnishing anything of higher value. Hence such congregations have been profanely valued at threepence a dozen. An amusing incident in one of these collections took place at a parish church in the west of Cowal. A family whom I used to visit there had come to their seat in the gallery, while the earlier service was still going on, and when the Gaelic ladle came round they put into it their contributions. After the beadle had traversed the church at the end of the second service and the collection was being brought back to the foot of the pulpit, the minister, who noticed that it had not been taken up to the laird's seat, beckoned vigorously to the man, who was approaching with the money, and pointed to the gallery. In response he received only a knowing shake of the head from the collector, who at last, impatient of the ministerial gesticulations, exclaimed aloud, 'Na, na, Sir; it's a' richt, I have takin' the laird's money at the Gaelic!'"

But the last copper has been lifted. The ladle has been up at the pulpit for the minister's collection, and now he rises to pronounce the benediction, and the service in the kirk is over for the day. The congregation "scales" and wind their various ways home, the two cronies Jeames Boyd and Tammas Mackenzie walking home together and talking about the sermon and their neighbours.

It is long since these two worthies went to their rest, their hard work over, their daily toil done. Jeames Boyd was the first to go. His illness was not a long one, but it was apparent to his old wife and to all the friends when he took to his bed in the day-time, which he had never been known to do during the course of his long life, that he was a "done" man and would never rise again. As his end drew near he expressed a wish to see his old friend Tammas Mackenzie. The wife sent for him, and he came after his day's work in the gloaming of a winter's evening. His friend Jeames Boyd's mind was wandering in the shadows. He barely knew his comrade, but at last a spasm of intelligence came into his face, he stretched out his hand, and he said in a whisper, "Gude nicht, Tammas; I'll meet you i' the kirk the morn." And so saying he passed over to the land of the leal and the true and the faithful.

And, no doubt, on one eternal morn the old friends would meet in the New Jerusalem, the Heavenly Temple, the house not made with hands, the Father's home of many mansions.

IN THE CAVE OF DIONYSIUS.

I.

WHEN Eugenie Verity made up her mind to winter in the Mediterranean she had no idea that such a determination would lead to a chain of circumstances that might almost be considered extraordinary. She had lately inherited a fortune from her grand-aunt that had enabled her to gratify the longing of a lifetime and to purchase a yacht of 300 tons, at the same time bringing to fulfilment a variety of half-acknowledged desires that had been growing up in her from the day that the world became the more thickly populated from her arrival in it two-and-twenty years previously.

Eugenie Verity was a handsome young woman with a will of her own, as her chaperon, Mrs. Duff, found to her cost, and which the skipper of the Water Lily had also found reason to regret several times since leaving the muddy reaches of the Thames below Tilbury.

The skipper of the Water Lily was a young man, which fact perhaps increased the stiffness of Miss Verity's manner towards him, and he had also been in love with her since the days when they paddled in the sea water at Scarborough—a lusty, healthy, sunburnt pair of cousins; and perhaps an intimate acquaintance, with the faults and ailments of childhood, does not tend to exhort to reverence in later life. But the fact that Tom Vernon and Eugenie Verity had each eaten tinfoil off the same gingerbread horses, when his father was head clerk in a bank where hers was subsisting on £100 a year as junior, made the difference in their positions now only the more painfully marked, for since those days Tom had been second mate in a steamer plying between Liverpool and Calcutta, while Eugenie had inherited her £5,000 a year.

The grandfathers of both these young people having been members of the clerical profession, where money is proverbially scarce, the fact will be easily grasped that their fathers had arrived at a position that seemed to promise even a further down gradient for the next generation, from which fate two of that generation had been timely delivered by the will of Miss Verity's great aunt. Eugenie had been rescued from a shop in the Edgware Road where she sold embroideries to querulous old ladies, and Tom from a steamer where he had consorted with men who were unaware of the value of an "h," and ignorant of the small refinements of gentility; and for the sake of "Auld Lang Syne," as Eugenie had somewhat loudly declared, she had offered her cousin his present billet on the Water Lily, and already the bitterness of regarding his former love in the light of an employer was ceasing to vex the soul of the young man.

Mrs. Duff made a charming chaperon, who knew when to efface herself; and as Miss Verity had a few agreeable visitors on board and a variety of strangers to visit her at whatever port they put in, Mrs. Duff found the life amusing and at the same time exciting, since Eugenie, from looks and fortune, was likely to make a good marriage.

The party on the Water Lily consisted of two young women and their brothers—Lord Annerdale and Lady Mary Leslie, Mr. Sykes and pretty Robina, who was Eugenie's greatest friend for the moment. The men were exceptionally good specimens of their class; the girls everything that well-bred, well-clad young women should be. Lord Annerdale was in the Guards, Mr. Sykes the owner of one of England's stately homes, and, having said this much, there remains little further to be recounted concerning their individuality, which was of the sleek, polished, well-groomed description.

Eugenie avoided her cousin from the moment that the Water Lily slipped her moorings at Tilbury and with the dawning of a new day slid like a bird into the grey of the Channel, shaking her white wings in the touch of the April sun.

Tom Vernon took his meals quietly enough in the saloon, a fact which Eugenie insisted upon on the moral ground of her kinship; but his attitude of tacit sullenness annoyed her to some extent, for she could not understand a perverse pride that refused to joke with Lord Annerdale or to bandy sallies with Mr. Sykes, the wit of the party. The very sight of her cousin in his usual place, plodding steadily through the menu, annoyed her, for in her heart of hearts she desired to see her cousin share intimately in the society of those with whom she associated as an equal; for the Tom Vernon of the Scarborough sands of her girlhood's days had been her hero, compared to whom this being in a blue pilot coat with unsmiling lips and eyes lack-lustre was a ghost of the past.

They were bound for Syracuse and the sunny shores of Sicily, but it suited Eugenie to get a glimpse of Algiers and Tunis before setting the course for that island, and it was at Algiers that the first trouble of the voyage began. It was mid-April, and the sun shone with southern warmth on Eugenie in her white drill gown as she emerged from her cabin in the early morning and came straight to where her cousin was standing, leaning on the taffrail. The quay was full of shipping of various nationalities. They had anchored under the town at daybreak, and already the deck was swarming with pedlars selling every variety of cheap Algerian jewellery, round whom the crew were collected, chaffing and bartering for brooches set with blue and red stones. The girl's hands were full of violets, purple and white, and the sun upon her head under her shady hat turned every coil to a mass of glittering gold. By falling over an Arab laden with cigars and common tobacco, and skilfully avoiding a Frenchman whose strings of scarlet coral were the object of the head steward's ambition, she guided a straight course to her cousin's side.

"I wish that you would send all these people away," she said. "The things are not even pretty that they are selling."

Tom raised himself, touched his cap, and commenced to harangue the little crowd in a happy mixture of French and Arabic, effecting a speedy clearance of the deck of the Water Lily.

When he returned to Miss Verity she was leaning over the rail, looking up at the steep slope of the white houses, the boulevards, the Arabic outlines of the native quarter, and the fresh dancing sunlight on white walls and minarets that makes Algiers one of the fair places of the earth in the spring time.

"I want you to come on shore with us," she said peremptorily, not looking at him.

"I should prefer to remain with the yacht," he answered stiffly. "I know Algiers, but Langton has never been on shore."

"Bother Langton!" said Miss Verity swiftly. "Once, Tom, you never hesitated over any expressed desire of mine."

His face worked a little. He could see the outline of her piquante face propped on one slender hand, the line of her yellow hair against her throat.

"Sometimes I think that you are apt to forget our relative positions."

"I wish that you could forget something sometimes," she murmured petulantly. "I wish you to come on shore, Captain Vernon. My wish should be law to you."

He bowed and moved away as Lord Annerdale put his head through the door of the companion way and hurried up to Eugenie, immaculately clad in his Poole suit, with a bunch of violets in his buttonhole. Eugenie greeted him with heightened colour and renewed vivacity, and by the time that Mr. Sykes put in an appearance with the rest of the party the whole programme of the day in Algiers was cut and dried, with the reluctant assistance of the skipper of the Water Lily, who had been appointed cicerone for the day.

Algiers is a place in which, if your physical condition inclines to weakness, you will inevitably be cheated; and that day Tom Vernon rescued the party from Arab and French men with complete success. He had come out to be their cicerone, and with his usual obstinacy he was willing to play that rôle and no other.

They bought fruit—luscious melons, oranges, and pears—on the steps of the Via Mustapha; filled their hands with roses; and emptied their purses for the sake of the beaten iron and copper work, the gold embroideries, and the satin hangings that are famous throughout the world as the produce of the African town. They partook of coffee in the open street, watching the veiled Arab women flit past, and the laughing, blue-uniformed cuirassiers clatter by on their sturdy barbs; and at last they halted to rest in the mosque in the great square that was even then calling to prayer from its dome and minarets. When it became evident that to traverse the cool corridors and inner chapels of the mosque they must don the shoes of the Faithful and dispense with their own, Sykes and Lord Annerdale turned restive and declined to follow what they were pleased to term "a confounded heathen notion, and a dirty one into the bargain."

Vernon was on in front, bargaining with the pious Mohammedan in charge; and Eugenie, light as a butterfly in her borrowed slippers, was already studying the inscriptions on the twisted columns, the Book of the Koran chained to its stand, the light from the coloured windows in the court of the fountain, where the orange trees were filling the air with fragrance, the floor of mosaic which infidel feet had never defiled; and, therefore, the first intimation that was received of any jarring note in the even tenor of their way was the loudly uplifted sound of an English oath and the shrill splutter of an Arab in wrath.

Tom Vernon, turning sharply round, saw that the two Englishmen had pushed past he guides, and that their feet were already upon the sacred floor. There was a little crowd of angry faces in the doorway, a menace of voices, a hurrying-up of officials from by-ways and arches; and, knowing the fanatical side of the Mohammedan but too well, he hurried up in an instant; while Eugenie, with face pale with terror, caught Mrs. Duff's arm; for the sacristan of the mosque seized Annerdale by the coat, and the Englishman, resenting with all a Briton's pride the touch of a native, turned to strike him to the ground.

"For Heaven's sake," cried Vernon, "what are you doing, man? Do you know where you are?"

He made a dash at Annerdale and pushed him before him backwards against the archway, lifting his arm so that he caught upon his own sleeve two downward cuts of the poniard that had flashed in an instant from the burnouse of the enraged Arab. There was a rip as the blade cut cloth and skin, and upon the marble of the floor a dull red stain, red as the coral of that morning's display, dripped in a slender stream.

Annerdale, very angry at the whole affair, stood expressing his feelings in the way peculiar to Englishmen who feel that their pride of race has been slighted; while Vernon, angrily staunching the cut with his handkerchief, was endeavouring to appease the officials of the mosque, first by the power and breadth of his Arabic, and finally by the all-prevailing might of backsheesh, which in the end proving effective, the whole party were allowed to depart quietly in spite of the murmurs of the crowd.

As they passed through the door Eugenie, under cover of the shade thrown by the pillars upon the courtyard, came close to her cousin.

"You are hurt," she said faintly.

Vernon had succeeded in rolling the handkerchief round the cut on his arm, and turned swiftly, with the instinctive desire to hide the injury from her.

"Oh, I am so sorry, Tom. You were so clever, and he so stupid."

Tom looked down at her for an instant. "Don't trouble about me, Eugenie," he said gruffly. "Go on with the others. I hate a fuss."

His tone was so harsh and so unsympathetic that Eugenie, holding back her tears, rejoined Lord Annerdale and walked back to the yacht with him, and it seemed to her afterwards, in reviewing the events of that day, that she had agreed to all he had said and assented with great apparent eagerness to his assertion that Englishmen have a right to do as they like in any beastly country, and that if only the skipper would have left him alone he would have mopped the floor with the whole lot of dirty Arabs and have challenged the native quarter of Algiers to single combat.

II.

SYRACUSE may sound an agreeable place to visit in the mind of those tourists who are in love with the historical side of Sicily; but in itself it is a place devoid of beauty or charm, as it stretches in a long, flat line from quay to quay, level with the sea.

Lunch at the hotel, where there was a difficulty in procuring ice, damped even Eugenie's enthusiasm, and when they started in a ramshackle wagonette to see the sights, with a guide on the box who was chiefly remarkable for the atrocity of his French and his Italian and the dirt that pervaded every inch of his person, she relapsed into a gloomy silence that was a contrast to the high spirits of her companions.

Tom Vernon had not accompanied the party that day, for he had expressed no eagerness to do so, and Eugenie had hardly spoken to him since they left Algiers, preserving where he was concerned a haughty silence that she hoped expressed her disapproval.

They viewed the Greek Theatre, with its flight of magpies, the Roman villa, and the temples, and came to a halt at last at the cave of Dionysius, outside which the rope-walk was in full work, with its two leisurely Sicilians passing the twine through their brown fingers as the wheel turned in the sun. Eugenie pleaded fatigue, and when the guide carried off the remainder of the party to visit the Roman Amphitheatre and the cemetery, where the wheel-cuts of the chariots still marked the rough track, she said with a peremptory gesture that she would remain behind and rest in the cool of the cave, and though Mr . Duff offered to stay with her charge, she was so plainly anxious to be alone that to press the suggestion would have been an impertinence.

"'You are hurt?' she said faintly"—p. 1099.

As the sound of their voices died away up the road, Eugenie heaved a little sigh of relief. She was tired of the Water Lily and her new friends ; weary of Mrs. Duff, who had found these friends for her ; and, above all, tired of intimacy that began and ended with the almighty dollar ; for to possess five thousand a year is all very well, but to be loved for that fact alone makes the heart of the thinker bitter ; and to-day i seemed to Eugenie that in all her world there was but one man w o had loved her for herself, and that time and circumstances had now estranged even that friend from her side.

She wandered disconsolately up the path and into the dark recesses of the cave that were damp and phosphorescent. Over her head a shaft of light shot from the trap where once the tyrant listened to the moanings of the prisoners in the dungeon below. The sheer wall of solid rock shot upwards till it lost itself in the unseen roof, slimy with the damp of centuries. There was no sound but the flutter of bat wings in the heavy air, the drip of the dank water upon the shoots of maidenhair where the cave was lighter.

A man with a violin, standing in the doorway, began to play ; and the weird cadence of the notes swelled and echoed through the vault, till Miss Verity could have sworn that there was a choir of unseen angels' hands at play in a heavenly orchestra above her head.

She was sitting on a square stone, her feet in a puddle, her gown daubed with the damp of the wall against which she leaned, luxuriously miserable ; and when the tears began to drip slowly down her cheeks she felt that the mise en scène was perfect. She was so absorbed in her own sorrow that the echo of a step on the path outside annoyed her, and she felt still more irritated when the figure of a man loomed up towards her, groping his way in the dusk ; for it was Lord Annerdale, and she guessed his mission before he spoke.

"What, you here in this hole, Miss Verity ?" he said, coming up close beside her. "If I were the Government, I'd knock a hole in the wall and let in the light, or have lamps about and the place cleaned out, but I'm awfully glad to find you alone. The others are all fussing over a bone or a pot or a primæval lizard they have found in one of the graves : so I lef them to fuss, for I never get a chance of saying a word to you alone. This is an awful place to say anything tender in ; but, Eugenie, you must have seen all along that I loved you. I wish I could see you now. it's awful hard lines saying things o the back of your head like this."

Eugenie made an impatient movement.

"It is very good of you to say this, Lord Annerdale," she said slowly, and her voice sounded sonorous as the echo took it up and shouted it through the cave ; "but I don't think you will want to repeat it when I tell you that I am no longer a rich woman. My—my money does not belong to me a all, and when the Water Lily is tied up at Gravesend I shall go back to lodgings and yards of embroidery again. You see, my great aunt made a mistake. She meant to leave the money, I am sure, to someone else, and I made it over to him yesterday."

"By Jove !" said Annerdale helplessly. "What an extraordinary thing."

"What is an extraordinary thing—that I have lost my money, or that you have proposed to a penniless girl ?" said Eugenie sharply. "Both facts are the result of mistakes."

Annerdale collected himself with an effort. He was a gentleman, and he had never behaved in any manner that was unbecoming his species.

"Of course, my proposal was not a mistake," he said gravely. "If you will do me the honour to become my wife, Miss Verity, I will do my best to make you happy. I am not rich, but at least there will be enough to keep us in comfort, if not in luxury."

Eugenie choked down an hysterical sob and rose to her feet.

"Thank you very much. No," she said. "I am tired of a position to which I was not born. I like you very much, but not enough to marry you ; and I am quite sure that when I see the lodgings in Edgware Road again they will look like home, and I shall hug my cards of embroidery and worship my linen buttons."

"Indeed !" said Annerdale, a little confused. "I—I am afraid that I do not quite follow your meaning. What—er—is Edgware Road—embroidery ?"

"Just this," said the girl shrilly. "I earned my living by being a saleswoman in a fancy shop in that part of London, and, since I have given up my fortune, I am going back again to that life, never to leave it again. Now, please go back to the others and leave me alone. We need never refer to this conversation again, and when we return to England you can drop my acquaintance if you wish to do so."

"I—I should never wish to do that, Miss Verity," said Annerdale solemnly; and after a moment's hesitation he departed, with a bewildering sense upon him that he had had a narrow escape of being united to a mad woman, and resolving to ask Mrs. Duff before nightfall whether there was lunacy in Eugenie's family, and, if so, to take his sister back overland.

Eugenie, left alone, gave way to her sobs, till the whole cave seemed to be ringing with mocking echoes of jeering, despairing voices, abandoning herself so completely to her grief that she started in terror at the touch of a hand on her shoulder.

"Eugenie," said a voice in her ear, "for Heaven's sake stop crying. Are you mad?"

It was Tom Vernon. She knew the sound of his voice, the firm grip of the hand that slid downwards from shoulder to wrist and held her there as in a vice.

"Eugenie, be quiet." She stilled her sobs to listen. "I think that you did not remember the echo in the cave. I was in the far corner all the time, and I heard every syllable that you and your friend spoke. I was afraid of moving for fear you should see me."

"Well," said the girl, in a stifled voice.

"I came after you to-day because I was afraid that you would be getting into some trouble again, as you did at Algiers. I am glad that I came now. Was it true that you said that you had lost your fortune? Are you poor again now, Eugenie, as you were in the old days? You have to deal with a man now, not a dressed-up Jackanapes, and I will have the truth from you."

"It was true," said Eugenie faintly.

"To whom have you made over your money, and when was the other will found?"

"There is no other will. I merely did what I thought fair—what Aunt Cave ought to have done at first."

"And the name of that person who now has that fortune," said Vernon, his fingers tightening on her wrist till she could have cried out with pain. "Oh, blessed person, to leave you poor and penniless, Eugenie; to leave you just your beautiful, womanly self, that a poor man might take in his arms and love and hold for the rest of his life! Tell me that person's name, that I may bless him or her in my prayers every day."

"I cannot tell you."

The words fell from Eugenie's lips with a touch of chill repression, for she was suddenly afraid of what Tom would say when he knew the truth.

"What do you mean, Eugenie?" he said sternly, falling back a pace or two from her. "Is it anyone whom you fancy I should dislike? Why, my dear, my dear, thank God that man exists." He forgot his momentary alarm, and at the faint sound of a sob, so faint that it was more like a sigh, he caught her hands in his.

"My darling, I love you so. Can you be happy without all the luxuries that your money gave you? I cannot see you in this darkness, Eugenie, but if the shadow that has grown up between us has melted away, tell me that you love me and we will be married to-morrow."

"I have got something to confess to you; don't come near me till you know everything," cried the girl suddenly. "Oh, Tom, Aunt Cave ought to have left that money to you. It has made me so miserable, and last night I just thought of a way out of it, and so I made out the document and posted it to-day in Syracuse, and the money will be yours as soon as the lawyers can seal and deliver it."

"What do you mean?" Vernon's voice was harsh with surprise, and his first instinct was one of annoyance.

"Forgive me. Oh, Tom, forgive me. I did not know that you would be angry. I meant to do right. You would not understand——"

There was something in the pathos of her voice that woke the hunger of Tom Vernon's soul, and the distance between them lessened suddenly. He could see her dim white shape outlined against the rock, framed in the fringe of maidenhair fern that hung from every ledge.

"You have not answered my question yet, Eugenie," he said. "Is it impossible for me to win your love?"

"Oh, it is yours already!" she cried, and would have added more but that he caught her in his arms.

But the troth of Tom and Eugenie may, perchance, have hallowed the memories of pain and stilled the ghost of dead years, for they were happy, and in this life happiness is the spell that lays every wandering spirit born of suffering and misunderstanding.

SEPTEMBER 18TH.—Israel Reproved.

Passage for reading—Amos v. 4—15.

POINTS. 1. God to be sought with all the heart.
2. He warns the unrighteous.
3. He forgives the penitent.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Time to Seek the Lord. An old writer says, "God invites many with His golden sceptre whom He never bruises with His rod of iron." If the invitations of His grace were more freely accepted, we should often escape the chastisement of His hand. Oh! that men did but realise that a time of health and happiness and prosperity is the best possible time for seeking the Lord. Indeed, any hour is a good time in which to seek the Lord so long as it is present with us. He who would be wise would find no better day in the calendar for casting off sin and folly than that which is now with him. But let no man trifle with time, for in an instant the die may be cast and his eternity begun. And then it is written concerning the ungodly, "I will laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh."

God's Warnings and God Himself. A very skilful archer went to the mountains in search of game. All the beasts of the forest fled at his approach. The lion alone challenged to combat. The archer immediately let fly an arrow, and said to the lion, "I send thee my messenger, that from him thou mayest learn what I myself shall be when I assail thee." The lion, badly wounded, rushed away in great fear, and when a fox exhorted him to be of good courage and not to run away at the first attack, said, "You counsel me in vain, for if he sends so fearful a messenger, how shall I endure the attack of the man himself?" Even so, if the warnings of God's ministers fill the conscience with terror, what must it be to face the Lord Himself? If one bolt of judgment fill a man with fear, what will it be to stand before an angry God in the last great day?

God Slow to Anger. It is told of the Roman magistrates in old times that when they gave sentence for anyone to be scourged, a bundle of rods, tied hard with many knots, was laid before them. The reason was this: that while the appointed officer was untying the knots, which he had to do in a certain order, and not in any other hasty or sudden way, the magistrate might see the behaviour of the prisoner, whether he seemed sorry for his fault and showed any hope of amendment, that then he might recall the sentence or mitigate the punishment; otherwise he was to be punished more severely. So it is with God in the punishment of sinners. How patient He is, how loth to strike, how slow to anger if there be but any signs of repentance! He does not try us by swift martial law, where the punishment follows immediately upon the sin, but He pleads with us, "Why will ye die, O house of Israel?" And this He does to see whether the sinner will throw himself down at His feet, whether he will come and make his peace and be saved.

SEPTEMBER 25TH.—God's Goodness and Mercy.

Passage for reading—Psalm ciii. 1—13

POINTS. 1. God's fatherly goodness to be praised.
2. His temporal mercies are great.
3. His spiritual mercies are infinite.

ILLUSTRATIONS. God the Father of All. The sun does not shine for a few trees and flowers, but for the joy of the wide world. The lonely pine on the mountain-top waves its sombre boughs and cries, "Thou art my sun!" And the little meadow violet lifts its cup of blue, and whispers with its perfumed breath, "Thou art my sun!" And the grain in a thousand fields rustles in the wind and makes answer, "Thou art my sun!" So God sits, effulgent in heaven, not for a favoured few, but for the universe of life, and there is no creature so poor and so low that he may not look up with childlike confidence and say, "My Father, Thou art mine!" (Henry Ward Beecher.)

Providence and Natural Laws. A vessel, a few years ago, was six months on its way from Liverpool to the Bermudas. Fogs enveloped it, winds sent it hither and thither, captain and mate lost their reckoning, the vessel sprang a leak and was given up in despair. Both crew and passengers were reduced to a few drops of water and one potato a day. Only one man on board, a missionary, held on to the hope of escape. Suddenly the leakage ceased. The next day they sighted land and were saved. When the ship's bottom was examined, it was discovered that the leaky end of the vessel was entirely covered with barnacles. God had seemingly wrought a miracle for their salvation, and yet their safety was brought about by natural means.

Mercy and Not Judgment. She had been dreaming. In the little chapel at Nestley Park she sat listening to the curate's denouncement of hypocrisy, when suddenly the scene changed. The pulpit had grown to a mighty cloud, upon which stood an archangel with a trumpet in his hand. He cried that the hour of the great doom had come for all who bore within them the knowledge of any evil thing neither bemoaned before God nor confessed to man. Then he lifted the great silver trumpet with a gleam to his lips; and every fibre of her flesh quivered in expectation of the tearing blast that was to follow; when, instead, soft as a breath of spring from a bank of primroses, came the words, uttered in the gentlest of sorrowful voices, "I will arise, and go to my Father." (George Macdonald's "Paul Faber.")

OCTOBER 2ND.—Elisha Succeeds Elijah.

Passage for reading—2 Kings ii. 12—22.

POINTS. 1. Elisha divides the waters in God's name.
2. He rebukes his followers' unbelief.
3. He heals the poisoned waters.

ILLUSTRATIONS. The Simplicity of Faith. Dr. Anderson was journeying in Scotland to help in a religious revival which was then going on. He met with a boy who told him of the death of his little brother. The lad seemed sure that his brother had gone to heaven. Dr. Anderson asked him the ground of his confidence. He replied, "Because he had faith." "But," said the doctor, "how do you know?" "Well, sir, when he was dying he seemed afraid. I told him to trust in Jesus. He asked me what that meant—what he was to do. I said, 'Pray to Him.' He replied, 'I am too weak, I am not able to pray.' Then I said, 'Just hold up your hand. Jesus will see you and will know what it means.' And he did it. Now, was not that faith?" Dr. Anderson was a great theologian, yet he often pointed to that dying boy with the uplifted hand as a beautiful illustration of the simplicity of faith. Was not Elisha's faith much the same when he smote the Jordan with Elijah's mantle, saying, "Where is the Lord God of Elijah?"

The Folly of Unbelief. Once a sceptic in Dr. Bonar's church said to him, "Sir, I do not believe that there is a God." It was 10 p.m., and there was no time for argument. I cast the burden on the Lord in prayer, and looked so happy that he said, "Are you laughing at me?" "No! but I was thinking that if all the grasshoppers on earth were to say there is no sun, it would not alter the matter. The Bible says, 'The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.'" I then showed that God calls every man who does not believe in Him a liar. The man went home seeming much impressed, and when I met him a few months later he said, "I found out that I was a fool, and I have learned to believe in God and to fear Him." Thus the sword of the Spirit pierced his heart.

A Practical Prayer. A deacon living in a town in Berkshire was asked to give his prayers on behalf of a poor man with a large family who had broken his leg. "I can't stop now to pray," said the deacon, who was picking and packing early apples for the next day's market, "but you can go down into the cellar and get some corned beef, bread, and potatoes and butter. That is the best I can do for the family just now."

OCTOBER 9TH.—The Widow's Oil Increased.

Passage for reading—2 Kings iv. 1—7.

POINTS. 1. The widow's distress.
2. Elisha's sympathy.
3. Blessings follow faith.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Living on in Affliction. A military officer a few years ago attempted to shoot himself in Hyde Park. The pistol missing fire, he drew his sword, but his hand was immediately arrested by a poor man near the spot, whom he had not observed. Resenting this interference, he attempted to stab his deliverer. "Stab me, sir," said the poor man, "if you think proper to escape. I fear death as little as you do, but I have more courage. More than twenty years I have lived in poverty and affliction, and yet I trust in God for comfort and support." The officer was struck dumb with this spirited lesson, burst into tears, gave the poor man a purse of money, and lived to be his greatest benefactor.

Story of St. Martin. A beautiful story is told of St. Martin, who, before he was baptised into the faith of Christ, and while he was still a soldier, showed a rare instance of love and charity. In the depth of winter a beggar, miserably clad, asked an alms of him for the love of God. Silver and gold had he none. His soldier's cloak was all he had to give. He drew his sword, cut the cloak in half, gave one portion to the poor man, and was content himself with the other. And we may truly say of him in our dear Lord's own words, "Verily I say unto you, he shall have his reward." That night in a vision he beheld our Lord on His throne, and all the host of heaven standing by Him; and as he looked steadfastly on the Son of God he saw Him to be arrayed in his own half cloak, and he heard Him say, "This hath Martin given to Me." So the smallest act of love and kindness done to Christ's poor for His sake shall not go unrewarded.

Adversity a Blessing. The springs at the base of the Alpine mountains are fullest and freshest when the summer sun has dried and parched the verdure in the valleys below. The heat that has burned the arid plains has melted the mountain snow and glaciers and increased the volume of the mountain streams. In like manner, when adversity has dried the springs of earthly comfort and hope, God's great springs of love and joy, administered through His servants, flow freshest and fullest to gladden the heart of the sad.

BETTY'S GRAND MAN.

A Story for Old and Young by Mabel Milne.

BETTY walked down the flower-lined path with two little creases on her forehead and a puzzled expression in her blue eyes. She couldn't make things out at all lately; they were very "upset," she said. Daddy didn't hurry away in the mornings as he had always used to do, and he never gave her rides on his back, or played bear or anything nice, but looked so strange that Betty could not make it out, and felt very sad. Nurse told her she must be very good and not give any trouble, for perhaps her daddy was very worried about things she could not understand, being such a little girl. That subdued Betty. She wished she were ever so big, and a deep pity throbbed in her tender heart. If only he would just grow back into her old daddy, she thought wistfully, and romp with and tease her as he had always done. And Mummy was sad too—very sad, for that very morning Betty had seen her crying—"a bad, dreffful cry," she expressed it, with Daddy's arms round her; and this was such an unheard of and terrible thing that Betty crept away dismayed.

She clasped a doll in her arms, faded and the most unlovely of all her sawdust, waxen, and compo family, but for some reason most prized by Betty—perhaps because she had suffered, and pity is akin to love.

"She has had the measles and the chicken pox," Betty confided to the rector one day when he was admiring the doll.

"Dear, oh dear me! That is very sad," he said gravely. "I hope she won't catch anything else."

"I don't!" said Betty. "I want her to have bronchitis, 'cause I should just know how to poultice her chest, like Mummy did mine. Daddy says I ought to leave her in the garden all night, but that would be so cruel, and the gipsies might get her, you know."

Betty began to unburden herself to the doll.

"I never saw Mummy cry before—never. I don't fink Daddy was cross—he never is cross with Mummy or me— and he was holding her tight, not as if he was cross. And he kissed her, I'm sure—I heard—it was such a big kiss, and I don't fink he would do that if he was angry, do you, dear? Once when I was cross with you 'cause you wouldn't take the medicine when you had the measles, I didn't kiss you—not till afterwards, when you was sorry."

She had reached the white painted gate that led from the garden, and was walking slowly now down the leafy lane. Betty's happy life was not spoilt with endless restrictions. Now that her charge was growing more independent of her services, nurse assisted her mistress and Mary, the housemaid, in domestic duties.

The cobwebs did not seem to clear from Betty's mind as she walked along, wondering dimly how long this singular state of affairs was going to last. She thought the world—just the little world Betty knew of "Mummy, Daddy, Nurse, and Maria Solphrina," and a few minorities—must be very upside down indeed for such "hollid fings" to happen. She never lingered this morning to gather the wild flowers that peeped amid the green on the hedge banks, and seemed almost too shy to thrust their tiny faces out to meet the sun's warm kiss. No, Betty was very preoccupied. Her usually bright face was overcast with a shadow of reflection, and there was a pathetic droop at the corners of her sweet little mouth. The sun touched the soft, tumbled hair that escaped from the pink folds of her sun-bonnet, and shone on the pale, waxen visage of Maria Solphrina.

"If there are seclets I fink nurse should have told us, don't you, dear?" she observed presently in a wistful way. Then Betty looked up suddenly, and the thread of her thoughts was broken.

"Ho, young lady, you're young to be wandering off by yourself. Playing truant, eh?"

The speaker was a tall gentleman, about sixty, probably more. He had white hair and a white, fierce-looking moustache. His eyes were very sharp and keen, and his stern expression was, perhaps, the least bit forbidding. But Betty, with the wonderful eyes of childhood, which seem to see such a long, long way where we cannot, probably penetrated something underneath the sternness. Anyhow, Betty had never been frightened of anybody in her life yet.

"Who are you?" she demanded.

"Ho, ho, who am I, eh? Much good it would do you to know," he said, looking down at her upturned face with a gleam of amusement in his eye.

"I'm Betty," she said, "and this"—touching the doll—"is Maria Solphrina."

"Maria Solphrina, eh? Umph!"

"What makes you grunt so, man?" inquired Betty sweetly.

"Grunt, did you say? Bless me, isn't that name enough to make anybody grunt? Maria Solphrina! And you're Betty. How old are you, little maid?"

"Six. It was a nice birfday, and Daddy brought home a beautiful cake. How old are you, man?"

"Humph, quaint little stick this! Sixty, and a little over."

"Oh," reflectively, "is sixty much older than six?"

"Ten times older."

"How very old you must be, man! Daddy said he was five times older than me. I s'pose you don't know my daddy?"

"No; you see I only came to live about here a few days ago." Then a far-away expression seemed to soften his keen eyes; he thought, perhaps, of somebody who would be thirty now.'

"Man," inquired Betty suddenly. "Can you splain things?"

"What things, little maid?"

"Hollid upset fings, like Daddy not playing bears with mummy and me, and nurse always whispering to Mary, 'cept when I go very close. And just now, man, what do you fink? Mummy was crying—more drefful than I did when my tooth ached so."

Betty paused, her face wearing an expression of tragic woe; then she went on drearily.

"I fought p'laps Daddy had been cross, but he's never been cross before."

"H'm, quarrelling," said the stranger, speaking in a sceptical undertone, but loud enough for Betty's sharp ears.

"I'm twite sure, man, they was not," she contradicted sturdily, "'cause Daddy was—cuddling mummy."

The stranger's lips twitched. "Lor, oh lor!" thought he, "what terrible domestic revelations will come out next?"

"And—he kissed her," ended Betty, with a little air of triumph, feeling she had successfully contested the point.

"He did, eh—humph!" Then to himself. "Pair of young fools!" But this time there was only a mild irony in the expression, for into the heart he had so long kept frosty and hard, Betty had crept like a gleam of sunshine, and her flute-like voice seemed to be sending its sweet refrain over the arid wastes of his life,

"Man, did you ever quarrel?"

He started and stood rapt. His hand shook slightly as he passed it over his forehead.

"Yes, once, little maid."

"But I s'pose you made it up, man?"

"No—never."

There was a huskiness in the abrupt words. Betty's soft hand stole into the stranger's in mute sympathy; he clasped it and began to walk on, leading her.

"Does mother trust you out as far as this, eh?" he asked presently.

"Of course she does," said Betty. "We always go for walks—Maria Solphrina and me."

"And never get lost, eh?"

"Course not," replied Betty again, and this time she was just a little offended.

"I wonder," said he, "if you could find your way to come and see me sometimes, little woman. Do you see that gate and the big red house behind it. Well, that is where I live."

"That was the empty house," said Betty, who had passed it many times, and very little escaped her sharp eyes.

"It was empty, but I am going to live there now. So you will come and see me sometimes, eh? You mustn't be frightened of the dog. He's a big black fellow, but he likes little maids, and I daresay he'll let you stroke him. Not frightened of dogs, eh?"

"I'm not—but I think Maria Solphrina is."

"Well, leave Maria Solphrina at home."

"I couldn't," returned Betty, with a grave shake of her head. "She would be so dreffful lonely. But I'll splain to her that the doggy won't hurt her."

So it was settled that Betty should call at the Red House the next time she was out, and after parting from her new friend she trotted home with Maria Solphrina, her troubles for the moment forgotten in the anticipation of new delights. Colonel Hamilton had certainly earned the reputation of being a cantankerous, irascible old gentleman, but Betty had not found him at all terrible. And certain it was, as he stood watching her little figure disappearing down the long dusty lane, that the ice of his heart was broken and his eyes were misty with strange emotions.

"Six, eh? And blue eyes. His were a bonny blue, too. Married at twenty-three—the young idiot. Yes—he'd be thirty now—and he might have a little Betty. But not a penny—the tomfoolery of it—and the girl not a penny either! I never saw her—never would see her. Marrying a governess, and there was the other with her thousands waiting for him like a ripe plum. She's married a peer now—can't say I envy the gentleman, for I'll swear she's developed into a nagger and has the temper of a vixen. Perhaps I ought not to be ungrateful the boy escaped that. I wonder now what he's doing, the young fool. Love was going to feed them, of course. H'm, always does! Said he would rather give up anything in the world but her—humph! Wouldn't demean himself by marrying a woman for her money, and he'd make his own choice without my helping him. Humph, he did! Love? I wonder if Betty believes in it. Bless her, she wasn't a bit afraid of a cross-grained old chap. Thinks the world of Maria Solphrina. Must buy her one to put that in the shade."

But he had yet to learn that the most beautiful and enticing of dolls would not have weaned Betty from the faded and long-suffering Maria Solphrina.

Betty was to experience another surprise when she reached home. She found a man—a man whose face she instinctively distrusted and looked on with suspicion—sitting in the little rustic porch, the odour of a foul pipe he was smoking poisoning the fragrant breath of the honeysuckle and jasmine that climbed over the lattice work. She entered on the war-path at once; for Betty could be a very determined little person when she liked.

"This is my porch," she began, "and will you please go away?"

"Your porch, eh? But things is changed now," he replied, with a leer that roused Betty's ire.

"I'll go and tell my daddy, and he'll make you go," she said, with a smart stamp of her foot.

"But your daddy knows I'm here—and what's more, my little bird, he knows I'm going to stop here."

Betty was too enraged to continue the argument. She brushed past the man into the house, upstairs into the room used as her nursery. Nobody was there, so she deposited Maria Solphrina on the couch, and went downstairs again. She met her father coming out of the little sitting-room that overlooked the garden in the rear. She ran to him eagerly:

"Daddy, there is a hollid man sitting in the porch. Will you tell him to go away at once?"

"I can't, my pet," he said, and his voice seemed choked. He lifted her in his arms with a sort of fierce despair. His face was so strange and haggard that it frightened Betty. He pressed his lips against her bright hair and put her down by the door of the sitting-room, which was just ajar.

"Don't mind about the man, darling. Go and stop with mummy," he said, and then he went out quickly.

Betty pushed the door slightly more ajar and looked in. Her mother and old Nanny Webster, her nurse, were inside; but they did not appear to notice Betty, for they were talking. Betty's mother stood by the open French window, the sunlight touching with gold the soft brown coils of her hair. She was tall and slight—a girlish figure yet, in spite of her eight and twenty years. Her face had a pure simple beauty of its own, and her deep grey eyes were fixed in sorrowful contemplation.

"There, there, my dearie," Betty heard her nurse say. "Don't you get worriting and fretting yourself. It will come right soon, though it looks so dark now," and Nanny sighed a little.

"But, Nanny, it seems so dreadful; and there's Betty too—to think of little Betty being shut up in a close room in London. It is not for myself that I mind; but to know how he is brooding over it is worse than anything. And then to hear him blaming himself for bringing this sorrow on me, as if any blame were his. You see, Nanny, he never knew that things were so bad with the firm till just before the crash came. He had hopes of being taken into partnership one day, and I know how his heart was set on that, so that we could put by money for Betty when she grew up. His salary was not large enough to enable us to save much, and what there was has gone for the common necessaries of life. Of course, he hoped to find other employment before this. Neither he nor I knew how hard that is—when one has no money or influence. What have we done to deserve this thing? Was it that we were too happy here, and we are not meant to have too much happiness in this world?" and there was a little ring of bitterness in her voice.

"'Who are you?' she demanded"—p. 1106.

"My dearie, troubles often come and we cannot see the why and the wherefore. It is a test of our faith not to question. Only if they come upon us through no fault of our own we have nothing to fear, and we may depend that the silver lining to the cloud will be very bright some day."

"It seems difficult to believe that—when things are so hopeless now. I could bear it better if he would not keep blaming himself. I had a good cry this morning, Nanny ; I could not help it. He said a dreadful thing—that I must wish I had never met him now he had brought all this trouble on me. That was just more than I could stand, his doubting my love like that—after all these years too. Of course, he was repentant at once, and promised he would never say anything of the sort again."

A smile lit up Nanny's wrinkled face ; for the love of these two seemed to waft her a breath of that heaven which her old eyes, becoming dimmer to the things of earth, saw growing nearer in the distance.

"He's got a heart of gold, has Mr. Geoff," she said, taking off her spectacles, because of the mist that had gathered on them.

"He has, Nanny." There was the radiance of love on the young wife's face. "It is cruel, unjust, that he should suffer as he is—and he has worked so hard for Betty and me."

"Well, it has been a labour of love, dearie," said Nanny with a nod, and then they both grew silent, feeling, perhaps, too deeply for many words ; for to both "he" was the sunshine of their little world—the loyal-hearted girl, for whom he had so willingly given up all, and the old woman who once had nursed him as a baby, and was Betty's nurse too.

Betty, meanwhile, had stood on the threshold, her small ears pricked, all sorts of dim and confused ideas bewildering her. But she comprehended enough from the conversation to gather that something was wrong, and that that something somehow or other chiefly concerned her Daddy. She stood in perplexity, her face grave ; then, unobserved, she slipped away from the door and sat down on the bottom step of the stairs, her head resting against the bannisters. In this position she could see the left shoulder of the strange man in the porch, and the sight brought little frowning furrows on Betty's forehead. It was a thing that puzzled her altogether, why her father, so tall and broad-shouldered and strong, could not turn away that nasty wizened little man she felt such a repulsion of. It was just at this moment that a thought struck her. Surely she knew somebody who could make him go : her acquaintance of that morning. The sight of that tall, fierce-looking stranger, stalking with giant strides down the garden path, his stick in his hand and a big dog behind him, would surely terrify the intruder effectually. Betty was not long in making up her mind. She darted across the little hall, where the tall clock ticked steadily, out of the porch, startling the unwelcome visitor by the sudden way she whisked past him. Then she turned and faced her enemy, a defiant challenge in her eyes.

"You nasty, hollid man, I'm going to fetch somebody who will make you go away. He'll bring his big stick and a big dog too."

The man winked at her solemnly. It amused him to see the small fury, and to egg her on he said :

"But suppose I've got a stick too—and a dog, maybe, not far off ?"

But Betty was not to be gulled, nor was she to be drawn into an argument. She trotted out of the gate into the road and down the dusty winding lane as fast as her chubby legs could carry her ; and it was a very tired and dusty Betty that arrived at the Red House. The Colonel caught sight of her from the window of the dining room where he was having lunch. He went out to meet her, his sharp eyes softened.

"Why, little maid, you have come to visit me again very soon, eh ?" Then he saw the flushed little face, the hair clinging to the white forehead ; and he lifted the small figure in his arms and carried her in the dining-room.

"There's a nasty man in the porch," began Betty, "and he won't go away. Daddy seems very sad. Will you come, man, and bring your big dog and your stick ?"

"A nasty man, eh ? What's he doing ?"

"Sitting down ; but he won't go away, and Daddy said he couldn't make him go. I fought if you came, he would be frightened of you."

"You did, eh ?" and the Colonel gave a little chuckle at Betty's naiveté.

"I've had no dinner, man," she remarked next, her eyes falling on the dainties on the table, and awaking suddenly to the fact that she was very hungry. The Colonel, with the aid of a couple of footstools on a chair, managed to construct her a seat sufficiently high. She was too busy to talk much while she demolished the delicacies he put on her plate, but he found sufficient pleasure in watching her. The brusque, fierce old soldier, whom people stood in awe of, was strangely gentle with this sweet, blue-eyed little maiden.

But when Betty had appeased her hunger she was all eager for the Colonel to start. He felt somewhat in a predicament. How did he know who the unknown man in the porch was, or what his business might be, and how on earth was he to interfere ? But so pathetically did Betty plead that he determined at least to go home with her; so the Colonel took his stick, called to Bear, the big sheep dog lazily sunning himself in front of the door, and off the trio started.

Betty was in a little flutter of excitement as she trotted down the lane, grasping the Colonel's hand, the dog following. She felt that when she appeared with two such champions, that ill-favoured man in the porch would certainly take to flight.

Betty brought the Colonel to a pause at the little white-painted gate of her home, and coaxed him up the path bordered with mignonette and blue lobelia and sweet williams. Her bugbear was still in his old position as if he had made up his mind to a permanent stay. Betty tweaked the Colonel's sleeve.

"There he is," she said, and gazed defiantly at the object of her scorn.

But for the first time Betty's sweet voice was lost to the Colonel. His eyes were fixed before him, not on the man in the porch, but on another who had suddenly appeared on the threshold of the door, a tall, well set up figure, such as the Colonel must have been in his youth. The Colonel took a stride forward, and for a moment they stood facing each other, father and son.

"Geoffry!" Then the Colonel's hand went out and the younger man's hand met it; and the barrier that had divided them for seven years was broken down at last.

"I was wrong, Geoffry! But I ask you to forgive me and forget the past, for I am a lonely old man and want my son," said the Colonel, and there was a humility in his voice that had never touched its brusqueness before.

It was not a very difficult matter, after all, for the Colonel to banish the man in the porch. Betty watched him slouch off down the path and out of the gate in high satisfaction, and called after him in shrill, piping tones:

"I'm very glad you're gone, you nasty man; and don't you ever come back."

Betty, in fact, was once more her light-hearted little self. She skipped upstairs to tell the good news to Maria Solphrina, and after subjecting that much-enduring doll to an impromptu toilet, which involved a little more shedding of the lustreless hair, and the scrubbing of the faded cheeks with a very crumpled kerchief, she brought her down into the sitting room and crept into a corner, to see but not be heard.

A glance at Betty's mother, in the graciousness of her youth and beauty, sufficed to bring home to the Colonel even more nearly the folly of his prejudice. Certainly, his keen, penetrating glance had never felt so inclined to flinch in all his life before, as in the moment when she stood before him, half proudly, her clear grey eyes meeting his.

"My dear, you must forgive a foolish old man; for youth can afford to be merciful," he said, and by the tenderness that stole into her face and the soft pressure of her hand in his, the Colonel knew that they were friends.

Betty sat in her corner, silently observant. The shadow had lifted from her home, and though she was too young to understand the why and wherefore of everything, she knew that the brightness had come back, and that her daddy's face was no longer careworn and sad. Everybody seemed very happy, even old Nanny Webster as she sat polishing her spectacles with her apron, and therefore Betty was happy too.

"And where's my little maid?" cried the Colonel suddenly. "Why, bless me, there she is, right out of it in the corner." He made his way to her, and tilting her chin so that he could better see her wonderful eyes, said:

"Do you know what you've got to call me, eh?"

"No," replied Betty.

"Why, grand-daddy, of course."

Betty considered, with a puzzled furrow on her brow.

"I can't have two daddies, and please, man, I'd rather not," she said, and glanced across to where her father was standing. For Betty's heart was very loyal, and she did not take quite kindly to the idea of letting another share her daddy's place. The Colonel was a new friend yet, and she did not grasp the relationship. But she did not want to hurt his feelings, so she added, with a solemn look in her sweet, blue eyes:

"I'll call you my grand-man."

And the Colonel had to be content with that; for ever after he remained to Betty just her "grand man."

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A POWERFUL WRITER.

OF recent additions to Temperance literature probably the most notable work of fiction is "Wine on the Lees," by Mr. John Alexander Steuart. The story shows all the finished characterisation of a master hand. The gifted writer has clearly taken special pains to study the drink problem at first hand. As a keen observer of how the poor live, and of how members of "the trade" make their fortunes, Mr. Steuart has peopled his pages with living men and women. He gives us a real "peep behind the scenes," and his book is one which cannot fail to rouse earnest minds to do battle with the "enemy of the race." We must not give an outline of the plot but we do strongly recommend Temperance workers to make good use of the book. By placing "Wine on the Lees" in public libraries, by presenting copies to their friends, and by mentioning it in their addresses we feel sure that some real recruiting work will result. It may be added that the author is a Scotsman, who was born in the Perthshire Highlands on July 3rd, 1861. He commenced his career as a banker, and after a brief experience in Ireland travelled in North America from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He became a journalist, and returned to Europe as a special correspondent. He edited The Publisher's Circular from 1896 until 1900, and is the author of "A Millionaire's Daughters," "Kilgroom," "The Minister of State," and many other popular books. Mr. Steuart has upon some few occasions been prevailed upon to take part in Temperance meetings in London and its suburbs, and his virile, crisp speeches have greatly delighted his hearers.

A NOVEL USE OF "THE QUIVER."

The following extract from a letter received from a veteran Temperance worker in Plymouth tells its own story. He writes: "You may like to hear that at a recent meeting of our Temperance society we had a capital evening, which was styled "A Night with THE QUIVER." One of our members attended with the last three or four years' numbers of THE QUIVER. These were handed round, and some twenty or thirty members read out paragraphs from your Temperance pages. The freshness and wonderful variety of the topics touched upon greatly interested the large audience, and the many helpful suggestions brought before those present should prove of great service. Some guesses were made as to your contributor's identity, and it was admitted that he (or she) seems to have an all-round knowledge of Temperance work and Temperance people."

THE WORK IN THE POLICE COURTS

The latest returns of the C.E.T.S. show that there is no diminution in this most valuable department of Temperance effort. The number of missionaries employed by the Church of England Temperance Society alone now reaches a total of ninety-seven, in addition to which there are sixteen mission women. Two hundred and ninety-four police courts are now regularly visited; and the following figures for the past year are an eloquent testimony to the activity of the missionaries:

74,606 persons were visited in their homes.
6,906 cases were attended to at the magistrates' request.
29,960 prisoners were met on discharge from prison.
20,367 free breakfasts were provided.
4,999 persons (chiefly young women and girls) were placed in homes or restored to their friends.
2,540 persons were provided with employment.
20,253 persons were assisted with money, shelter, food, clothing, tools, etc.
3,174 persons were handed over to the care of the parochial clergy.

A SIDELIGHT ON LEGISLATVE ACTION.

Among the Parliamentary papers recently issued was one giving a return of the number of victuallers', beerhouse, and other licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors, the renewal of which was refused at the annual licensing sessions in England and Wales in February and March last. The total number refused was 422, but there were appeals in 263 cases. The result of the appeals was that 21 were abandoned, 108 dismissed. and 114 allowed, while there were 20 appeals still pending. Among the licences refused were 286 victuallers' licences, 101 beerhouse licences, and 35 other licences

ANOTHER IRISH EXAMPLE.

Ireland, which has so frequently given the lead to the Empire in Temperance work, once again furnishes a striking example of how things should be done. A very large and influential committee, representing all sections of Temperance opinion, all creeds, and all political parties, has been formed to promote an "All Ireland Temperance Bazaar," which will be held in the well-known exhibition grounds, Ball's Bridge, Dublin, on May 16th and four following days next year, in aid of the funds of the Irish Temperance League and the Irish Association for the Prevention of Intemperance. The aim is to raise the sum of £6,000, which will be spent by these joint well-known organisations in still further extending their work. The comprehensive character of the scheme will be understood when we mention that it includes:

1. An increase in the number of travelling agents.
2. The circulation of Temperance literature.
3. The holding of indoor and outdoor meetings.
4. The assistance of local societies with speakers, and with legal advice in opposing licences.
5. The teaching of Temperance lessons in day schools.
6. The enforcement of existing licensing laws.
7. The entire closing of all licensed premises on Sundays, and their earlier closing on Saturday nights.
8. To labour to create a sound public opinion on the evils of drunkenness.
9. To promote effective Temperance catering.
10. To educate young people in the duties of citizenship with respect to the liquor traffic.

One friend has generously contributed £200 to defray the hire of the Ball's Bridge grounds, and there are encouraging signs that the bazaar will be well supported throughout the country. Two young ladies, who have long been widely known for their keen interest in Temperance work, have been appointed as assistant organisers of the bazaar, namely Miss K. A. Gifford, B.A., of Dublin, and Miss Maggie E. Donaghy, of Belfast. These ladies are holding drawing-room meetings and addressing conferences of workers in all parts of the country. Their mission is to stir up interest, enlist helpers, offer suggestions, receive hints, and, in a word, concentrate their persuasive gifts to the making of the most notable bazaar ever held in Ireland. In cordially wishing them success we feel it right to recall that in the great bazaars held in London upon several occasions, and last year in Manchester, for Temperance purposes, stalls have been invariably supplied by Irish friends. The forthcoming event will furnish an opportunity for English Temperance workers to pay their debts. The Secretaries of the bazaar are Mr. J. B. Moriarty, 4 and 5, Eustace Street, Dublin, and Mr. Wm. Wilkinson, 16, 18, and 20, Lombard Street, Belfast.

"THE QUIVER" MISSION BOAT FUND.

"There's Always the Wrecks."

"THIS is very pleasant," remarks a Londoner, basking in the sunshine of an ideal summer holiday. The garden of an hotel where his after-lunch coffee is spread commands a view of the sparkling British Channel, and Nature smiles her kindliest smile. "This place is delightful in such weather as this," he continues to the landlady who has brought out her knitting and is evidently ready to catch the opportunity of a chat, for it is early yet for visitors; "but don't you find the winter very dull?"

"Well, sir," she replies, "there's always the wrecks."

"Always the wrecks" to break the monotony of the winter on our British coasts; always a series of disasters to supply hotels with customers such as underwriters, insurance agents, and persons deputed to carry on inquests. "Yes, in winter there are always the wrecks," echo the voices of the seafaring population; "wrecks to break hearts, destroy homes, and fill them with sorrow so that life can never be the same again." Even places well known as resorts for invalids see for themselves calamities when the great Atlantic rages and chafes under the lash of angry gales. During the last winter terrible storms broke over the south-west coast. In February the town of Falmouth was thrown into gloom by the worst accident that had happened for many years.

It was a rough Wednesday evening when the captain, chief engineer, two seamen, and a fireman attempted to return from shore to their ship, the Melrose Abbey, which lay anchored in the roadstead. When alongside a fierce squall seems to have struck the boat, as all within it were drowned. On the following Sunday the shocked and sorrowful survivors welcomed a visit from the chaplain and reader of Missions to Seamen. All hands met to seek from the Ruler of the sea help, comfort, and protection. Protection they sorely needed in their undermanned vessel. Even before the mission dinghey had conveyed the chaplain and reader safely back to their cutter, the Sickle, the main boom was carried away, and the yacht was only with great difficulty brought back to its moorings. The little Mission craft was also in great peril. The chaplain ascribed its gracious deliverance to God alone and to the prayers of His people, offered specially on Sunday mornings for seafaring men and workers amongst them.

In spite of the squall the missionaries visited three ships on that day. On the first, a large four-mast English barque, they had a service with eighteen men, of whom thirteen took the pledge of total abstinence. Sobriety amongst seamen often means the salvation of life. In the hour of danger the preservation of a ship may depend on a clear head, alert faculties, steady hands and feet. Brave as sailors may be, there is no courage equal to the calm confidence of men who know God as a present help in trouble and are fearless when waters roar and waves leap to overwhelm them. An instance of this sort of courage is told amongst the stories of the Missions to Seamen chaplain for Cornwall.

In the spring of 1903 a Norwegian steamer —the Siggen, of 670 tons—was rendered helpless by the loss of her propeller. For five days and a half terrible seas drove her hither and thither on the Atlantic. During this time the crew dared not go below. They fought the elements and bravely defended their drifting ship until the captain bade them give up the struggle. They had done their best; nothing remained now but for them to die like men and like Christians. The crew of thirteen assembled. Half frozen, almost worn out, they stood around him on the rough pavement of trampled snow and hail, and closed their eyes whilst he read part of the solemn Burial Service. It was over, and they prepared to meet death in the strength of Him Who has destroyed its sting. They opened their eyes to see, not the last enemy, but a large American steamer, the Pennsylvania, bearing down upon them."

"I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord," each one of the true hearts yielded to His will might well cry, as it drew nearer and nearer, and at last rescued and brought all safe to land. If the American ship can be looked upon as a daughter of the Mayflower, and these hardy Norsemen as descendants of the Vikings of old, their British comrades bidding them welcome into a fair haven are typical of the seagirt nation to which they belong. Her Continental neighbours, at least, realise her position and responsibility.

"English is the sailor's language!" replied a young seaman on a Danish barque to the inquiry of a Mission agent whether the crew could speak English. Special responsibility rests upon England towards seamen of every race, for no other country has the same opportunities or influence. Respect for life and growth in humanity demand that care should coming of summer is not more regular than their rush to the seaside. September witnesses their return home, no longer fagged and weary, but with strength renewed and a comfortable readiness to take up life's burdens afresh. When turning their backs upon the sea it will be gracious to bear in mind the outward bound ships and their freight of human life

Readers of the May Number of THE QUIVER will remember that a Fund was opened to purchase a motor vessel to replace the Messenger, the worn-out sailing boat at Cork Harbour, and to supply ten row-boats for other be taken for the comfort and safety of the mercantile marine, without which England would cease to be a nation. But no precautions, no scientific improvements and observations, no modern appliances, can control the elements. So long as autumn succeeds summer and winter succeeds autumn, and so long as thousands of ships go to and fro, there will always be wrecks. The one safeguard for seamen is to know their God as a present help in trouble and the hearer and answerer of prayer. The main object of Mission boats, institutes, and all the organisations connected with them for the temporal comfort and benefit of seafaring men, is to lead them to Him that they may live righteously and lay hold on a Saviour and Friend.

stations. Our July Number described the launch of the Quiver No. 1 row-boat on the Tyne. Autumn is here. Winter must not be allowed to bring news of disasters, followed by sad admissions that evils might have been remedied if only the means had been at hand. "This life need not have been lost if only the Mission boat had been seaworthy!" "Crews starting to face bitter cold might have been supplied with knitted comforters, woollen steering gloves, or literature that would have been a godsend for dull days, comfort for body and soul might have been supplied, but for the want of more boats!"

The time is short. Whilst we have the opportunity, whether used or lost, seamen pass away. "In winter there are always the wrecks."

Children's Page.

THE object of the children's section of THE QUIVER Mission Boat Fund is to provide row-boats, which can penetrate the masses of shipping in port when the larger launches provided by the "grown-ups" cannot make their way. Our object is to provide ten boats at a cost of £25 each. So far, the proprietors of THE QUIVER have given the first boat, Quiver No. 1, and a lady has given the second in memory of her little daughter. We are now working for the third boat.

MY DEAR READERS,

I am writing this before it is possible for me to hear from you whether you will respond to my appeal, for I daresay you can understand it takes some time to prepare a large magazine like this. In any case, I do not expect a brisk correspondence for some time, for doubtless you will all be thinking over ways and means of helping and making plans for small sales of work, concerts, etc., to be held in the winter. I really think that these are some of the best ways of raising money for charities; and then also, there are "self-denial" ways. I know many children who give up birthday gifts to their pet charities, and who even walk instead of taking an omnibus, and devote the fares to the good cause. I call that real goodness; for it is much more difficult to sacrifice one's personal comfort and one's time than to take round a collecting card. Still, whether you choose the collecting card, or the bazaar, or the "self-denial," I shall be equally glad, as long as the silver shillings and the brown pence come rolling into La Belle Sauvage. As I write these lines THE QUIVER Row-boat No. 2 is being built, and is to be called the Mildred, in memory of the little girl of whom I spoke last month. Do not let it be long before we can send the order for Row-boat No. 3—the first boat we shall be able to call "ours," for No. 1, as you remember, is given by the proprietors of THE QUIVER.

Meanwhile, I am sure you will be interested to hear the story of the founding of the Missions to Seamen, whose splendid work we are endeavouring to help. Sixty-eight years ago a clergyman and his son were walking along the cliffs above the Bristol Channel, enjoying to the full the beauty of sea and land and sky. Suddenly the small boy's attention was captured by a sparkle from one of the islands lying out to sea—Flat Holms was its name.

"Look, father," he said, "what is that shining thing out there?"

"It's the sun shining on the lighthouse," said his father.

"Oh," said the little boy, and was silent for a moment. Then he continued, "And do men really and truly live out there?"

"Yes," replied his father, "for months and months."

"And no one else lives there?"

"No."

The small boy was silent again, pondering.

"Poor men," he said. "It's very good of them, dad, to stay there just to keep ships from going on the rocks."

"Yes," said his father; "it's a lonely, anxious life."

"And how do they go to church, dad?"

The minister was surprised for the moment. The thought had never come to him.

"They don't go," he replied.

But from that moment he began to wonder why the lonely lighthouse and lightship men were never visited by any minister, who could speak to them and cheer them and discuss their hopes and fears, and read the Word of God to them. So he hired a boat and went out to Flat Holms and received so enthusiastic a welcome from the men that he determined to visit them each Sunday of his holidays. Then, too, he noticed a number of becalmed ships off the coast of Wales, and he went out to them, and was again given so warm a reception that he felt, "Here is much work to be done." "No one cared for the merchant seamen," said the men. As soon as they came ashore they spent their money in drinking and low places of amusement; and then they shipped again as soon as it was all gone, and terrible specimens of humanity were to be found in the "fo'c'sle," which is, as many of you know, the sailor's name for the "forecastle," that part of the ship in which the seamen live. Bad language, bad habits, bad thoughts, that was the atmosphere in which many a man, anxious to do right, found himself.

Dr. Ashley—that was the name of the clergyman—was horrified, and in consequence of what he heard and saw he declined a splendid living which had been offered him, and determined to devote himself to the seamen. A few years later Mr. W. H. G. Kingston, the author of "Peter the Whaler," and "The Three Midshipmen," and other books which many of you have enjoyed, took up the question too, and he, with some friends, founded a society for sending out chaplains and Scripture readers to work among sailors round the coasts. This society joined the work started by Dr. Ashley, and was the beginning of the Missions to Seamen.

And wonderful has been the work achieved by them. Not only at our own ports, but in distant Eastern harbours, are chaplains and their helpers, who seek out "Jack" and bring him books and cheering words, and welcome him on shore to church and reading-room. Formerly the good-natured, easy-going sailor, as soon as he reached port, was set upon by swarms of bad people, who quickly induced him to part with his money; and when he returned home, and had to wait in port for his pay, these wretched people induced him to spend his money in advance and borrow from them, so that when the pay did come, poor Jack found a long bill, which left him penniless again. The Missions to Seamen brought these wrongs before the Government, and now the money is sent after the sailor to his own home, so there is no loitering about the ports. You can see what wonderful work has been done. Fancy the poor wife, who had been looking forward to her husband's return, and then found he had spent all the hard-earned money which was to make life so pleasant for them during the time he was ashore, and for many months to come! Fancy the shamefaced feeling of Jack himself! No; all this is altered now, and the more the Mission Boat can wing its way through the waves to show men where friendly hands and voices await them, instead of the public-house, the better will be the lot and the life of the merchant seaman.

So I'm sure you will feel doubly anxious after reading this to add your mite to the great work.

Before I close my letter I wish to give you two examples of the way in which assistance comes. A very welcome gift has arrived through Commander Dawson from the Rev. James White, of St. Peter's Vicarage, Paddington. It is the result of a collection at a children's service, and amounts to £1. I do hope this idea may be followed by other ministers and their young congregants.

And, secondly, I give you an extract from a very nice letter from a hospital nurse. She sends 3s. 6d., and writes:

> "Will you kindly send on a copy of the photogravure 'The Light of the World'? Since I was quite a little girl we have always had THE QUIVER monthly, and have taken opportunity of many of the benefits it has offered from time to time. I am only sorry I cannot send the half-guinea just now towards the Mission Boat fund. Enclosed find postal order for 3s. 6d., 2s. 6d. of which you can use toward the Mission Boat or any other fund you care. It is a grand idea to have these boats for the dear seamen. I thank you in anticipation for the picture, and pray the necessary funds will be sent in."

I trust I may soon receive many letters from you breathing the same spirit of helpfulness. I shall love to hear from you.—Yours affectionately, AUNT GRACE.

I am indebted to Commander Dawson, R.N., Lay Secretary to the Missions to Seamen, and to a booklet written by Miss Mary Walrond for information regarding the history of the Missions to Seamen.

You will find a collecting form in the Magazine. Please cut it out, fill it up as well as you can, then send it, with all collections and letters, to:

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

The Lord's Prayer on a Sea-shell.

PERHAPS a queerer vehicle for prayer than the surface of a sea-shell was never employed. Little is known of the origin of the shell photographed except that it is many years old. The labour and painstaking care of the carver must have been infinite, for every letter of the famous prayer is executed with remarkable skill and precision, the height of the relief writing being $\frac{1}{32}$ of an inch The length of the shell is just over three inches.

THE LORD'S PRAYER ON A SEA-SHELL.

Curé and Colporteur.

A FRENCH pastor was passing a village home, which he knew to be tenanted by a Roman Catholic family, when he noticed a woman within the doorway weeping bitterly. He learned that her husband was dying, and was admitted to the sick man's bedside. At his first words of Gospel truth the wasted features lighted up with joy. "I know that well," said the sufferer, "and I have perfect peace." "Where did you learn of the Saviour's redeeming love?" "When I was a porter at the last Paris Exhibition, the agents of the British Bible Society gave to me and my mates each a copy of the New Testament. What I read in that holy book brought me to know and trust Jesus." This and other such incidents were related in the Protestant church of Havre by Pastor Paul Monod, whose father, Mr. Gustav Monod, for thirty years director of the Paris branch of the British and Foreign Bible Society, passed a short time ago to his heavenly rest. Throughout France 12,000,000 copies of the Bible in whole or in part have been circulated by that society. There is, we think, an element of special interest in the comparatively humble celebration of her centenary festival in a land where her faithful envoys have to contend with so much superstitious bigotry, in addition to the ignorance and indifference everywhere encountered. But all the more are such occurrences as the following to be valued. A curé, meeting a Bible colporteur in a country district, reproved him for circulating the error which he supposed to be contained in the French scriptures sold by the Bible Society. "Will you accept and examine one of my books?" The curé consented. That evening he sought out the colporteur. "I find this quite a faithful translation," he said, "and I wish you to supply me with one hundred of these books for the outlying hamlets of my wide parish, which I can rarely visit." Ere long a second hundred was demanded by the same applicant.

A Grateful Housemaid.

A POOR woman who was attended with the utmost professional care and personal kindness during a long and painful illness by the late Dr. Waring, exclaimed to him in gratitude during one of his last visits before her death: "Oh, sir, when I am in heaven I shall watch for you every day; and when I hear you are coming, I shall ask God to let me go and open the door for you!" Those of us who are more learned and less simple than good Dr. Waring's poor patient, are apt to mould what we imagine of the next world on what we know of this; and who shall assert that, in some fashion inconceivable by us, who "see through a glass darkly," the housemaid's loving and dying desire may not be fulfilled? "The heart of the Eternal is most wonderfully kind."

"Than Thousands of Gold and Silver."

THE Psalmist's words are true, in more than a metaphorical sense, of the unique and most valuable copies of the Holy Scriptures displayed at the London office of the British and Foreign Bible Society, of the centenary of which we are now all thinking. Of the many excellent pamphlets issued by the Society in connection with this occasion, we have not perused one that is more interesting than the description by the publishing-superintendent, Mr. J. J. Brown, of the many priceless Biblical treasures which are in the Society's present possession. We may linger among rare editions, with their exquisite caligraphy or typography; but some of the Bibles, pecuniarily worth little, are, to a Christian imagination and devotion, the most precious. Mr. Brown tells us, for example, of a copy of the Holy Scriptures for a tribe of Red Indians, which was printed in 1665, from a translation by the noble "apostle" to the Red Indians, John Eliot. The entire tribe and language have vanished as completely from off the face of the earth as has the devoted missionary; but, in those faded pages the fragrance of a faithful work survives. Then there is a stained and mouldy-looking Malagasy Bible, just as it appeared after its interment for several years, during the terrible persecution which succeeded the first promulgation of the Gospel Message in Madagascar. And next, Mr. Brown could show us a copy of St. Matthew from one of the Loyalty group of islands. There is a smear of blood where one of the corners of the book ought to be, but which has evidently been cut off by a hatchet. It was this fateful volume which a native catechist was reading by his hut door when he was set upon and hewn in pieces by some of the savage enemies of his new faith. "The blood of the martyrs," in truth. And, as so often happens in life, as well as in literature, during our survey of this wonderful collection of books, something very like humour jostles pathos. There are examples of the famous Treacle Bible, where "balm" appears as "triacle" in Gilead; and of the Vinegar Bible, where "vineyard" is misprinted "vinegar" in the headline to one of the parables. We observe a specimen of the "Wicked" Bible, published in the reign of Charles I., of which the printer was fined the then very large sum of £300 for missing out, probably by accident, the important little word "not" in one of the ten commandments. Yet another Bible might be mentioned, with a somewhat singular summary, upon a page heading, of the murder of the grand and great victim of Herodias—"The Inconvenience of Dancing." Truly, this is a marvellous "treasure-house," as Mr. Brown calls it, of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and we may add that he is—on paper, at any rate, a capital guide.

At Least.

"AT least, he didn't run away!" exclaimed the mother of a French soldier, amid her blinding tears, as she looked at the dead body of her boy. And when we survey what sometimes seems to our unfaith the woeful waste of human life in the highest service, the delicate woman butchered in China, the flower of English University culture poisoned amid the swamps of the Zambesi, the missionary riddled through the heart with savage arrows, we can reflect (and the thought may lead us higher), "At least, they didn't run away!"

"Thou Shalt Not Covet."

"I AM inclined to be apprehensive," writes a minister of experience, "lest the essentially commercial spirit of our age, the horrid tendency to be everlastingly 'on the make,' be actually invading some departments of Christian work. It is no infrequent experience for a parent to withdraw a son or daughter from some church or chapel society because they are 'getting nothing out of it.' There is a sudden steady and sad improvement in the numbers and the regularity of many a Bible class directly books begin to be subscribed for by members, with, very likely, an injudicious and immoral bonus at the end of each half-year. An incumbent in the East-End of London, the cherisher of lofty ideals, thought some time ago that he would abolish treats, but he soon found, to his dismay, that his Sunday schools were on the rapid road to becoming perfectly empty. This, no doubt, was going impracticably and needlessly far; but we should exert what influence we can against this crude desire for selfish aggrandisement, and, at least, not allow it to masquerade before our eyes under the semblance of religion. Covetousness, the curse of our century, is capturing many unsuspected sides of life. I have received even an advertisement of Christmas crackers, to contain coupons entitling certain winners to valuable money prizes. A father, with a zany's cap upon his head, may not look the most imposing object at the top of his table, crowded with bright young faces ; but it is a thousand times better than that he should teach his children how to coin cash out of their harmless fun."

Scriptures for Japanese Soldiers.

WHILE negotiations were still going on between the two countries now engaged in war, and long before actual hostilities commenced, the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society at Kobe obtained permission from General Terauchi, the Japanese Minister of War, to distribute Scriptures to the soldiers on their departure for active service. On permission being granted, special editions of 200,000 Japanese Gospels and 1,500 Testaments were printed for distribution to the Mikado's troops. Since war has commenced, this agent has sent an interesting letter to the head office in London on how the Japanese leave for action. He writes rom Hiroshima, where each division is stationed before embarkation, and says : "They are bright and eager for action. Their behaviour in the town is remarkably free from drunkenness and rowdyism. They are all imbued with one spirit—to vindicate the right of Japan in the position she has taken at this time." Through the courtesy of the British and Foreign Bible Society we are enabled to reproduce a photograph of the Scriptures which have been so largely distributed to the Japanese soldiers. The larger book is a copy of the New Testament, and the smaller one a copy of the Gospel according to St. Matthew. On page 78 the verses are St. Matthew x. 39–42, the following page containing the first four verses of chapter eleven. The Japs read from right to left and perpendicularly, beginning at the top of each column. The Gospels were given to the soldiers and the larger books to the officers. That these gifts have been appreciated there is not the slightest doubt. An officer in the Imperial Guards, on receiving a copy, wrote as follows : "The Testament which you have so kindly presented to me I shall take with me to the war, and gladly read as opportunity serves. We have not all got these nice books, but intend to lend them to each other. I am very grateful for such a present at this time." This is only one of many similar letters which could be quoted.

Missing Heirs, or "The One Opportunity of Your Life."

A WORKING man chanced to see in a newspaper, many days old, an advertisement inviting anyone of his name to communicate his pedigree to the Court of Chancery. Acting on this notice, he found himself heir to £250,000, which for more than a century had awaited a claimant. There are, it is said, £100,000,000 lying buried in Chancery, and 50,000 missing heirs for whom that Court and solicitors and other trustees are seeking in vain. For the enlightenment of such a book has been published, giving the names of many thousands of these missing heirs. "Send for the book to-day," concludes the publisher's notice ; "this may be the one opportunity of your life. What a striking allegory, touching the offer of the heavenly "inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away"! Yet to inherit this there is no question of examining a list of names and putting in a plea at a venture. The favoured heir to these true riches is entitled "Whosoever will," and in the volume wherein this world-wide name is published is found also the only and infallible way to make good the claim. Simply, wholly trusting the Saviour sent of God, for pardon, deliverance from sin, every human being shall inherit the gift of God, life eternal, joint heirship with His beloved Son. Earth's language is inadequate to set forth—aye, the heart of man unable to imagine, the value of this heavenly treasure; yet the feet of little children can pass the entrance way into that fair, limitless inheritance. Well may we be exhorted with regard thereto, "Make your claim to-day!" "To-day," because the time is short, the chance of closing with this wondrous invitation transient; "to-day," because to the heirs of God's glorious promises is granted a rich earnest, a blessed foretaste of eternal possession, in the life that now is, and every hour's delay is costing us all that makes for present peace and joy worthy the name. Yes, blessed now, blessed beyond human thought to conceive in the day of the full "revelation of Jesus Christ," "are they whose names are in the Book of Life."

129. What wonderful victory was foretold by Elisha?

130. What case is mentioned in the Old Testament of children being sold as slaves for the debts of their father?

131. How were the children redeemed?

132. What interesting event connected with the prophet Elisha took place at Shunem near Mount Tabor?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 1020.

109. There was a perennial spring on Mount Carmel which yielded a good supply of water in the driest seasons. (1 Kings xviii. 33, 34.)

110. To prevent doubts arising in the minds of the people as to the origin of the fire which consumed the burnt sacrifice, it being well known (as Calmet says) that fire was ofttimes surreptitiously applied by heathen priests to deceive the people. (1 Kings xviii. 35–38.)

111. The destruction of the priests of Baal, as commanded by the Law of Moses for inciting the people to idolatry. (Deut. xiii. 6–10; 1 Kings xviii. 40.)

112. A great fear fell upon Elijah owing to the threats of Jezebel, and he fled away into the Wilderness of Judæa. (1 Kings xix. 3, 4.)

113. Because he was so disappointed at the apparent want of success in his mission to the people. (1 Kings xix. 4.)

114. God sent His angel to comfort the Prophet and prepare him for a journey to Mount Horeb (about 150 miles). (1 Kings xix. 5–8.)

115. God manifested His Almighty power over the forces of Nature, and then revealed to the Prophet that there were still seven thousand true worshippers of God in Israel. (1 Kings xix. 11, 12, 18.)

116. By the power of Hazael, King of Syria, who cruelly oppressed the people of Israel, and by Jehu, who should become their king. (1 Kings xix. 15–17; 2 Kings viii. 12 and x. 7–10.)

117. God granted the Israelites two great victories over Benhadad, King of Syria, when the army of Israel appeared as two little flocks of kids in comparison with the host of Syria. (1 Kings xx. 13–21, and 25–31.)

118. He paid a parting visit with Elisha to all the schools of the prophets, Gilgal, Bethel, and Jericho. (2 Kings ii. 1–6.)

119. That if Elisha saw him depart he should receive a double portion of his spirit. (2 Kings ii. 9, 10.)

120. When Elisha struck the waters of Jordan with his mantle, they parted asunder, and he went on dry ground. (2 Kings ii. 14-15.)

STREET ENTERTAINMENTS.

By Harry Davies.

"Proceeded to walk round the ring, balancing his strange load."—p. 1126.

"HULLO, Dick!"

"'Ello, guv'nor!"

"How are you?"

"Oh, chirpy, like."

"Ready to take me round?"

"Yus."

Such was the greeting which passed between me and the item of humanity who was to be my guide for the evening. An item of insignificant size, but big in importance, just as he was big in boots. His boots were tremendous.

"Which way had we better go, Dick?"

"You come along of me. I'll tyke yer. Nah then, look aht! That 'oss was nearly on yer! You've got to look slippy in all this 'ere traffic. Ain't used to traffic, I s'pose?"

"Well, I am used to it a little," I said humbly, "having lived in London, more or less, for fifteen years; but, you see, I usually try to cross behind things, not under the horses' heads."

"One wye's as good as anuvver," said Dick curtly.

I meekly accepted the dictum, and devoted my energies to keeping pace with the big boots along the crowded pavement. They were determined to lose no time, and dodged in and out among the people in a manner perfectly bewildering. It was like a game of hide-and-seek; and when at last I had threaded the maze in pursuit of them, and had followed them out on a clearer stretch of pavement, I felt I had done something. I was handicapped, too, by a crook-handled umbrella. It had hooked an indignant old lady; it had caught the sleeve of a factory girl, who had turned round and delivered herself of cutting sarcasms; it had linked itself into the handle of a basket carried by a small but pert girl. I had begged pardon at least four times, and yet I had kept pace with the big boots!

"Nah then, yer wants to see the cove as does the 'ed business. This wye, then."

I darted down a side street, again in pursuit of the boots. As I kept step with them, I stole a look at the queer little figure above them. A wide pair of dingy grey trousers, many inches too long, and rolled up several times about the ankles; a faded little brown coat, buttoned close, and tight almost to bursting; a clean red comforter about the neck; a big cap, falling ludicrously over the ears, like an extinguisher; a pale, sharp-featured, old-fashioned face, shrewd beyond its age. Such was Dick.

"This 'ere coat is a-goin' to Bob, 'cos I'm growed aht of it," he said confidentially, when we had become more familiar. "These 'ere trahsis, they wos Bill's, but he's got a new pair. 'E en't got the new coat yet, 'cos 'e worked short time lars week, so I got to keep on wearin' the coat."

A sudden turn into another thoroughfare brought us within view of a triangular plot of land where, round the glare of a naphtha lamp, the streaming flame of which was blown hither and thither by the wind, there was a crowd of people peering, surging, straining their necks, standing on tip-toe, leaning over each other, in their endeavours to see something which was going on in the centre.

"'Ere's the 'ed business," said Dick. "Nah, yer've got to push in, or yer won't see nuffin'. Don' mind wot they syes to yer. Come along of me!"

"But hadn't we better just try if we can see before we push in?" I asked reluctantly.

Dick looked at me with an air of disdain, as who should say, "'Ere's a mug!"

"All right!" he said indifferently. "Try, if yer like."

I tried.

"Can yer see anyfing?" he asked drily.

"No, I cannot."

"I told yer so. I knows wot I'm a-doin' of. Nah, push be'ind me. Myke wye there, please! Myke wye there! 'Ere's a gent as wants to get by. Nah, will yer myke wye there, please!"

Impressed by the tone of authority, the people gave to right and left, and after an interval of tugging and hustling Dick and I managed to squeeze into the inner circle.

"Look at that!" said a man's voice behind us. "See that! Cool, ain't it? 'E only wanted to get a plyce, that's all! Stall seats, all fer nothin'! You're a saucy young bloke, me lad, an' no mistyke, you an' yer 'Myke wye there'!"

Dick turned round and looked at him.

"'Ello, flat-fyce!" he said genially. "Who's done anyfing to you?"

A roar of laughter followed, and our friend behind subsided. We were now able to turn our attention to the performance which was going on within the ring. A short, spare, grey-haired man was walking about with a huge earthenware jar under his arm—a jar with a big body and a very narrow neck.

"I am Barton, I am," he said, in a thin, cracked voice. "Barton, that's my name. You've most of you heard of Barton. Barton, gentlemen."

After walking to and fro, repeating this formula several times, looking at us meanwhile with great earnestness, he gave a preliminary flourish, and then swinging the jar up, placed it, neck downward, on his head. For a moment he steadied it; then he removed his hands, kissed them to the crowd in the mechanical way of entertainers, and continued to pace to and fro, balancing the jar on his head.

"Barton, gentlemen, that's my name. You all know Barton. You've seen me here before. I've performed in all parts of London, I 'ave. Barton, gentlemen."

Coming to a standstill, he stooped down carefully, holding his head upright under the jar, and picking up a piece of stout board, about three feet in length, held it aloft in his right hand, while with the left he waved another mechanical kiss. Then, stretching his arms upward, he placed the board on the inverted jar:

Another walk round the ring, another repetition of his formula, another mechanical kiss from the finger tips, and then he paused and looked around him.

"What boy 'll come up to-night?" he asked.

There was a sudden commotion, followed by a simultaneous rush of urchins from all parts of the ring. They stood around him, clamouring, gesticulating, pushing each other.

"I was fust, Barton."

"No yer wasn', then. I was fust."

"You shet up, bofe of yer. I was fust, 'cos I touched 'is sleeve afore yer got anywhere near."

Barton looked down at them from under his lowered eyelids, his head still rigidly balancing the jar. He picked out a small boy dressed in a bulging tunic; then he carefully lowered himself till he was on his knees.

"Will some gent kindly put him up to sit on the board?" he said, holding the jar with both hands.

A man stepped forward, and to the manifest delight of the urchin raised him to his seat.

"Right in the middle, if you please," said Barton. "No, he en't quite in the middle. A leetle more to the left. That's right. Now, will the same gent kindly fetch the two jars as is under the lamp, an' put 'em up on the board, one on each side of the boy, neck upwards? Thank you, sir. Ketch 'old of 'em, my boy. Just put your arms around the necks. Don't move your body, whatever you do. Sit quite straight. Now, gentlemen, Barton is my name. You all know Barton. Barton, gentlemen. See what Barton does."

After a little preliminary steadying of his burden, Barton removed his hands from the lowermost jar. Not only must his skull have been a thick one, but he must have practised the art of balance to a nicety, for there was now an extraordinary structure reared on his head. On the narrow base of the jar's neck was poised the wide jar itself, the piece of board above it, the boy sitting thereon, and on either side of the boy a jar. Swaying a little, but keeping marvellously steady on the whole, Barton rose from his knees to his feet, and proceeded to walk round the ring, balancing his strange load. Now he took a little step to the right, now one to the left; now he made a momentary pause to steady himself; now he gently inclined his body to counteract a false movement. Thus he walked on slowly, the crowd watching him in silence. Having twice completed the circle, he again lowered himself to his knees, helped down the boy in the bulging tunic, and removed the various articles from his head without losing his balance for one moment. Then he hastily took his cap, and came towards us, holding it in his hands. Just as hastily the audience began to melt away.

"A gramophone, a weighing-machine man, and an energetic vendor of sweets were bawling."—p. 1126.

"Remember Barton, gentlemen. Don't go away without remembering Barton."

A few people put coppers in his cap; only a very few; the majority turned away as he came near. I saw his face in the light as he passed in front of us. It was wrinkled and old and anxious-looking. His voice followed us with pathetic insistence as we walked up the crowded street:

"Barton, gentlemen; that's my name. Don't forget Barton. I'm no public-house performer, gentlemen. Don't go away without giving me a bit of encouragement, gentlemen!"

"'E was turned aht of 'is room abaht a monf ago. All 'is sticks was chucked aht into the street," said Dick.

"Why?"

"'Cos 'e couldn' pay 'is rent. 'E was reg'lar off 'is nut, 'cos of 'is daughter."

"Why because of his daughter?"

"She's got consumshin, or somefin' like that, an' 'e 'ad no plyce for 'er to go to till a woman took 'er in."

"You know them then, Dick?"

"'Eard somefin' abaht 'em," said Dick carelessly.

Dick was young, and youth has no cognisance of tragedy.

We walked on for a few hundred yards, and then Dick stopped for a council of war.

"There's a show as you can go to see this wye, or there's a boxin'-plyce the uvver wye."

"What is the show?"

"There's a giant, an' there's a strong man."

I decided on the show, and we crossed to the opposite side of the busy thoroughfare. Here the Saturday night crowd was at its densest. Street stalls lined the pavement, gutter merchants shouted their wares in flat, nasal tones. From the butcher's shop a few yards below our crossing place came a stentorian voice inviting the public to "Buy, buy, buy!" The rattle and boom of the traffic, the flare-lights on the long row of stalls, the surging, jostling crowd on business and pleasure intent, completed a scene of life and din and bustle which was, in its way, intensely interesting. The masses of people around the street stalls and gutter merchants, combined with the flow of pedestrians in both directions, rendered the pavement almost impassable in places. Dick was for going on in sublime indifference, but I was disposed to linger.

"Here, Dick, just wait a moment. What are they doing here?"

People were standing around a stall, eating from small saucers with the utmost solemnity.

"It's only eels," said Dick, with contempt. "That en't a show; yer wants to see the show, don't yer?"

"Yes, quite so," I said mildly; "but let us look on a moment."

Dick paused with an air of weary toleration, while I watched the stall. As soon as one person finished his repast, another slipped in to take his place, and was promptly served by the active man in a cap and apron, who made no more ado than: "Now then, gen'l'men. Another plyte 'ere, gen'l'men. Jellied eels, gen'l'men."

All the eaters plied their spoons without looking either to the right or to the left, and went away with an air of having been engaged in a most serious operation.

As we resumed our way, I caught sight of a large card swinging in front of the stall. Written on it in rough characters was the following legend:

"Come on, come, the people cry,
These jellied eels for to try.
Sixpence a bottle is the charge,
Fresh every day, and nice and large."

"Why do they eat in the street, Dick?" I asked. "Is it because they are hungry?"

"Nah!" said Dick, with disdain. "Only becos they sees 'em an' tykes a fancy to 'em."

I looked back. There was another large card on the side of the stall:

"We always try our friends to please,
This truth must be confessed.
The eels you'll have of ——
Are the largest and the best."

My attention was now distracted by a noisy and densely crowded patch of pavement where a gramophone, a weighing-machine man, and an energetic vendor of sweets were bawling their loudest. Their utterances mingled with each other in ludicrous confusion.

"B'leeve me or b'leeve me not, ladies an' gents, these 'ere sweets is the cheapest an' best as 'as ever been put on the English market. There's nothin' like 'em ter be 'ad anywhere for purity, for quality, an' for taste. They suits all pallits, from the Duchiss down ter the workin' classes. 'Ere they are, as supplied to Roy'lty an' the aristocrissy of the West End. Ho, yus! The aristocrissy is very keen on these 'ere sweets. They knows a good thing, I can tell yer, when they tastes it. They knows as there's a wonderful propitty in these 'ere sweets. They knows as if you 'ave a cold they eases it, if you 'ave a dry throat they oils it, if you want a tongue-tickler they fairly melts in the mouth. Why, b'leeve me or b'leeve me not, I tell you as my ole woman, if I takes these sweets 'ome to 'er, she meets me with a smile as almost cracks the lookin' glass, an' if I don' take 'em she meets me with the broom. If you want ter please the pore 'ard-workin' little wife at 'ome, why, take these 'ere sweets to 'er. If yer wants to get yerself in favour with that smart-lookin' gel as you're after——"

"B-r-r-r-r-r-rup. Then—ah, here's to good old England, r-r-r-r, And—ah, here's to her sons so true, r-r-r-r, And—ah, here's to the man that will help a friend, With 'Old pal, I'll pull you through,' r-r-r-r-r-r——"

"It's my belief as that there gramiphone is grumblin' for some of these 'ere sweets to oil its throat," said the sweet-man tartly. "It's 'usky enough an' 'oarse enough for anything. Call that moosic! Bah! Well, as I was a-goin' ter say, whether yer takes these 'ere sweets to yer wife or yer sweetheart or yer grandmother or yer grand-aunt or yer grandchild——"

"Oh, lydy, weigh the byby! Weigh the byby, lydy! Yer can't let such a sweet-lookin' hinfant go by without a-weighin' of it. Look at it a-askin' of you as plain as possible! That's right, lydy. Just put 'im nice an' snug in the corner. That's all right. 'E'll be as comfortable there as though 'e was in 'is cradle. Oh! 'ere's one more to be weighed! Oh! they can't 'elp a comin' to the only correck scales, tested an' stamped by the London County Council. Oh! it makes no diff'rence to hus what it is. We can weigh anythink, from a hinfant up to an elephant. The more the merrier! One stone—three, four, five, six.

"'Six men on the board!'"—p. 1129.

One stone six ounces. One stone six ounces exackly. 'E'll 'ave to be a bit 'eavier than that afore they takes 'im for a soldier. There yer are, lydy! On correck scales, all writ down on a card an' all, for the price of one penny. Thank yer, lydy. Bring 'im again, the little darlin'. Bring 'im again, an' see 'ow 'e's gettin' on for the Army. 'Ere yer are, lydies an' gentlemen, try yer weight; now's the time, now's the time! The only correck scales, tested an' stamped by the London County Council——"

"Are yer goin' to get to that show to-night?" asked Dick curtly, and I moved away.

"It's all so interesting, Dick."

"It's 'all me eye,'" said Dick. "They're only bloomin' spahters. They ain't got nothin' better to offer nor anybody else, only they wants to myke yer b'leeve as they 'ave."

"You're a regular cynic, my young ancient. It is a good thing that all these people are not of the same mind."

Dick snorted, and forged ahead with his big boots.

A string of factory girls, arm-in-arm along the pavement, alternately singing songs and chaffing the stall dealers; a raucous-voiced proprietor of a picture show, who, savage at the lack of custom, informed everybody satirically that if they were all so hard up he would trust them, blest if he wouldn't—as far as he could see them; a vendor of cough lozenges down a side street; these were the chief items that caught my eye as we threaded our way amongst the crowd. Dick kept stolidly ahead, and allowed me no further time for loitering. Dick evidently belonged to the order of people who, when they have got a fixed idea in their heads, require a surgical operation to get it out again.

"'Ere it is," said Dick at last; "an' long enough wiv bin in gettin' 'ere," he added severely.

I found myself in the midst of a crowd of people who were gazing with the greatest interest into the window and doorway of a disused shop. A dingy brown curtain, drawn across the entrance, intercepted the vulgar gaze of those who had not paid their pennies. In front of it sat a girl with a bag suspended from her shoulders, and by her side stood a solemn-looking individual, who, by way of stimulating the curiosity of the crowd, occasionally pulled the curtain aside and allowed them a brief glance at the people who were waiting within. In the window a big poster announced that the great Hibernian giant, who had appeared at the Dome in Brighton before Royalty and the élite of the town, challenged the world for height and proportions, clenching the argument by a portrait of the great Hibernian giant himself, a meek-looking, bearded gentleman, sitting in a chair in a meditative kind of way, with a very broad-brimmed silk hat on his head. Our study of this document was suddenly interrupted by a commotion behind the curtain in the entrance, followed by the appearance of an individual in tights.

"That's the strong man," said Dick, with a sudden and remarkable show of interest.

"It's 'all my eye,'" I said.

"No, it ain't," retorted Dick with vigour. "'E's all right, 'e is."

"Now I understand why you were in such a hurry to get to the show, you young shaver!" I said.

Dick was too engrossed to reply.

"By way of contrast."—p. 1130.

The strong man drew up his arms to show his tremendous biceps, straightened his legs to show the great muscles thereof and inhaled a deep breath to exhibit his capacious chest. Then he suddenly started on a recitation, delivered in a high-pitched monotone, and at such a tremendous rate that we could barely catch a single phrase. I gathered, however, that the strong man was describing vividly and in detail the marvellous feats he performed. His outburst ceased as suddenly as it had begun, and, swinging round, he disappeared behind the curtain.

"Don't yer go doin' that often," called out a girl in the crowd, "or yer'll strain yerself."

But the solemn-looking showman was now shouting "Walk in! Walk in!" with great energy, the while he held the curtain aside invitingly, and the girl with the bag was busy taking the money as one after another of the crowd accepted the invitation with a sheepish air. We entered with the rest, and I immediately lost sight of Dick, who had forced his way to the front of the circle which the strong man had already formed.

The atmosphere was heavy under the flare-lights with mingled odours of oranges, stale tobacco smoke, and general mustiness, but it was little the onlookers troubled about the atmosphere. They were intent on the doughty deeds and gyrations of the strong man, who seemed to be going to all kinds of trouble to entertain them. From my position on the outskirts of the thickly packed circle around him I caught occasional glimpses, which showed me that he had in one of his hands a mass of heavy weights, tied together with rope, and was playing with them as though they were blocks of wood, now swinging them about his head in the most alarming way, now holding them out at arm's length, now drawing his elbows in and raising them up slowly until his arm, quivering under the great strain, was perfectly straight above the shoulder, now letting them down with a great crash and clatter on the floor. He held them this way and he held them that, he swung them forwards and backwards and roundabout until I thought he must surely do injury to himself. What the strong man did not do was not worth doing, an opinion which Dick seemed to share, judging from his open mouth and rapt expression when I once caught sight of him. And, finally, the strong man introduced his pièce de résistance, his culminating effort. He lay down flat on his back, drew up his feet, put his hands on the floor beneath him, and raised his body, chest well out and head thrown back. A piece of board, long and broad, was then produced by one of the showmen, and was placed, one end resting on his knees, the other on his chest. A groove at the latter end fitted the curve of his chin, and gave him the appearance of a trunkless head.

"Now, gents," said the showman, looking round, "will any two gents oblige by steppin' forward?"

There was an immediate response from two men, who stood waiting for instructions with as grave an air as though they were assisting at an inquest.

"'Ere, if you please, gents," said the showman, putting them in position, one on each side of the recumbent athlete. "Now ketch 'old of each other's right 'and over the board."

They obeyed.

"Now each put one foot on the board. That's right. Now both step up at the same time. Steady, if you please! Thank you, gents. Now, will two other gents kindly oblige? Thank you. You two are about the same weight. One on each side in the same way. Ketch 'ands. One foot on the board. Step up as gently as you can. Thank you. Now two other gents, if you please. Exackly in the same way. Gently, please. Thank you. There you are, ladies and gents! Six men on the board! Six men's solid weight restin' on 'is chest by the strength of the muscles of arms and legs."

A murmur of admiration passed round the assembly, followed by a hearty burst of applause.

"Thank you, gents. Step down together, if you please. Thank you, ladies and gents all. This partic'ler part of the show is over."

The six men stepped down, the board was removed, and the strong man stood up, looking hot but triumphant.

"This way to see the great giant! One penny to see the great Hibernian giant, the tallest man in the world!"

The showman was now standing at the foot of the staircase which led to the upper rooms. The great majority of us flocked in his direction; the remainder went out.

We found the great Hibernian giant seated in state in the upper room—the same bearded, meek-looking, silk-hatted individual whose portrait we had seen on the poster. Dick went up close to him, and coolly surveyed him, as though he had been some rare type of animal. The rest of us stood in a group, and regarded him in mute admiration. There was a short silence, during which the giant looked at us ruminatingly, and tapped his foot on the floor, apparently to demonstrate to us that there was no deception.

"My! Ain't he a big 'un!" giggled a girl at my elbow to her swain. "What a whopper 'e'd be to walk aht with!"

"You ain't got no call to walk aht with 'im, 'ave yer?" retorted the young man, with some acerbity.

The showman came in briskly.

"Ladies and gents, allow me to introdooce to you the great Hibernian giant, acknowledged by Public and Press to be the tallest and biggest man in the world."

The giant rose to his feet and solemnly bowed to us. Then he took three or four strides to show us his proportions; then he turned round that we might investigate his back; then he beckoned to a small young woman, and in a fatherly, affectionate manner placed her at his side by way of contrast—a proceeding which called forth the utmost delight and confusion on her part. Then he picked out a tall man and patted him playfully as he looked down at his head.

These little stock amenities over, the giant raised his hat to us, and said:

"Well, good-night to you, and thank you."

We did not take the hint, but continued to stand staring at him. The giant looked bored, and took another turn down the room. There was a would-be comic man amongst us who had made one or two inane attempts to raise a laugh. He now tried again.

"How do it feel up there, eh?" he asked.

This was an extremely threadbare joke, and no one even smiled. Yet the humorist must needs court another failure.

"I s'pose you was born very young, like meself?" he said, glancing around him for approval.

The giant looked into vacancy, and the crowd were chillingly silent; whereupon the wag gave it up and retired into himself.

"Well, good-night to you all," the giant said again, taking off his hat.

"Good-night, ladies and gents; good-night, good-night, thank you all," said the showman, walking us away in the most insistent manner.

"What's 'is 'ight?" asked one of him as he pressed us towards the staircase.

"I don' know," said the showman, with the most gracious affability. "'E won't tell anybody 'is 'ight."

As we walked homeward the street carnival was at its briskest. The sweet-vendor, the gramophone, and the weighing-machine man were still shouting each other down, and the sweet-vendor was making exactly the same speech, with exactly the same jokes.

"He evidently says the same things over and over," I remarked.

"Yus," said Dick, with scorn. "After finishin', 'e waits a bit an' then begins again to a fresh lot."

The peepshow man, as we repassed, was more wrathful than ever at the lack of customers, and at the ways of the world in general. He walked to and fro before the gaping onlookers, with his hands in his pockets, tossing his head in disgust, clicking his tongue against the roof of his mouth, pausing to contemplate the faces around him with aggrieved astonishment.

"Well, I will say this, chaps," he burst forth with scathing irony; "you're a wonderful good-lookin' lot of fellers, but you ain't got much else to recommend you."

His audience stared at him, stolid and unabashed.

He pushed his hat desperately over the back of his head, looked at three or four boy customers whose eyes were glued to the peepholes, and in a fit of frenzy dashed his right fist into the palm of his left hand.

"Look 'ere!" he said. "Them boys, them boys, mind you, 'ave got more sense than all of you put together. They knows a good thing when they sees it. 'Ere's a choice lot of picters as I've travelled two 'undred miles to show yer, an'—an'—yer won't look at 'em!"

There was no response. The showman walked over to the wheel of the barrow on which his peepshow was resting and laid his elbow on it in speechless indignation.

"Two 'undred miles!" he said, addressing the housetops, "all to show these bloomin' picters! 'Ow do they think I'm a-goin' to do it?"

"Is that 'all my eye' too?" I asked Dick, as we went on.

"Yus," said Dick. "It's only 'is wye of doin' it. 'E gets on well enough."

In the conversation which followed between us, Dick gave his reminiscences of divers other street shows which had visited the neighbourhood within his recollection. He seemed to be a regular walking directory on the subject. He recalled with unction, and with many sage criticisms, the Fat Lady, the Marvellous Tattooed Man, the Fire-eating Nigger from West Africa, and the Great Snake-bodied Acrobat, who tied himself up and undid himself, and generally twisted himself about as though he were made of india-rubber.

"And which do you like best of all the shows you have seen?" I asked.

"The strong man," said Dick, with decision. "'E was a bit of all right, 'e was. Means to be a strong man meself," he added curtly.

I looked at his spare, stunted figure. A strong man! Poor little Dick!

A ROMANCE OF OLD FRANCE.

By Christopher Hare, Author of "Dreams to Sell," Etc.

CHAPTER XXXI.

MADAME D'OLBREUSE was well content. Her simple diplomacy had succeeded beyond all expectation, and another deed of charity was added to that hidden record of which the world knew so little.

Early in January her husband had occasion to take a journey to Paris, that he might present a petition to the King on behalf of certain Protestants, and she had charged him to bear news of Mademoiselle de la Féronniere to the Hôtel Maillebois, for the Duke was an old friend of his. He and Gabrielle had rejoiced to hear of Yvonne's safety, and had forthwith sent off a trusty messenger in pursuit of Réné, with directions to spare no cost and not to return until he had delivered the letter with which he was entrusted.

Such was the report which Monsieur d'Olbreuse brought back to his wife, but many days passed before her hopes were realised by the coming of the Chevalier de Beaumanoir. She it was who had told him of Yvonne's retreat by the sea, and smiled on the impatience which sent him in search of her, all travel-stained and fresh from his headlong journey.

But Madame d'Olbreuse could not rest here. She knew that danger lurked on every side, and that no one could foretell what an hour might bring forth. One bold move, and all would be safe. The marriage must take place at once, and the means were within her reach.

It so chanced that the Curé of the parish of Aleigne on the way to La Rochelle, though of another faith, was a man after her own heart, of deep religious thought and learning, a scholar and a mystic. Great things had been expected of Monsieur Benoît in the clerical world, and the Pope himself had taken special notice, during a period of his early life spent in Rome, of his devotion and eloquence.

After this he was for a time the most popular preacher in Paris. Men and women crowded to hear him as he dwelt upon that pure inward worship in which the soul is so united to God that it adores Him in holy joy and sees Him face to face. Outward forms were of small account to him. He dared to think for himself, to point out abuses, until his superiors detected heresy in his doctrine. When, later still, he was found to have carried on an earnest correspondence with Madame Guyon and other Quietists, his fate was sealed, and he was exiled to a remote parish in La Vendée. Yet he still remained true to his opinions, and when the terrible persecution of the Protestants began he did all in his power to protect them and mitigate their sufferings.

This was the priest to whom Madame d'Olbreuse turned for help. She took him into her counsel, and told him all the story of those two young lovers who, after so many adventures and so much constancy, were thus strangely brought together.

"You will marry them, Monsieur?" she pleaded. "I know that it is much to ask, for it will make you enemies in high places."

"Madame, I pray that no ignoble fear may cause me to shrink from that which my soul approves. I will be ready to perform the marriage at any time you may appoint."

"Ah, Monsieur, I expected no less from you. After matins in the church of Aleigne will you tarry awhile in the sacristy for the next three days? If all be well, we will meet you, for dangers crowd around, and there is not an hour to lose."

So it was arranged, and Madame d'Olbreuse set forth on her homeward journey, with the glad assurance that she had smoothed away the first difficulty, and her courage rose to the task before her.

Both she and her husband felt strongly attracted by the gallant bearing and radiant brightness of young Beaumanoir; he reminded them so keenly of a dearly loved son whom they had lost. As they sat round the great wood fire, when all were once more gathered together in the Château d'Olbreuse, Réné told the story of his adventures with a simple modesty and directness which won all hearts.

Yvonne listened, with breathless interest, to the account of the voyage to Algiers, the reception by the Pasha, the sudden attack so quickly repulsed; but when it came to the parting with Monsieur de la Forêt her eyes filled with tears.

"I cannot bear to think of it!" she sighed. "So sad a martyrdom, far from all who love him."

"Nay, rather, the crown and fulfilment of a noble life," said Madame d'Olbreuse, in a low, grave voice. "To die, as he has lived, for the sake of others. What better fate can we ask for our dear friend?"

There was a deep, expressive silence before the Chevalier briefly told what befell him on his return to France.

"I had searched far and near for my lady in vain, but it may have been that I was not secret and subtle enough. My very eagerness may have betrayed me. Then, after much weary wandering, came the glad day when my sister Gabrielle's letter reached me.

"I was at Poictiers, for at length I had decided to beard the lion in his den and boldly risk all by asking Monsieur de Vaudreuil where he had hidden his niece. He received me with much outward show of courtesy, and assured me on his solemn oath that, doubtless lured by ill advice, she had rashly fled from the safe home he had provided, and that he knew not what had become of her.

"It so chanced that I was still in the audience chamber when the messenger from Paris arrived, having tracked me through the streets, like a bloodhound, to the Hôtel de Ville. In my eagerness I broke the seal and read the glad news at once."

The listeners looked at each other with dismay in their eyes.

"You read it in the presence of Monsieur de Vaudreuil? But you said not a word, you did not betray your joy?" asked his hostess anxiously.

"I see now that I was to blame, but think what that ray of hope was to me, Madame!" he exclaimed. "It was the sudden flooding with light of a dark chamber. I spoke but a word of hasty farewell, and was only bent on making my escape."

There was an ominous pause.

Yvonne gave a little gasp, and said, half under her breath, "Then he suffered you to depart?"

"Yes, and I lost not a moment," continued Réné. "As I passed down the great staircase and crossed the stone courtyard into the street, I found that the wintry daylight was waning fast and a thick, icy mist was rising from the river. I quickened my steps, and as I hurried on, my way to the inn led me through a dark, narrow alley with high blank walls on either side. Suddenly I became aware of footsteps behind me, and the suspicion passed through my mind that I was dogged; but before I dreamt of an attack or put myself on guard a crushing blow on my head struck me to the ground.

"For a brief space I must have lost consciousness, for when I came to myself, still giddy and dazed, I caught sight of a shadowy figure escaping in the distance. I struggled to my feet, but pursuit was hopeless in those unfamiliar by-lanes, and I made the best of my way back to the 'Colombe d'Or,' where after some delay

I found my man and bid him get the horses ready at once. My purse was gone, but I had already lightened it to pay the messenger, and I am too old a traveller to carry all my eggs in one basket. There were gold pieces sewn up in my saddle-bag to pay mine host before we set forth on our journey.

of the sentinels took me to be a young spark who was fleeing from his creditors. All my protests were in vain, and I was locked up in the common gaol. Only after two days of devoted effort on the part of my faithful servant, who proved my identity and threatened the King's vengeance, was I at length set free

"'In my eagerness I broke the seal and read the glad news at once.'"

"When we reached the south gate our safe-conduct was abruptly demanded, and to my horror I found that the satchel containing my papers had been stolen."

"Was the letter from Gabrielle also taken?" asked Yvonne, pale with anxiety.

"Alas, yes, it was gone. I had thrust it inside my doublet, and it may have fallen out in the scuffle, but every word was engraven on my heart, and I knew that I should find you here in safe keeping. The loss of my papers was a disaster; for, by ill-fortune, one to continue my journey. But I had lost precious time for which no haste could make atonement!"

It was Madame d'Olbreuse who spoke.

"I see it all. Our fears were but too well-founded. You were betrayed, my friend. Every moment of delay is fraught with danger; we must act at once. Monsieur le Chevalier and you, my Yvonne, are you prepared to checkmate your enemy by an immediate marriage?"

A rosy flush overspread the girl's face, but there was no mistaking the supreme content in her shining eyes.

"Madame, how can I ever thank you?" cried Réné, bending down to kiss the hand of the brave lady who dared thus to befriend them. You have saved my bride, you have brought us together, and now you offer us the crowning joy of all! But in these troubled times how will you achieve it? Where will you find a curé?" He paused.

"He is already found," was the eager reply. "The Curé of Aleigne awaits the wedding party to-morrow in the village church."

Then the Duchess went on to tell of Monsieur Benoît, his large-hearted tolerance and the charity he had shown to fugitives and refugees, hiding them in his own house and braving for their sake censure and deprivation.

But Monsieur d'Olbreuse struck a warning note. He drew young Beaumanoir aside later in the evening.

"Monsieur le Chevalier, there is one matter on which I feel it my duty to speak. Are you aware of the heavy penalty attached to marriage with a Protestant? By the Act passed in 1680 you lose all right of inheritance. As you are an only son, this will touch you closely. Moreover, you will have no hope of promotion, and may not even be suffered to remain in the Royal Navy."

"I thank you, Monsieur le Duc, but I know all," replied the young man, with a quiet smile. "Believe me, no sacrifice will be too great for the prize which I look to win. We have counted the cost, and will gladly face toil and poverty—together!"

A silent clasp of the hand was his friend's only answer, and so the matter rested.

It was Madame d'Olbreuse who kept anxious vigil that night, for on her rested the whole burden of responsibility. To the courage and strength of a man, she joined the tender, sensitive nature of a woman, whose keen imagination goes forward to meet trouble and danger half way.

Through all the long hours of darkness, the rustling wind up the bleak passages and behind the hanging tapestry, the creaking of time-worn timber—every weird sound in the old château was a menace, and never was the coming of a red, frosty dawn more gladly hailed.

The Duchess had given her orders overnight, and in due time the great, lumbering chariot drove across the courtyard to the foot of the broad stone staircase. She had not confided her plans to the servants of the household, or to the Protestant refugees who in disguise still shared her hospitality, and the rumour had spread that Madame was about to set forth on a journey.

A white dress of the fashion of other days had been unearthed from some ancient chest to adorn the bride, and her only companions were her hostess and old Madelon. Monsieur d'Olbreuse and Réné had preceded them on horseback, and in this order the wedding party made their way for some miles along the rough country road until they reached the village church. Monsieur le Curé awaited them with an aspect of calm benevolence, which showed no trace of haste or anxiety, and proceeded to celebrate the marriage according to the rites of his Church. Never had two noble families been united with less pomp and ceremony; it was a contrast, in truth, to the stately grandeur of Gabrielle's wedding at Beaumanoir amid an admiring crowd of friends and kindred.

Times were changed indeed, for scarcely had the last words of the benediction been spoken when the peaceful atmosphere was roused to a sudden awakening. There was a clatter of horses' hoofs without, and at the church porch the bride and bridegroom were met by one who brought an urgent message from the governor of La Rochelle.

An envoy extraordinary had arrived from his Majesty, and M. le Duc d'Olbreuse was besought to come at once, as the matter concerned him closely.

"It may be some new trouble for my poor refugees, if my sister Éléonore has failed in her appeal."

"Heard you any mention of the Duchess of Brunswick?" he asked the messenger.

"None, Monsieur. I know no more than I told you."

"Then I must lose no time!" exclaimed d'Olbreuse, turning to his wife. "It is but a morning ride to La Rochelle, and I look to return before night."

"But you cannot go alone, Alexander, without an escort!" she pleaded.

Réné stepped forward. He gave one glance at his bride, and her steadfast eyes and mobile face answered his mute appeal.

"If you permit me, I ride with you, Monsieur!" he said in a tone of quiet resolve.

The horses were waiting at the foot of the steps, and he sprang lightly into the saddle.

"But I cannot part the newly wedded!"

exclaimed the Duke in dismay. "What say you, Madame de Beaumanoir?" and he bowed low before the girl.

"That he follow you, Monsieur, is the first request I make my lord, and he will not deny me!" she replied, with a proud smile on her lips.

"Spoken like a Spartan wife!" he gaily laughed. "In these days it is well that our ladies are brave as they are beautiful. If trouble should arise, with this young paladin by my side all will be well!" and he bent down on his saddle as he kissed his hand to Madame d'Olbreuse.

Yvonne and Réné exchanged one long glance, in which each read the soul of the other in perfect trust. A minute later and the horsemen had galloped away, without another backward look.

There was a wistfulness in Yvonne's face, which, for all her brave show, betrayed her to the faithful old Madelon. Seeking to turn her thoughts elsewhere, she suggested:

"Now that you are here close by, if Madame permits, will you come with me to see old Jeanne? It would give her great joy to greet you on your wedding day."

Madame d'Olbreuse was quick to understand and approve. "Yes, my child; that is well thought of. She was your mother's maid, I remember, and had tended her from childhood. I will leave you at the cross-ways, by the foot-path, and then pay a visit to my friend Madame de l'Aleigne. You and Madelon will join me at the château, and we will drive home together."

The girl gladly assented. In her own radiant, overwhelming happiness, it was a relief to think of giving pleasure to the dear old woman who had so little in this world.

The cottage of the Hues nestled in a little hollow sheltered by wind-blown trees, at a short distance from the road. Yvonne waved a gay farewell to her friend, who bid her wrap her mantle closely round her, as the air was keen and frosty.

"What a brave girl it is!" mused Madame d'Olbreuse, as she drove on. "Yet I cannot quite forgive myself, for it was through my hasty words that the young lovers were parted on their wedding day. Heaven grant that it be not a bad omen. At least, I am more content to know that my husband has a gallant young comrade by his side. I pray God they be not long delayed, and have a safe return."

The road to the Château d'Aleigne took a long winding turn, and the ruts were deep, so that the lumbering chariot made but slow progress. Suddenly Madame was roused from her absorbing thoughts by the sound of horsemen in the distance. She could not see them owing to the sharp curve in the highway; but her first thought was of intense gladness, in the hope that some unforeseen tidings might have sent her cavaliers back already.

"How happy Yvonne will be!" she exclaimed. "I will send the Chevalier to meet her at once."

A few minutes later, as they reached the corner, the coach was pulled up abruptly, and one of the footmen, springing down, stood white and trembling by the window.

"Oh, Madame!" he gasped, "old Pierre thinks they are brigands!"

"There is no cause for alarm, in broad daylight and on the open road," was her calm reply. "Tell Pierre to drive on."

But the order was not obeyed, for in another moment the carriage was surrounded by soldiers on horseback, armed with pikes and halberts, while a loud voice shouted:

"In the name of the King!"

Then she knew. These were the hateful dragoons whom she had believed to be far away. Resistance was hopeless, and the Duchess sat silent and motionless, like a figure of ivory, while the interior of the coach was searched and her servants roughly questioned.

The leader, who seemed to be in a very bad temper, shook his clenched fist at her, and shouted:

"Madame, where are your companions, those cursed heretics? We have sure information, and demand that you give them up!"

"I do not know who you may be, Monsieur, you who insult a helpless woman!" she answered with quiet dignity, as her scornful gaze rested full upon his lowering face. "Even when M. de la Briquette searched my château with his soldiers, he treated me with the outward respect to which I, the Duchesse d'Olbreuse, am used."

"What do I care who you are?" was the brutal rejoinder. "But we are losing time. You will be conducted back, under a safe guard, to your home, where I will set a watch that no one may enter or leave it."

With that he gave a few whispered directions to his lieutenant, and, taking with him one of the terrified footmen, he galloped off with the rest of his troop.

CHAPTER XXXII.

"AT last, Yvonne! You will not escape this time!"

These were the words which sounded in the girl's ears with a ring of insolent triumph. She looked up, and Adolphe de Vaudreuil stood before her: it was to his presence that she had been dragged with brutal violence by the soldiers.

Ah! She had known it from the first moment, when the cottage had been stealthily surrounded, and Madelon's warning cry had come too late. She was mute with indignation. Her reproachful eyes glittered like stars in the pale, worn face, whose spiritual look was accentuated by the stern simplicity of her antique white dress with its clinging folds.

She might have been some virgin martyr led to the stake.

"Ah, my cousin, you would be glad enough to marry me now!" he jeered. "But I am grown dainty in my taste. I desire a rosy bloom, and a merry tongue, and a dowry of much gold! To-day, it seems to me that you have none of these!" he added, as he caught her by the shoulders and peered into her face.

"The girl's eyes still met his with fearless scorn."

Yvonne shook herself free, with a gesture of horror.

"Must I tell you once more that I would not marry you to save myself from torture or death!" she cried in passionate disdain. "You come too late, Monsieur, and I thank Heaven for your hate. I am already the wife of the Chevalier de Beaumanoir, and the tie betwixt us none can break."

For one moment he looked at her in dumb fury; then he muttered to himself:

"That was what the serving man stammered out when we tortured him."

If looks had power to kill, the girl would have died at his feet; but he quickly recovered his outward composure.

"You are easy to cheat, Mademoiselle. The marriage was a farce! A Huguenot is beyond the pale, and only the King's word could make it hold. Your brave gallant must have deserted you at the church door!" was the sneering rejoinder. "Well, you must put up with me now. I have you at my mercy, whether it be for love or hatred," he added in a hoarse whisper.

The girl's eyes still met his with such fearless scorn that he could only believe she must have some hidden weapon. He would run no risk.

"Bind her hands!" was his next order.

Madelon had drawn near, and was tenderly wrapping a warm mantle around her mistress. At the words she gave a cry of dismay and horror.

"Stop the mouth of that old woman, who nearly gave the alarm already. One of you must take her on your saddle," said De Vaudreuil. "We start at once, Dubois, see that the horses are brought round. I myself will clip the wings of my lady here!"

Their leader's rude jest was greeted with loud laughter by the dragoons, and the poor girl flushed scarlet with shame Never in the darkest hour of her adventures had she felt so nigh despair. She was held in a grip of iron, and the hot breath of her captor seemed to scorch her brows and cheeks, while she writhed in vain to loosen her hands from the cords which were cutting into her tender wrists.

Adolphe watched her with a pitiless smile, and she quivered beneath his intolerable gaze, for now she was absolutely powerless, and he knew it. Was ever fall so sudden and terrible? In one moment the cup of happiness had been dashed from her lips, and she had been cast down from the gates of Paradise to the lowest inferno.

The agony of mind and body was more than she could endure. Shuddering, she turned aside; a mist seemed to rise before her eyes, and a sudden giddiness came over her; she wavered from side to side, and as she fell swooning to the ground her head struck the side of the door, and she lost consciousness.

It was an awkward moment for Adolphe de Vaudreuil, but he was not to be hindered by so small a matter as a woman's faint. At least, he would not have to face resistance or reproach.

With some difficulty the girl's helpless form was lifted up into his saddle, so that he could support her in his arms. The powerful grey horse was quite equal to the additional burden; and his master started off at once, without compunction, for he had already delayed too long. He quieted any misgivings by assuring himself that the air would quickly revive his unconscious charge. It was most urgent that he should make for La Rochelle at once, as he had a meeting on hand there, of overwhelming importance to him, with an agent from the King of Spain.

To retrieve his ruined fortunes he had plunged deep into plots of the most desperate nature. The Señor Don Diaz de San José was to arrive in the town that very day in disguise, and was to bring him a large sum of money. This was in payment for plans of fortifications and the most private information, secretly obtained, of the intentions of King Louis and the decisions of his Council. De Vaudreuil had been on his way to completing these perilous negotiations, when he received from his father certain tidings of Yvonne's whereabouts, and he had at once made forced marches to secure her person.

It was well to have another string to his bow, for his debts were becoming notorious, and no one would trust him. He ground his teeth as he thought of the time wasted over his father's mild and futile plan of shutting the girl up in a convent and awaiting the slow process of conversion.

"She wants a strong hand like this," he muttered, "and we shall soon bring her to reason now. Of a surety, this marriage will be set aside, and possession is nine points of the law! Then, whatever befalls, we have good hope of her property, unless, indeed, the King should intervene and confiscate it."

So he told himself as he rode on at a steady trot through the frosty air. The road was now on a dead level, across the marshy land, with a broad expanse of sands to the right and the sea beyond. He began to look out anxiously for the distant view of the towers of La Rochelle, for he was growing uneasy at this long swoon, from which Yvonne did not seem to recover. Her hood had fallen back, and her head and neck were exposed, so he bent forward to draw the cloak around her, and started at the icy touch of her hand. For an instant he blenched with fear. In eager, trembling haste he cut the cord which bound her wrists, but she made no movement.

Had the strain been too much for her? Had she indeed escaped him for ever? Ah, no! He gave a gasp of relief as he felt the throbbing of her heart and listened to her even breathing. He remembered that she had struck her head against the side of the doorway, but he did not know that this strange, heavy sleep was the result of slight concussion of the brain. He looked upon it simply as a faint from which she was marvellously slow in reviving.

To his impatience, this weary ride seemed interminable, but at length they were actually under the walls of La Rochelle. Unchallenged by the sentry, who saluted the King's uniform, they passed through the Porte de la Grosse Horloge, and on into the lower part of the town, built round the inner harbour, guarded by its twin towers of St. Nicholas and De la Chaine. Adolphe here dismissed most of his dragoons to other quarters, for the meeting before him needed to be private and secret. He drew rein before a grimy-looking tavern, with a swinging signboard of the "Moor's Head," and the landlord came out to meet him with a servile bow,

"Is there under your roof a certain foreign merchant of curiosities, awaiting a collector from Paris?" asked the new arrival.

"Yes, Monseigneur; he landed from the harbour this morning, and awaits your pleasure within."

"The rough journey has been too much for Madame," he remarked, noticing the man's look of curiosity at the muffled figure. "Help her to dismount, and see to it that she and her maid yonder have proper service," and he added a few whispered words.

"You may trust me, Monseigneur!" was the ready answer, for the fellow scented an adventure.

Yvonne, who by this time seemed to be slightly recovering the power of movement, was half supported, half carried, indoors by Madelon, with the landlord's wife in close attendance.

Meantime, Adolphe de Vaudreuil gave sharp instructions to the four trusty men whom he had selected to be on guard. Then he hastily climbed the dark staircase, and was ushered into a big, low room by mine host, who scraped a bow and withdrew. A swarthy man with a square, massive face, keen black eyes, and a pointed beard, rose to meet him. He was dressed in a sober suit of dark green, but there was an air of distinction about him which belied his pose as a hawker of foreign wares.

"I must pray you to pardon my delay; but, to tell truth, there was a lady in the case!" began Adolphe with a swaggering air. "The papers are here, as I promised," and he drew a sealed packet from inside his doublet and threw it on the table.

The stranger grasped it in his slim, claw-like hands, tore it open, and greedily devoured the contents.

"Yes; they are all complete. Toulon, Marseilles, Bayonne, La Rochelle, Nantes, and the last plans of Monsieur Vauban—one, two, three," and he counted them on his finger tips. "As for the brief waiting, do not mention it, Monsieur. I have made good use of my time, for this window commands the harbour. See here, my drawing of the towers of defence, the new fortifications; and that line indicates the chain which closes the entrance. Ah, well! Here, Monsieur, is your reward."

He pointed to a strange, massive-looking casket on the ground by his side, and, pushing back a disc of brass in the inlaid pattern at the top, he touched a secret spring, and the cover flew open. Within was what appeared to be a collection of curious daggers and sword hilts, but in reality a part of the cunning mechanism. He raised the false bottom and disclosed serried layers of golden doubloons, over which De Vaudreuil bent with staring, greedy eyes.

He was still gloating over his treasure when, at that moment, the door was abruptly thrown open. With a violent start he sprang to his feet to meet the intruders.

"Gentlemen, I request you to retire. There is some mistake——" he began imperiously.

"So we perceive, Monsieur de Vaudreuil," said a voice which he seemed to have heard before. Looking up, he recognised the foremost of the party as the Governor of La Rochelle, who stepped forward and laid a hand on his shoulder.

"In the King's name, I arrest you for high treason."

Adolphe's first impulse was one of self-defence, and his hand instinctively sought the hilt of his rapier. But at a sign from the Governor two guards silently entered the room and disarmed him. The shock of discovery was so sudden and unlooked for that he was paralysed at the moment, and had not a word to say in defence. Of what avail, indeed, would be idle protest when the papers and plans, the gold, the foreign envoy, were all in full view?

The Spaniard had kept his presence of mind, and with a stealthy movement seized the documents. But he was forestalled by another hand, thin and blue-veined, with hanging ruffles of costly Flanders lace, which grasped him by the wrist.

"Don Diaz de San José, you are a man of the world, and will accept the fortune of war," said a refined, softly modulated voice. "If I might tender advice, I would not in future adventure a strange craft in the harbour of La Rochelle, where yonder sailing boat has been watched since daybreak. Nor would I land the price of treachery in so rare a casket, whose weight is more than a burden for two men!"

Stung to the quick by these errors in judgment thus brought home to him, the Spanish envoy gave a vicious kick at the open chest, which closed instantly and completely, leaving not a sign of lock or keyhole.

"You are like to find it costly enough ere it be opened, for you may pound it to atoms, and it will not betray its secret!" he remarked savagely. "And what concern is it of yours, Monsieur?" he added, taking no notice of the two guards, who stood one on each side of him.

"You have a right to ask," was the suave reply. "I am the Duc de Maillebois, one of the councillors of his Most Christian Majesty of France, on whose behalf I am here."

"The Duc de Maillebois!" gasped Adolphe, unconsciously repeating the name aloud in his utter dismay.

"Yes, Monsieur de Vaudreuil. I was with the King when this matter was brought before him, for you were betrayed by one you trusted. Ah, yes, it is the common fate of traitors to meet with treachery themselves."

A hoarse cry burst from the culprit's lips.

"Who was it? Tell me only that!" But De Maillebois continued, unheeding:

"I never saw his Majesty so agitated, so indignant! The papers with regard to this collusion with Spain were lying on the table before him, but his alarm was more personal. You were reported to have been seen with the Italian, Exili, and the King believes that you meant to poison him."

"It is false, it is a wicked lie! On my honour, I swear it!" cried the wretched Adolphe.

"The less we say of honour the better," was the cold rejoinder. "The King can never forget that on one occasion you put yourself forward to take the place of Monsieur Bontems, the head valet, in immediate attendance on his royal person for a whole day. He believes that you did this for a guilty purpose. I will add that on this point I do not agree with him."

There was a moment's pause, and the accused looked up, with a flash of hope. But the Duke continued, in a grave, steady voice:

"His Majesty, who looks carefully into the smallest matters of State, was also convinced of the serious nature of this conspiracy, but Monsieur de Louvois treated it lightly, and was disposed to throw doubt upon it. When I offered my services to unravel the Spanish plot, the King was so anxious to prove himself in the right that he welcomed my proposal with eager gratitude, and vowed that he would grant the boon I asked—simply a small matter to secure the happiness of two friends," he added in a low under-tone.

At this point there came a sudden interruption. A slatternly maid, with a scared face, put her head inside the door and called out, in a sharp, high-pitched cry:

"M'sieu, M'sieu! My mistress bids me tell you that Madame, your wife, has recovered, and will leave the house forthwith. We cannot hold her back. Ah! ah!" she ended with a scream, as she caught sight of the soldiers, and would have fled, but a voice of command bid her stay.

"Go to Madame, and pray her that she honour us with her presence. The Governor of La Rochelle will see that she come to no harm. We make not war on women."

It was Monsieur d'Olbreuse who spoke. He and Réné had been standing aside in the shadow, for the room was but dimly lighted with one small window towards the harbour. Hitherto they had not felt called upon to take any part beyond being silent witnesses on behalf of the Duc de Maillebois.

But the serving woman's words had awakened vague suspicions in the minds of all present. It was not the custom for a captain of dragoons to take his wife about the country with him on such an errand as this.

Adolphe de Vaudreuil had been far too much engrossed to take any notice of the Governor's companions. The crushing blow which had suddenly overwhelmed him had killed all curiosity. Yet now that this last crime was about to be brought home to him his very rage and despair nerved him to a sort of reckless courage. He looked up boldly at the speaker, and then for the first time caught sight of the Chevalier de Beaumanoir, who had stepped forward into the light.

It only needed that presence to crown all and set the seal upon his ignominy. He set his teeth and clenched his hands, and would have sprung at his rival, but for a sharp reminder from his guards that he was their prisoner. Fiery words clamoured in his throat, but it suddenly flashed through his quick brain that silence might deal a more deadly stab than speech.

The people at the inn had taken "Madame" for his wife; he would let the unspoken lie do its work.

A hush of expectation had fallen upon that company, so strangely brought together, who shared some dim instinct of mystery and awaited a revelation.

Framed in the sombre doorway, a young girl stood irresolute and dismayed at the sight of all those men. The western rays from the window opposite gleamed full upon her white dress and lighted up the pale face and dishevelled golden hair and deep, wistful eyes. For she was dazed with this sudden encounter, and paused on the threshold, silent and motionless as a statue. Then a great cry rang through the stillness.

"Yvonne, Yvonne! How came you here?"

"Surely by her own free will, Monsieur le Chevalier," replied Adolphe in a low, venomous tone. "Ask Madame if she did not ride hither in my arms without one word of dissent?"

Réné, beside himself, made a blind movement towards his tormentor to choke the foul lie in his throat, but the Governor was swift to forestall him.

"Guards, remove your prisoners here at once; and see them safely bestowed in the Citadel," he sharply commanded.

Old Madelon had followed her mistress, and now, taking her by the hand like a child, she led her towards Réné. In low eager tones she told the story of their surprise and capture, and ended thus:

"See, Monsieur, those soft wrists all bruised and bleeding with the cords, and the mark on her forehead where she fell. Even now she is scarce herself."

In a moment he was on his knees covering her hands with kisses in passionate remorse for one fugitive shadow of doubt; but Yvonne understood not, and she never knew.

It was well, indeed, for De Vaudreuil that, unarmed and a prisoner, he had already passed from the sight of the man whom he had so deeply wronged.

"Madame de Beaumanoir, I have news for you," said the Duc de Maillebois, in the quiet tone with which he would have addressed her in his own salon. "Gabrielle has a little son."

Yvonne had started at the sound of her new name. Then all her soul was poured forth in ardent sympathy with this great joy, which had come to her friend—the young child who would transform a palace into a home, and keep the mother's heart warm in the midst of pomp and state.

"Monsieur, I am glad," she murmured.

"It is for my wife's sake, and to give her pleasure, that I am here to-day," he added quickly. "She cannot rest until you and her brother are safe. I have rendered a service to his Majesty, and have been suffered to choose my reward. He has given his royal permission for your marriage with Réné. But the air of France is not healthy at this present for one of your faith. Your husband is therefore appointed to an honourable post in the suite of the new ambassador, who is about to sail for England. Do you consent, René?" he asked.

"How can we thank you, Monsieur?" was the eager reply. "To attain my heart's desire, and to serve my country still—it passes all my hopes!"

He caught the hand of Yvonne and looked in her face. No words could have been half so eloquent as that happy silence, for her smile of pure content was like the sunshine on a river.

AND HOW TO WORK THEM.

TEXTS and mottoes, when used for decorative purposes, are rarely arranged in a manner that is likely to be permanent. As a rule, they are fashioned so as to give a festive appearance for a few days or a week only, and at the end of that time they are taken down, rolled up, or packed flat, as the case may be, and put away for the next occasion.

The fashion of framing favourite texts and of hanging them on the walls of a mission room, or of the principal rooms of our homes has in great measure died out, but there are still some families who count an embroidered text as one of their treasured possessions, and they like to have the words always before their eyes. For them there is an immense choice of texts to be had ready printed on perforated card. These are by no means the crudities that they were some few years ago, and they are now arely offensive in design, and need not be made so in colouring.

An example of a motto of this kind is given first of all. To many a worker possessed of deft fingers the task of working such a text is not at all disagreeable, and many an invalid has found weary hours shortened by such an occupation. Some of the embroidery threads that are now to be had in so great a variety to imitate silk can quite successfully be used for the work, which is for the most part executed in cross-stitch, though for tracing fine scrolls back-stitch is needed, and borders and straight lines are as often as not followed with a couching of silk. Gold thread may also be employed for outlines and for scrolls. It is not necessary to keep the same make of thread throughout, for, upon a good-sized piece of work, slight disparities are not visible, and odds and ends of all makes of silks or threads may be used, provided that they are about the same thickness and that the shades and colours are harmonious. The cross-stitch may be very quickly worked by carrying one long stitch first straight along the line to be covered, and working back over this with half-cross stitches. It is necessary for these stitches to slant in the same direction in every detail of the work, and it is possible to execute it so evenly that the effect is very much that of tapestry work done upon canvas, except that here the background is left quite clear. Too many stitches would be apt to tear away the card by their weight and by the inevitable dragging that must result from filling in too closely.

But there are other ways of executing mottoes and texts with embroidery that will commend themselves to many workers as being more artistic and quite as bold. The first of these methods will make scrolls and other devices that, being rather limp, are easily rolled up when they are required to be stored, ready for another occasion. Coloured linen is one of the best of backgrounds for these embroidered letters. Naturally, the colours must depend upon the rest of the decorations of the room in which the text is to be employed. Pale green, blue, and pinkish terra-cotta are good backgrounds when pale tints are needed, but there are plenty of darker shades to be had if the letters are to be quite light.

The gift of designing letters for herself is not possessed by every worker, but there are plenty of inexpensive aids provided for her. For mottoes bearing, perhaps, the words "Welcome Home," or "God bless the Bride and Bridegroom," the floral letters that are to be had in transfer at nearly every fancy shop are very well adapted, and, provided that the decorative portion is not executed so heavily as to make the letters themselves indistinct, they answer admirably. The stitches to be employed for them are exactly such as would be used for any other piece of needlework. Among them are outline, couching, chain, back-stitch, French knots, satin stitch, and others.

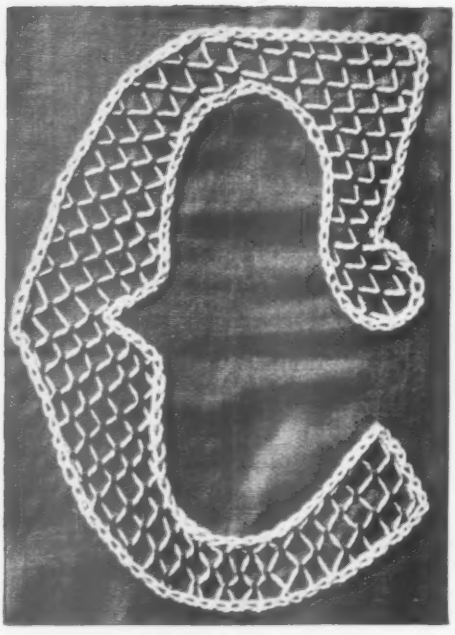
In our next example we reproduce a bold letter that is quite easy to work and that looks very well upon almost any background. The whole of the letter is covered with a lattice made of long stitches of white Lustrine or some other coarse twisted thread. All this is easy enough to manage, and with most people no guide is required for placing the stitches. Should, however, the worker be doubtful of the correctness of her eye, she will do well to take a piece of card and make a couple of notches in it to mark the space that is to be left between each stitch.

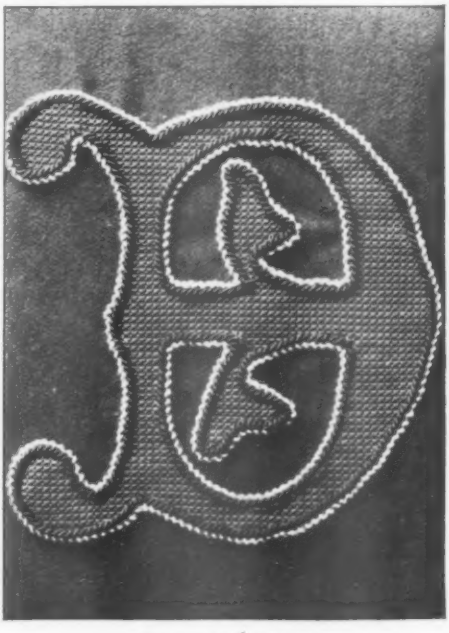


After all the threads have been placed for the meshes of the lattice they have to be caught down, each with a single straight stitch of another colour, which must be carried over the threads at every point at which two lines meet. In executing this part of the embroidery there will be the opportunity for correcting any slight irregularity there may be in the placing of the meshes of the lattice. The stitches must all be the same size and set at exactly the same angle upon the material. When they are all done the letters have to be outlined, either with chain-stitch worked with white, as in the illustration, or with coarse thread couched down, or with fine cord, or with buttonhole-stitch, as the fancy of the worker may suggest. Care must be taken to work without puckering the material, for we must try to give our decorations as professional a look as possible.

AN EMBROIDERED MOTTO ON PERFORATED CARD.

Another good and rather rapid way of managing texts and mottoes is by the aid of appliqué, as shown in the letter in our third illustration. Bold characters are required for this style of work, and, as most amateurs know, the letters are cut out of one material and laid on to another fabric of a contrasting colour.

Before cutting out the letters to be applied it is advisable to back the whole of the material with whitey-brown paper, or with thin muslin.



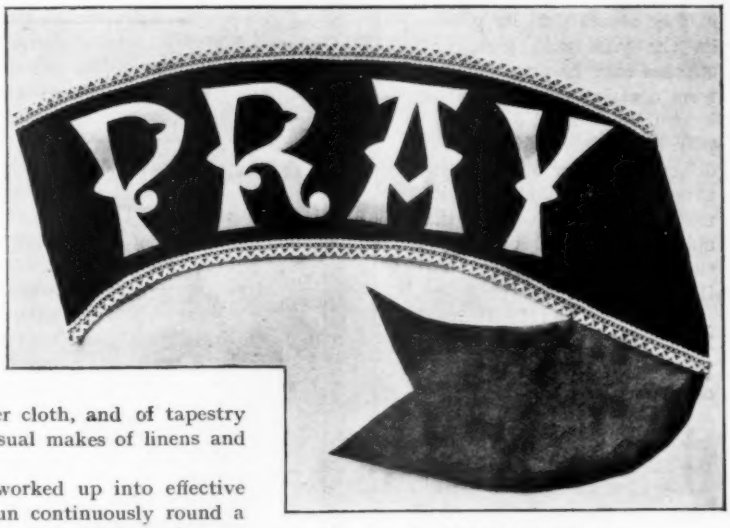
A LATTICE-EMBROIDERED LETTER.

This should be done with a good paste, and the material must then be put under press till quite dry. The letters can then be cut out, and the backing, if properly done will quite prevent the fabric from ravelling along the cut edges. As each letter is cut out, it should be pasted down to the material chosen for the background and put under a weight till dry. The letters have perhaps stuck down so thoroughly that no further fastening is necessary beyond that afforded by an ornamental outline; but if this is not the case, they must be caught down all round the edges with stitches carried over the margin of the applied material into the foundation.

Then comes the great question of ornamenting the edges. When the letters are bold there is nothing better than fine cord of some contrasting colour (see illustration). It must be caught down in such a way that the stitches allow it to hide the edges of the letters and also help to hold them down. Considerable addition to the general effect can be made by working a row of outline stitch with black or some other contrasting colour along the outside edge of the letters. This helps to throw the work into higher relief. A couching of several strands of stout thread may be employed instead of the cord, if more convenient. Fine braid also gives a very good effect, and, if the comparative slowness of the work is no disadvantage, the letters may be simply buttonholed down to the material, the cord of the stitches serving to hide the raw edges.

For appliqué it is necessary to have the letters all the same width as far as possible, but any fine work there may be about them must be put in with embroidery stitches, as these details would, in all probability, be too fine to be cut out in the brocade. The letters, of which one is illustrated below, are sufficiently large to allow of two rows of fine cord instead of the outlining, but on smaller characters a single row is quite enough.

After the style of lettering has been decided upon there are many ways open to the worker for making up the texts and mottoes to suit the special purpose for which these are to be employed. If the text is a long one, the letters may be drawn and painted very boldly, or stencilled upon text paper, which, if 13 inches wide, costs only 3½d. per yard. It is to be had at other prices proportionate to its width. Plenty of plain coloured paper is also to be obtained which will serve well for a background. Then there is ribbed or morocco gold paper,



AN APPLIQUÉ LETTER.

22 inches wide and sold by the yard. This, being also continuous, can be used for the longest of inscriptions without a seam. Another useful material is flock paper, which forms a particularly rich background, either in green, scarlet, crimson, maroon, blue, or white. It is also to be had in black and in violet. The four last-named colours are rather more expensive than the others, costing 1s. 6d. a yard instead of 1s. Designed paper, which has a conventional pattern of lilies upon it, looks like brocade, and is well suited for use for texts that are subjected to somewhat close inspection. Amateurs have a choice also of leather cloth, and of tapestry canvas, besides the usual makes of linens and hollands.

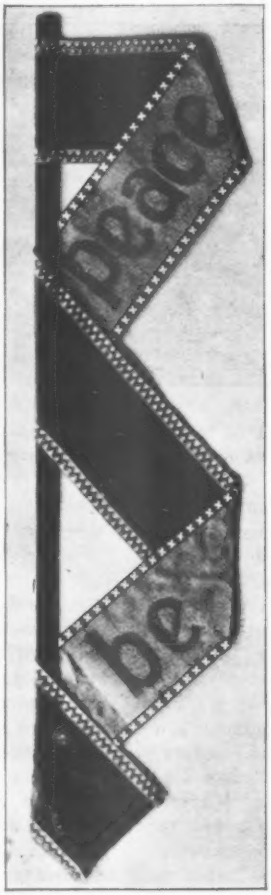
All these can be worked up into effective friezes arranged to run continuously round a room, with or without the addition of paper borders. Rainbow stains are invaluable for letter painting and for stencilling, as they look well upon almost any material, are pure and rich in colour, and are cleanly and easily applied. They have the advantage also of being sold in little tubes, so that after a small piece of painting is completed an amateur is not left with any very large amount of colour of which she does not know how to make use.

The letters, unless she who has undertaken the task is clever enough to draw her own, may most successfully be traced from paper or cardboard models cut by professional hands and supplied by the same house whence the papers were obtained. They save an infinite amount of time and trouble and are by no means costly. Small letters can generally be obtained to suit the capitals, and all the alphabets are designed to accord with various styles of architecture.

The portion of a flat scroll with a motto shown on page 1146 illustrates an easy method of arranging such a decoration down the sides of a window or a doorway. The model is intended for the right-hand side, the lath upon which it is mounted being nailed to the wall alongside the frame of the window or door. A similar flat scroll should be made for the left-hand side. A flat lath was employed as a support for the original whence our illustration was taken, but quite as good an effect may be obtained by a rounded rod if this can more easily be procured.

PART OF A RIBBON SCROLL.

A bamboo pole will answer very well, and, as this is too hard to receive nails with ease, it will have to be held against the doorway with a strip of tape secured with a fine tack, much in the same way as that in which fruit trees are nailed to a wall. A few fine tacks are necessary to keep the scroll also in its place. These need be scarcely more than pins, so that they leave no unsightly holes when the decoration is taken down. The lath is scarcely likely to be sufficiently ornamental to be left in its natural condition, unless, indeed, it is bamboo. It can easily be enamelled, stained, or gilded. The useful rainbow stain, Vandyke brown, serves very well for this purpose if the original wood is light in tint.



The motto is set upon a long strip of either of the materials mentioned above. The width must, naturally, be entirely regulated by the height of the place it is to fill and the folds of the scroll, in the same way, must depend greatly upon the length of the longest word that is to be placed upon it. It is necessary to back the material chosen for the scroll with some second fabric that will look well as a lining after the folds have been arranged. A darker tint is always better for this purpose than that upon which the lettering is to be painted.

The strip must be wound round the pole backwards and forwards, as shown in the example. This brings first the right, then the wrong side foremost. The material may be attached to its place on the pole with glue, or stitches may be arranged to form a casing through which it can be run. The latter plan is possibly a little more difficult to carry out than is the former method, but it may be a convenience to be able to take the pole out when the motto is done with and it has to be put away.

After the text itself has been painted on the scroll this requires to have the edges finished off with binding, or fancy braid, which can be glued or sewn on to the material, as is most convenient. Two kinds of braid must be procured, for the portion that is turned over from the wrong side should be of a different pattern from that on the right and lettered side. The scroll may be of any length desired, only a portion being shown in the illustration. The number of the folds need only be two or three, or they may be five or seven, as may be most appropriate to the available space.

Of scrolls the variety in shape and size is unlimited, and a "ribbon" of which we show one end on page 1145 may easily be made of any length required. Indeed, this is about the easiest of all ways of getting an effect with very little labour. In this instance the background is of flock paper of a rich crimson hue. The wrong side, which is brought to the front by the turning over of the end of the scroll, is faced with morocco gold paper. The letters of the words "Watch and Pray" are simply cut out of straw tissue. This material is convenient because, when the characters are at all soiled, they are readily cleaned by having a damp sponge taken gently over them.

A PAINTED SCROLL.

The letters are to be bought ready cut out in accordance with any style desired, and of any size. They, of course, look better when they are rather large than when they are small. The average amateur is always rather apt to err on the point of over-timidity as to size when she is planning out a text or motto, forgetting that it is most likely required to be read from a distance as well as close by. The letters look better also when at least half an inch can be left between them, and the words also need to be liberally spaced.

It is a good idea also to cut the letters out of leather cloth which is of a dull grey colour and to mount them upon flock paper in the same way as are the straw words above mentioned. With the brush and some oil or water colours, and a good medium, letters can be so tinted as to have all the appearance of being set in relief upon the background. A line of black carried round the margin of every letter on the background material will give it a much-raised appearance if judiciously managed.

At the shops at which a speciality is made of church and other decorations many other materials are to be found that can be employed for the preparation of texts and mottoes.

Among these is frosted swansdown, which makes very effective letters if laid upon a coloured or golden background. There is an infinite variety in artificial flowers too, which may be set closely together to form letters, the background scroll or shield itself being bordered with green leaves. If well managed, these have an extremely festive appearance.

DOING "AMEN."

THE STORY MOLLY'S MOTHER HAD TO TELL.

By Mrs. G. S. Reaney.

BITTERLY cold day in March—a day upon which to hurry along and get through your work quickly if you chanced to be walking ; if driving, to turn up the coat collar or fasten more closely the fur, sheltering the neck from the biting wind ; while all the time the thought of home with its cheery fireside would mean comfort of a kind which belongs to these occasions.

Into the bleak and almost deserted street of a small provincial town two little figures turned, quaint, weird-looking, walking slowly, their arms intertwined around each other's neck. Neither hat nor cap rested upon the tangled, untidy hair, arms and shoulders were bare. The elder girl—she was barely nine—wore a ragged apron ; the younger, a child of seven, a soiled pinafore ; in both cases a tattered skirt came down to the heels. That they were sisters could be seen at a glance. Both had dark, curly hair, which did something more than fringe the weird little faces—faces which looked as if "tub-night" to them was a luxury unknown. Both had large, dark eyes, wistful and sad.

As this quaint little couple walked slowly and solemnly in the middle of the narrow road it was evident from their downward glances that they were in search of something. Now and again they stooped, and the hand at liberty picked up from the ground the crumbs of bread with—as a great "find"—a stray piece of broken crust, which some thrifty housewife had thrown to the birds.

It was not always to the mouth of the one who owned the hand thus busy that the picked up morsel found its way. An onlooker would have thought each child fed the other. That both were hungry was all too evident.

A lady watched the children for awhile with tear-filled eyes. "Poor hungry mites," she said, half aloud, as she slowed her steps not to overtake them. Then an impulse seized her. Hurrying forward, she put a hand upon the shoulder of the girl nearest to her, and said :

"Let us go into yonder baker's shop and buy a loaf of bread. I believe you would enjoy a real slice better than these crumbs."

"You bet we would," said the elder of the two, a new light dancing in her eyes, and a rich glow spreading over her pinched little face, blue with the cold.

"Come with me, then," said the lady, as she led the way to the shop indicated.

In a minute or two the children had run off with their precious treasure—a stale quartern loaf—while the lady awaited the change. She was disappointed to find them gone when she turned from the counter. Who were they ? What were their names ?

It was some days before she saw them again. The keen wind had gone. The day was wet and mild. The children were sauntering down the street, less blue and cold, but not less ragged.

Ever and anon they paused before a shop window. The grimy little arms encircling each other's necks would relax their pressure for the moment, and the two quaint little figures would come apart. Then there would be sundry "Oh, my ! Did you ever ! " ejaculations, uttered in tones scarcely above a whisper, while the weird faces pressed the window pane, and the goods espied within met with careful scrutiny and candid criticism.

Mrs. Fairfield had watched the children with interest and amusement. They were enjoying themselves immensely. Another moment and she quite hoped to hear them laugh ; they seemed to be years younger than the day she had first made their acquaintance. But at this instant one turned and recognised her benefactress, nudging her sister to call her attention to the discovery. Sundry little bobs—the mark of the true-born country child—and brightened faces gave kindly welcome to Mrs. Fairfield.

"Tell me your names," she said, anxious to use the opportunity so eagerly longed for in the last few days.

"Please, I'm Molly, and she's Sally," said the elder girl, speaking for both. In size there was scant difference, but the face of the speaker looked several summers older—and then the apron claimed years which the pinafore could not boast.

"But your surname—your father's name ? "

"Fraser—James Fraser. Folks mostly call him 'Jim,'" said Molly, and her weather-beaten little face broke into a smile.

"And where do you live?"

"Down Belcher's Buildings—leastways, a turning out of there—the three little houses what stand back. Ours is the middle one."

"Where do you go to Sunday school?"

"Nowheres, ma'am; we ain't got no Sunday clothes." This from Sally, who evidently thought it her turn to speak.

"Well, come along, and let us get another loaf of bread," said Mrs. Fairfield as the rain at that moment came down with added force, and she led the way to the baker's shop visited on a previous occasion. She bought the loaf and gave it into the outstretched hands of little Molly; then, having paid for the bread, she turned to follow the children. They were close at hand, sitting side by side on a neighbouring doorstep, and were busy — doing what?

Both little creatures were hard at work picking off the corners of the loaf and pressing their grimy little hands flat upon the muddy pavement, then rubbing them upon the bread.

Angered, hurt beyond measure, Mrs. Fairfield hastened towards the children.

"You naughty, wicked little girls! How dare you waste that beautiful bread like that?" she said sharply.

"Please, ma'am," said Molly, and her big eyes were filled with tears, "we don't want mother to sell this loaf, as she did the other; that's why we're making it look dirty. That day we took the quartern home you gave us, mother said she'd borrow a nice knife to cut it, and she went out and—and——" Molly's sobs choked her utterance, and Sally's voice took up the story: "The landlord of 'The White Horse' gave her a quart of beer in place of it, and we never set eyes on it no more."

The memory was painful, and sympathy with Molly overwhelming. Sally broke down completely here, and Mrs. Fairfield felt her own eyes fill with tears hard to be kept back.

It was easy after this to make friends with the children, to bid them come to her house for clothing—she had little children about their size—and to gain their promise to attend the ragged school the following Sunday.

This was the beginning of better days to Molly and Sally. No children were more punctual in attendance, more eager to learn, more responsive to sympathy shown. The efforts to come clean and neat as became the occasion were more marked than effectual, and very quaint were their sayings when Mrs. Fairfield would catechise them herself.

"It was nice to think the Lord Jesus cared that much about them that He was sorry for them when they got a 'hiding.'"

"And did He really mind bad words? They'd never use no more—no, not if they had to bite their tongues off to keep them in."

One day Molly's little face was flushed with weeping, and her chest heaved involuntarily with sobs which could not be hushed into silence. Mrs. Fairfield watched her opportunity and inquired the trouble.

Shyly the child told her story. Once when mother scolded her she "sauced her back," but she knew the Lord Jesus would be grieved if she did so now. That day her poor drinking mother had "knocked her about a bit," and Molly had hidden in a cupboard underneath the stairs, lest she should get to the end of "holding out" and sauce her mother back. She had gone without her dinner, and cried until she could not cry any more.

Mrs. Fairfield gave the comfort befitting the occasion in hopeful and praise-giving words:

"Mother might one day be better; nothing was too hard for God. He could give her a new heart, and then she would hate the drink which made her cruel. Molly had pleased the Lord Jesus by not saucing mother; for He had bidden us learn of Him, the meek and lowly of heart," and more was said in the same strain—teaching of a kind which could only fill the child-heart of little Molly with tenderness and love.

* * * * * *

And so the spring came and went, and summer found Molly and Sally less weird and more childlike. New thoughts and emotions had come into their lives. Home was the same as aforetime, but they themselves were different. They had tasted the sweet joy which comes alike to young and old when a Heavenly Father's love is accepted as a fact. There had risen in their childish hearts the Sun of Righteousness with healing in His beams, and all unconsciously they basked in the warmth and expanded and grew in heart and character, as others have done before them.

It was late in July that Mrs. Fairfield met the two, the day after the school treat which had given Molly and Sally one of the most blissful days of their lives. They were hurrying along, with furtive glances to right and left, lest unfriendly eyes should note their movements. Each carried in her hand—for once the sisters walked apart, no encircling arm linked either to the other—the toys won in the races the previous day.

"Well, little people, and where are you going?" said Mrs. Fairfield cheerfully. A loving look came into little Sally's eyes—no fear of misunderstanding, no lack of sympathy with "their lady"—as she whispered, glancing up into the kind face bent over her:

"We're going, Molly and me, to hide our presents in a dear old hollow tree which grew a-purpose in the Spring fields yonder."

"But why? Will they not be too far from home for you to enjoy? How can you play with them at that distance?" Mrs. Fairfield inquired, to be told by Molly:

"We'll manage it somehow on half holidays. We're most afeared to have them at home. They'd be so handy, see, for father or mother to chuck about when they got throwing things at each other."

"Poor mites!" said Mrs. Fairfield, as she bid them hurry on their way and "have a real good time in the hollow tree."

She had long wondered if such parents could be won to better things by ordinary means, and had found her way to the house on more than one occasion, but only to meet with rebuff; and fear to endanger the children's movements, Sunday by Sunday, had made her refrain from further aggressive measures.

And then the unexpected happened. Mrs. Fairfield was at home to callers one day late in the following September, when her maid told her—as she happened at that moment to be alone—that little Molly's mother wanted to see her.

"Show her in, Hannah. Let us make a lady of her for once, and see if coming into the drawing-room may help to soften her."

Hannah's smile was something more than sympathy or appreciation of a good mistress; it was suggestive of pleasure in being herself associated with such a happy scheme. She hurried away to find the visitor, mentally planning to place the Indian basket chair for her to sit down upon and so spare the upholstered ones.

But Mrs. Fraser had no intention of sitting

"'There was Molly teaching the twins to say their prayers.'"—p. 1150.

down, even though pressed by Mrs. Fairfield to do so.

"Please, I'd rather stand, ma'am. I really would. I feel almost choking, but I must tell you my story. It beats anything ever wrote in a book."

It would spoil the telling of that story to put it into other words; it was so distinctly from beginning to end Mrs. Fraser who spoke.

"Bless me, ma'am, but I wasn't always what you know me to be to-day. I guess I was as smart a girl as ever trod shoe leather when I was kitchen-maid at the Squire's. I kept my place for well-nigh seven years, and then, silly like, left to wed Jim—a trim young fellow in those days, but, you see, a rare one for giving his opinions to his mates when his day's work was over. That's what took him to the public, and me often along with him. I kept myself respectable enough, but, of course—and that's the pity of it—drink is drink, and it gets a sort of hold of you that nothing else does. I never meant to like it too much, but there, I never stopped soon enough.

"And that's how things have gone on—well, ever since my big lad of sixteen lay a smiling infant in his cradle. I've buried five between him and Molly—you see, there's only Molly and Sally and the twins I call in-hand like. Harry's in a good place miles from here, and the aunt who lives in John Brown Street is very good to the twins, so I needn't to worry when I go out for a day's work. But Molly—I will say that of her—she's a good child to put the twins to bed of nights if I'm not there. As the church clock strikes six she starts them off upstairs.

"Well, this brings me to my story. Yesterday I was doing a day's work at Mrs. Doctor Bank's, and as things ought to have gone I shouldn't have been home until eight. But in the afternoon the missus' baby took a fit. They've served him cruel this many a day. I never thought he'd come out alive yesterday, I didn't. Of course, we couldn't go right forward with the work when the house was all in confusion; so when the doctor—he's a nice gentleman, ma'am; do you happen to know he? He's got a name, too, for being mighty clever with the kiddies—when he came in and attended the little one—there, he bathed him as if he'd been a woman, such tender hands and such insight into everything! Well, when the young gentleman was out of his fit and inclined to doze, his ma came to me and says she, 'We'll not have any ironing done to-day, Mrs. Fraser; come round in the morning for a couple of hours.' And then she took to thanking me for my little bit of help in assisting cook to get the bath water ready.

"Well, the church clock struck six as I put my shawl on, and it didn't take me above ten minutes to get home. When I came to the door I expected to see someone about, but the house was as silent as the grave. I stepped inside softly and listened, but I could hear voices upstairs. It would be Molly putting the twins to bed. I thought I'd creep up gentle-like and give them a bit of a surprise, as I wasn't expected for nigh upon two hours; but I had only taken one step up when I stopped dead-like: there was Molly teaching the twins to say their prayers. She went right through the hymn, 'Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me,' and it did sound pretty. You see, ma'am, it was you who taught Molly to pray; I never did. May God forgive me. And me that had the make of a good mother in her if it hadn't been for that hateful drink. Well, when they'd done the 'Tender Shepherd' hymn they started along with the 'God bless' prayer, and—and—it's that—that beat me."

Mrs. Fraser stopped and wiped some very genuine tears from her eyes. It was a moment or two before she found her voice to continue her story.

"They said just after Molly, word for word, the beautifullest prayer I ever heard tell of; and it was for me—for me, ma'am, bad, wicked woman that I was. It was something like this—excuse me crying; how can I help feeling it? It's that touching that I don't believe I've ever had anything happen like it since my poor old mother died. The words Molly said were something like this, ma'am:

"'And please, Lord Jesus, bless our poor dear mother, and don't let her take no more drink, and then she'll be our good mother. Lord Jesus, you can do it. It ain't too hard for you. There's four of us a-asking, you know—Molly and Sally and Bobby and Erny—and you won't forget, for we'd like our prayer answered quick, as we're all a-aching in our hearts for our good mother to come home and live along with us.'

"There, ma'am, that's as near as I can remember, word for word; and—and I said 'Amen' then, I did, and now I want to do 'Amen.' I've come to sign your pledge book. Never shall a drop of that nasty stuff pass my lips again, God helping me!"

The Golden Street of the Heavenly City

By the late Rev. Hugh Macmillan, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

"And the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass."—REVELATION xxi. 21.

IN the interior of one of the most magnificent churches of Rome, the church of Santa Maria Maggiore, or the "Liberian Basilica," as it is often called, there is an immense nave, whose wide span of roof is elaborately carved and gilded with the first gold brought to Europe from South America and presented to Pope Alexander VI. by Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. It is one of the most gorgeous roofs in the world, and every panel and ornament is loaded with the glittering splendour of the precious metal. You gaze up at it, soaring high above your head, in awe and wonder. It must have cost many thousands of pounds; but after a little your emotion subsides, and your first feeling of admiration changes into one of repulsion as you remember how that gold was obtained and to whom it was given. You have all read the dreadful story of the conquest of Mexico and Peru by Cortes and Pizarro and their Spanish troops; and you recollect how they tortured and slew the poor inoffensive natives in crowds, and destroyed their homes, in order to wring from them the golden spoil which they possessed. Every ounce of the precious metal cost the lives of hundreds. This was the way in which the gold that adorned the interior roof of the great church in Rome was obtained; and it was bestowed in a way equally reprehensible. It was sent by the King and Queen of Spain as a present to the infamous Alexander Borgia, the poisoner, adulterer, and perjurer, in whose veins flowed the very worst blood of Spain, and who sought to have his monstrous crimes and vices condoned by this gift to the church. These are the awful memories which the gorgeous golden roof of Santa Maria Maggiore recalls to everyone who knows its history. Instead of admiring it, one longs to pull it down and destroy it as a hateful memorial of one of the most dreadful pages in the history of human guilt.

The first places of worship which men constructed were open to the wide heavens. They were roofed only by God's blue sky, with its bright sunshine and beneficent clouds, and tender dews, and constellations of stars, receding into the illimitable depths of space, suggesting only thoughts of mercy and goodness infinite as the universe and as He Who made it. But here, in the later ages of the religion of Him Who proclaimed peace on earth and goodwill to all mankind, a Christian church is roofed over and shut out from God's wide world of goodness and grace by the hard gold which speaks only of man's inhumanity to man. It is thoughts of judgment, and not impulses of worship, which such a golden roof suggests. It seems to contract and suffocate the soul, instead of enlarging and ennobling it, and enabling it to soar to the heavenly places. Standing beneath it, and going over in imagination all the terrible events connected with Spain's conquest of the Western Hemisphere, her long reign there of intolerable cruelty, oppression, and corruption, since that first fatal gold came to her shores and was employed to adorn this Christian church, and in this way to receive the consecration of the Christian religion, one feels a profound satisfaction in the thought that the day of reckoning, so long postponed, has come at last; that He Who said, "Vengeance is Mine, I will repay," has employed the newest Power of America to wrest from the oldest Power the last of her possessions on that continent, and drive her from the fair lands which she had made desolate. The gold on the roof of the church seems dimmed and tarnished by the breath of anguish which rises up to it from the poor Indians who said of their Spanish oppressors, as they tore their gold from them, "What a god must he be who has such hell-hounds for his servants and children." Such gold should never have been laid upon God's altar, for it is the price of blood. It is a Corban gift substituted for the justice and mercy of God's law—a gift of devotion to God bestowed at the expense of cruelty to man. Such gold should never have been exalted above the heads of the worshippers, to draw up their imaginations and desires to the heaven which it limits and pollutes, and altogether misrepresents. It is utterly out of place in such a position, where the associations should be of an altogether different kind.

On the outer roof of St. Isaac's Cathedral in St. Petersburg, the most magnificent of all the Russian churches, the tiles are thickly plated with gold, which dazzles the eye by its effulgence when the sun is shining upon it. The golden roof alone cost more than a million sterling. It was presented by one of the most cruel and despotic of the Czars, Ivan the Terrible, whose ruthless deeds make us shudder to read of them. The golden roof represented the grinding taxation wrung from the starving peasants. Each tile speaks of the groanings of the poor and the down-trodden peasants, whose cry went up to God, for vain was the help of man. And, oh, the awful mockery of it! That gold, wrung from the wants and sufferings of the poor, was employed to uselessly adorn the house of the God of the poor and the oppressed!

Such are the uses to which man has put gold. He has exalted it to the heavens, he has roofed his most sacred buildings with it, he has made a religion of his love of it. The golden image which Nebuchadnezzar raised on the plains of Dura, compelling men to kneel to it on pain of death, has often been raised up since, and thousands have bowed down the knee to it, and thousands have cast themselves or been cast by others into burning, fiery furnaces of pain and want and misery of every kind because of it. Multitudes have given to it the whole love of their hearts, and the whole devotion of their lives, and for the sake of their idolatry they have been guilty of the greatest cruelties and crimes.

Has it ever struck you what a different place God has given to gold in the heavenly kingdom, and what a different use He makes of it? He has put it, not above man's head, as something to look up to, to aspire after, to bow the soul to, but beneath man's feet, as something which man is to use and to stand upon as a support, but which he is to hold always below himself.

In the heavenly city it is not employed in the ornamentation of churches and palaces; it is used only for the paving of the street. It is put beneath the feet of the heavenly inhabitants. It is strange to think that the thing which is most valued and loved on earth, which is made an idol of—put, as it were, on a lofty shelf for men to reach up to, and strain with all their powers of body and mind and heart to attain—should in the celestial city have the lowest place of all assigned to it. We are apt to think that the expression in the text refers only to the glory and splendour of the New Jerusalem. It is so magnificent that its very streets are constructed of gold. The most gorgeous image of earth is used to represent heavenly things. But while this, no doubt, is the primary reference, we may nevertheless see in the image a deeper significance, for the words of God are more comprehensive and expressive than appears on the surface, and I think it is lawful to see in the symbolical language this other meaning as well.

It has been suggested that the natural objects that are the rarest in this world are the commonest in other worlds, and that objects that are of no use on earth find fullest use in the orbs of heaven. There are metals which were first discovered by the spectrum analysis of some star, and have subsequently been found in small quantities on earth. Materials that are sparsely diffused throughout our globe may be the most abundant of all materials in the stars and planets. There may be other worlds that are composed altogether of diamonds and other precious gems, where the gold and the silver, as in Jerusalem in the days of Solomon, are as stones for abundance. The gold that exists in such small quantities on our earth, and is therefore so highly prized on account of its scarcity, may be so common that it may be thought nothing of in heaven, and be used only for paving the street with. In a world where all the materials were gold, a common stone would be the most valuable thing; and amid the superfluity of gold in heaven we should not be surprised to see it turned out to the street, and be of no use save to be trodden under foot. You have heard the story of Midas, how the magic power was given to him to convert anything that he touched into gold, and how miserably he lived because in his case the power we possess in daily life of converting gold into bread was reversed, and the bread that he touched turned into gold. What would Midas think of the magnificence of a street of pure gold? He would greatly prefer a golden cornfield whose ears he could pluck with impunity to feed his starving body in the midst of his vast and fatal riches! And if the streets of heaven are of pure gold, surely one would soon be satiated with the splendour and find the gorgeous wealth a mere commonplace, and prefer instead to be led by the Lamb into the green pastures and beside the living fountains of waters, that are softer to the tread and more refreshing to the soul. The standards of the heavenly Jerusalem will be altogether different from the standards of our earthly cities. The Kingdom of Heaven here and now reverses the worldly ideas of men. It blesses poverty, meekness, persecution, godly sorrow, and hunger and thirst after righteousness—qualities which the world despises. The treasure that we lay up in heaven is not the gold we accumulate here, but the good deeds we have done and the good dispositions that we possess. Our gold is left behind; it perishes with our perishable bodies; but our true riches of heart and soul endure and go with us to enrich us for evermore beyond the grave. Surely, then, if the cross is the crown of our world, its highest glory in the estimation of heaven, the gold that we esteem so highly here, for which we sell not only our own souls and bodies, but in many cases the souls and bodies of others when we have the power, is good only for making the street of the celestial city. Its only purpose is to furnish a footway!

And, so understood, the expression of my text shows to us that what we think is the grandest thing in heaven is the meanest and lowest, and should teach us what the true position and use of gold should be in our own world. It should always and only be used for the construction of a street. It is simply and only a way of living, a means to an end. It should never be regarded as the end itself, as the living itself. It is only a way by which we obtain the means of life and carry on the purposes of life, hold intercourse with one another, and maintain the commerce by which our common wants are supplied. It is good only for standing upon, walking upon, reaching our end upon. It should ever be kept beneath our feet; it should never get higher than that. It should never dominate our hearts or our heads.

Man's world is full of work; God's world is full of fruits. How much of man's work is for hire, the fulfilment of a bargain, which gold repays. But in God's world we come into a much higher region. There the fields are golden with harvest, the trees are golden with fruit, the very buttercups give their ministry of beauty to gladden the world, and they seek no reward save the blessedness of their working and their use to God's creation. What a wonderful thing it would be if there were more of this fruiting instead of working in our world—fruiting because we cannot help fruiting, spontaneously, freely, gladly; if the beggarly elements of the world's golden currency were changed into the pure, transparent gold of loving, free-hearted, and free-handed service! What a change would take place in our world if, instead of gold, love were the medium of exchange; if human beings did everything for each other for the sake of love, instead of for the sake of gold! Everything has its price; but what would it be if the services we require at each other's hands were priceless, could not be bought with gold, but only with love? As it is, the services we value most in this world are those which are not paid for, but are given free from the heart. An office-bearer of my church came to me once, and when I had gone over with him some hard and useful work he had done for the congregation, I remarked that he ought to be paid for giving so much time and skill and labour to our interests. He replied almost indignantly, "I would not do it at all if I were paid for it." He found the labour itself its own reward. And what would it be if that were the case universally: if we toiled for each other, and ministered to each other in ignorance and sickness and feebleness and old age, and did the whole work of the world, owing no man anything but to love one another? The joy that people have here and now at rare intervals in giving freely with all their heart to a noble cause, and which is the purest and loftiest of all human joys, might be distributed over all the work of the world, and be experienced every day and in everything. There is no one, if he trusted to the instincts of his own heart, but would prefer infinitely the experience of the philanthropist who spends his life in doing good without return, to that of the rich man whose wealth, selfishly acquired, is so enormous that the law will be called in to administer it when he dies. Man's selfishness is not native. It is the devil's poison in his blood. Divine charity expels it. It would be the millennium on earth if this divine charity were everywhere and at all times practised, so that all the labours of human beings, secular and religious, would indeed be works of faith and labours of love.

That will be the case in heaven. Gold will not be the medium of exchange or service there. The work of heaven will not be paid for. Gold can never more purchase the necessaries of life, for the redeemed shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more. As God's people on earth they were redeemed, not with corruptible things such as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ. They bought from God during the course of their redeemed life on earth, wine and milk, the blessings of grace, without money and without price; and now in heaven God gives them freely to eat of the tree of life; gives them all that is needed to maintain their glorified life in the highest efficiency without any golden equivalent. Gold in heaven is only of use in paving the streets of the New Jerusalem. It is only a symbol of that which the redeemed have finally triumphed over, the covetousness of their hearts, through the overpowering love of Christ. It is now beneath their feet. They have got a magnificent victory over their avarice for ever. They have been made conquerors, and more than conquerors, through Him that loved them.

But you will say that all this is ideal, worse than Ruskinesque! It is the great charm of wealth—if by wealth we mean a modest but secure provision for all reasonable needs, which everyone should aim after in a world constituted as this is—that it sets a man free to serve his neighbours for nothing. That, indeed, is what God gives it for, if He gives it at all. And one of the greatest trials of poverty or reduced circumstances is that it prevents or restricts such free service for others of money and help. God means gold to be a golden street that we are to use for the service of our neighbours and for the benefit of the world. Lord Palmerston said that dirt is only matter in the wrong place, and money becomes dirt when we suffer it to get into the wrong place. And it does get into the wrong place when it gets into the chief place, when it gilds the roof of our religion and of our life, instead of paving the street along which we do our daily work of faith and labour of love.

The gold of the street of the New Jerusalem is pure gold, "as it were transparent glass." There is no sordidness in that gold, no avarice, no selfishness. It is the symbol of the honesty and uprightness of the redeemed. They are pure in heart and clean in hands, and their feet, washed in the blood of Christ, are worthy to walk on the golden street of God's heavenly city. The gold of heaven is transparent as glass. We can see through it down to the bottom. It is like the gold of the crocus blossom that is shining in the sun, and which, like a piece of opaque porcelain, you can see through if you hold it up to the light. The gold of earth is opaque. It blinds people. It causes selfishness and dishonesty, and impurity of thought and deed, and everything that makes life opaque. But the gold of heaven will be as transparent as the gold of the first Paradise, of which it is said in the Bible, "The gold of that land was good." It was good to get, and good to give. It neither harmed oneself nor did harm to others. No one who is loaded with the opaque gold of this world can hope to enter into Paradise restored. It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man who is cumbered and made opaque to the higher things of his life by his riches to enter the Kingdom of Heaven. None can walk that golden street who has not cleansed his ways here and kept his feet alike in the house of God and in the market-place. We want to make our life pure, bright, and beautiful; but we are conscious that we have contracted many pollutions by wandering in the world's miry ways. He Who washed the disciples' feet will wash ours and free us from all our stains; and we are to keep our way clean by doing our work for God, by doing it as God would have us do it, in a faithful, honest, and generous spirit, not for the sake of the money that we are to earn by it, but for the sake of the good that we are to do by it; by using our gains for noble ends, for our neighbours' benefit as well as for our own; by renouncing any gain which we can only get through cheating or injuring a fellow-creature; by making all men feel that they can trust and depend upon us because we love God and walk by His will. So living, so walking, here below we shall be counted worthy to stand at last on the street of pure gold, "as it were transparent glass," above.

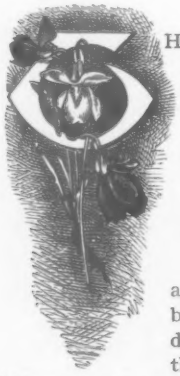
2. I need not tell Thee who I am,
My misery and sin declare;
Thyself hast called me by my name—
Look on Thy hands, and read it there:
But who, I ask Thee, who art Thou?
Tell me Thy name, and tell me now.



3. 'Tis Love! 'tis Love! Thou diedst for me!
I hear Thy whisper in my heart:
The morning breaks, the shadows flee—
Pure, universal Love Thou art!
To me, to all, Thy mercies move;
Thy nature and Thy name is Love!

Amen.

THE LITTLE LADY.

by Mamie L. Bleby.

A Complete Story.

THE Rev. Arthur Macneil, minister of the largest Nonconformist chapel in the town, was walking slowly down the High Street of Duneaton, his eyes bent to the pavement below him and his thoughts busy with next Sunday's sermon. An hour ago it had been raining fast, but now the high wind had driven the clouds far asunder, there were large patches of blue in the sky overhead, and the afternoon sun was shining bravely and brightly. But the Rev. Arthur heeded none of these things, so intent was he on his sermon as he strode thoughtfully on, perfectly oblivious of the fact that most of the passers-by turned to glance again at the tall figure and handsome, cultured face of the minister. Suddenly, however, he was called back to earth in a very practical fashion; a straw hat came flying gaily along the pavement, and settled itself onfidingly at his feet. Stooping down, he picked it up and looked round for the rightful owner.

She was standing quite close to him—such a tiny little lady, so slender and fragile, that he almost wondered that the wind had not blown her away entirely instead of merely taking her hat. The same mischievous wind had ruffled her luxuriant hair, till it strayed all over her face in loose, wavy tendrils of a deep, golden-brown colour.

As the minister picked up her hat she broke into a low laugh, which reminded him curiously enough of the musical tinkle of the little stream which flowed close to his childhood's home, and in which he had often paddled as a truant in the long summer days.

"Allow me to—that is——" And then he also laughed, infected by her merriment, for she was still laughing

"I beg your pardon—indeed, I do," said the little lady presently, when she had recovered her self-control. "But it is too absurd, and I feel so undignified."

Whereupon they both laughed again, and the Rev. Arthur told himself that there was nothing so attractive as a musical laugh, especially when the owner was a dainty little person with beautiful sunny hair.

"Allow me to hold your umbrella while you put on your hat," he said courteously.

"Thank you," she replied simply, and with a little impatient gesture she pushed back her hair and replaced her runaway hat, while he stood beside her, holding the umbrella.

"Thank you again," she said with a smile as he restored it to her. "'A friend in need is a friend indeed.' Good afternoon."

He raised his hat and paused for a moment to watch her as she passed quickly up the street, walking with a dainty grace which reminded him so forcibly of the movements of a bird that he smiled to himself again.

Then he, too, went on his way rather more quickly than before, but he had forgotten all about his next Sunday's sermon.

That evening, as he sat in his study, the Rev. Arthur felt decidedly lonely. It was, on the whole, a novel sensation to him, and not particularly pleasing. Once or twice he pushed the writing materials from him, and, rising from his desk, paced restlessly up and down the room, pausing now and then to gaze blankly up at ponderous theological volumes which seemed to look reprovingly down at him. Presently the door-bell rang, and it was with a distinct feeling of relief that the minister turned to greet one of the officers of his chapel.

XUM

Perhaps Mr. Crowley—an extremely business-like and practical man—was a trifle astonished at the warmth of his greeting this evening and the readiness with which the minister assented to the looking-through of several papers he had brought with him; but after a while he certainly noticed that the minister seemed pre-occupied and absent-minded, and that he frequently had to repeat a question before he received any answer. At length he rose to leave, and his host accompanied him to the front door, and stood there for a few moments discussing final arrangements.

"Oh, by the way, Mr. Macneil," said his visitor, turning back suddenly after taking his leave, "how would you like the bills printed for Monday's meeting? What colour lettering would be suitable?"

"Golden-brown," replied the Rev. Arthur, in a tone of conviction.

"'I was not aware that I was under any obligation to sing to you, Mr. Macneil.'"—p. 1159.

On the following Sunday morning the Rev. Arthur Macneil solemnly ascended his pulpit stairs as usual, and glanced down at the assembled congregation before kneeling in prayer. His gaze fell full upon a little lady who sat half-way down the chapel in a pew belonging to a well-known member of his congregation. The minister bent his head reverently, but his silent prayer was, to say the least, unusual, for its closing sentiment was a wonder as to how so much sunshine had got imprisoned in that hair and face—which, perhaps, proves that there is not so great a distance between the pulpit and the pew as many people think.

On the next afternoon the Rev. Arthur Macneil paid a visit to that most highly esteemed member of his chapel—Mrs. Irvine—and was introduced by her to her sister, Miss Eva Wright.

"Eva has come to pay me a long visit, Mr. Macneil," she explained, "and I am quite counting on her help at the different teas and meetings this winter. What are you two laughing at?" And Mrs. Irvine broke off in amazement.

"We have already met under ridiculous circumstances, Edith," said the little lady, and the minister thought once more of the low murmur of the stream as it flowed over the shining pebbles in its bed.

After this the Rev. Arthur saw a great deal of Eva Wright. Mrs. Irvine was a very energetic worker in the chapel, and her sister now entered with her usual vigour and brightness into her works and plans. So it came to pass that the minister saw Eva Wright at all kinds of functions, and it was not long before he grew to watch eagerly for her coming, and to see her pass out with a curious feeling of desolation. Everywhere her bright face and sweet laugh won friends for Eva, and no tea or meeting was quite complete unless she was there to set flowers on the tables and to be the sunshine of the dismal and crotchety. The Rev. Arthur would walk home after these affairs with a strange throbbing at his heart and a great desire surging through him. There was a little tender name which he had almost unconsciously learnt to apply to her, he could not tell when for the first time. But it seemed to suit her so exactly and it haunted him with its sweet sound, although he scarcely dared to whisper it even to himself alone in the seclusion of his study. "Wee wifie"—no other name could be more expressive of the dainty little lady, and deep down in his inmost heart the minister treasured it silently, and with it a hope which brought a strange glow into his eyes when they rested on Eva Wright.

One evening there was a children's tea at the schoolroom, and the Rev. Arthur, as in duty bound, went down early to make himself useful. As he entered the room he caught sight of Eva's slender figure surrounded by a little group of girls who carried off to the distant tables the plates of cake she was busily arranging. The minister stood for a while talking to various ladies and watching from a distance the deft movements of the little hands and the bird-like turn of the golden-brown head, until he could resist the fascination no longer. He crossed the room and took from her hand a plate she laughingly extended to him.

"If you come here you must work, Mr. Macneil," she said, gaily. "I will have no idlers near me."

"How energetic you are," he sighed, in mock despair. "Are you never tired, Miss Wright?"

"Not often," she confessed, shaking her head reprovingly at a refractory piece of cake which would persist in tumbling down from its exalted station.

"Mr. Macneil," she added suddenly, "would you be good enough to eat that piece of cake; there is really no other way out of the difficulty?"

"With pleasure, if you will have half of it," he replied obligingly.

"Very well," and Eva cut it in two and offered him one-half as she took the other.

"It is really very shocking of you to be so greedy, Mr. Macneil," she said, severely. "I am ashamed for anyone else to see what a hurry you are in for your tea."

He laughed lightly at this. "I am afraid you have no respect for my ministerial dignity."

"No, I haven't much. But then I haven't much awe of anyone. The bump of veneration does not exist on my head, Mr. Macneil, while the bump of mischief is enormously developed. The spirit of mischief comes over me in spurts, and at such times I am terribly naughty, and occasionally I repent later on of my evil deeds, but not often."

"Well, they are waiting for me to say grace," and the minister moved reluctantly away.

After tea there was a short concert in one of the adjoining rooms. The Rev. Arthur lingered in the larger room in the hope that Eva would come into the concert with him, and he might get a seat by her. Presently, however, she came towards him.

"I am singing to-night, Mr. Macneil," she said, "so I must sit towards the front. Would you mind looking after the little boys at the back of the room?"

The minister took up his station in the required position, and waited eagerly for the coming song. It made his heart beat faster than usual as he thought of it; and when Eva ascended the platform, amidst loud cheering, the glow deepened in his eyes. A moment later he bent quickly forward, a great hush fell upon the room, and in the stillness an exquisite voice rang out in rich and marvellous melody as she sang a children's lullaby. Every syllable floated pure and sweet to the minister, and he almost held his breath for fear that he should lose one sound of that wonderful voice. He had heard the music in her laugh many a time before, but this—this was something to soothe the weary, to draw tears from unaccustomed eyes; and it went straight to the minister's heart. In the moment's silence which followed the song the Rev. Arthur vowed a sacred vow, and as he let himself into his silent home that night he told himself that his life was a very lonely one, and that there was one little woman who was the sweetest and loveliest woman in the world, which two facts did not strike him as being in the slightest degree irrelevant.

It was about a week later that one evening Mr. Macneil called upon Mrs. Irvine to discuss with her the advisability of starting some new club. He was shown into the drawing-room, and for a moment he stood at the door, loth to disturb the pretty picture before him. The lights were turned low in the room, but there was a very large fire on the hearth, and on the rug before it, seated on a low stool, her head resting against the back of a chair, sat Eva. Mrs. Irvine's little four-year-old daughter had fallen asleep with her head in her Auntie Eva's lap, and the ruddy glow of the firelight lingered caressingly on her fair curly hair before it danced up to rest on Eva's head and touch it into living gold. As the Rev. Arthur advanced into the room, she held up silently a warning finger and smiled at him, as Mrs. Irvine with a whispered greeting drew forward a chair.

"Eva has been singing to Doris," she said softly, "and now she is fast asleep. We can talk quietly, Mr. Macneil, and I expect she will sleep till nurse comes for her."

But the minister did not talk much that evening; he leaned back in his chair, and from under the hand which shaded his eyes intently watched the woman he loved, scarcely heeding Mrs. Irvine's low-toned conversation.

Eva, too, was unusually silent; her eyes had a far-away look in them as they rested on the fire; but every now and again her little hand moved gently over the head on her lap. Once the quiet watcher thought he saw the glimmer of unshed tears in her eyes, and again he was nearly certain that something bright and glittering fell on her dress, only to be brushed quickly away with a noiseless movement.

After a while, Doris, still asleep, was carried off to bed, and Mrs. Irvine, begging to be excused for a short time, followed her.

"Eva will entertain you, Mr. Macneil," she said, as she turned the lights higher.

But Eva did not move from her lowly position or seem inclined to enter into conversation. At length, leaning forward slightly, he said:

"I am going to ask a favour of you, Miss Wright."

She moved her head towards him, and her lips relaxed a little.

"Well?" she said questioningly.

"Will you sing to me as you have been singing to Doris?"

"I am sorry to refuse, Mr. Macneil, but I cannot sing any more to-night." Her voice sounded weary, and he noticed it instantly.

"Are you tired?" he asked anxiously, and perhaps there was some strange note in his tone which made her rise hastily and begin to make up the fire.

"No, I am not at all tired," and she gave the fire a vigorous poke.

But the next moment the poker was gently taken from her hand, and Arthur Macneil was standing close to her and looking straight down into her face.

"Then why do you refuse my request?"

The little lady drew herself up to her full height with a proud little gesture.

"I was not aware that I was under any obligation to sing to you, Mr. Macneil." She looked full at him, and her tones, though perfectly polite, conveyed a distinct snub. He laid the poker down quietly before he turned to her again.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Wright," he said coldly, and at that moment Mrs. Irvine came into the room. For the rest of his visit he avoided speaking to Eva, and she withdrew to a distant armchair and busied herself in dressing a doll for Doris.

It was late in the evening before he took his leave, for Mr. Irvine arrived and would not hear of his departing before they had had their usual discussion on politics—a discussion to which Mrs. Irvine listened with a tranquil smile, and did not notice that Eva had slipped out of the room. But Arthur Macneil noticed it, and his heart grew heavy within him, and his answers to his opponent grew more and more confused, till at length Mr. Irvine gave up in despair.

"I believe you are half asleep to-night, Macneil," he said, as the minister rose to leave. "If you will wait a moment I will put on my coat and come with you as far as the post-office."

At that moment there was an indistinct cry from upstairs, which made Mrs. Irvine, with a quickly murmured "Good-night, Mr. Macneil," run hastily up to her wakeful little daughter. So it came to pass that the minister was left alone in the drawing-room.

He was quite startled when the curtain which separated it from the conservatory was noiselessly drawn aside, and Eva slipped in. She held her hand out to him, and he could see quite plainly that her eyelashes were wet.

"I owe you an apology and an explanation," she said simply. "I could not sing to-night to you because I was too sad. It is the anniversary of a dear friend's death. Good-night, Mr. Macneil," and without another word, she glided quietly out before he could speak to her.

That night Eva Wright stood in her room alone before her mirror, and angrily surveyed her crimson cheeks and shining eyes.

"You are a great stupid, Eva Wright," she said at last, aloud. "Still, I think you may be forgiven for this once," and she turned the gas out.

A day or two later the Rev. Arthur was summoned away from Duneaton on business, which detained him for a fortnight in London, and three weeks had elapsed since his visit before he saw Eva again.

Then one bright wintry afternoon, as he walked rapidly down the High Street, a slender little figure emerged from a shop and passed lightly down the street before him. Under his ministerial coat his heart gave a great leap, and the blood tingled madly through every vein. With a few rapid strides he had overtaken her.

"Good afternoon, Miss Wright; this is an unexpected pleasure."

At the sound of his voice she gave a little startled movement and glanced up at him with an additional glow of colour in her cheeks, which might or might not have been brought there by the cold, sharp air.

"Are you glad to see me?" The question slipped almost unconsciously from his lips, but it was destined to receive no answer. The colour deepened in her cheeks and her eyes fell suddenly under his gaze, to glance up quickly again as a voice close to them exclaimed:

"Good afternoon, Mr. Macneil; and you, too, Miss Eva. Eh, dearies, but you are a pleasant sight for my old eyes." And one of Eva's favourite old women stood holding out her hand before them.

Eva took it silently, without glancing at her companion; but Mrs. Martin, who was devoted to her dear Miss Eva, did not notice this.

"You are bonnier and brighter than ever, dearie," she went on admiringly, and, turning to the minister: "She is just a bit of sunshine, isn't she, Mr. Macneil? I think there couldn't be a better name for her."

Then a sudden bold inspiration flashed into the mind of the Rev. Arthur. He cast prudence to the winds, and leaning forward, said quietly as he looked at Eva:

"Yes; I know of a sweeter name for her than that, Mrs. Martin."

"And what might that be, sir?"

"Wee wifie," said the Rev. Arthur, in a tone of firm conviction.

It was fully five minutes later before he dared to speak to Eva again. She was walking very swiftly with her head turned away from him, so that he could not see her face. But as they entered a quiet street, he bent his head lower, and whispered penitently: "Sweetheart, will you forgive me, because I love you?"

And a moment afterwards the little lady looked up at him with shining eyes. "Oh, Arthur," she murmured; "it was terrible of you, and you must never say it again."

Which thing the Rev. Arthur faithfully promised, and broke his promise six times that very afternoon.

THE MOUNT OF OLIVES.

By Miss May Crommelin.

A MORNING ON THE MOUNT OF OLIVES.

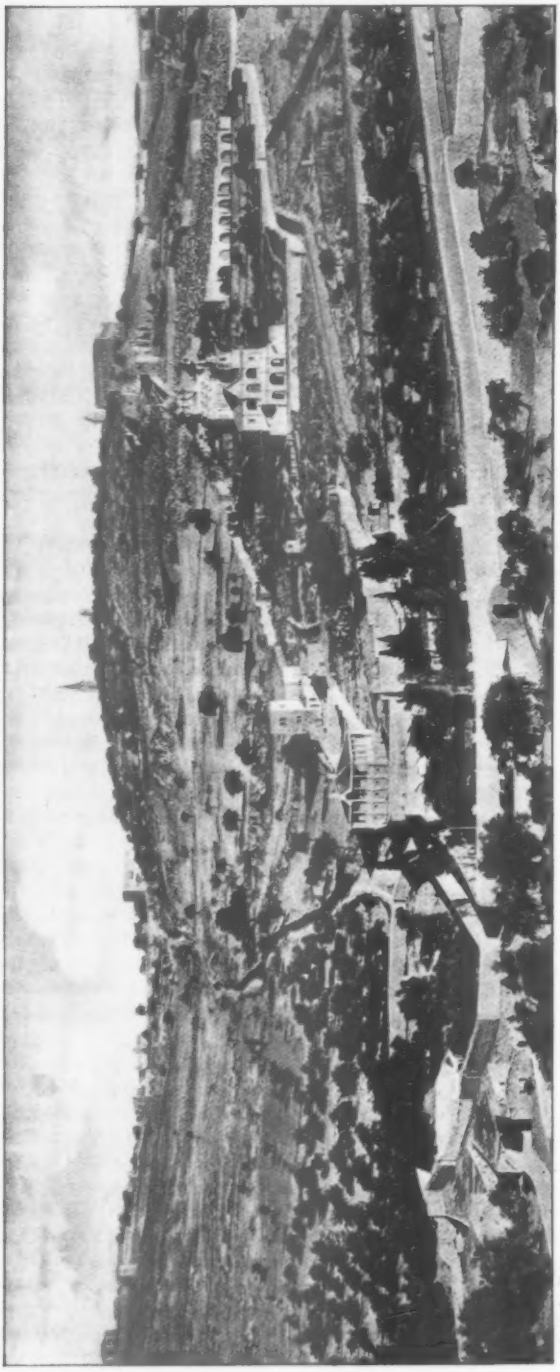
HAT is the Mount of Olives like? Those who have never crossed sea hitherward often picture it to themselves a small hill, thickset still with the gnarled grey trees most of us know so well from friendly acquaintance with those in Southern Europe, or from pictures. Not so. The real mountain forms the end of a long hill ridge, dominating the city of the seven hills. It slopes steeply to the valley of Jehoshaphat, where Jewish gravestones lie thick and white as sheepfolds. More steeply still rises opposite the high eminence, almost cliff, crowned by the city walls, wherein the Gate Beautiful is set, but walled up.

Stand with me on the brow of the Mount, and the Temple area across the valley seems so near that with field-glasses one can easily discern each figure crossing its open courts, now given over to Mohammedan worship.

A PANORAMIC VIEW.

The view from here is panoramic. Come over the hill-top, and look! There lies outspread the hill country of Judæa, wild, almost arid, to your very feet. To right, to left, the eye ranges over brownish, greyish, yellowish, or even whitish hills, to where in a long-drawn valley leftwards can be traced in its green setting Jordan flowing down to the Dead Sea. Their meeting of waters is easily seen from hence; and how gloriously blue is the sea! Pity that the beauty of its expanse is broken by hills blocking the view. Still further lie those tantalising mountains of Moab, their summit a splendid tableland, they say, who have entered the edge of its borders; full of Roman ruins, its interior yet unexplored, roamed over by tribes of lawless, even fierce Arabs.

BETHPHAGE.



Come along the hill ridge now, to the grove of fir-trees around the tall, needle, bell-tower of the Russians, and standing on the hill-brow, look down into the lowland. There lies far below a white building—that is the site of Bethphage. It lies in a tumbled sea of hills, here still greenish, leftward more and more arid, until only sand waves and peaks border the plains of ancient Sodom and Gomorrha. What a valley of desolation! A little way behind us stands a red-roofed building—Galilee, it is called, for this reason: here, tradition says, in the days of the Jews until the time of our Lord, the Galileans, who came yearly up to Jerusalem to sacrifice, were wont to camp. Certainly, if not here, it was quite near to this spot. Therefore some people believe that Jesus meant to speak of this place on the Mount of Olives when He bade His disciples to "go before Him to Galilee." And yonder small mosque, once the Church of Saint Helena, is likewise believed to mark the site of His Ascension. It is a round shrine with pillars beautifully carved. The Mohammedans guard it, but they are tolerant, and Christians are allowed to enter in to pray.

CHURCH OF THE ASCENSION.

A little further is a cluster of beehives, most original to our Western eyes. A dozen earthen jars laid on their sides have been built into the side wall of a small house. Their mouths are flush with the stone-work, bees fly in and out, so owners and apiary are housed under one roof. Hard by a carob tree spreads its thick foliage. Pull some of its bean-pods, and try the fare of the Prodigal Son; for these are "the husks which the swine did eat" wherewith he filled himself.

THE RUSSIAN TOWER.

Let us linger awhile near the high Russian tower, an obelisk-like landmark that is seen in every view of this side of Jerusalem. Unbeautiful in itself, and not useful either—for, though a belfry, its bells are unneeded, and its tower rocks in a strong wind dangerously—one wonders why it was built. Yet perhaps those who reared it meant it as an offering from devout hearts. And the simple piety of the Russian pilgrims hither is very touching. Each year some five to six thousand of really poor moudjiks leave Russia, crowded like cattle on board ship, joyfully. Once they are landed in Palestine, they tramp all through the country for days, even aged men and women. And when they reach at last Nazareth, or Bethlehem, or the Holy Sepulchre, then—bearded old men weep like little children! The women seem transported with love and gratitude. One feels that this fire was what burned in the Crusaders' hearts, and we look at them, regretting how much older, colder, we Westerns in Europe have grown.

These pilgrims are said to spend each about ten pounds during their stay in the Holy Land. They go back laden with shrouds made in Jerusalem, with bags of earth, with tins of Jordan water. And they smilingly give to every beggar, to each extortionate demand.

For their simple, pious sakes, let us look down the side of the Mount of Olives at their great church not unkindly. There it stands, with garish blue walls, with gaudy gilded domes, to us spoiling the scenery of rock slopes and aged olives. But in their eyes it is glorious.

What a pleasant shade is cast this hot May morning by the young fir-trees and the tower! Let us enjoy it gratefully and sit awhile on these stones, while a lizard whisks out his head to watch us. But hark! What is that strange humming sound, droning through the warm air? Distinctly human, or one might imagine it meant to lure bees swarming, as pots and kettles are beaten with us. My companions, who are dwellers in the land, listen a moment, then say:

"It is children. They are practising the Song of the Bride. Come this way and let us watch them. It is quite curious."

Curious, indeed, to me. For, thinking themselves unobserved by tiresome strangers, a group of Arab boys and girls are at play, pretending—like children all the world over. The game is that a wedding is imagined about to pass, and it is therefore their duty to greet the bride with the accustomed chant. This all are doing more or less gravely, with the full might of their lungs—the elders with an eye on the youngsters, whom they stop at moments to reprove shrilly, with renewed demonstration of "how it should be done."

A difficult feat truly, for with both hands clapped to their sides, as if on parade, the small teachers strained their necks forward, making long-drawn sounds, whilst their tongues kept clicking faster than any bell-clapper. So fast they quivered that how the singers kept their breath, or whether those small tongues would not be too tired for speech during the following day, was a matter of wonder to the watchers. It was no surprise to me when one of the latter whispered:

"The children are taught to begin young, as later on they could never learn it. Of course, they think it great fun, so we often hear them practising together their Song to the Bride."

Now is this ancient Eastern custom one that the Jews of old used, but which they dropped in time when exiled wanderers in foreign lands? The reason that one thinks it might be so is that the Arabs—sons of Ishmael—have retained many other habits of life that were once practised by their kinsfolk, the sons of Isaac. For instance, among most of the followers of Mohammed a bride is never seen unveiled by her husband until after marriage, unless she be of the poorest peasant class, a fellah-girl, used to work in the fields. The bridegroom is escorted to the bride's room by his "best man," or greatest friend. The latter waits outside the door, and custom ordains he should pretend or feel the liveliest anxiety as to whether his chosen comrade will be pleased with the life partner who sits within, all shrouded like a covered statue. The bridegroom enters, draws aside her veil, and gazes for the first time on the face of his wife.

Then—as custom from immemorial time likewise ordains, unless for strong reason to the contrary—the happy youth gives a loud exclamation of joy at the sight of the young girl's features. And his friend, who is waiting without, hears the bridegroom's voice, and rejoices accordingly. Can we doubt that this is other than the marriage custom referred to by our Lord, as familiar to His hearers, and that is still kept up in the almost unchanging East?

LIZZIE CHEVELEY'S MISTAKE.

by C. Edwardes.

A Complete Story.

IT was a black day for Rachel Proctor, this 4th of January, though the snow lay white on the unnatural hillocks round the hard-working little slate-roofed town of Wixcote—black to her as the smoke and smuts from the many tall chimneys and the flaming furnace shafts of Wixcote's famous smelting and iron works.

Until the morning she had cherished hopes that Alfred Dover loved her. It was true even then that she had not liked to think of Lizzie Cheveley's disappointment in the matter, for Rachel had a heart of gold. Lizzie might be all her father and others said she was—the most unscrupulous little man-hunter in the town, and never so well pleased as when she was the centre of a group of young men, all eyeing her longingly. She had several strings to her bow, whereas for Rachel there was only one possible sweetheart in all the world. This was Rachel's great and precious secret, yet not so much of a secret that Lizzie Cheveley of the corner shop had failed to get at it, and, with characteristic impudence, had challenged Rachel to dare to stand between her and the handsome young stranger who had come into Wixcote not six months ago, and was now one of the most trusted and rising engineers in the Wixcote Iron Works.

"You're sly, like all you quiet ones, Rachel Proctor," Lizzie Cheveley had said to her; "but it will be bad for you if your slyness gets hold of him."

To which Rachel had said nothing. What could she say? She could only look at the pretty Lizzie, and blush both for herself and her rival; wonder, too, what Alfred Dover would think if he could see Wixcote's belle with such an ugly light in her beautiful blue eyes.

And her very silence had only the more exasperated Lizzie Cheveley with the consciousness that, however she might excel Rachel in beauty, for real goodness Rachel was worth ten of her.

This had happened in the last week of the old year, after a certain memorable evening when Alfred had taken Rachel home from a concert. What bright dreams she had dreamed that night! And how she had wondered, when the New Year chimes rang out in the murky Wixcote air (with the hooters bellowing in the works)—how timidly she had wondered, with clasped hands, if the year now begun was to bring the supreme happiness into her placid life!

But it was all over on this black 4th of January.

Lizzie Cheveley had come to her father's house almost as soon as he had gone to his work, and fluttered her laurels in her face.

"Look at this, my dear!" she had cried to Rachel, holding up the hand with the ring on it. "I don't want to be nasty, only to put you properly out of your misery. And you needn't be down in the mouth, Rachel, for I've left you plenty to choose from. There's Tom Gossett and Harry Crowe for you to begin with. They'll both be in the blues about it, and if you've only the pluck to do it you might catch on with either of them at once. They'll have had enough of my style to be ready to jump at yours, perhaps. Men are awfully soft, aren't they, dear—just big children? I don't care if they are; they're very amusing, if you know how to manage them. I've got the best of the bunch, and you're welcome to all the others. Aren't you going to congratulate me?"

This was Lizzie Cheveley to the life.

Rachel felt like fainting. But after the first hard fight to keep herself together, that trouble went; and then she did a braver thing still.

"I hope you will both be very happy," she said. She even smiled, with no very obvious effort.

"No, you don't," retorted Lizzie. "You know that's a lie. You'd give your ears to have this ring, instead of me, and so don't pretend you wouldn't. I hate such meek-and-mild falseness."

"Well, then," said Rachel, no longer smiling, "you'll let me say that I'll try and hope you may both be happy. But I should think better of you, Lizzie, if you wouldn't tell me about it quite like this."

That finished Lizzie Cheveley.

"All right," she said with a brazen laugh. "I'm sure I'm so much obliged for your bad opinion of me, and I won't keep you from your pots and pans any longer. Good-bye, and I'll promise you one thing—you shall be asked to the wedding."

She went off humming a tune.

And Rachel took up again the thought of her father's dinner as if nothing had happened to rob this of its importance. She clenched her hands, and determined that she would do her duties just the same. Indeed, she was so particular at the butcher's that the butcher said good-humouredly, "Why, Miss Proctor, you are hard to please this morning. The weather, I reckon!" And she nodded, and agreed that it probably was the weather.

But at eleven o'clock her father came rushing from the works, with terrible words on his tongue, and there was an end to all her make-believe. The Proctors' house was the first in the main street of Wixcote, and the nearest to that mass of chimneys and sheaves of darting flames and acreage of sheds which made up the great ironworks of the town.

"Another minute and he was clinging to her hand."—p. 1168.

"An accident, my girl!" he said hoarsely. "They're bringing him here. I told them to. The poor fellow can't be taken to his lodgings. He'll die more comfortably here. Let them carry him up to my room."

Rachel's face showed deep sympathy and pain.

"Yes, father," she said simply. But the next moment an intuition came to her cruelly. Her father had mentioned lodgings. The sufferer was not a regular workman then; nor yet one of the boys, for all these had homes of their own. Alfred Dover, however, lived in lodgings, with a retired schoolmistress of the town.

"Who is it?" she asked, with a pale face.

But instead of answering, Mr. Proctor went out towards the solemn procession of men now approaching with something on an ambulance between them.

Rachel waited. She knew now. Her instinct prepared her for the rest, so that she neither screamed nor fainted, nor showed any weakness when the men brought Alfred into the house. His head was roughly bandaged, and his eyes were shut. The dismal light of the winter day helped to make him look like a dead man. Yet though the tears were waiting to stream down her cheeks, Rachel did all that could be done, as if it were quite a matter of course. She held her father's bedroom door open for them to pass, and even supported the poor crushed head until it was gently on the bed. And then she went downstairs to prepare warm water and linen for the surgeon who might next be expected. There was a gabble of voices outside, mostly women's, for the Wixcote wives and daughters had a very personal interest in these occasional accidents at the works. To-day it was one woman's husband or son or brother; to-morrow it might be any one of theirs

But the sound of rushing feet and a shrill voice now broke above the subdued chattering, and Lizzie Cheveley declared herself.

"I don't believe he's all that hurt," cried Lizzie, "and I won't have him left here."

Rachel sighed and went out to the girl who had shouted her triumph in her face only an hour ago.

"Oh, Lizzie," she began, "I'm so sorry——"

"It's a lie! Where is he? He's got to be shifted, and——"

Happily Dr. Bass now strode up, accompanied by the messenger who had fetched him.

"Hush! hush!" he said, staring at Lizzie Cheveley's flushed and angry face, as he passed into the house.

And then, in a passion of tears—not all of them worthy tears—Lizzie turned aside from the door The others present guessed what it meant. The ring on her finger was bright in the gloom, and with Rachel they closed about her to comfort her. But she soon made them see that she wanted none of their words. "I don't believe it," she exclaimed again, when one of them said that young Dover was as good as dead already.

Rachel stole away after that, stole upstairs and heard the doctor's report from her father. A nurse was sent for. There wasn't any hope, the doctor said, but the nurse had better come. And hearing this, Rachel told her father about Lizzie and her especial claim for consideration, and begged him to go to her.

This Mr. Proctor did. He told her that in all likelihood young Dover would die without recovering his senses; and he asked her if she would like to see him. Lizzie went upstairs with eager eyes, breathing very fast. She stood and gazed at her sweetheart, trembled, and turned aside.

"How dreadful!" she whispered; and five minutes later she was back at the shop, her mind actively engaged with her future, in which Alfred Dover was to have no part, after all.

There was tranquillity in the Proctors' house now. Throughout the rest of the day Nurse Amy watched her patient, who lay so still, and yet did not die.

She and the doctor had discussed things, and Rachel had been brought into the interview. Would she help Nurse Amy with her work of mercy? she was asked. Would she?

But though her heart throbbed with joy in contemplation of such a task, she hesitated, and then spoke of Lizzie. She did not think Lizzie Cheveley would like it. Perhaps Lizzie would prefer to do it herself.

The doctor soon settled her objections.

"I wouldn't trust that girl with anything more precious than a ribbon," he said; "but I tell you what I will do. Miss Proctor. I'll tell her about it, so that she may say 'No, thank you' in the regular way. That's what she will say, or I don't know her."

And to Rachel's amazement the doctor was right. The doctor found Lizzie amusing herself with Harry Crowe at her father's counter, her ring already locked up out of sight.

"Should I do any good, sir?" she asked, plainly begging for a "No." And quite curtly he gave her the answer she wanted. "I understood you were engaged to Mr. Dover. That's the only reason I called. Miss Proctor will do the work much better than you."

"What do you think of that, Harry?" demanded Lizzie, when the doctor had gone.

"The idea of thinking I was engaged to Mr. Dover."

"Poor chap!" said Harry Crowe. "It wouldn't do him much good if you were."

"No, it wouldn't, would it?" she retorted, as if glad of the suggestion.

She called at the Proctors' in the evening, and saw Rachel. It was difficult even for her to say what she wanted to say.

"Rachel," she whispered, "I told you a fib this morning—about poor Alfred Dover and me. He—didn't give me that ring. We were friends, of course, but only that. I thought I'd tell you, because it might seem so queer my not helping to nurse him, you know. Don't say anything about it, please."

Rachel promised. Wixcote might think what it chose, and so would Rachel herself. She read Lizzie only too plainly, but that night, sitting and watching her heart's treasure in the silent hours, she forgave her her treachery as she had not been able to do before. And she prayed and prayed—first that Alfred would get well, and secondly that, if he did, he might not feel this other blow too severely.

Alfred Dover did not die that night; no, nor the next day either.

On the third day the doctor began to express hopes. He said the brain was not hurt so badly as he had feared, and having said this, on his own responsibility he called in a celebrated consulting surgeon from Manchester, and an operation was arranged for.

And now, with this sanguine news spread about the town, what must Lizzie Cheveley do but rush to Rachel again and, in the most shameless way conceivable, deny her late denial.

"I'm not going to pretend to be better than I am, Rachel," she said carelessly. "Of course we are engaged. Didn't I show you the ring? I—thought he hadn't a chance, and naturally I didn't want to waste my time. A girl's young only once in her life. And—you are so good-natured that I'm sure you'll help me all you can."

For once, however, Rachel did not seem good-natured.

"I—can't!" she said. "And oh, Lizzie, how could you be so wicked?"

Lizzie shrugged and laughed as if it were nothing to what she could do if she tried.

"Well, I don't care," she said. "If he gets well, I'll soon have him again. I reckon I understand men. I'm not afraid of you now. Tell him all the lies you like, and I'll still have him."

She went off, tossing her pretty head.

The operation took place the next day. It was a critical one, and for many hours Dover lay on the borderland, poised between life and death. Nurse Amy and Rachel never left him for a moment.

"We'll save him, dear—you take my word for it," said Nurse Amy to Rachel during one of these joint watches. She did not say what was in her thoughts, but her smile was as mysteriously cheering to Rachel as an angelic whisper of hope. For she and everyone in Wixcote now knew more or less completely the story of Lizzie Cheveley's base and audacious truckling with fortune, and of Rachel's special interest in young Dover

But though Rachel's heart was lightening within her in the belief that Alfred would get well, she did not dare to think of anything better still. Enough if he recovered and perhaps thanked her for doing what she had been so proud to do for him.

It was late in the evening of the day after the operation that Alfred Dover opened his eyes and sighed as he realised that he was alive.

Nurse Amy had gone out for an hour, and Rachel was alone with him.

"Oh," whispered Rachel, with heaven's own joy on her face at the sight. "Thank God, at last!"

He smiled his recognition of her, showed faint surprise, and then seemed to fall asleep again. Tremblingly Rachel touched his pulse—she knew much about pulses by this time. It was no longer a very weak man's pulse. And then, with clasped hands, Rachel looked at him until the nurse returned. She stole from the room to proclaim the great news immediately.

Nurse Amy accepted the situation with professional calmness.

"I told you he would, dear," she said. "Go and let Dr. Bass know."

The doctor was as delighted (almost) as herself.

"You've saved him, between you, Miss Proctor," he said; "and that's the first bit of Wixcote information I shall give myself the pleasure of telling him."

Rachel could not return home there and then. She wanted to get among the fields and rejoice in solitude. And she did so rejoice under the early stars; nor troubled to ask herself very closely what her great joy meant.

Back at the house in time to give her father his tea, she heard more news. Alfred had begun to ask questions, and the doctor had even told Nurse Amy that he might be encouraged thus to exercise his brain in moderation.

And now there was no more nursing for Rachel. She kept away from the sick room for a whole day and a night. Her heart was troubled again, for Lizzie had declared her intention of coming to see her sweetheart.

"Nobody shall stop me, now he's got his senses back," she said, and the threat had drifted to the Proctors'.

"Will she?" said Nurse Amy, when she heard the news; and she squared her shoulders and smiled in that confident way of hers which always made Rachel wish she had such composure of mind.

She told the doctor about it, and he laughed and shrugged his shoulders.

"It will take her all her time, the hussy!" said he; and from his patient he drove straight to the corner shop and gave Lizzie a lecture which would have broken the spirit of nine girls in ten. But it didn't much affect Lizzie Cheveley.

"You'd better mind your own business, Dr. Bass," she said, "and leave me to mind mine."

But the doctor had the best of it with the last word.

"Just so," he said. "I am anxious that you should mind your own business—in the shop. You'll be sorry if you attempt to interfere with my patient—very sorry, my girl."

Lizzie decided that she would postpone her visit until the next day. Then all Wixcote should not keep her aloof.

But in the meantime something happened.

Nurse Amy brought Rachel several messages from Alfred.

Why didn't she come to him? Was it because he had been quite enough of a nuisance already? And—didn't she want to help him to get well any longer?

Rachel's answers were easy, but they didn't satisfy him. And now, on this second evening, Nurse Amy came with an imperative request.

"Go to him, dear. He'll have a relapse if you don't."

Another minute, and he was clinging to her hand and she was blushing and breathing very fast and looking at him with happy tears in her eyes.

"You must tell me at once," he said. "Did Lizzie Cheveley tell the truth when she said you had told her that—you disliked me?"

Rachel's eyes answered, not her tongue.

"That's enough," he said. "Kiss me if you love me, and then—see how fast I'll get well. I—know all about Miss Lizzie's tricks now, and I'm ashamed of myself as well as her."

"Won't you kiss me?" he pleaded, when she made no movement. "Don't you love me, then? I—used to hope you might, some day."

"Did you?" she whispered.

This time she yielded to the constraint of his hand. His murmur of "My true sweetheart!" after the kiss almost transported her; but she sat and listened to him in silence while he told her more about his love and his fear that she was too good ever to love him; and he held her hand fast all the while.

The doctor caught them thus together.

"Don't get up, Miss Proctor," he said cheerily. "I'm enchanted, just enchanted; and, upon my word, Dover, you're a lucky man. That accident is about the best blessing that could have come to you."

"I know," said Alfred Dover.

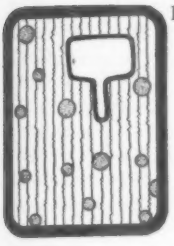
What must Rachel do then but lift Alfred Dover's hand to her lips and glide away.

"You are a lucky fellow, my boy!" said the doctor afterwards; and again Alfred Dover whispered, "I know I am."

Once more the good doctor called at the corner shop. This time he talked to Mr. Cheveley as well as Lizzie, and, as he said, fairly brought the young minx to book. The next morning an envelope was delivered to Alfred Dover containing the ring; and that same afternoon Lizzie had the audacity to tell Harry Crowe that she was glad it was all quite over now between her and Dover.

"I never really cared for him, Harry," she said. "It was just the sport of making him fall in love, you know."

Harry Crowe didn't know, however, and he soon left her, feeling that he, too, might be being sported with in this same cold-blooded way.



And when, only three months later, the Wixcote bells pealed for the wedding of Rachel and Alfred Dover, Lizzie Cheveley was at the counter of the corner shop without a sweetheart at all. Glad of it, too, if she was to be believed; and determined that Wixcote should soon see the last of her. She had made up her mind to go to one of the large towns in the neighbourhood and begin all over again.

XUM

PATIENCE

By the Archdeacon of London.

"In your patience possess ye your souls."—ST. LUKE xxi. 19.

THE whole life of our Lord was in contrast to the bustle, anxiety, worry, fussiness, and impatience of the majority of Christians. He was the highest conceivable example of quiet, faithful endurance throughout His earthly career, both public and private. Although He might have held that if He had begun His mission many years before He finally appeared amongst His countrymen, the result would have been greater and wider, He was content to wait in absolute obscurity till He was thirty. His mission is believed only to have lasted three years. It ended in apparent disappointment and failure: rejection by the authorities of His country, the scattering of His little band of followers, His own early death. He was willing to be misunderstood, misinterpreted, misjudged. He knew that the result which He desired would come in the end, and for the present He was absolutely indifferent to all the storms of calumny and hatred, the bitter taunts about failure and madness. "When He was reviled, He reviled not again; when He suffered, He threatened not; but committed Himself to Him that judgeth righteously." "For the joy that was set before Him, He endured the cross, despising the shame. Consider Him that endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds."

Besides His example, our Lord leavened all His teaching with lessons of meekness and endurance; and here, in one of His farewell discourses to the apostles, in which He warns them of the troubles, dangers, and disasters through which they will have to pass, He gives them the great secret of true Christian philosophy, the condition on which the other Christian virtues will be able to produce their due effect of personal happiness, but without which they will be soured and weakened. "In your patience possess ye your souls."

St. Paul and the other apostles necessarily make much of this essential quality of the Christian life. "Tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience," says St. Paul; two necessary stages in the growth of the soul. The Christian hope depends not only on the comfort administered by the revelation of God's will in Holy Scripture, but also on the patient habit of mind. God Himself is described as "the God of patience and comfort," not the God, as we might have expected, of victory and certainty. In all the numerous convincing signs by which St. Paul had commended his apostleship to the Corinthians, the first was his patience. Twice he insists on this—at the beginning and the end of the second epistle. When he is writing to the Colossians, and prays in magnificent and soul-stirring language that they may be strengthened by God with all power, according to the might of His glory, what is the object? It is unto all patience and long-suffering. So he tells the Thessalonians that he remembers before God without ceasing their work of faith and labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ. The hope is not yet seen. All alike have in patience to wait for it. Patience and faith—those were the qualities in the same people for which St. Paul in his second epistle gloried about them in all the churches. Six were the points of conduct to which St. Paul exhorted Timothy, and one of them was patience. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews tells his readers that they have need of patience, that having done the will of God they may receive the promises. Familiar to all is the celebrated passage in the same writer, "Let us, seeing that we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, lay aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset us, and run with patience the race that is set before us." St. James, at the very beginning of his epistle, urges that "the trial of faith works patience; let patience, therefore, have its perfect work." In St. Peter's catalogue of the stages of the Christian life, self-control is to be added to knowledge, and to self-control patience.

We are sometimes inclined to suppose that the founders of religious belief, the illumined teachers of the Old Testament, had much more overwhelming proofs of what they believed than we can claim. I do not think that this was so. Patience, or waiting, was a constant attitude of their minds. "They all died in faith," says the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, "not having received the promises, but having seen them and greeted them from afar, and having confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth." "I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord," said the dying Jacob. "All the days of my appointed time," said the afflicted Job, "will I wait till my change come." "Thou art the God of my salvation," said David; "on Thee do I wait all the day." And again, "Wait. I say, on the Lord; be of good courage, and He shall strengthen thine heart; wait, I say, on the Lord." And again, "They that wait on the Lord shall inherit the earth." And again, he asks himself, "And now, Lord, what wait I for? My hope is in Thee." Once more: "I am weary of my crying: mine eyes fail while I wait for my God." And another Psalmist, "Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eye of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress, so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God until He have mercy upon us." And another, "I wait for the Lord; my soul doth wait, and in His word do I hope. My soul waiteth for the Lord, more than they that watch for the morning—I say, more than they that watch for the morning." And Solomon: "Wait on the Lord and He shall save thee." And Isaiah: "I will wait on the Lord that hideth His face from the house of Jacob, and I will look for Him." And again: "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; they shall walk and not faint." And Jeremiah: "Art not Thou He, O Lord our God? Therefore will we wait upon Thee, for Thou hast made all these things." And again: "The Lord is good unto them that wait for Him, to the soul that seeketh Him. It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord. It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth." And Hosea: "Turn thou to the Lord; keep mercy and judgment, and wait on thy God continually." And Micah: "I will look unto the Lord; I will wait for the God of my salvation; my God will hear me." And Zephaniah: "Therefore wait ye upon Me, saith the Lord, until the day that I rise up to the prey."

So the prophets waited. They possessed their souls in patience. They believed God, they uttered what the Spirit put into their minds, they could not understand it fully, they did not see its fulfilment or realisation. Still, they went on speaking and writing what they discerned in the dim glory of their spiritual visions. They went down to the grave without seeing the result of their words. Their reward came when the Spirit of Jesus entered the land of the departed and gave them the good news that the salvation which they had foreseen was now accomplished. What better words could they have found to express their gladness and triumph than what Isaiah had said so long before: "Lo, this is our God. We have waited for Him that He should save us. This is the Lord! We have waited for Him; we will rejoice and be glad in His salvation!"

There are two kinds of impatience which do us harm—one of the intellect, the other of the temper. I will speak first of impatience of intellect or faith.

Although we know so well God's message to the world, and the truth of the hopes of man in Christ Jesus, yet we are still waiting. It is the law of our being that we should be looking forward. If we had the feeling of absolute certainty, that there was nothing more to learn or see or know, it would probably not be good for us. We should become too complacent, arrogant, quiet, and perhaps idle. There is always something unrealised, something unattained, something to struggle for, something to reach after. One of the new traditional sayings of our Lord, discovered lately in an Egyptian papyrus, is most profoundly true, and illustrates in a remarkable way what I am saying: "Let not him that seeketh cease from his search until he find; and when he finds he shall wonder; wondering, he shall reach the Kingdom of Heaven; and when he reaches the Kingdom he shall have rest." Searching is the best for us here; sometimes we shall have glimpses that will fill us with delightful wonder; but still we must search; that is all that we can expect. Now we see through a glass darkly. Now we know only in part. Now the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, the redemption of our body. There is nothing really to daunt us in the fact that we are still waiting. Rather this feeling of imperfection, yearning, and expectation, proves to us that there is something to which we have not yet attained. We should rather be rightly suspicious about the truths of God if we felt that there was nothing to wait for.

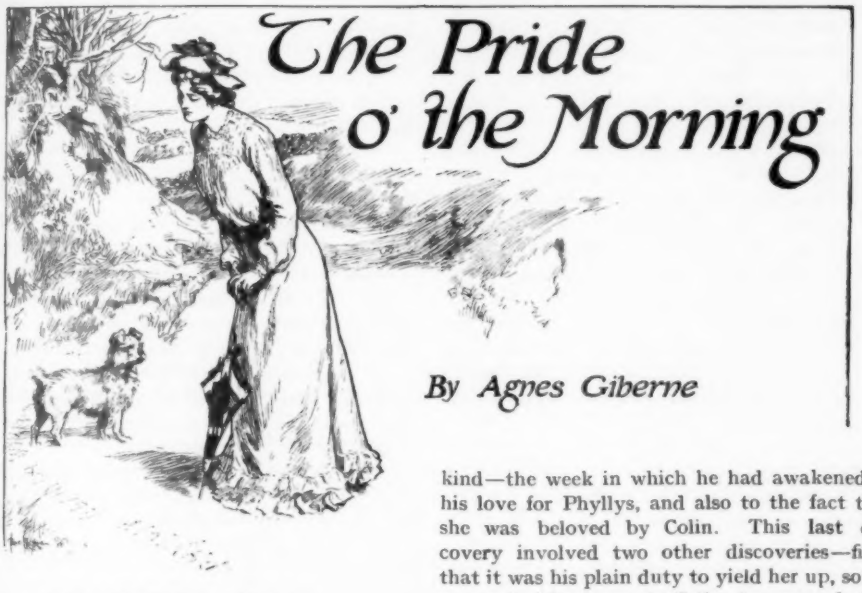
The fact is, that God in His great wisdom has surrounded our hold on His eternal truth with something of trial and difficulty, simply in order that before we pass away into the unseen world we may be stablished, strengthened, settled in our faith, firm and fixed in our resolutions, solid, steady, and ripe in our character, not after the manner of the evil angels likely to cause disturbance, trouble, discord, and rebellion in the peaceful regions of Heaven. One of these trials is familiarity with religious ideas. Season after season comes round, the lessons which they bring are so simple and plain, we know them so well and think of them so regularly, and yet nothing happens. The world goes on just the same, and we receive no message from the heavens. I ask you whether this is not at first sight a trial? It acts in two ways: it makes some people careless about religion altogether, and it makes other people impatient. They want certainty.

It is of no use to speak about the duller sort of people, who are content to do without the thought of God altogether, because they are not here. You, thank God, have at any rate escaped that great danger, and you are gathered together anxious to know all about God and His truth that you can possibly learn. But it is not at all unlikely that some of you may feel yourselves exposed to that other trial of which I spoke, and that is the feeling of impatience. You are sometimes inclined to exclaim: "Let Him make speed and hasten His work, that we may see it; and let the counsel of the Holy One draw nigh that we may know it!" It is a very common feeling. It was so in the time of Jeremiah: "Behold, they say unto me: Where is the word of the Lord? Let it come now!" It was the same in the time of Ezekiel: "The word of the Lord came unto me saying, Son of man, what is that proverb which ye have in the land of Israel, saying, The days are prolonged and every vision faileth?" It was a feeling which our Lord foresaw, and He described the impatient servant saying, "My lord delayeth his coming." It is a state of mind which had already become well known when St. Peter was writing his second epistle: "In the last days there shall come scoffers, walking after their own desires and saying, Where is the promise of His coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation."

And perhaps you did not see any great harm in this state of mind. It is possible even that you thought this feeling of impatience was rather a compliment to the Almighty than otherwise. Ah! but depend upon it, He knows best. When Christ taught us to pray, "Thy Kingdom come," He did not mean that we were to pray for anything so awful as the last day. That dread decree will come in God's own good time. He knows when it is necessary. In the meanwhile, we may well wait and bear our burden of not seeing God except through the veil, and not yet entering into His rest; waiting in quietness and patience for the sake of the improvement of the world and the conversion of sinners until the day dawn and the shadows flee away.



Impatience is treason to God. Next to Martin Luther, the German, the greatest of all the reformers was Calvin, the Swiss. "I have not so great a struggle," said Calvin, "with any of my vices, great and numerous as they are, as with my impatience; my efforts are not absolutely useless, yet I have never been able to conquer this ferocious wild heart." One of the greatest of English preachers was South, chaplain to King Charles II. "Impatience," said South, "is a quality sudden, eager, insatiable, which grasps at all and admits of no delay; scorning to await God's leisure and attend humbly and dutifully upon the issues of His just and wise providence." Impatience is not likely to improve our case with our Almighty Creator. "Impatience," said Hippocrates, the greatest of Greek physicians, "only makes the mediciner more severe in his treatment." It is only to the pure in heart that God thoroughly reveals Himself. Who can say that his heart is sufficiently clean and single to deserve the unveiling of the Unseen? Depend upon it, God allows us to know and see as much about Him as is good for us; and it is neither wise nor becoming in us to ask Him to let us know more of Him than He has willed, or to hasten the day when He will come in flaming fire, taking vengeance of all His enemies.

To some the present age seems a special time of difficulty. Foundations appear undermined, authorities clash, discipline in the Church hardly exists, familiar traditions are discarded, and strange ideas are invoked. It is our comfort to know that many of these troubles affect only what is accidental, and the foundations remain in their eternal truth and security. "Sire," said Beza the reformer to Henry, King of Navarre, "it belongs to God's Church rather to suffer blows than to strike them; but be it your pleasure to remember that the Church is an anvil that hath worn out many a hammer!" For the rest, we are well content to believe that one day we shall see face to face, and shall know even as we are known.

The other kind of impatience is that in temper. Here, indeed, there are many trials. We seem so helpless, and yet we see the way in which the evils which surround us could be cured. There are so many things that we could do, but neither time nor strength avail us. Friendship, on which we had reposed so much trust, is found absolutely useless in time of need. Even love, which had vowed fidelity in all circumstances, deserts us. Those whom we had thought ideals, certain to guide and help us in every possible difficulty, are discovered to be strictly limited, and indeed useless. We try in vain to mould the people with whom we have to do after our own ideas. They will not be moulded; they have as much right to their own individuality as we ourselves. What we think their faults remain as prominent as ever. Their view of ourselves is probably the same. There can be no social or family life without a very large amount of give and take—far more give than we probably think reasonable—but it must go on to the end. Sometimes there is persecution by those who zealously dissent from our principles. Often the weapon of slander is used by those who would regret to see our influence established. Sometimes, even, there is treachery on the part of those to whom we had entrusted our confidence. Often our hopes in life are blighted. We forget that at each period there can be but one Prime Minister, one Primate, one Lord Chancellor, one Commander-in-Chief, put at the head of each of the great departments and professions of life. We find our strength failing before we have done what we wished. We are but commonplace, after all. We are not necessary; our situation can easily be filled by others. All these thoughts are selfish and unchristian. God has many ways of fulfilling His purposes. We are not individually necessary. Let us be thankful if we have any useful part to perform in life. All time is alike to the Eternal Spirit, and if He works slowly, let us, at any rate, rejoice if we are permitted to co-operate with Him in ever so small a degree. "'Pray' and 'stay' are two blessed monosyllables," said Donne, the Poet-Dean of St. Paul's in the time of James I. "Patience is but lying-to and riding-out the gale." "Never think that God's delays are God's denials. Hold! Hold fast! Hold out!" If you can get from God the gift of patience it does many wonderful things: it sweetens temper and stifles anger: it extinguishes envy, and subdues pride; it bridles the tongue, and refrains the hand, and tramples on temptation; it endures persecution; it produces harmony in families and societies; it comforts the poor, and disciplines the rich; it makes men humble in prosperity, cheerful in adversity, unmoved by calumny and reproach; it teaches the forgiveness of injuries, and ever to be first in asking pardon of those whom we have injured.

"To weary hearts, to mourning homes,
God's meekest Angel gently comes:
No power has he to banish pain,
Or give us back our lost again;
And yet in tenderest love our dear
And Heavenly Father sends him here.
There's quiet in that Angel's glance!
There's rest in his still countenance!
He mocks no grief with idle cheer,
Nor wounds with words the mourner's ear;
But ills and woes he may not cure
He kindly trains us to endure.
Angel of Patience! sent to calm
Our feverish brows with cooling palm;
To lay the storms of hope and fear,
And reconcile life's smile and tear;
The throbs of wounded pride to still
And make our own our Father's will!
O thou who mournest on thy way,
With longings for the close of day,
He walks with thee, that Angel kind,
And gently whispers 'Be resigned;
Bear up, bear on; the end shall tell
The dear Lord ordereth all things well!'"

CHAPTER XXII.

OF RENEWED FIGHTING.

"IN the lives of most men there has been a week, at the memory of which ever afterwards a dark cloud comes down, and makes a possibly sunny world momentarily a place of gloom." So says that forceful writer, "Linesman."

Such a week had Giles known earlier; a week followed, indeed, by weeks and months of pain, but in itself alone sufficient, when recalled, to bring a dark cloud, taking his "possibly sunny world a place of gloom." The blackest week, the sorest loss, the most passionate remorse, though they may promise to shadow all life's future, yet, from the very nature of things, in the course of time, sink into the background and fail to quench all hope, forming, indeed, a burden, but one to which the shoulders have grown used. Still, there in the background the memory and the burden are, at seasons making themselves felt.

That heavy time, the recollection of which could never grow dim, and the results of which could never cease to be, belonged to boyhood.

Since those days recently, he had lived through another stringent week, different in kind—the week in which he had awakened to his love for Phyllys, and also to the fact that she was beloved by Colin. This last discovery involved two other discoveries—first, that it was his plain duty to yield her up, so far as was in his power, to Colin, because of that dark passage in their boyhood—and, secondly, that he had not power to do it. In the strife, his sense of duty succumbed before the passion of his love.

But, as British soldiers know, to be beaten is not necessarily to be conquered. Nay, to be twice beaten, thrice beaten, may still lead to final victory. With human beings generally, a defeat weakens permanently the moral fibre, lessens permanently the power to resist. Yet there does exist a stamp of soldier, notably in the British Army, with whom defeat seems to stiffen the moral fibre, to strengthen the will, so as to render more resolute and resistless his next onset.

Something of this might have been visible to watching angels, themselves unseen of men, gazing upon the solid tall figure of Giles Randolph, with his sombre blue eyes and austere gravity, as he went to and fro those autumn days at Castle Hill. He said nothing to anybody. It was not his way to talk about himself, to make appeal for sympathy. During weeks he fought his bitter fight alone, neither understood nor aided by others.

Days passed thus, and a telegram arrived from Mrs. Keith, dated at Dover, simply saying: "Not well; will get home this afternoon, train arriving 5.5."

"In England!" he said in surprise. Then Phyllys, of course, had gone to Midfell. Some complication must have arisen. The plea "Not well" made no great impression. He was too much accustomed to hearing it, with or without reason. Mrs. Keith was not strong, but also she never hesitated to be "not well" for a purpose.

Had she and Phyllys quarrelled? Surely not.

A thrill tingled through his powerful frame. Was it possible that Phyllys might come with Mrs. Keith? He negatived this idea at once. Nevertheless, he told the housekeeper to have the best spare-room ready, just in case—But, of course, she had gone north.

It was a chilly day, and he went to meet the travellers in the closed landau. As the train drew up, and he glanced along the windows of first-class compartments, that tingling recurred.

For Phyllys was there!

Was this to mean fresh defeat? At the moment when he had victory in view, was he to be hurled back and conquered?

Phyllys to stay a fortnight at Castle Hill! He was to be with her, day after day; within sight, within hearing, within touch, yet debarred from winning her! Debarred by his own resolve in the past never to stand in the path of Colin's happiness; debarred by his own resolve in the present to let Colin have the first innings. If Colin failed, then would come his chance. But Colin would not fail. And now, meanwhile, a fortnight of this long-drawn agony! To make matters worse, he read in Phyllys' face something of joy at their meeting. Though Colin was absent, she was glad to be here, glad to be with him again.

Not glad only, but sweet to a degree which even he had not known in her before. She had developed of late. He saw this, as the old Vicar had seen it, though from a different point of view. He was conscious of something new; something below the surface, carefully held down, which had not been there before. He was dimly aware of power over her, recognising, as once earlier he had recognised, that he would be able to sway her, to win her, to do what he would with her, Colin being out of reach.

Giles was a strong man, a man of iron will, yet it might well be questioned whether his strength would be equal to this terrific strain. There are forces before which iron bends and snaps like tin. In her beloved presence he knew himself to be weak. But in that very knowledge lay safety. Because he felt his own strength to be inadequate, he laid hold upon Divine strength.

She was up betimes next morning, and indulged in a ramble through the garden before breakfast. Coming back, to be in time for the gong, she met him in a side-path.

"This is too soon for you after your journey," he said gravely. He had no choice but to turn and walk by her side.

"I'm as fresh as possible—quite rested. I don't think you are well," she said.

"Quite, thanks."

"I fancied something was worrying you—like Mrs. Keith. She so often seems troubled. It is her way, isn't it? But not your way!"

Giles hardly followed the words. He was thinking of herself more than of what she said. She ventured cautiously another question:

"I suppose Mrs. Keith really has not any particular great sorrow or trouble—something that would make her unhappy?"

Giles looked surprised.

"She seems sometimes to be so upset—almost as if she expected things to go awfully wrong. But you would know if she really did. I don't want to be interfering, only I have been so sorry for her lately."

"She is excitable—a tendency to hysteria," explained Giles. "Nothing to be anxious about. She could hardly have any serious trouble without my knowledge. There is"—and he hesitated—"a tendency to exaggeration. One must always allow for that. I am sure she is not fully aware of it herself."

Then he abruptly changed the subject.

"Colin had a week with you at Midfell lately, before you went abroad."

"Yes; he wanted to finish the bust, and it is done. It is said to be a great success. He ought to be a famous sculptor some day—don't you think so?"

"No question as to his gift. The doubt is as to his physical power."

"Midfell seemed to suit him. He was well there."

"Well, because happy. He was with you."

Phyllys made no reply.

"He may have a career before him," continued Giles in a suppressed voice. "He ought to have. Much depends on whether he marries the right wife. If he should wish to marry, there will be no difficulty as to means. He and Mrs. Keith often talk as if he were a poor man, dependent on his art. It is not so really. What belongs to me belongs to him. What is mine is his. I have felt that I ought perhaps to name this to you, that you might understand."

She knew what he meant, and her face was turned resolutely away from him. He went on patiently, slowly, trying to explain.

"It is not merely that we were brought up together, and that we have always been brothers. It is more. Years ago I made up my mind that, whatever at any time he might wish, if it were in my power to give, he should have it, even though it might cost me—might cost me——"

The hesitation, the reiteration, the suppressed suffering, told her more than he meant to tell, let slip that which he had intended to hide. She kept her face turned away, and said quietly:

"Yes, I see. I think it is quite beautiful of you."

"Not beautiful at all. You misread my meaning. It is a matter of simple duty."

"For yourself perhaps. But Colin would be wrong to let you."

"You would not think so if you knew everything," he replied sadly. "I owe to him all—more than I can ever repay."

They were nearing the house, and only a few seconds remained. Phyllys' heart beat fast, for she saw now, knew now, that he loved her. But with the knowledge came, womanlike, on her part, a wish to hold back, not to betray her own feelings too readily, not to be won without effort. Words were on her lips which she felt ought to be said, only she feared that he might understand too much, if she could not say them easily, looking in his face—and to look now might tell all. Yet, not to say them—to let him go on under the delusion that she cared for Colin—was out of the question.

She thought she would wait till the last moment, till there should be no time for a response on his part.

Unknowingly he helped her. He said in a low voice, "I hope you will not mind my having said so much. I have a purpose. I have been thinking that if Colin could come home in a day or two to take my place——"

The sentence remained unfinished. Phyllys allowed six seconds to pass; then she glanced up and asked, "What for?"

"You hardly need to ask that."

She delayed again till they were close to the side-door, and her next words were, "Please don't!"

A sudden passion of hope shook him.

"I mean"—and she spoke with smiling unconcern—"that if you have any sort of fancy about Colin and me—anything of that sort—it is altogether a mistake. Please don't send for him, if you meant to do so. It would be better not."

Giles had grown white as chalk. He stood before her, motionless.

"I can't help seeing what you have in your mind," she added. "But it would be wrong of me to let you. For Colin's sake, it would be wrong—if ever he has had any such fancy. I don't believe he has. I believe"—and she laughed—"he is above all that sort of weakness. He is a sculptor, and nothing else."

"You do not think that you could in time, perhaps——"

"Never!" she said decisively, and she ran indoors.

Giles did not follow her. He could not face other people immediately. His joy had to be met as his sorrow had been met, alone. Not the smallest element in his joy was the knowledge that victory had been won before the dawning of this radiant hope.

He knew now at least that she would not be Colin's, and that the coast lay clear for him to seek her.

CHAPTER XXIII.

OF THE LOST HEIRLOOM.

IN a corner of the gallery Phyllys gazed with interest at the space once occupied by an ancestral portrait. She knew the spot, though during her former visit her attention had not been drawn to it. She hardly wondered that the vacant space had not been sooner perceived. It was so much out of sight, the oak-panelled wall was so dark, the pictures around were so similar in tint to the panelling, that the disappearance might easily have gone unnoticed. As she thus cogitated, a step made her glance round.

"Fine afternoon," remarked Mr. Dugdale. "Kathleen wants you for a drive. She will call here at half-past three."

"That picture has never been found yet," said Phyllys.

"No. Extraordinary!" And he knitted his brows.

"But if the thief took it——"

One word came in reply—"Humbug!"

"You don't think it was a thief?"

He looked round to see that they were alone, and lowered his voice. "That is all humbug. No more a thief than I am a thief. I'd wager a hundred pounds it is Mrs. Keith's own doing. Don't tell anyone I say so. There would be no end of a rumpus."

Phyllys was startled, despite her own suspicions. "But why? What could make her?

What was the picture like?" She had often wished to ask this.

"Young fellow in the dress of somewhere about two hundred years ago. Pleasant face, blue eyes, strong look of Colin—which she hates like poison to be told. That is why she has hidden it—if she has, which I for one don't doubt. Of course, I can't say that to Giles or Colin." There was in Mr. Dugdale a distinctly feminine element, apparent at this moment.

Phyllys absently assented. He seemed to be describing the oil-painting which she had accidentally seen.

"Fact is, she detests being told that Colin is like the young fellow in the picture, simply because he was a sculptor, and a successful one in his day, and she always has set herself against Colin's love of modelling. Reason? No reason. A woman never needs a reason. Anything that tends to encourage in him the taste displeases her."

"What sort of man is her brother?"

"Jock Reeves? Judging from a photo I once saw—a big-made, substantial man, rather jolly-looking, not in the least her style."

Phyllys pondered much that afternoon on the singular ways of Mrs. Keith. That the hidden portrait really was the lost heirloom, she could no longer doubt. It was not the likeness of Mrs. Keith's brother, but of a young sculptor, ancestor to Giles, who had lived two centuries earlier, and whose gift, resembling that of Colin, had perhaps developed in him the same cast of face and expression as Colin's. Mrs. Keith's extreme dislike to the resemblance being noted arose, of course, as Mr. Dugdale intimated, from her intense and illogical aversion to sculpture.

"A sort of brain oddity," decided Phyllys. "But what shoals of lies she has told!"

When she went to bed she thought it all over again, and then was dropping peacefully to sleep, letting these entanglements slip away. Giles' face came up, and she smiled to see it. She all but forgot herself, and came to, and floated off again into semi-dreamland, when, like a flash of lightning from the mist-clothed Niesen, an extraordinary conjecture seized her.

It was a conjecture so vivid, so startling, so far-reaching in its involvements, that in a moment she was wide awake, sitting up in bed, staring into the darkness.

"Nonsense! Nonsense!" she said aloud.

But the possibility grew. It laid hold upon her imagination. Looking back, she saw scene after scene, heard utterance after utterance, more or less perplexing at the time—all now met, all unravelled, all explained, by this new scathing suggestion—all lending support to it.

"No, no, no!" she said energetically. "I'll never let myself think such a thing again. Oh, no! Impossible! It is absurd; it's ridiculous! It's out of the question."

The resolve was powerless. She could not stop the thinking. Again, again, again, that dread possibility leaped up, and would be faced, would assert itself. It cast a lurid light on past, present, future. It made all perplexities clear. It set her brain whirling.

But, of course, it could not be. It was too wildly improbable. She was mad to imagine such a thing. Absurd! Ridiculous! She said those words over and over, but they had no force. She could not divest herself of a growing belief that things were so. And yet—to imagine that she alone should see, and that everybody else had been blind! Preposterous! But, if it were so——

She tried to laugh. "It's a nightmare. I'll go to sleep, and forget."

Sleep, however, had fled.

Two or three days later Mrs. Keith stood, after the fall of dusk, at the open window in her bedroom. Giles, before her return, had invited to dinner the Vicar and Dr. Wallace, and these invitations remained uncancelled.

She was in one of her restless moods, frequent moods of late. She had dressed early, and had dismissed her maid, planning to secure half an hour alone. Yet when she found herself thus, she wished she had not done so. Solitude was seldom welcome.

A letter had arrived that afternoon, not in the ordinary way, but forwarded under cover from her London bankers, being marked "Immediate." It was written by one whom she ought to have welcomed gladly to Castle Hill, whom, for no fault of his own, she was determined to keep away. The writer knew this, and in a tone of serious remonstrance he argued against the resolve, trying to make it clear that she wronged both herself and him thereby.

"He shall not come," she repeated aloud more than once.

She turned from the open window, through which blew, unheeded, a cold breeze.

"He ought to know that I would not act so without good reason. He ought to understand. My motives are no concern of his. I told him

"'Never!' she said decisively."—p. 1175.

it had to be, and that should be enough. After all these years, what can it signify to him? But, at any cost, stay away he must—must!"

Standing before the large mirror, in her brocaded black silk, she pictured to herself what his arrival on the scene would mean. She saw him come in, saw the faces around, heard the inevitable exclamations; realised to the tips of her fingers what would be felt, thought, uttered; and with that conjured-up vision a sick terror seized her. She leant against the table on the verge of fainting.

A slight tap at the door roused her, and Phyllys appeared in a new evening frock of pale blue, a present from herself. There was a touch of constraint in Phyllys' manner, though she tried hard to be precisely as usual. She did not accept, but could not forget that midnight suggestion.

"I want you to see how nice my dress looks," she said. "It is early still. Nobody will come for another twenty minutes." But, contradicting her own words, "Why, there is a carriage already." She went to the window and peered out. "Not a carriage, but a railway fly."

Mrs. Keith sat upright, her eyes wide and staring, and the faintness vanished. If this, indeed, were the worst, she would brace herself to meet it.

"Colin has come," exclaimed Phyllys.

"Nonsense! He is in Scotland."

"I saw him plainly."

Mrs. Keith leant back, shaking like a leaf. The momentary terror, courageously met, had been awful, and reaction was severe. She had for an instant felt certain that the deferred possibility of years was a present reality.

The dinner went off as small dinners commonly do, being kept up to the mark in conversation by Mr. Dugdale, who, at least, never failed to contribute his share.

Mrs. Keith was, as always, well dressed; but she could not to-night have been complimented on her looks. Her face was pale with a spotted pallor, drawn, and deeply lined. Colin evidently noted her appearance as unusual. His eyes travelled repeatedly in her direction.

Giles observed no difference in her, simply because his mind was occupied elsewhere. He saw only Phyllys—and Colin in connection with Phyllys.

He could not yet flatter himself with having made much way since her arrival. For Colin's sake, now that he knew Colin's supposed quest of her to be hopeless, he would fain have brought matters quickly to a point, and have kept Colin away by announcing his engagement. Thus far he had failed. Phyllys was in what Colin would have called an "elusive" mood; entirely charming, but by no means to be promptly "landed." She held him at bay and fascinated him at one and the same time.

Colin's return was unexpected. The avowed cause, something to do with his modelling, did not satisfy Giles, who suspected Phyllys to be the true reason. He seemed in good spirits, but looked ill, as he always did after travelling.

Not long after Mrs. Keith and Phyllys left the table they were joined by him. For once the elder lady went off to write a note, leaving the two together, and in a minute or two Phyllys found him to be speaking of Giles in high praise. She wondered after how he had introduced the subject.

"One of the best fellows that ever lived," was his declaration. "Honestly, I believe there is nothing in life he would not give me if he thought I wanted it."

Phyllys' reply was impulsive. "Yes; he said so to me. 'At any cost.' I wondered what he meant. He said he owed you so much."

She was aware of a drawing back.

"Pretty of him. Unfortunately, the indebtedness lies the other way."

"But Giles must know," she insisted. "He told me he never could repay what he owed to you. He did not explain, and, of course, it is not my business." But it was her business, she added to herself, if he was to be her husband.

"He rather likes to put things strongly. Sounds effective! Don't make too much of it" Colin's tone was evasive "Some boyish escapade in his mind"

"It didn't sound so. It sounded very real."

"Giles was talking nonsense."

Was he? Phyllys knew him to be a man not addicted to light or careless speech. What he had said he meant.

Perhaps Colin did not wish to be questioned further, for he moved away.

CHAPTER XXIV.

OF A POSSIBLE COMPLICATION.

At her open window, gazing into the darkness, knelt Phyllys, sorely troubled.

Another suggestion had come, touching her far more acutely than the first, which was correlated to it, and far more terrible.

That earlier flash of light on Mrs. Keith's past had been lurid in aspect, had thrown a scathing gleam on things which seemed simple and natural enough. It had been since a weight upon her spirits. Still, she was with Giles; she was increasingly sure of his love; she felt perfect confidence in his rectitude and truth; she knew that, whatever happened, he at least was dependable. Nothing, she had told herself, could shake that security.

Hitherto no thought of blame to Giles had occurred to her. She had looked upon him as the unconscious instrument of another's evil deed; as no less ignorant of it than the rest of the world. Provisionally she had condemned one person, hoping still that her conjecture was mistaken, trying to find for that person extenuating circumstances, should the conjecture prove true.

But if Giles were implicated, if for years he had acquiesced, there could be no excuse, no extenuating circumstances.

She glanced back, in her thoughts, to a certain conversation with Giles, and his words spoken with regard to Colin recurred strongly—

"He and Mrs. Keith often talk as if Colin were a poor man, dependent on his art. It is not so really. What belongs to me belongs to him. What is mine is his. . . . You misread my meaning. It is a matter of simple duty. . . . Years ago I made up my mind that, whatever he might wish, he should have it; even though it might cost me—might cost me—— You would not think so, if you knew everything! I owe to Colin all—more than I can ever repay."

He had said this earnestly, from his heart. And Colin could say that he had been talking nonsense!

Some boyish escapade to win words like these from a man of Giles' stamp! That explanation would not hold water.

Then it was that the first dart of the new conjecture came, sharp and dagger-like—

"Did Giles know?"

Colin, of course, did not. No such suspicion had ever occurred to him. But, was Giles in ignorance?

She laid her face on the window-sill, clutching it in her distress. "Giles, you too, untrue!" she whispered, with scalding tears.

Then the recollection of her own future demanded attention—the all but certainty that he would ask her soon to be his wife. If things were so, how could she? Marry a man whose life was one long fraud!

If things were so. They might not be. It was only a conjecture—a suspicion. His words might bear some other interpretation. Even though her earlier imagination should prove correct, he might be innocent as a babe of complicity. Without most ample proof she would not believe him capable of such conduct. She would wait for further light. But she would hold him off, would not allow him to propose, till she should know more.

Giles, meanwhile, had resolved to lose no time, and difficulties strengthened that determination.

One whole day he had to be absent on business, and the next morning he found himself constantly eluded. He was aware of a change in Phyllys. She seemed constrained, no longer brightening with joy at his approach. His hopes sank, but he would not delay.

After luncheon she retreated to Mrs. Keith's boudoir; and presently, glancing up from her work, she found Mrs. Keith gone and Giles in her place. Before she knew positively whither his speech tended, it was done. He had offered her himself and all that he had—his love, his life. She whispered, "Please don't!" but he would not be stayed. He pleaded in short vehement phrases.

"Give me some hope, Phyllys"—for her face was almost hidden in the sofa cushion—"one word——"

That averted face struck like ice.

"Have I spoken too soon? This cannot be a surprise to you."

Still, she would not let him see her look. The silence was more than he knew how to endure.

"It is life or death to me," he said hoarsely. "Life without you is death. I did not know till I saw you what it was to live. Give me hope—if not now, for the future."

She had drawn her hand away, and he took it again. "Phyllys, my darling! if you knew what you are to me! One word——"

But when she lifted her head, she was joyless and pale, her cheeks drenched with tears.

"I can't!" she said, with a sob.

"Cannot—love me?"

"I can't say anything!"

"You want time. Dearest, I will wait any time. Only give me hope."

"No." She mastered herself with difficulty. "I can't. It can't be. Not now!"

"But by-and-by—when you know me better. I can wait if only I may hope."

"Oh, I don't know. Don't ask me, please."

He sat beside her, dazed and pained.

"Please—try to forget."

"Forget you? Never!"

He kept her hand, and she did not again draw it away.

"My darling, what can this mean?" he asked passionately. "Not that you do not care for me! That you don't feel you might—some day——"

"Perhaps—but, oh, not for years——"

"But why wait? Why put me to this terrible suspense? Every day is a year till you are mine. Why wait—if you think you might learn to love me? Would it take so long?"

She burst into such heart-broken tears that he could not misunderstand, and joy leaped into his face. "My Phyllys! My own!" he broke out. "You do love me!"

She put him off with both hands. "No, no! I can say nothing now. It is quite impossible. You must not think of me for a long, long while. I shall go home, and you must forget."

"Never!"

"You must! You are free."

"Free! But this is awful. Free till when?"

She could only sob, and he took a sterner tone.

"You have not treated me fairly. You have given me reason to hope."

"I know," she whispered. "And if I had seen——"

"Then you thought you could. You did not see earlier—this that stands in the way. It is something new."

"Yes."

"Since when?" She made no reply. "You cannot be refusing me for Colin's sake—after what you said." She shook her head. "I cannot conceive what other obstacle exists. You do care for me."

He spoke masterfully, and she was again silent. To give him a decisive "Yes" or a decisive "No" seemed equally out of the question. He gathered a grain of hope from the downcast face.

"One thing at least you will allow. I may speak again. How soon?"

"Oh, not for a long, long while, please!"

He covered her hand with kisses. She burst into fresh tears, and hurried away.

CHAPTER XXV.

OF A FLARE-UP AND ITS SEQUEL.

LITTLE more was seen of Giles that afternoon. But, disappointed and distressed though he was, he could not be described as hopeless. At least he knew with almost certainty that his love was returned, and he did not regard the refusal as final Colin had been all day invisible—not fleeing from the pain of seeing Phyllys. He had come home, aware what it meant for himself, bent upon freeing Giles from the measure of doubt which, with his keen insight, he had detected in the latter's correspondence. Giles had won his way to victory through defeat; but in Colin's case there was no defeat, and no man knew of his strife. He loved, and at one time he had hoped; but so soon as he read clearly what Phyllys was to Giles, he drew back. He would not stand, if he might, in the path of Giles' happiness.

But he had in trouble a resource denied to less fortunate mortals. For weeks he had gone without any inclination to model. Now, suddenly, in the midst of many interests, a "new idea" had come to him, with its compelling force. And, Phyllys or no Phyllys, love or no love, it would not be denied. Disappointment, longing, languor, fled before it. In the absorption of shaping his vision through plastic clay, all else was forgotten, or was seen as a dim dream. Hours flew as he worked, and when he stopped, it was not from mental inability to continue, but from physical exhaustion.

Resisting the impulse to fling himself on the sofa, he went to the drawing-room, wondering what others had been after all day.

"All alone?" he said, in surprise, as he entered.

Phyllys met the remark composedly. "Yes, Mrs. Keith has something to do upstairs. A note came, and perhaps she is answering it."

"And what has become of Giles?"

"He had to go out."

One swift glance deciphered her. She poured out tea and brought it to him, with a "Don't move," as he started up. It had been an endless day with her, not flying on wings as with him. She went to the window, to gaze into the dusk, and an exclamation all but left her lips at the sight of Giles standing under a great cedar tree. It was Giles. She saw distinctly the outlines of his large, solid figure, and pity welled up in her heart. Poor Giles! She knew how miserable he was, and it was she who had had to make him so. Tears came, and she stayed where she was, seeing nothing through the mist. When it cleared, he was gone.

Mrs. Keith's voice sounded faintly in a long scream, shrill and drawn out, like that of some wild animal in a trap. Colin was in the hall before a word could be spoken, Phyllys flying after him. From the floor above came cries of "Fire!" and there was a smell of burning.

Thither rushed the two, followed by butler and footman. From the shut door of Mrs. Keith's room issued a low moaning.

The door was locked—a strong one, not easy to burst open. Colin flung himself against it, without success. He signed the men forward as they came up, but before the three could act in concert, the key was turned from within, and a large figure emerged, wreaths of smoke pouring out with him, through which darting flames were visible. He carried the helpless form of Mrs. Keith, having flung a wet towel round her face and another round his own.

"Giles!" whispered Phyllys. He must have gone round to the front of the house, and have climbed in at the bedroom window over the porch. As this conjecture flashed up, she recalled having seen a light ladder near the porch that afternoon.

"Take her—sharp!" He thrust the limp lady into her son's arms. "Not burnt! Frightened! Water—plenty—quick!" in peremptory tones. "Keep this door shut, or you'll have the house in a blaze! Hurry, men! Not a moment to lose! Water——"

He banged the door to, and could be heard furiously tearing down curtains within, while butler and footman rushed for cans of water, and Colin half-carried, half-dragged, his mother to another room. Phyllys went too, disturbed by fears for Giles. Colin delayed a few seconds, to satisfy himself that Mrs. Keith had not been touched by fire, then asked Phyllys: "Would you mind staying with her? I must go. Send for Dr. Wallace if needful."

"Yes. Don't wait. Giles may want you. I hope he won't get hurt."

She found plenty to do, even with Mrs. Keith's capable maid to the fore. For some time the rescued lady was barely conscious, and when revived to her surroundings, nervous terror overpowered her, causing a return of faintness. By the time she came out of this, Colin reappeared, looking white and used up.

"Is the fire out?" asked Phyllys anxiously.

"Yes." He leant against the chimney-piece. "Much wrong?" with a glance towards the sofa.

"Only upset, we think. She is beginning to talk. Is anybody hurt?"

"No one hurt; but a good deal of damage done. We've been within an ace of something very much worse."

"How did it happen?"

His gesture showed ignorance.

"A big box lying open just between bed and window, and a pile of clothes flung on the ground, which seem to have caught first, and made a regular bonfire. I suppose the breeze from the window carried the curtains within reach, and, of course, they flared up. Bedding all reduced to ashes. In two minutes more the woodwork would have been alight. I don't understand why she did not give the alarm sooner."

"Is Giles there still?"

"I can't say. I've been filling cans at the cistern, sending the men to and fro."

He went to the sofa, and Mrs. Keith, speaking indignantly, turned to him. "Will you please attend to me? No one will listen. Where is Giles? They tell me I can't go to the room yet, and I must go. I intend to go. I don't care what you say."

He sat down by her side, asking: "How did it come about?"

"I'm sure I don't know. How can I tell? I had put a candle on the floor for a moment, and there were some things out of a box, and then I heard a horrible roar, and the whole pile blazed up. I rushed to the door, and it would not open, and I forgot I had turned the key. I thought I should be burnt to death, and I think I lost my senses, for when I came to I was down on the ground, and the room seemed full of smoke and flame. I suppose I called out, and somebody picked me up, and threw a cloth over my mouth, and I heard Giles' voice. It was dreadful."

"Was that the box in your cupboard, ma'am?" asked her maid.

"Yes; you wanted a ruffle out——"

"You said the key was lost, ma'am."

"Of course; but I found I had a duplicate key, so I just got it out to look. Colin, I don't choose that anybody should meddle with that box. There are things in it of my own. I must go and see. I want it put back, exactly as it is, into the cupboard."

She was starting up, but the touch of his hand restrained her. "Not now. The room is not in a fit state, and you must keep quiet. I will see to it for you."

"The box is to be put back into the cupboard immediately," she reiterated. "Nothing in it is to be touched."

"I understand. It shall be done at once." He would not suggest to her that probably its contents existed no longer.

Phyllys made her escape with him, and they went together into the once pretty bedroom, now a scene of desolation. The smell of fire was strong, curtains had vanished, blackened remains of burnt goods lay about, and water had been flung in lavish streams over walls, floor, and furniture.

Mr. Dugdale stood at the centre, surveying the wreck. He had just arrived.

"You look considerably the worse," he remarked to Colin, who paid no heed to the remark, but shoved an empty and fire-blackened box into the cupboard.

"What has become of the fellow who rescued your mother?"

"What fellow?" inquired Colin. "Giles brought her out."

"Giles was not here till later. Says so himself. A stranger, John says—just arrived in Castlemere on his way to call here. By the time anybody had leisure to attend to him he was like a sweep, and he went off to make himself respectable; coming later, he said. One or two seem to have mistaken him for Giles."

"I did, oddly; but it was a mere glimpse. He was gone before I came back."

Colin went away, and Mr. Dugdale, moving a step or two to examine the old carved bedstead—a valuable article of furniture, badly charred—uttered a short exclamation. He stooped to lift a picture, which had been put aside, leaning against the wall.

"My goodness!" burst from him. Then, "Didn't I say so?"

Phyllys came nearer.

"It's IT!" in tones of intense wonderment. He turned towards her a black-framed oil-painting. She saw a calm face, with familiar, clear, blue eyes.

"Well!" uttered Mr. Dugdale, as if words failed him.

Phyllys put a grave question. "Is that the lost picture?"

"Yes."

It was also the hidden portrait, declared by Mrs. Keith to represent her brother, Jock Reeves.

Nothing could long keep Mrs. Keith quiet. She was unable to rest. Twenty minutes after Colin had left her she went to her room, after dismissing her maid, only to find the door locked. Extreme anxiety to know whether the picture in the bottom of the box had escaped observation oppressed her, but she dared not make direct inquiries. She knew that the dresses heaped on the floor had been consumed, but she hoped still that the thick woollen shawl covering the picture might have been left undisturbed.

Failing to allay her suspense, she made her way to the library, where others were gathered, discussing the event of the day. When she appeared, Colin remonstrated with her for being about, and they tried to turn the subject, but she could speak of nothing else.

Three minutes after her appearance the stout butler came in, composed as always, but with curved eyebrows of amaze.

"The gentleman is here, sir, that got in at the window. He asked to see Mrs. Keith."

"Bring him at once. We all wish to thank him for his help," spoke Giles.

A dread seized Mrs. Keith. She rose, and put out protesting hands. But it was too late. With more than usual emphasis the butler gave forth:

"Mr. Jock Reeves."

Solid of figure and heavy of step, in walked a more elderly but most exact repetition of Giles. It was Giles in figure, Giles in bearing, Giles, when he spoke, in voice—but Giles as he would become years later, somewhat stouter, with streaks of grey in the hair. In an instant Phyllys knew that she looked upon the Giles whom she had seen at Interlaken.

Nobody spoke. The whole circle seemed stricken dumb. Giles, Colin, Mr. Dugdale, knew not what to say, what to think. Phyllys read confirmation of her midnight suggestion. Mrs. Keith hardly breathed. This was the moment that had hung before her imagination as an awful possibility through years.

Feature for feature, he was Giles Randolph. And his name was Reeves. He was not related to Giles in the most distant degree.

He took two steps forward, and cheerfully accosted the latter.

"How d'you do, Colin? I've taken you all by surprise. But no mistake is possible," with a jolly laugh. "You and I might be son and father! Glad to find my nephew so perfect a chip of the old block. Well, Cecil, my dear, I made up my mind at last to take the bull by the horns."

He glanced round, and spoke again to Giles.

"I've put up for a good while with your mother's fantasies, Colin; but, really, it was getting beyond a joke. I couldn't stand it any longer. So I thought I'd come and see for myself, and I was in the garden when I heard her shriek, and got in over the porch, using a ladder luckily there. Excusable, I hope, in such an emergency."

Giles murmured an assent.

"You, of course"—looking at Colin—"no mistake there either. How d'you do, Randolph?" putting his broad hand on Colin's shoulder; "No mistaking you for any but a Randolph. Not the athletic type. You're the image of your uncle Jem—died young, you know."

So far he talked on carelessly. But the silence made itself felt. He looked round with curious eyes.

After these years of unquestioning acceptance, in one moment light had flashed on all three men. No doubt the way for such illumination had been prepared. Many a perplexity, put down to Mrs. Keith's "oddity," now rose with confirming and convincing power. Mr. Dugdale's eyes expanded with astonishment. Colin's face, already pale, grew a shade more ivory-like. Giles flushed darkly, whether with guilt Phyllys could not yet determine. By comparison she cared for nothing else.

The silence was brief, measured by seconds, yet to all there it seemed long. To Mrs. Keith it meant years of anguish compressed into a point.

Colin broke it. In soft slow tones, dragging more than usual, he informed the newcomer: "You are making a slight mistake—pardon me. I am Colin Keith; that is Giles Randolph."

The other spoke his incredulity by a short laugh.

"It is true," chimed in a deeper voice. "I have always been Giles. He has always been Colin."

Mr. Reeves looked at the last speaker. "No, my dear fellow. You don't humbug your uncle in that style! Not quite!" He turned upon his heel, with a gesture of disdain.

"I don't fathom your object in trying to take me in," he said. "But I promise you, you won't succeed. Look here!" He placed himself beside Giles, opposite the long mirror—both tall, substantial in make, upright, with red-brown complexion, straight features, and blue eyes dragged downward at their outer corners.

"Look there, and tell me that again if you can. I believe"—and he glanced again round the room—"I believe you mean it. You are not humbugging me. But how in the world you have been taken in passes my comprehension. Does it need any telling? Look for yourselves. This is my nephew. You"—grasping Giles' arm—"you are Colin Keith; that other is Randolph. It is written in your faces, plain as daylight. Ha, now I know why she tried to keep me away. Afraid of its coming out." He spoke with increasing emphasis. "So this is your work, Cecil! That's what you've been up to. A pretty business. You dare to tell me that all their lives those two have gone under the wrong names? Colin for Giles! Giles for Colin! Then I say it is iniquitous! scandalous! disgraceful!"

Mr. Dugdale made a move. He went to a corner of the room, brought thence an oil-painting, and held it up beside Colin. Hardly more remarkable was the resemblance between Giles and Mr. Reeves than the semblance between Colin and this Randolph ancestor.

"See?" demanded Mr. Dugdale of the company. "Now we know why it has been hidden."

Giles strode forward and stood facing Mrs. Keith. She cowered before his look. Phyllys' heart bounded with joy, and then there was quick self-reproach that she could be so happy when another was so miserable.

"Will you please to tell me the truth, Mrs. Keith? Am I, or is Colin, your son? Is my name Randolph—or Keith?"

She shrank lower and lower, till her bowed head almost rested on her knees. In that shame-stricken form they read the truth. But Giles repeated sternly:

"My name, if you please. Randolph—or Keith?"

And as if the word were dragged from her against her will, she murmured, "Keith."

One low word—"Mother!"—was heard from Colin.

But the crushing shame, the overwhelming sorrow, of Giles' look silenced all lips. He stood with folded arms, bent head, lowered eyes. Mrs. Keith broke into a storm of hysterics, and had to be carried from the room.

CHAPTER XXVI.

OF READJUSTMENTS.

BRIEFLY stated, this was what had happened.

Twenty-eight years before this date, James Randolph, then owner of Castle Hill, lost his wife in the south of France, and, broken-hearted, went to travel in the East, where a few months later he too died. Before starting, he gave over his infant son, Giles, to the charge of young Mrs. Geoffry Keith, friend of his wife, and widow of his brother-in-law, Geoffry Keith, whose first wife—his own sister—had died years earlier.

"'My name, if you please. Randolph, or Keith?'"

Mrs. Keith, a handsome and attractive woman, had one baby-boy of her own, and she was charmed to have the second infant to bring up with him ; the more so, since she had been left at the recent death of her husband in almost destitute circumstances ; and so long as little Giles should be in her charge she would receive an allowance of eight hundred a year.

This arrangement, made by the widowed father, continued indefinitely after his death.

A second winter was spent by Mrs. Keith in the south of France, and in the spring, when the little boys were about sixteen months' old, she was assailed by the great temptation of her life. Giles fell ill, and was ordered north ; and, as she travelled by slow stages, their nurse broke down with some severe ailment, and had to be left behind. Two stages later, Giles grew markedly worse, and the German doctor, hastily called in, pronounced him to be dying.

Mrs. Keith knew what that meant. If Giles died, her income ceased. The Castle Hill estate would pass to a distant relative, and she, with her little boy, would be unprovided for.

She shrank with dread from the thought, and then came a suggestion of evil. Why not transpose the boys' names ? Put Colin for Giles and Giles for Colin ? She was in a strange place, among strangers. No one would know. If Giles recovered, she would at once revert to the old order of things. If die he must, why should not her boy, as Giles, enjoy the wealth which otherwise must pass to a stranger ?

The temptation was sore, and she was not a woman of high honour or strict integrity. She had never been truthful. The change seemed simple. She only had to write and dismiss the nurse they had had, only had to give the doctor the transposed names. She had always called them by pet terms, "Mop" and "Top," so little difficulty existed in that direction. Both were blue-eyed, and, though unlike in make, they had been called alike in colouring.

When the doctor called again, though she had not made up her mind previously, she found herself claiming the sick boy as her own, and talking of the other as "her charge."

All night Giles seemed to be dying, but with morning came a rally ; and when a young English doctor, Wallace by name, passing through the place, offered his services to a countrywoman in trouble, he took a more favourable view, which proved to be right.

Mrs. Keith then found herself in a terrible position. The little fellow could not be moved for weeks, and all around believed him to be her son. On her first arrival she had written a line to Mr. Penrhyn, Giles' guardian, naming the severe illness of, not "Giles," but "Colin." A trained nurse had to be engaged, and she, as well as the doctors and some kind English residents in the place, all had heard the same false statements. She had woven a web round her own feet, from which she found no escape. Mr. Penrhyn, the guardian, came out to see the child, and insisted on his being brought up thenceforth in England.

Nothing short of frank confession could undo what she had done ; and to a proud nature such as hers confession seemed to lie beyond all bounds of possibility.

So, hoping against hope for some method by which she might undo the tangle, without betraying her own act, she let matters drift—a fatal policy. She did not then see how inevitably difficulties must thicken as time went by. The very idea of reversal without confession became gradually a hopeless dream ; and all idea of restitution was relegated to a dim distance. Things were thus ; and thus, she told herself, they had "for the present" to remain. No one now spoke of the boys as alike. Colin — the true Giles — was greatly altered by his severe illness ; and Giles—the true Colin — grew month by month more hardy, more robust, more sturdy.

In early days she had not felt anxious on the score of family likenesses. That fear dawned later, when she saw "Colin" fast developing into a reproduction of the Randolph ancestor, inheriting also the gift which she loathed because it was a Randolph characteristic ; when, too, she saw her own son growing into an exact copy of her brother Jock Reeves.

The latter had been so long on the other side of the earth that she had ceased to fear his return, when suddenly he came. From the marked resemblance in his handwriting to that of his nephew, she had always taken strict precautions never to have his letters seen. When he returned he did not announce his coming beforehand, and on learning from her London bankers that she was abroad, and that any letter from him was to be sent to a certain Thun address, he promptly followed her to Switzerland. Thus the letter discovered by Mr. Forsyth gave Mrs. Keith her first intimation that she was no longer separated by oceans from the terror of half her life.

When next day she saw him at Interlaken, he found himself hysterically forbidden ever to show his face to her son or her son's friend. He argued in vain against the senseless prohibition, as it seemed to him, and at length he resolved to break through it. With his appearance at Castle Hill was levelled to the ground in one crash her elaborate structure of deceit, built up through twenty-eight long years.

They had not been happy years to her. She had a conscience, though she did not obey it; and hundreds of times she had bitterly regretted her own mad folly. But no way out of the tangle had ever presented itself, save the one way which she refused to face.

Perhaps all through the deepest dread in her mind had been lest Giles, her own boy, should despise his mother. Anything rather than that! His contempt she could not endure.

But the look in those sombre blue eyes which broke her down was not disdain. It was the crushing shame, the overpowering sorrow, that touched her heart and led her, though not at once, to true repentance. She knew that she, his mother, had brought it all upon him; and she recognised how her tale must look in the sight of the one being for whose sake she could almost have died. Not quite! A woman of her calibre dies—quite—for nobody. Self always ranks first. Still, she did love him passionately; and when she thought of her little child's clinging arms, when she realised that she might have kept his loving esteem and trust in ever-growing measure to life's end, she could have cried with one of old, "My punishment is greater than I can bear."

She had an interview with her son next morning, and of that interview no human being heard the details.

An hour later Giles was on his way to the library, oppressed by a dazed consciousness that in no corner of the house had he a right to stay. The shock to him had been tremendous, the upheaval of feeling immense. A few words, early uttered by Colin, had been significant. "You have often said to me that what was yours was mine. This only means the same reversed—that what is mine is yours." But Giles felt that he could not consent to such generosity from one whom he had so long and deeply—though unwittingly—injured.

It was, indeed, no light matter for one of his proud nature to step in a moment from the position of benefactor to benefactee—to pass from the landed country gentleman to the impecunious adopted brother. It tried him beyond words.

Worse still, he knew that he no longer had a home to offer Phyllys. To give up the hope of winning her would be worse than death; yet what choice had he?

In the library he found her, and she signed to him to move softly. Colin was asleep in the inner room, worn out. "He won't hear if we speak low," she said, and then Giles found her with tears in her eyes apologising for something that she had suspected or imagined. He did not quickly take in her meaning, and she had to explain more fully—to quote his own words about Colin.

"I don't wonder that you were puzzled," he said at length, dejectedly; not vexed with her, as he might have been with another. "I ought to have said less or more." Then he gave the clue she had required. "His ill-health is my doing—my fault. It is through me that he never is, never can be, like other men. I spoilt his life for him."

He alluded to the tale, which Phyllys had heard earlier, of the cliff accident, when Elsye Wallace was killed, and when Colin had received severe injury. "You know so much"—as if relieved not to have to tell the whole. Then, lower: "It was my doing. Not intentionally, but in a passion. I was jealous—angry—and I gave him a push. He overbalanced, or she started back—no one knew how—and they both fell. Now you understand what I meant; why I can never make up to him for all he has suffered. And as if I had not harmed him enough—this in addition."

He looked wonderingly at Phyllys' hand, laid on his knee, and his own came on it.

"You are sorry for me. But I have my way to make and my mother to support. She will live with her brother—that is settled; but I cannot let her be a burden on anyone but myself. Even if you could say 'Yes,' it would mean years of waiting."

"And if I don't mind waiting?" she murmured.

His face changed, the sombreness dying out of it.

"But—there was a barrier!"

"There is no barrier," a quiet voice asserted by his side. "You have a home, for Castle Hill is your home. I cannot do without you. Be my agent—my referee; anything you like to call it—and name your own income. And the sooner you can persuade Phyllys to come and be the perpetual sunshine of the place the better for us both!"

Phyllys' smile looked as if she might not be hard to persuade.

[THE END.]

THE MAKERS OF MODERN CHRISTIANITY.

AMBROSE THE STATESMAN.

By the Very Rev. H. Donald M. Spence, D.D., Dean of Gloucester.

N Ambrose, the Bishop of Milan, we have a completely different type of Churchman from anything that before had appeared in that first hundred years after the victory of Christianity in that wonderful fourth century which produced those great ones who moulded and shaped the religion of a persecuted sect into the religion of the civilised world—the world of Rome.

The group we have been sketching were all preachers, all theologians; but each had his distinguishing characteristic. Jerome was the profound scholar; Basil of Cæsarea was the organiser of the monasticism which was so largely to influence mediæval Christianity, the builder up, too, of the edifice of the far-reaching Christian charities, the hospital, the homes of the weary and heavy laden of every degree and kind; Gregory Nazianzus was the theologian par excellence; John Chrysostom the first of Christian preachers. Ambrose was scholar, organiser, theologian, preacher too; but, first and foremost, he was the pioneer of the distinguished band of Church-statesmen—the spiritual ancestor, he has been termed, of the Hildebrands and the Innocents of Rome—of men like Lanfranc of Norman England; of Suger, the Minister of Louis VII. of France; of à Becket, the Archbishop of Henry II.; and of many another statesman-ecclesiastic whose portrait hangs in the long gallery of illustrious Churchmen belonging to many ages, from many peoples.

The early story of Ambrose was uneventful. Everything that fortune could bestow was his. Descended from a noble Roman family of large possessions, his father was, besides, one of the great officials of the Empire, the Prætorian Prefect of Gaul. The young noble, after a careful education, rapidly passed through the lower grades of the imperial civil service, and when still comparatively young was appointed as Consular Magistrate of the provinces of Liguria and Æmilia, Milan being the seat of his government. There he gained general respect and admiration for his administrative talent, for his industry, and scrupulous love of justice; and when the bishopric of the great See was vacant he was designated by universal acclamation for the vacant post. The young statesman, reluctantly it seems, accepted the ecclesiastical dignity; but at once devoted his great natural abilities to fit himself for the important work for which he had received no previous special training.

We have a picture of his daily toil-filled life after he had assumed the weighty charge of the Milan episcopate. He began his long day early with prayer, and then for hours he sat at his study table working at the Holy Scriptures with the aid of such books as Origen's voluminous commentaries and Basil's sermons on the Bible. His doors were ever open to those who sought his counsel and his direction. He would lay aside study for the moment, would reply, and then plunge again into his scholar's work. Scarcely would he pause even to eat. Far into the night the restless toil went on. Augustine tells us how several times he penetrated into that study chamber at Milan and watched him working, and longed to speak to the great Bishop, but could not find the heart to interrupt him. Every Sunday Ambrose preached in the splendid Basilica of Milan. Crowds went to listen to his sermons; they did not possess the varied picturesqueness of Basil, whom he especially loved to imitate, or the wondrous dramatic power of Chrysostom, or the marvellous lucidity and depth of the dogmatic teaching of Gregory Nazianzus; but they had a strange charm of their own. The spirit of the eminent Roman judge—hard, practical, vigorous—lived in the preaching of Ambrose, and men came from far and near to listen to him.

The Emperor of the West in the early years of Ambrose's episcopate was the young Gratian. His father, Valentinian I., before he died had especially commended his son to Ambrose's care, and Gratian from the first lived in the closest intimacy with the great Bishop, whom he loved to consult and advise with, not only on spiritual matters but on state questions.

The influence of Ambrose over Gratian is shown in the marked hostility of the young Emperor to the Pagan party, still a living power in the state. It was Gratian who first formally declined to be invested with the ancient insignia of the Pontifex Maximus, as official head of the old Pagan cult. Before him the Christian emperors had on special occasions worn these. It was under his orders that the time-honoured "Altar of Victory" and the famous statue were removed from the Senate House in Rome; and when Symmachus the Senator, the acknowledged chief of the Pagan party, in consequence of this order sought an interview, the Emperor declined to receive him. A series of edicts, strongly favouring Christianity, was issued, too, from the Court of Milan between the years 379 and 382.

In the year 383 Gratian was assassinated during a residence at Gaul, in a military revolt, by Maximus, one of his leading generals, who assumed the purple and the government of the vast Gallic provinces.

Gratian's young half-brother, Valentinian II., who had been associated with him as joint Emperor of the West, was at once placed by his mother, Justina (Valentinian I.'s second wife) under the guardianship of Ambrose, whom she rightly deemed the most powerful personage in Italy. This was in some respects a notable act, and shows how Ambrose was regarded even by those bitterly opposed to his religious creed, for the Empress Justina was a strong Arian. Valentinian II. and his guardian, Justina, took up their residence at Milan, virtually under the protection of Ambrose. The statesman-bishop we next hear of as ambassador of the boy Valentinian II. at the court of the usurper Maximus at Treves, negotiating an agreement between Maximus and the Milan Court. For a time he arranged what was virtually an armed truce between the master of the Gallic provinces and the young Emperor Valentinian II. Returning to Milan, Ambrose was soon engaged in a bitter controversy with the Arian Empress-mother, who, forgetting her deep obligation to the Bishop, endeavoured to procure for her Arian friends the possession of the most important of the Milan churches. Ambrose firmly resisted this encroachment, and the people of Milan sided with him. His resistance to the Court was a protracted one. It is a somewhat long and confused story, but it is clear that, in spite of the strong leaning of the Empress in the direction of Arianism, the deadly heresy made no way in Milan, and Ambrose, with the Orthodox party, remained in possession, not only of the churches, but also of the hearts of the Milanese. He also obtained an extraordinary influence over the young Valentinian.

But the bitter disputes of the Catholic party with the Court and the Arian faction had emboldened the usurper to press his designs upon the dominions of the boy Valentinian II. Again Ambrose undertook the office of Ambassador to the Court at Treves. The mission, however, was fruitless, and Maximus invaded Italy, and Valentinian and his mother fled to Theodosius, the Eastern Emperor. The pretensions of Maximus were finally disposed of by the armies of Theodosius, who defeated and crushed the formidable rebel, and once more the Eastern and Western Empires were united for the last time under the great military Emperor Theodosius.

For several years (roughly from A.D. 388 to A.D. 391) Milan was the centre of the whole Roman Empire, both of the East and West, the seat of the Imperial Government, and the residence of Theodosius. Ambrose was now brought into immediate contact with one of the greatest of the Roman emperors. His ascendancy over Gratian and Valentinian II., the young sons of Valentinian I., who successively had reigned over the West, was undoubted, but the new master of the Roman world with whom he had now to do was a person of very different calibre from those youthful and impressionable princes. A consummate and brilliant military leader, Theodosius was, besides, a wise and far-seeing ruler of men, and has well earned the title of "Great" generally bestowed upon him by all historians. For Ambrose to have successfully asserted his ecclesiastical authority over such an Emperor was indeed a strange victory for the Church, and one which has exercised over her fortunes a far-reaching influence.

During the three or four years of the residence of Theodosius at Milan, Ambrose continued his intimate and trusted friend, and on several memorable occasions asserted the supreme majesty and power of the Church in which he occupied so dignified a position. One of these occasions deserves a more detailed mention. Theodosius, wise and prudent monarch though he was, was liable to uncontrollable bursts of passionate anger. A terrible expression of one of these was his conduct on the occasion of a disgraceful outbreak at Thessalonica, when the Governor and his staff of imperial officers were cruelly murdered by an excited populace. By order of the Emperor a terrible vengeance was determined upon, and an inhuman massacre of a very large number of the Thessalonian inhabitants by the soldiers of Theodosius was the punishment exacted for the wild uprising and the consequent cruel insult to the imperial Majesty in the persons of the Governor of the city and his staff.

The horror of Ambrose when he heard of the inhuman deed perpetuated by the orders of his friend the Emperor was profound. He at once separated himself and his clergy from all communion with the Court, and for some eight months refused to allow Theodosius even to cross the threshold of a church; and only on the great Emperor undertaking to publish an edict prohibiting all capital punishments for thirty days after conviction, and so preventing for the future such terrible results of imperial passion, did Ambrose consent again to admit Theodosius to communion with the Church.

But the Bishop required more than the promise to publish a merciful edict. He demanded from Theodosius a public profession of contrition as a condition of his being admitted to worship as in old times; and the Roman world was startled at the sight of the irresponsible master of the vast Empire, stripped of his purple and his diadem, prostrate on the bare pavement of the Church's porch, in tears, beating his breast and imploring forgiveness of his great sin. Then, and not till then, did Ambrose grant the Emperor absolution for his great sin.

Nothing of this kind had ever happened before in the story of Christianity. During the eighty or ninety years of the public profession of Christianity by the Emperors in Rome, in Constantinople, in Cæsarea, in Antioch, men like Basil and Gregory Nazianzus with all their power and prestige had never dreamed of asserting so awful a power over the master of the world. Christian Emperors like Constantine the Great and his son Constantius, Valentinian and his brother Valens, and even Theodosius until he met with Ambrose, had treated the Church and its chief ministers as they treated other subjects. The Emperor was absolutely supreme, and the great majority of the Church leaders were content to acknowledge this supremacy; but by Ambrose a new claim was asserted. "The Church," he wrote, "was not in the Empire, but it was the Emperor who was in the Church"; and Christianity now gradually assumed a totally new position in the world. The Emperor, equally with the meanest of his subjects, acknowledged the right of the Christian Church to sit in judgment upon him and to enforce obedience to her laws in matters which involved the eternal principles of justice and mercy, when those eternal laws were flagrantly disregarded as they had been in the massacre at Thessalonica, perpetrated by direction of Theodosius.

For a second time in Ambrose's public career an awful tragedy swept across and desolated his busy, beautiful life. It happened in this wise. In A.D. 391, after some three to four years spent in the Western Empire, mostly in Milan, the great Theodosius judged it expedient to return to the East and Constantinople, leaving the still youthful Valentinian II. as the Western Emperor, under the guardianship of Ambrose in religious and civil matters and of Arbogastes, a tried soldier of ability, in military questions. Arbogastes proved unfaithful to his trust, and in the course of a visit of Valentinian II. to his Gallic dominions basely procured his assassination. Arbogastes was of barbarian extraction, and not desiring to array himself in the imperial purple, set up a puppet Emperor in the person of Eugenius a scholar and rhetorician. The body of the murdered Valentinian II. was brought back to Milan; and Theodosius, from his Eastern capital, directed that the last rites should be rendered with all possible ceremonial and state. The sorrowing Bishop preached the funeral oration of the murdered Prince whom he loved well—a pathetic monument of eloquence and heartfelt sorrow, and then quitted Milan, as he could have no dealings with Arbogastes and his creature Eugenius.

Theodosius, worn, not with age—he was only fifty years old—but with a life of incessant toil and weary struggle, after some delay marched against Arbogastes. This campaign could not be avoided, for not only was his carefully built up Empire endangered by the revolt of Arbogastes and the elevation of Eugenius, but the Christianity of the West was gravely imperilled; for the policy of the usurper during his brief tenure of power, which lasted only two or three years, had thrown him into the arms of the Pagan party, still very influential in Rome. Again the "Altar of Victory" was restored in the Senate House at Rome, and many of the closed idol temples were reopened. One brief but dangerous campaign, however, averted the danger. Once more Theodosius was completely victorious. The forces of the usurper were routed, Eugenius was put to death, and Arbogastes, in despair, committed suicide.

The Eastern Emperor, again the undisputed sovereign of the Roman world, reentered Milan as a conqueror, but at the same time as a dying man. Literally worn out, he succumbed to a dangerous disease a few months after his decisive victory over Arbogastes and Eugenius (A.D. 395). Those who stood by the death-bed of Theodosius thought they heard the name of Ambrose trembling on the lips of the Emperor as he passed away.

Once more in that strange public life of his, Ambrose was asked by his dying friend to watch over the heirs of the awful Diadem of Rome. But, alas, for Arcadius and Honorius, the two young sons of Theodosius, the eminent servant of God, who, had he lived, might have done so much for them, might have trained those sadly wasted lives to aim after ideals nobler than merely selfish pleasures, only survived his well-loved friend and Emperor two short years. The end came for Ambrose in A.D. 397.

When the great and good prelate was lying, as men too truly feared, sick with a mortal sickness, a group of the leading men of Milan, knowing what an irreparable loss the Bishop's death would be to Italy and the Roman world, asked Stilicho, the Vandal soldier to whom Theodosius had entrusted the Regency of the West during the minority of Honorius, to beg Ambrose to pray himself for the prolongation of his life. The answer of that true saint of God to the curious request is memorable. "I have not so lived among you," replied the dying Bishop, "as to be ashamed to live, but I have so good a Master that I am not afraid to die."

Other pathetic memories of Ambrose's death have been preserved for us by Paulinus, his secretary, who was with his master at the last, and who, at the suggestion of St. Augustine, subsequently wrote his life. For instance, Paulinus tells us how some of those who were watching by the bedside of the Bishop whispered together how, perhaps, one Simplicianus would be his successor to the See. To their dismay the dying Ambrose heard the low whisper, for they heard his faint voice immediately mutter three times, as though their surmise interested him, "An old man, but a good man." Just before the end his friend Honorius, Bishop of Vercellæ, who had left Ambrose for a short time and was resting in an adjoining room, fancied he heard the dying Bishop call him. He hurried in and offered him the Sacrament, Ambrose received it, and as he was praying, went home to God.

Although pre-eminently a statesman, and largely occupied for the best and most active years of his life in imperial and public duties, the friend, as we have seen, and the trusted adviser of three reigning Emperors in succession, Ambrose has left a large collection of writings, consisting of expositions of Scripture, learned and valuable treatises on doctrinal questions, and other miscellaneous works bearing on theology: among the latter two very remarkable and eloquent funeral orations delivered on the deaths of the Emperor Valentinian II. and the great Theodosius. Many of his works obtained a wide and well-deserved and even an enduring popularity. The voice of Christianity associates him with Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory the Great of Rome as the four Latin doctors of the Church.

Among the questions carefully treated by Ambrose, his views on "Death" are specially interesting and important, and deserve, even in so brief a study as this, to be quoted. They are set forth in his treatise, "De bono Mortis" and "De fide Resurrectionis."

To this eminently practical saint it appeared that death was something to be earnestly wished for, and not only by the good and righteous, but by all. With him the terrors of the future state, so earnestly dwelt on by later mediæval theologians, poets, and artists, largely disappear. He does not deny that punishment in some form will be the lot of the wicked, but even to these unhappy ones death is a gain.

HEART ROSES.

A Complete Story by Rita Richmond.

"'Will you tell me, if you please, what roses do mean?'"—p. 1195.

I.

"TAKE it, please!" he said, and, thrusting it awkwardly into her hands, hurried past.

The other girl laughed out, showing her white teeth mischievously in the sunshine, and the sound jarred on Anne.

"Don't!" she said sharply, jerkily, as she lifted the crimson glory of the roses to her face.

"Well! Whoever did see such a way of giving a woman flowers? If he does admire you, and it shows his bad taste when I am by"—with a saucy glance—"he might show it in a more dignified manner. 'He—here's a bag; here's a bouquet,' says your man."

"Your man! Mabel! the hopeless vulgarity of——"

"Yes! I know I'm slightly underbred; but it was really such a very tiny shop grandpapa had—though Mamma calls it a warehouse now—that you can't wonder at the smallness of it tainting my blood a little."

"If," continued Anne, in a severe, measured sort of way, "if a man of slightly unconventional nature and little studied in women's ways happens to resolve a kindly passing thought in a kindly if rather hasty action——"

"The thought is first imaged in the astral light, and then projected into action," said Mabel seriously; "very much and suddenly projected, that image of Austin Holt's——"

"No," said Anne, still with a judicial, controversial air, "nothing at all strange in Mr. Holt's giving me these flowers."

"They're lovely!" said Mabel, drawing in a long breath of the delicious fragrance, that seemed to create a different atmosphere round the two, walking amid the smoke and "stour" of the city; and then she looked up innocently into Anne's grey, soft, honest eyes.

"What do roses mean, Anne?" she added, and laughed till the bluebells in her pretty hat seemed to tinkle as the other shook a puzzled, wondering head at her in silence.

"Ask Austin Holt," she advised mischievously over her shoulder, as she darted into a shop and left Anne with her roses.

The glow of them warmed her heart long after she had parted from Mabel Wingham and trudged away to her lonely lodgings in an unfashionable quarter of the town. The sunset was more golden because of them; the damp pavements glistened to her absent eyes like a silvery road to a beautiful dreamland; the mystery of the spring, with its restless heart-stirring breath, was understood of her; the little drab town sparrows that hopped about the street brought visions to her of wa ing branches and of deep waterpools in velvety shadows of woodland greennesses; of cries of curlew over red-brown moors; of "larks in the sky and ploughboys o'er the lea."

Even the meeting, by evident appointment, of gaudy-tied shop-boy and neat, trim-waisted shop-girl took on an illusive romance in Anne's eyes this evening that she could not have clothed it in yesterday, and as she watched the sunset fall upon the two young, laughing faces turning towards the west in the usual evening arm-in-arm saunter, she smiled a little.

"They are gathering the roses," she said, and then she added softly, as she climbed the long, weary stairs that led to her lonely lodgings, "I too—I too have had my roses—all the sweeter, perhaps, for being late ones; sweet, though they be only, as I know they are, roses of friendship; but they are so ruddy, so richly red"—looking musingly down at them—"they might be heart roses."

II.

"LISTEN!" began Miss Wingham. She had a way of beginning sentences very frequently in this fashion.

"I am listening," replied Anne hastily, and with rather a guilty air. The fact was, the sudden whirl of her young friend into her rooms this evening had disconcerted her a little; for Anne was busy, as it happened, thinking—and it is a process that craves solitude—thinking over her friend hip with Austin Holt.

Anne was one of the unexacting women of the world—not one of those who must hold a relationship of love or friendship up to the light to see if there be flaw in it, or demands exact change for every silver coin of kindly act or word she spends upon her friend; and when others wondered at any woman's friendship with such a strange, silent, unexpansive person as Austin Holt, she only smiled a little. It was enough for her that she divined the gold lead under the unpromising surface where others saw but hard rock. He was her friend; he had made her understand in his quiet, undemonstrative fashion that he was so; and the roses he had given her that day seemed to her to set the seal and sign upon their friendship. It was enough for her.

Now the roses were withered a week. One or two had been carefully dried and laid between the leaves of Anne's favourite volume of Christina Rossetti. Anne had idly noted the poem against which they lay as she placed them haphazard in the book, and a strange little pang somehow struck her as her eyes ran over the words:

"All things that pass
Are woman's looking glass;
They show her how her bloom must fade,
And she herself be laid
With withered roses in the shade.

* * * *

Unlovely, out of reach
Of summer joy that was."

She had shut the book suddenly then, and sat down by the fire, a cruel thought, born of the poem, rising in her.

Was friendship one of those passing things? Was he tired of it already that he let his roses wither a week ere he cared to see her again? Had he grown careless, forgotten her? And she so wearily missing her friend. Were the roses too late, after all?

Perhaps her bloom was faded. She never had much at best, she knew.

Was she to find herself "out of reach of summer joy," after all? And then Mabel's ring at the door-bell, Mabel's rush into her room, had scattered these melancholy musings to the winds.

"I am listening," repeated Anne meekly, shaking off the last trace of absent-mindedness and sitting up in her chair as the other looked at her unbelievingly.

"You'd better!" said Mabel meaningly, lifting her veil, "because it's about that dear brown bear of yours, Austin Holt."

Anne flushed; a little line formed between her eyebrows. It was not often she grew angry with the reckless-tongued Mabel, but to-night the speech irritated her.

"I beg you, Mabel, to remember that Mr. Holt is my very good friend, and that I can't allow you——"

"Only your friend?" queried Mabel keenly, tipping her hat back from her feathery fringe, and giving Anne a searching glance out of her forget-me-not orbs. "Only that, and nothing more?" she repeated, half anxiously.

"Only that," replied Anne, with dignity, her soft, grey eyes deepening into darkness.

Mabel sat back in her chair, and a little sigh of relief escaped her.

"I'm glad," she said simply, and yet there was something in the words that made Anne suddenly turn like a white ghost in a grey gown, as she rose from her seat and grasped Mabel's two slender arms in a hard grip.

"What is it?" she asked quietly, while her heart leapt in her throat.

"It doesn't matter so much to you," replied Mabel, looking curiously up at her; "and I'm glad it doesn't. I heard to-day that Austin Holt has been very ill with pneumonia in his lodgings, with nobody but his old landlady to nurse him, and there's a fear——What in the world are you doing, Anne? Where are you going?"

"Going to him!" Anne was tearing open her bedroom door, and Mabel sprang from her chair and followed her.

She was putting on her outdoor things, pinning on hat and veil with a steady hand, buttoning her jacket.

Mabel shut the door—and set her back against it.

"Anne, are you mad?" said Mabel solemnly. "How can you go at eight o'clock at night? It's getting dark. You say you are only his friend. You can't!"

"I can!" said Anne stolidly, advancing to the door. "Let me pass, Mabel."

But Miss Wingham's back was obstinate. She was strong, stronger than Anne, and she forced the pale, slender woman back.

"The school will hear of it, and then where are you?" said she sternly.

"I don't care," replied Anne. "Let me pass."

Suddenly Mabel stood aside.

"All right," she said carelessly; "go to the man who has never asked you to come to him. Go and throw yourself at the head of that grim, unemotional bit of rock, and see how he receives your devotion. I wish you joy of your visit. Well! why don't you go? I shan't hinder you. Ah, my dear, you know a woman's love must wait upon her prudence in a case like this," she added pityingly, as Anne faltered, glanced uncertainly at Mabel's scornful face, and then all at once sank limply down upon a chair and covered her face with her trembling hands.

* * * * * *

"All the same, I'll help her in the only way I can," Miss Wingham was saying to herself as she rattled home in an empty 'bus about half an hour later.

"Nobody need tell me," nodding at her reflection in the opposite panes, "that Austin Holt meant nothing when he gave her those roses. He knew what they meant as well as I do, else why give her roses when the shops now are fuller of other flowers? He is such a strange, silent brown bear of a man, I believe it was the only way he could manage it; and then, on the other hand, if he didn't attach such meaning to them, my sending him a bunch of roses, then, in Anne's name, with kind inquiries, won't do any harm."

III.

"YOU'RE better, then? I'm so glad." The same banality does duty equally for our thankfulness for a friend snatched from the jaws of death, or for his recovery from a toothache or a cold in the head.

They were walking on the sunny side of the street, as behoves an invalid to do when taking his first constitutional after severe illness, and the sun was shining very brightly on the invalid's sallow face and lighting up his dark eyes under his soft, grey hat. On Anne's cheeks the sun had brought out faint blossoming roses that were not due merely to the reflection of the pink parasol she carried over her shoulder.

"At last!" said Austin Holt, looking down at her with a glad smile that lightened his dark face wonderfully. "At last, Anne," he said softly, and suddenly, under cover of the wing of the big grey cloak he wore, Anne felt her hand clasped firmly in a big, strong clasp, and she looked up at him, half startled. Was this her quiet, undemonstrative friend of old? And did—did friends past the ages of ten and twelve go walking hand-in-hand along quiet, tree-shaded crescents? And yet how brightly the sun shone, how buoyantly the blood leapt in her veins, and how pleasant it was to walk thus hand-in-hand! But, after all, this was not Arcadia; and Anne, recognising the fact, strove to draw her hand away, in vain.

"Don't!" said Holt, clasping it tighter. "It helps one to talk. Perhaps if I had dared to take your hand in mine before, I had said what I wanted so long ago to say already."

The change in his way of speech struck Anne into wondering silence. There was a new touch of fluency—a note as though some barrier had been broken down between them. Not so had he spoken in the days before his illness, with slow, hesitating remarks and laconic answers, with stiff utterance and unready speech. What had changed him?

"You know—who better knows my wretched, boorish inability in talking to women?—you know my loneliness of life and how it has dried up any readiness of wit or speech in me that other men have; how I have envied them talking to the woman they loved, so easily, so acceptably, and I tongue-tied with you by my side! How I wondered at your being able to bear with me—and so I gave you the roses." Holt paused and laughed a little to himself, and tightened the handclasp ere he continued, "It seemed the act of a raw youth; in fact, it was a youth from whom I heard for the first time of the idea of flower language, and then I said to myself, 'I will give her roses. She may understand what I cannot force this clumsy tongue of mine to tell her.'" He paused a moment, and looked down at the face beside him. The sun was filtering through leafy branches and casting little lights and shades on the soft pink cheeks. "And then I doubted. You would never think of their meaning—till that other bunch of roses came, and then I knew you must have understood, and had sent me the same sweet message I had given you. Ah, my dearest, can you imagine the rapture of a sick man when those roses came?"

"Stop!" said Anne faintly. "Stop!" She looked up at him with wide, half-frightened eyes. "I—I sent you no roses."

He dropped her hand, and the light that had so changed his face flashed out and left it cold and dark.

Then he stood still on the pavement facing her. "You sent no roses?" he said slowly, with the old, stiff manner upon him as he leant upon his stick and looked down at her.

"No," replied Anne, hanging her head, and the pink roses in her cheek had paled to white ones.

"Forgive me. I thought you had understood, and had answered me so. Forgive me!" he said, passing his hand across his brow in a dazed way. "It must have been a trick someone played upon me." Then he turned back by the way they had come; there was no use walking further now. The sun had dulled, the trees were grey, not green; the very tap of his stick on the pavement had a slow, weary sound that it had not a few minutes before. "I must have seemed a most presumptuous idiot, talking in this way; but, you see, I thought you sent them"—repeating himself with a mournful, weary sort of wonderment—"I thought you knew what they meant."

Suddenly Anne stood still and laid a hand on the wing of the grey cloak. Her face was white, but determined; her eyes, raised to his, shone with a steadfast light.

"Mr. Holt!" said she. "Mr. Holt, will you tell me, if you please, what roses do mean?"

He stood still, looking down at her a moment, and then his eyes evaded hers. A slow flush rose to his brow; the old awkwardness, the old tongue-tiedness was on him; and his gaze was fixed on the trees over her head as he answered slowly and with difficulty:

"They mean, 'I love you.'"

Then a sparrow, encouraged by the silence and immovableness of the two figures, hopped close to their feet and eyed them pertly ere Anne spoke again.

"I could—I could send you the roses still if you wished," she said, in a very faint, trembling whisper, and her face was quite hidden under the pink parasol; and then the sparrow flew away, with an indignant flirt of his tail, startled by the sudden impetuous movement of one of the figures he had imagined to be harmless statues.

TEMPERANCE NOTES AND NEWS.

By a Leading Temperance Advocate.

A FRIEND OF THE CHILDREN.

"PURE religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." Mr. A. F. Pryke is a man who has saturated himself with the spirit of this Apostolic deliverance, and for some years past he has found a congenial sphere for the exercise of his sympathetic gifts in the work of the Good Templar and Temperance Orphanage at Sunbury-on-Thames. He is the Hon. Secretary of this Institution, and the boys and girls which it shelters and trains for the battle of life, know that they have in Mr. Pryke an unfailing friend. He is a life abstainer, and as a lad constantly attended the Lambeth Baths Temperance Meetings conducted by the late Mr. G. M. Murphy. He joined the Good Templar Order at Wimbledon thirty-two years ago, and has filled nearly every office in the Subordinate Lodge, and has also been Assistant Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of England. Mr. Pryke has taken a keen interest in Juvenile Templary, and for nearly a quarter of a century has superintended St. John's Hill Juvenile Temple. As Hon. Secretary of the Metropolitan Templar Federation and Hon. Secretary of the National Lodge of Good Templars, meeting at Exeter Hall, he has long been in the forefront of aggressive Temperance work in London. He is an excellent speaker, and has the happy knack of looking on the bright side of things and finding out the bit of blue sky even on the darkest day.

THE CRY OF THE CHILDREN.

For nearly thirty years the Temperance Orphanage has carried on its merciful mission. Its noble work is, however, constantly checked by the lack of adequate support. Its income barely touches £1,500 a year. An increase of a few hundreds per annum would materially benefit numbers of orphan children who are worthily entitled to sympathy. One or two typical examples of the cases now housed in the Orphanage will illustrate the nature of the work:—

"G.B. and C.B. (Cornwall), aged nine and six respectively, are the children of a postman, who died at the early age of thirty-two, leaving a widow and eight children, the youngest being but five months old. The father was a life abstainer, and a member of the I.O.G.T., and the mother also is a life abstainer."

"W. A. S. (Iver), aged seven, is the son of a working gardener, who left a widow and six children totally unprovided for. Both parents were earnest members of the local Lodge of the I.O.G.T."

"W. C. G. (Harringay), aged eleven, is the child of a painter, who left a widow and seven children, the eldest of whom was but thirteen years old. He was an abstainer for twenty-four years, and a prominent member of the Rechabite Order. The mother has been an abstainer for twenty-two years."

"Give the child a chance" was the plea with which the philanthropic Canon Major Lester used to move Liverpool folk when pleading for his great Ragged Industrial School. We echo his cry to-day. Are there not many temperance families who could afford to pay for the keep of one orphan in the Temperance Orphanage as their own especial charge? "The Child: What will he become?" asked John Cassell. It all depends very much upon what chance the child has.

"WHAT WE CAN DO."

Some years ago a Temperance rhymer wrote a couple of verses commencing:—

> "Oh, what can we do, my brothers,
> To speed the cause along?
> We can speak a word to others,
> We can cheer them with a song."

And few have done better or braver work in the "cheering with a song" line than Mr. A. H. Rogers, of Ware. He was among that small but earnest band of musical Temperance folk who rallied to the call of the late James A. Birch, Gentleman of H.M. Chapels Royal, when he founded the National Temperance Choral Union. Mr. Rogers is a life abstainer, and has for many years been prominently identified with the musical part of Temperance work. Mr. Birch often fell back upon Mr. Rogers when a deputy conductor was required, and he has travelled all over England and Wales rehearsing choirs for the festival demonstrations. In 1898 he was unanimously elected Secretary of the National Temperance Choral Union, and he has discharged the onerous duties with great zeal and unfailing courtesy. Year by year his re-election has been most cordially approved, and his heart is so thoroughly in the work that one cannot imagine the Union without this model Secretary.

A TRIBUTE TO A TEMPERANCE WORKER

A noble tribute to the life-work of the late Mrs. Wightman, of Shrewsbury, has been paid by the partial restoration of St. Alkmund's Church, Shrewsbury, of which parish Mrs. Wightman's husband was the honoured vicar for so many years. It will be remembered that it was in this parish that Mrs. Wightman carried on her great Temperance work, the story of which is so graphically told in her popular books, "Haste to the Rescue" and "Arrest the Destroyer's March." Upon her deathbed Mrs. Wightman expressed the wish that any memorial to her life's work should take the form of the restoration of the parish church, and this desire has now been happily carried out.

GOOD NEWS FROM SCOTLAND.

The earlier closing of public-houses in Glasgow on Saturday nights is being watched with the keenest interest. Already it has been made abundantly clear that the experiment is reducing considerably the amount of drunkenness. Here is a practical reform ready to hand for any other city to adopt. The motto "Let Glasgow Flourish" will carry a fresh meaning presently for all who have "eyes to see and ears to hear."

WATCHING THE NEW ACT OF PARLIAMENT.

It is early days yet to say what course of action the Temperance forces should take with regard to the most recent liquor legislation; but it is not too early to express the hope that our Temperance leaders will keep a watchful look-out on the practical working of the Act. Defects in the administration, weak spots in the particular bearings of the provisions of the Bill on special localities; and, above all, the extent to which the new enactment will effect a reduction in the number of licensed houses—these are among the points which should be carefully noted. The collection of solid facts, rather than the expression of individual opinion, seems to be the course best calculated to advance the Temperance cause.

THE WINTER'S WORK.

Nearly every temperance worker has a pet plan for showing how things ought to be done, and, if the truth be told, I have mine. Let us return to first principles. Let us remember that our business is to make men and women and children abstainers. At every meeting, large and small, "recruiting we must go." There are many drones in the Temperance hive; they must be "hustled out," or, better still, transformed into workers. There are many ornamental members in every society; they must be cajoled or persuaded into becoming fighters in the ranks. Little petty personal differences of opinion must be relegated to the background, and we must all begin again afresh to do our very best for the furtherance of the best of all good causes. "This one thing I do," should be the definite resolution of every Temperance worker.

A NEW TEST FOR SOBRIETY.

Walking a chalk line, or saying "Truly rural" are familiar tests of whether a man is drunk or not. Quite recently a man appeared in the Thames Police Court charged with drunkenness, and wound up a long speech by saying there was no one to "krober—krobs—krobberate" the policeman's evidence. Mr. Cluer, the stipendiary magistrate, quietly observed that he should recommend the police to use the new word as a test of sobriety. Unfortunately, the author of the word was ignominiously fined 5s. and costs.

THE STORMY-FOOL.

A Canadian Story for the Youngsters by Howard Angus Kennedy.

A SMALL boy raced down from the white folk's house, roaring and screeching "like a runaway engine-lion," dashed into the middle of the Indian snowshoe-makers on the river bank, and began a furious war-dance for their admiration. A few of them stopped work for a moment to look on, without a smile, but most of them only glanced under their eyelids at the little stamping feet, and Chief Ossawippi wouldn't even do that. The coolness of his audience froze up Rennie's excitement; a war-dance without anyone caring seemed silly, and he stopped short, nearly crying.

"G-g-guess what I am," said he to Ossawippi.

"A little white boy making a big black dust," said the chief.

"Wrong," said Rennie; "I'm the Thunderer."

"The Thunderer never made a fuss like that," said Ossawippi. "He rode on the clouds and made the thunder; but it was Puck-puck that made the storm and did the mischief."

"I never heard of him," said Rennie. "Tell me all about him."

"That would take too long," said the chief, "because he was making mischief for thousands and thousands of years before he was stopped."

"Then tell me how he got stopped," said Rennie.

So Ossawippi, going steadily on with his work all the time, told this story :—

He was a dreadfully mischievous fellow, Puck-puck was. He couldn't keep his hands off anything. Some people called him the Stormy-fool, because he made such a mess and noise, and was so silly about it; but his real name was Puck-puck, or something like that. He used to steal round after the Thunderer, hiding behind the clouds, and when the Thunderer thundered, Puck-puck used to start shrieking and dancing up and down and round and round, kicking up the dust like a little white boy, and blowing the birds' feathers inside out, and upsetting their nests, and making the trees so giddy that they tumbled down and couldn't get up again.

"You'll come to a bad end if you go on with your mischief," said his mother one day. His mother's name was Mrs. Whirlwind.

"Pff, pff!" said Puck-puck, pouting out his lips. "What do you go on with your own mischief for?"

"Because I can't help myself," said his mother. "I was made that way, and I can't stop. I wish I could."

"And I was made that way, and I can't stop, and I don't wish I could," said Puck-puck, "because it's good fun tearing things up and teasing people." And off he whisked out of his mother's cave in the mountain, to tease the mountain-chickens.

Now the mountain-chickens were the Thunderer's great pets, and he loved to stroke their feathers and scratch them on the head and make them sing their purring song on his shoulder when he came home tired. Puck-puck began by dropping stones down the little mountain-chickens' throats, when they opened their mouths and shut their eyes, thinking he was going to feed them; and then, while they were spitter-sputtering to get the nasty stones out again, he turned the nest upside down, and the poor little mountain-chickens tumbled down to the ground. Then the mother of the mountain-chickens heard them crying, and came flitter-fluttering through the trees to find out what the matter was.

"It's Puck-puck," said all the little mountain-chickens at once, coughing and sputtering on the ground. "He put nasty stones into our mouths, and then he tumbled us out like this, and hurt us so much we can't get up again."

"Never mind, my dears," said their mother, picking them up and dusting them, and putting them carefully back into the nest. "I'll go and tell the Thunderer."

So away she flew, over the river and over the meadow and over the foothills; and then she rose higher and flew over the birch-wood; and higher still, and flew over the pine-woods that grow where the hills end and the mountains begin; and when she had rested a minute on the top of the tallest pine-tree, she flew straight up into the sky ever and ever so far.

"It's about time I could see the top of the mountain," she said to herself. And so it was, only the Stormy-fool had pushed a big heaping cloud on to the top of the mountain, so that it was all covered up. The mother of the mountain-chickens didn't like getting wet, but she was very brave. "Never mind," she said to herself; "I'll fly right through the cloud. I think I can fly straight, even if I can't see my own nose in front of me." And straight at the cloud she flew.

When the cloud saw her coming so bravely, it was afraid of that sharp beak of hers and began to get up and move off.

"Sit still, you stupid thing!" shrieked the Stormy-fool. "Closer! Closer! Sit down heavy and thick, and smother her!"

The cloud didn't quite know what to do. It was more afraid of Puck-puck tearing it to rags than it was of the mountain-chicken's beak; but it knew that the Thunderer was watching from the other side of the mountain. So while it pretended to stop, it really went on, rising very, very slowly, till there was just a few inches of blue sky showing between it and the mountain-top. The mountain-chicken darted in and squeezed her way underneath, and though she scratched her feet on the sharp rocks and got her back feathers very wet with the edge of the cloud, she got through all right, and flew down the other side of the mountain to where the Thunderer was lying asleep in the bottom of his beautiful valley.

"Hush! hush! hush!" sang the mountain-chickens perched on the Thunderer's shoulder. "Don't wake him up. He's just come home, and he's very tired."

"I'm very sorry," said the mother-bird, "but that rascally Puck-puck has been tormenting my little ones, and if he isn't caught quickly he'll kill them."

"Oh!" said the perching mountain-chickens, "if it's to save the little ones, I daresay he won't mind."

"Of course he won't," said the Thunderer, getting up and shaking himself, and spilling all the mountain-chickens into the air. Then he put on his big white wings and flew up to the top of the mountain.

When the cloud saw him coming, it jumped up in such a hurry that it broke in two, and one piece rolled off one way and the other piece another way, and they both rolled so far that they never found each other again, and the sun melted them into nothing. And when the Stormy-fool saw the cloud roll away in such a hurry, he flew off in a terrible hurry himself and perched on the North Pole, and there he sat shivering and shuddering with fear till the North Pole waved about like a tree in the wind.

The Thunderer flew up and sat on the top of the mountain, and called out, very loudly and angrily: "Where's the rascal that's been teasing my mountain-chickens?"

All the birds heard the thunder roar, and stopped short in the middle of what they were singing; and all the beasts heard it, and crouched down as close to the ground as they could flatten themselves; and all the fishes heard it, and poked their noses up out of the water to see what the matter was. But Puck-puck didn't say a word, though he shivered and shuddered so hard that the North Pole cracked, just like the sapling your father put up on the school-house last Queen's Birthday.

"Come here!" shouted the Thunderer.

If he hadn't gone the North Pole would have shaken him off, for fear he would break it with his shivering and shuddering. But he went. Oh, yes, he went, for he didn't dare disobey, with such an order rattling in his ears. He went very slowly; and when the echo of the order had died away he stopped and looked round, as if he wanted to escape. But the Thunderer just said, "Come!" and Puck-puck went on in a hurry till he came to the hills looking down into the mountain-chickens' valley; and then he sat down on a rock and waited, shivering and shuddering all the time, because he was afraid he was going to be whipped. He loved tormenting other creatures, but he couldn't bear the least thing himself, he was such a coward.

"Don't you dare touch my mountain-chickens again," said the Thunderer, calling out across the valley.

"I w-w-won't," said the Stormy-fool between his chattering teeth.

So the Thunderer flew back into his own valley, and went to sleep again.

Puck-puck thought he was lucky to get off without having his ears boxed. I think if I'd been the Thunderer I'd have boxed his ears till his head came off; but the Thunderer was very tired, and wanted to get to sleep again as quickly as he could.

"So that's all," said Puck-puck, chuckling to himself. "Well, I suppose I've got to leave his mountain-chickens alone; but I'll be revenged. I'll be revenged!"

He got up and danced on the hillside till he had trampled all the grass into the earth, and stripped all the leaves off the trees. Then he hopped across the valley, trampling down a thousand flowers at every hop, and hopped up the mountain at the other side, pushing and rolling a little cloud up in front of him. When he came near the top he crept into the middle of the cloud and rolled along inside it. It wasn't very comfortable for him, just like rolling along inside a barrel; and it was very uncomfortable for the cloud, just like the wolf that swallowed the crab, and made it so heavy that it got all its edges torn by scraping against the rocks. But they rolled on together till they got half-way down into the Thunderer's valley, and then they rolled into a hollow, and hid there till the Thunderer got up.

"He caught hold of one of the Stormy-fool's prickly wings."—p. 1202.

The Thunderer slept a long time—weeks and weeks—he was so very tired. Puck-puck got soaked through and dreadfully cold, but he didn't dare to come out. At last the Thunderer yawned and got up, and shook off the mountain-chickens, and they perched on the nearest trees they could find and went fast to sleep that minute, because of course they'd had to keep very wide awake and watching out all the time the Thunderer was taking his nap. Then the Thunderer put on his big white wings, and came flying up the mountain-side.

"Oh, dear!" said Puck-puck. "He's coming to find me."

But he wasn't. He was just going to feed his pet raven, Flying Night, who lived in a cave in the cliff.

The raven flew out of his cave, and perched on the Thunderer's shoulder, and rubbed his head against the great one's chin. "Take me with you," he croaked. "Take me with you. I'm afraid something's going to happen."

"No," said the Thunderer. "I'm not going to take you this time. You make the sky so very dark, and I'm not going to make big thunder to-day."

The raven whimpered a little, but he knew better than to say another word when the order had been given; so he hopped back into his cave, and went on with his dinner, while the Thunderer flew away to the south.

"Now's our chance," said Puck-puck to his cloud. "Roll down in front of the raven's cave and block it up."

So the cloud rolled down and stopped up the mouth of the cave. The raven thought it was getting very dark, but it wasn't till he had finished his dinner that he looked up and saw what had happened. He usually went to sleep again as soon as he had eaten his dinner, and he didn't really want to go out at all, but as soon as he saw he couldn't, he wanted to very much. He turned his head first to one side and then to the other, till he had nearly twisted it off; and he flew up to the top of the cave door and then down to the bottom; but the cloud blocked it all up, every bit.

"Now roll right in, and cover him up," said Puck-puck to the cloud, "and I'll catch him and wring his neck before he can bite so much as a pinch of skin."

"I daresay he won't bite you," said the cloud; "but every time he snaps his black jaws he'll be biting me, and it's bad enough having a Stormy-fool like you in my inside without having a snappy raven too."

"Get in, I tell you!" said Puck-puck, kicking with both legs at once.

The cloud squirmed, and pushed in as quickly as it could.

When the raven saw the cloud rolling in he gave a great frightened croak and dashed out through the middle of it. The Stormy-fool clutched at him as he passed, and caught hold of his tail, and all the tail feathers came out in his hand; but the rest of the raven flew croaking down into the valley to where the mountain-chickens were snoozing on the trees.

"Wake up!" croaked the raven. "Something dreadful's happened."

"What is the matter?" said one of the mountain-chickens when it had got one eye half-open.

"There's a nasty cloud in my cave," said the raven, "and he's pulled out my tail-feathers."

"I'm only dreaming," said the mountain-chicken to himself, "because clouds don't really do such things." And he went fast asleep again.

"Lazy things!" croaked the raven; only as he couldn't wake any of them up he went to sleep himself, sitting on a stump right in the middle of the mountain chickens, where he was pretty sure no robber cloud would dare to come.

In the evening the Thunderer came flying home from his travels, and perched on the mountain-top looking down into his valley.

"All fast asleep," said he to himself, "and Flying Night in the middle! What does that mean, I wonder?" So he plunged down into the air.

As soon as the mountain-chickens heard the flapping of the Thunderer's wings, they began to flap their own wings, dreaming; and then they woke up and sang the welcome-song. The raven woke up too, and tried to sing it, but he was too hoarse. Besides, he was so miserable about losing his tail that he couldn't have done anything but croak.

The mountain-chickens hopped on to the Thunderer's broad shoulders and purred in his ears, just like a comfortable cat. The raven tried to fly up too, but he couldn't steer himself very well without his rudder, and he tumbled about in the air till the Thunderer put out a hand and caught him.

"Flying Night," said the Thunderer, "what have you done with your tail?"

"A dreadful catching cloud came into my cave," croaked the raven, "and when I flew through it to get out, it caught hold of my beautiful tail feathers and pulled them all out."

The Thunderer frowned terribly. "I know what that cloud was," he said. "Which way did it go?"

"I didn't see it go at all," said the raven. "I was in such a hurry to go myself, I didn't look behind me once."

The Thunderer didn't say a word, but he shook off the mountain-chickens, and told the raven to sit on his shoulder and hold tight, and flew up to the cave.

Now Puck-puck had come out of his cloud and stretched himself in the sun for a nap when the raven had flown away; but when he heard the Thunderer flying up over the trees, he awoke and jumped into the air like a lacrosse ball. The Thunderer reached out a hand and caught him by the hair; but Puck-puck jerked himself away, and left his hair in the Thunderer's hand, and jumped clean over the mountain.

The Thunderer was in no great hurry; he knew that wicked ones would always be caught some time or other. He looked round for Flying Night's tail, but the Stormy-fool had carried it off.

"Never mind," said the Thunderer, "we'll make him punish himself." So he rolled the Stormy-fool's hair in his hand, and turned it into the largest and strongest black feathers you ever saw; and he stuck some of them into the raven's poor stump of a tail, so that it was ever so much finer than before; and he stuck the rest into the raven's wings, so that they were bigger and stronger than an eagle's. Then he flew away over the mountains, and the raven flew along under his feet.

They flew all night, and they flew all day, and all the next night too, till they'd left the mountains all behind, and saw the great flat plain stretching away below them, and there was Puck-puck scudding away in front as fast as his mischief could carry him. The Thunderer flew faster and faster, and stretched out a hand and caught hold of one of the Stormy-fool's prickly wings; but Puck-puck jerked himself away, and left his wing in the Thunderer's hand, and dropped like a stone to the plain, and kicked up such a dust that the Thunderer had to stop and wink the dust out of his eyes; and when the dust was gone, Puck-puck was gone too.

"I see him," said the raven. "He's gone back to the mountains."

So the Thunderer flew back to the mountains too, and the raven flew under his feet.

When Puck-puck saw them coming after him again, he knew it was no use trying to escape, but he tried all the same. He couldn't fly with only one wing, but he could run like a thousand rabbits; and he ran till he came to the first maple tree on the foothills, and climbed up the tree, stripping off the bark with his horrid sharp fingers as he went, and hid among the leaves, shivering and shuddering. But the raven saw him and told his master.

The Thunderer flew straight at the top of the tree; but when he saw the poor tree bleeding sap from all its wounds, he stopped and turned the Stormy-fool's wing into strips of bark, and mended the tree with them. Before he had finished, Puck-puck had jumped out of the tree and hopped away up on to the rocky mountain-top; and there he stamped and stormed, and stormed and stamped, and broke the rocks into splinters at every step, and sent them rattling down on the trees below.

When the Thunderer flew up to catch the Stormy-fool, the poor broken mountain cried out as he passed, "Stop and mend me, Thunderer! You mended the tree down there. Stop and mend me too!"

"Yes," said the Thunderer, "I'll mend you too." But he didn't stop. He flew faster and faster, and stretched out his great hand and caught Puck-puck in it, as I would catch a fly, and gave him one squeeze, and there was nothing left of Puck-puck but his bones. Then the Thunderer turned the bones into monstrous rocks and mended the mountain-top with them, so that it was ever so much finer and rockier and higher than before; and that mountain's been called Puck-puck's Tombstone ever since.

So you see what happens to people that storm and stamp, little Pinkface!

BASED ON THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

OCTOBER 16TH.—Elisha and the Shunamite.

Passage for reading—2 Kings iv. 35—37.

POINTS. 1. A sorrowing mother.
2. A praying prophet.
3. A restored child.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Sorrow and Joy. "There came to us last night at sundown a poor pilgrim, named Sorrow, who for the first hours of night sighed and wept so sorely that it seemed as if she were breathing her life away. For the last two hours she seems to have fallen asleep, for there is silence in her chamber, and it would be cruel to awake her." "Sorrow? Ah! I know her well. My name is Joy. Sorrow and Joy have had the world between them ever since it was made; but now, look in your room. You will find it empty. I met Sorrow an hour ago on the other side of the hill. She told me that she had slipped silently away, and that I should be just in time to smile 'Good morning' to you from my bright face while she went on her way towards the dark valley of Death. Sorrow will not come here again to-night, for I shall stay. Sorrow goes west towards the darkness, and I go east towards the light. We often meet and then part. But I have heard it in the land of light from which I come, and Sorrow knows it too, that there is a good time coming when even she will not know how to weep, 'For the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces.' This weary world 'shall obtain joy and gladness' at last, and 'sorrow and sighing shall flee away.'"

Power of Prayer. Just as a shoemaker makes a shoe, and a tailor a coat, so also ought the Christian to pray. The Christian's trade is praying, and the prayer of the Church works great miracles. In our days, wrote Luther the reformer, it has raised from the dead three persons, viz. myself, having been frequently sick unto death; my wife Catherine, who was lately most dangerously ill, and Melanchthon, who was at the point of death. And though their rescue from death be but trifling miracles, yet they are signs to those who will see that God does work wonders in answer to His people's prayers.

Prayer Answered. Philip Henry, after praying earnestly for two of his children who were dangerously ill, remarked, "If the Lord will be graciously pleased to grant me this request concerning my children, I will not say, as the beggars do at our door, 'I will never ask for anything again,' but, on the contrary, He shall hear oftener from me for ever, and I will love God better and pray more earnestly than ever as long as I live."

OCTOBER 23RD.—Elisha and Naaman.

Passage for reading—2 Kings v. 1—14.

POINTS. 1. A great man—but, a leper.
2. A slave girl's good advice.
3. A cure in answer to humility.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Instability of Greatness. Cæsar was cruelly assassinated in the height of his power and glory. Casimir, the wealthy King of Poland, died in the act of raising a jewelled cup to his lips. Charles XII. of Sweden descended from the position of a conqueror to that of a forlorn exile among the infidels. Charles I. laid his royal robes aside to die as a malefactor at Whitehall. Napoleon on one day was the "arbiter of the destinies of Europe," and the next was defeated and dethroned. So passes the glory of the world. Naaman's greatness and glory could not keep away the leprosy.

Good Effects of Advice. In Mr. Gladstone's household there was an elderly widow who had a son inclined to go wrong. His mother remonstrated, but in vain. At last she caught at the idea that if she could persuade the Premier to take him in hand, he might perhaps be saved. In trembling and anxious tones she made her request. Mr. Gladstone responded at once, and though the affairs of the greatest kingdom in the world pressed heavily upon him, he had the lad sent to his study, and with his usual genuine simplicity spoke tender words of advice and remonstrance, and then knelt down and prayed God to help him in the work of reformation and redemption. This kindly action was effectual, and the lad was saved.

Humility the Road to Exaltation. Our humiliations work out our most elevated joys. The way that a drop of rain comes to sing in the leaf that rustles in the top of a tree all the summer long, is by going down to the roots first and then ascending to the boughs.

OCTOBER 30TH.—Elisha at Dothan.

Passage for reading—2 Kings vi. 8—23.

POINTS. 1. Elisha's danger from enemies.
2. His deliverance by angels.
3. His generous treatment of foes.

ILLUSTRATIONS. Boldness in Danger. The Prince of Condé being taken prisoner by Charles IX., King of France, and put to his choice, whether he would go to Mass, or be put to death, or suffer perpetual imprisonment, his noble answer was that by God's help he would never do the first, and for either of the latter he left it to the King's pleasure and God's providence.

Angel Guards. Our protection is in other hands than our own. In the way of duty we are as safe as in heaven. Not only in great dangers, but in little ones we are secure if we are in the right way, for we are kept from stumbling stones as well as from fiery darts. Our guards are such as no enemy can resist, for they are strong; such as no evil can escape, for they are swift; such as no weariness can tire, for they are never weary. We have a body-guard of Immortals, each one of them invincible, unflagging, loyal, loving, and full of fire. Each angel may truly say, "A charge to keep I have." And keep it he will till the Lord of Angels Himself shall receive our spirit.

Love of Enemies. The venerable Dr. Duff once read the Sermon on the Mount to a number of Hindoo youths, and when he came to the passage, "I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you," so deep and intense was the impression produced on one of them that he exclaimed in ecstasy, "Oh! how beautiful, how divine! This is the truth, this is the truth!"

NOVEMBER 6TH.—Joash, the Boy King.

Passage for reading—2 Kings xi. 1—16.

POINTS. 1. The royal infant protected.
2. The youthful heir crowned.
3. The queen-mother put to death.

ILLUSTRATIONS. God's Protection. When Felix of Nola was hotly pursued by murderers he took refuge in a cave, and instantly over the rift of it the spiders wove their webs; and seeing this, the murderers passed by. Then said the saint, "Where God is not, a wall is but a spider's web; where God is, a spider's web is as a wall." (Dean Farrar.)

Providence an Inheritance. Richard Boyle, generally called "The great Earl of Cork," is said to have outlived most of those who had known the meanness of his beginning; but he delighted to remember it himself, and even took pains to preserve the memory of it to posterity in the motto which he caused to be placed on his tomb, viz., "God's Providence is my inheritance." A noble motto truly!

A Just Retribution. A bishop said to Louis XI. of France, "Make an iron cage for all those who do not think as we do—an iron cage in which the captive can neither lie down nor stand straight up." It was accordingly made, this awful instrument of punishment. After a while the same bishop offended Louis XI., and for fourteen years he was imprisoned in that same cage, and could neither lie down nor stand up. It is a poor rule that will not work both ways. "With what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again." (Talmage.)

NOVEMBER 13TH.—Joash Repairs the Temple.

Passage for reading—2 Kings xii. 4—15.

POINTS. 1. Liberal offerings.
2. The Temple repaired.
3. Work faithfully done.

ILLUSTRATIONS. A Child's Offering. A little girl, seven years old, died in Philadelphia. When the doctor told her she could not live, she asked her mother to send for the pastor of the church, and when he came she gave him her little savings-bank box. "Open it," she said. There were four dollars and a few cents (about seventeen shillings). "Take them," said the child, "and build a church for poor people—poor people, mind, who now sit in the back seats of our church. They must not pay anything. I want all the seats to be free." The clergyman took the money. "My child," he said solemnly, "it shall be done, with God's help." When the child was dead he placed her little bank and the money it contained on the pulpit and told her story. Tears were in every eye. One wealthy man after another came forward with his offering. Children came, women came, and the poor with their pence. It was not long before the completed church, ready for its poor occupants, was dedicated to the service of that God Who willed that the poor little child's offering, like the widow's mite, should not fail of its reward.

A Powerful Argument. A church in the West Indies was being restored. The minister called on all the people to give what they could for the repairs of their own church. A working negro came forward amongst others, and putting his hand in his pocket, pulled out some silver, which, when counted, was found to amount to £2 10s. When asked if he could spare so much he said, "God's work must be done, and I may soon be dead."

Faithful Performance of Common Duties. Philip Henry one day, calling upon a tanner, found him so busy tanning a hide that he was not aware of his approach until he tapped him on the back. The man, starting in confusion, exclaimed, "Sir, I am ashamed for you to find me thus." "Nay," replied Philip Henry, "may the Lord Jesus, when He comes, find me discharging, with the same faithfulness and zeal, the duties of my calling."

WORD AND WORK IN THE MASTER'S NAME.

OUR COMING SERIALS.

WITH the number for November THE QUIVER breaks fresh ground, and the Editor thinks that a brief sketch of the contents of that number will show that the high position of THE QUIVER as a magazine for the Christian home and for every member of the home circle, is being well maintained. The frontispiece of the number is a reproduction by Rembrandt photogravure of the fine painting by Mr. Arthur J. Black, entitled "Volunteers,"—representing that constant heroism and self-sacrifice which are characteristic of our lifeboat men. The opening chapters of two powerful new serial stories will be found in this number, the first being "The Sword of Gideon," an engrossing tale of the days of Marlborough's wars—that critical period for British Protestantism—from the pen of Mr. J. Bloundelle-Burton, the author of "The Scourge of God" and many other thrilling historical stories. Mr. Bloundelle-Burton is new to the pages of THE QUIVER, but his reputation stands high for the production of stirring narratives of sustained interest and lofty motive, and in this new story the Editor ventures to think the distinguished author will be seen at his best. Our second serial story in the November number is "The Sea Between," by Miss Amy Le Feuvre, author of "Probable Sons" and other stories which are well known to our readers, who already know their author as a contributor to our pages, although she has not hitherto given us so long or important a story as this new tale of love and devotion.

Other Features.

IN addition to the opening instalments of the two new serial stories, the November number will contain four shorter complete stories of varied interest, by Ethel Heddle, J. K. Leys, and other popular writers. Dr. John Watson ("Ian Maclaren") and Dr. Chadwick, the Bishop of Derry and Raphoe, contribute devotional papers, and a number of the leading authorities in the foreign missionary world (Bishop Montgomery, the Rev. Wardlaw Thompson, Mr. Eugene Stock, Mr. A. H. Baynes, and others) join in setting forth "The Missionary Outlook for 1905." Illustrated articles are devoted to the following, among other subjects: "Hospital Housekeeping," which lets the reader into the inner working of these great households of relief and comfort; "Nonconformist Public Schools," a subject of special interest in these days, when the great question of education is absorbing so much serious attention; "The Oldest Inhabited City in the World," which our readers will see is associated with more than one important event recorded in the Bible; and the practical topics of "Action Songs" and "Winter Gifts for the Poor," this last paper being illustrated by suggestions of methods of working various stitches useful to ladies in this charitable labour of love. THE QUIVER Mission Boats Fund appeals to young and older readers alike, and for the musical will be found a new hymn tune, for Sunday School teachers a helpful set of anecdotes illustrating the International Lessons, and for all the "Temperance Notes" and the "Short Arrows." In conclusion, the Editor earnestly hopes that these efforts to continue the recognised mission of THE QUIVER as an attractive and effective agency for the spread of genuine religious thought and enterprise throughout the English-speaking world will receive the wonted support of his innumerable friends at home and abroad, who for many years have thus co-operated with him as fellow-missionaries in this important field of Christian work, not only by reading the magazine themselves, but by warmly commending its perusal to others. The new features of the next issue will afford an excellent opportunity for promoting a still further expansion of these efforts.

"Members One of Another."

ON the day before the victory of Solferino, on June 24th, 1859, the vast army which conquered was marching wearily and despondently through a country densely shrouded by shrubs and small trees. Each soldier could only see a small company of his fellows on either hand, and a depression of loneliness fell upon the host. But at length they reached a wide and open plain, and their wise commander marshalled them in such a way that the whole army stood together, and the setting sun flashed upon long miles of the glittering panoply of war. The men grew exhilarated and enthusiastic, and the new spirit put victory within their reach. It seems a pity that insignificant trees and shrubs of misunderstanding should hinder the mutual recognition of many earnest Christians while spiritual Solferinos are waiting to be won.

Jehovah-jireh.

ROMANCES might be written concerning the many mottoes and sentiments inscribed by means of diamonds upon window panes. But we do not know a more effective incident in this connection than a fact related about the late George Müller, founder of the famous orphan homes at Bristol. This man of faith was going through one of his many experiences of pressing need. Funds were unusually scanty, and he did not know whence to provide food for his hungry and numerous family, and to carry on the work of his institutions. At this crisis a lady was suddenly moved to send him, with other articles of jewellery, a superb ring set with diamonds, which she desired should be disposed of for the benefit of the homes. The proceeds were found sufficient to procure food for the many mouths for a whole week, and to pay the salaries of the helpers. But before selling the diamond ring Mr. Müller inscribed with it upon the window of his private sitting-room this special Old Testament title of the Almighty, "Jehovah-jireh," "The Lord will provide."

"The Quiver" Heroes' Fund.

THE Editor will be glad to hear of well-authenticated instances of personal bravery in the saving of human life at the imminent risk of the rescuer. Properly substantiated cases will be carefully considered with a view to their recognition by the award of a bronze or silver medal of THE QUIVER Heroes' Fund.

The London Spectacle Mission.

OF all the trials that an industrious bread-winner is called upon to endure none is greater than the loss of power to work. It may mean the break-up of home and starvation to those dearer than life. It is eighteen years since the late Dr. Waring, C.I.E., discovered that a multitude of tailors, printers, seamstresses, and persons of the same class were falling out of the ranks of independent, self-respecting toilers simply on account of failing sight, and that their great burden of trouble could be lifted by the gift of a pair of glasses. The numbers were beyond the compass of one solitary individual, so he devised a scheme to supply those whose lot made it impossible or painfully difficult to pay for them. After Dr. Waring's death, his friends and those who remembered his services for humanity in India enlarged the London Spectacle Mission as a memorial in his honour; and his daughter, Miss C. Waring, undertook this work, and has been ever since hon. secretary. As a result of the charity becoming known, and of careful organisation, it has increased to such an extent that four centres have been opened. Subscribers recommend the cases. A subscriber of 5s. receives four cards for distribution, one of 10s. ten cards, and so on. The primary object is to supply spectacles to needy persons over the age of twenty-five. The sight of applicants is tested by experts; those suffering from affection beyond the help of glasses are recommended to a hospital, and may obtain special spectacles through the mission if ordered by the ophthalmic surgeon. During the last eleven years 12,305 applicants have been helped in London alone, and coloured and other glasses have been sent to sufferers in the leper settlements in India, South America, and Demerara. Old clerks have been enabled to keep their situations, and widows supporting themselves and families by needlework have been relieved from anxiety by this society. It earns the name of mission by the effort to care for the souls as well as the bodies of applicants; each one of them is supplied with something good to read. We are sorry to learn that, for the first time in its existence the society is unable to meet the increasing demands upon its resources.

What Love Can Do.

It is a fact hard to realise that the last century was half over before England possessed an institution for persons hopelessly incapacitated by infirmity, and without the means to obtain necessities of life, still less comforts that make illness endurable. One of the oldest institutions of this kind is the British Home and Hospital for Incurables. It was founded in 1861 by a few good and generous men, who gave pensions of £18 per annum and skilled medical attendance to five out-patients. This small beginning rapidly developed, and they took premises in Clapham Road for in-patients. The auspicious year when the Princess Alexandra of Denmark became the Princess of Wales opened a happy era for this home; she consented to become Patroness, and has supported it ever since with constant interest and liberal gifts. In 1863 the directors took possession of the house at Clapham Rise formerly occupied by the British Orphan Asylum, and adapted and furnished one half for in-patients. All sorts and conditions of men fostered and encouraged its healthy growth until it became of age; then, on its twenty-first birthday, our King and Queen, then Prince and Princess of Wales, received special gifts on its behalf. In 1895 the lease of the old premises having run out, a new Home was built on Crown Hill, Streatham Common, to accommodate 300 patients. Care was taken to carry out the kind and characteristic wish of the royal patroness that everything should be made as homelike as possible. The windows are so low that even the bedridden can see something of the outer world.

All candidates must be at least thirty-five years of age, and must belong to the respectable middle class. Neither imbeciles nor persons unfit to share the room with other patients are admitted. Sufferers from cancer and epilepsy are, however, eligible for pensions. The oldest inmate, who has been for thirty years in the Home, is an exquisite needlewoman. All the women who can use their hands at all do some kind of knitting or fancy work, which is sold once or twice a year, and brings them in a little pocket-money. Here, in cheerful rooms, sweet with flowers—the gifts of thoughtful friends—or in a terraced garden, suffering toilers rest from the hopeless struggle to maintain themselves. A cheery old sea captain tells his tales of adventure, sympathy in misfortune draws the white heads of two paralytics together, and many others by their lives preach patient thankfulness. The late head-mistress of a large school, who before her affliction earned £200 a year, is amongst the younger patients. Her cheerful face is a proof that utter helplessness is not sufficient to destroy happiness. She can be lifted from her bed to a couch, which may be raised so as to vary her position, and the long hours are beguiled by books on a reading-stand. Love to the wounded or half-dead neighbour, if it cannot heal, may at least relieve the suffering body and lift the burden that weighs down the spirit.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 1120.

121. Amos is supposed to have been a native of Gilgal, in the time of Jeroboam II., by occupation a herdman, whom God called to prophesy against Israel, for which he was driven from his home and took refuge at Tekoa, a village about twelve miles from Jerusalem, where he wrote his prophecy. (Amos vii. 14, 15, and i. 1.)

122. Bethel, Gilgal, and Beersheba. (Amos v. 5.)

123. Persecution of God's servants. Taking bribes for the perversion of justice, and oppression of the poor. (Amos v. 12.)

124. Amos speaks of "the seven stars and Orion" as part of God's work in creation. (Amos v. 8; Job ix. 9.)

125. Psalm ciii. 13; St. Matt. vii. 9–11.

126. By forgiveness of sin, by preservation of life and health, and by a continued supply of temporal and spiritual blessings. (Psalm ciii. 3–5.)

127. There was an ancient idea that the eagle was able in some way to renew its vitality from time to time, so that it lived to a very old age. By this the Psalmist foretells that God's goodness would revive again the glory and greatness of Israel. (Psalm ciii. 5.)

128. The healing of the watersprings at Jericho, the water of which was of no use for fertilising the soil. (2 Kings ii. 19–22.)

129. A victory of the Kings of Judah and Israel over the Moabites, when God in a miraculous way flooded the country with water. (2 Kings iii. 14–24.)

"THE QUIVER" MISSION BOAT FUND.

A MODEL OF ONE OF "THE QUIVER" MISSION BOATS.

(One of three offered as prizes to the collectors of the three largest amounts in the Children's Section.)

CHILDREN'S PAGE.

Conducted by Aunt Grace.

THE object of the Children's Section of "The Quiver" Mission Boats is to provide ten row-boats at a cost of £25 each. These boats are to assist the larger Mission Boats founded by the "grown-up" readers of THE QUIVER, for very often a small boat can make its way through the masses of shipping in port, and bring the seamen books and cheering words, when larger boats cannot penetrate. So far two boats have been given—one by the proprietors of THE QUIVER—this is called "Quiver No. 1"—and another by a lady in memory of her little daughter; this is called the "Mildred." We are now working for the third row-boat.

MY DEAR READERS,—

By the time these lines reach you most of you will have returned from your holidays, and school and lesson books will be the order of the day. All the long winter months lie before you—all those nice, long, cosy evenings with drawn curtains, bright lamplight, and glowing fire, which make up in some degree for the outdoor joys of summer and which give you more time to think of and work for others than those hours of open-air life. I hope, therefore, that you will employ some of your time in working for our next "Row-Boat." Next month I shall give you some suggestions; meanwhile I daresay many of you can find some ways of helping for yourselves. And remember that I shall be delighted to hear from any of you and to receive any suggestions from you. Do not be shy of writing to me. I daresay it seems rather strange at first to write to someone you have never seen, but when you see your names in my little corner, "Answers to Correspondents," which I shall set aside for you every month, you will not feel we are strangers any more. And, moreover, do not be afraid of sending in small sums. Every penny, every sixpence is welcome. So I look forward to a budget of letters and collecting cards in time!

As I write these lines I have the sound of the sea in my ears, and when I lift my eyes I can see the long grey lines of waves rolling towards the shore. It is a wild and stormy day, and the sea, which yesterday looked as blue and sunny and calm as a lake, is forbidding enough now.

The contrast, too, between yesterday and to-day sets me thinking again of the varying sides of a sailor's life. How many scores of boys after a fortnight by the sea, when all looks plain sailing, sunshine and dancing waves and a clear sky, declare: "A sailor's life for me!" They have no idea of the hardships and trials which await the men of the Merchant Service. I read a story the other day which pointed this out in a very amusing chapter. The book was written by an American, Mr. Joseph Lincoln, and was called "Cap'n Eri." Captain Eri lived with two other friends, Captain Jerry and Captain Perez, and all three gained their livelihood by fishing, and were lifeboatmen, too. You could not meet if you travelled the world round three honester, quainter "old salts" than these. Now Captain Perez had a nephew whom his sister had confided to his care. Josiah—that was his name—was what is popularly known as a "handful." In fact, he was more than a naughty boy, he bade fair to become a disgrace to his relatives, for he began to take pleasure in bad company. Poor Captain Perez was very distressed, and he consulted his friend Captain Eri. What was to be done? Well, Captain Eri pondered: "Josiah wanted to go into the Navy, didn't he?" Yes. Well, then he would take him on his first trip, just to get him accustomed to the sea and lick him into shape. Captain Perez was pleased but rather doubtful. Captain Eri would not be too hard on Josiah? He had promised his sister that the boy should not be severely treated. Captain Eri reassured his friend, and Josiah himself was questioned. Oh, yes, he was willing to go. Josiah thought not a little of himself, and considered that "Cap'n Eri" was lucky to get hold of so fine a fellow.

When they embarked, Josiah was as perky as could be—quite patronising, in fact—till he received some orders from the Captain which didn't please him. Likewise the rolling of the boat, the raw coldness of early morning, the smell of fish, began to tell on him; and last, but not least, a pipe, which he was attempting to smoke. He became mutinous; the Captain firmly "stuck to his guns." Josiah had to obey, protesting, furious, till the Captain was merciful and allowed him to go below, overcome by sea-sickness. Alas! for the "able seaman"! The way Mr. Lincoln describes Josiah's sufferings and feelings, and how, after many tussles, the boy becomes quite obedient and full of admiration for the Captain, would delight you. Josiah begins to feel he is nothing more than an ignorant boy when he sees the Captain guide the little boat through mountainous seas, which make the "able seaman" tremble. In the end it is a very different Josiah who returns to his uncle Perez—a Josiah determined to make the best of his life and to become a very "able seaman."

These experiences of Josiah's are not unique. Strict obedience in fair weather or foul, rough food, a rough life, are the rule, especially for the lads of the Merchant Service. Small wonder, then, that they appreciate to the utmost any kindly words, any messages or gifts that fall to their share. It is in your hands to send these to many a sailor man and lad—to cheer the good, to encourage the less deserving. Could there be a finer work?

I long to hear that you are ready to help the "Cap'n Eris" and the "Josiahs," and that I may rely on a band of willing workers.

The illustration this month represents one of the three models of one of THE QUIVER Mission Boats which will be presented to the three contributors who send the largest sums towards a boat.

Adieu now till next month,

Ever your affectionate

AUNT GRACE.

EVANGEL'S ADVENTURE.

EVANGEL was lost. She was not a London child to be taken in charge by a friendly policeman, but a boat bearing a suggestive name, and for the present borne herself by a relentless tide far from shore and anchorage. Whither, it was hard for her solitary oarsman to say, for a sea fog enveloped the landscape and the November day was drawing in. This much he knew—the estuary of the Medway with its winding reaches, strong eddying currents, treacherous mud-banks and risks of colliding crafts surrounded him. The house-boat which he had left must be six miles behind, and Baxter's Oyster Fishery, Cole Mouth Creek, where he had promised to hold an evening service, about four miles in advance. No sound of barges or steamers broke the silence, and he had no compass to direct him. To pull, though it might be—and probably was—in a circle, was necessary for life, if only for warmth. One thing at least was clear in the gathering darkness—the chance of a service at Cole Mouth Creek on this Monday night was becoming more and more remote. Visions of supper and a night's lodging gradually gave place to contemplation of a vigil in an open dinghy. But suddenly gloomy forebodings and even the thick vaporous shades seemed to divide with the shout of a friendly voice.

"Boat ahoy! Are you lost?"

"Yes."

"I thought so. I feared the fog would catch somebody. Pull slow in towards me."

Truly, as H.R.H. the Admiral of the Fleet declares, the brotherhood of the sea is independent of tongue, nationality, or any bars that divide the landsman's social life. The Missions to Seamen chaplain obeyed orders with confidence. Presently the same voice inquired:

"Can you feel the bottom?"

Yes, the welcome river mud was within the depth of the oar.

"Well, you have a quarter of a mile to go. Keep your starboard oar touching, and pull slow after me. I will make as much noise as I can."

Could that long pull with ears strained to catch the direction of the sounds in front be only a quarter of a mile? It was over at last as the voice of command called:

"Now pull straight in."

The boat touched, and the atmosphere was clear enough to discern a gigantic figure with a gun on his shoulder standing on a sea wall. This sturdy friend in need helped to secure the boat and then conducted its occupant to a mussel fishers' colony.

(By permission of the Missions to Seamen.)

A DECK SERVICE.

The Rev. Jacob Thompson introduced himself. For years he had had charge of a Mission on the Medway extending from Maidstone to the Nore. He had gone beyond the limits at both ends of his thirty-mile parish, once a year having a service at Tonbridge, and as opportunity offered navigating the estuary of the river where it loses itself in the capacious mouth of the Thames. Yet until this moment the very existence of this mussel fishers' colony had been unknown to him. The colonists made him very welcome. Supper was spread, and they brought out the very best they could afford. Their visitor soon learnt the affairs of their little world which revolved on its own limited orbit. Was their soul's desire for united worship of God starved to death? By no means; they were ready there and then to appropriate the religious service which had been intended for their brethren in the more distinguished oyster fishery. The fervour with which they took part in it was at least equal to their hospitality, and there was little doubt that the gratitude they expressed was sincere.

The moon rose; the fog lightened slightly, and the chaplain said good-bye. It was now eight o'clock; Stoke Creek lay a mile further on; once through that opening, there would be no other until he reached Cole Mouth, so if he only kept the port oar touching, he thought he could not miss the way. Well, if duty bade him go on, the headman would at least put him in the way to Stoke Creek. Soon after this the allied forces of a veiled enemy and a powerful current proved again too much for Evangel. She was lost for the second time. So was a barge with which she came in contact about midnight. The barge man made his fellow-wanderer very welcome, and found a place for him by the fire, where he lay until the morning. It was day, though as dense as ever, when once more Evangel started to explore. A pull of two hours led to nowhere; but at last she discovered Cole Mouth Creek and from there groped her way back to the house-boat. The fog cleared by mid-day, and revealed the friendly barge not five minutes off. The oyster fishers had their promised service that night. After all, it was only twenty-four hours late, and the Evangel's involuntary voyages of discovery were not barren of results. It was arranged that from this time both the mussel and the oyster fishers' colonies should have Divine service once a month, as well as the coastguard stations.

The Evangel is one of three boats which minister to them on the Medway; she occupies the useful if uninteresting second place, the Oriel, a steam launch, taking the first in importance, and a humble punt the third. Varying tides, varying duties, and unlimited opportunities make the work beyond the compass of any one kind of boat in particular. It is not surprising to hear that Mr. Thompson's successor, the Rev. R. Griffiths, would like a fourth, a small motor, to thread its way amongst the shipping anchored thick in the three miles space between Strood and Chatham. Fifty thousand seamen annually frequent the Medway. Their perpetual liability to peril leads them to realise that the time is short, and to solemnly consider the realities of life and death.

Perhaps no men have more time for quiet thought than those in lightships and lighthouses. Certainly to none are friendly visits more grateful. When they recognise the mission vessel afar off, they hoist the Trinity House flag, crowd the side, and prepare a welcome. Eight lightships, which send out their beacons to guide the greatest amount of shipping in the world, are in the spiritual charge of the Medway Mission.

The Medway Mission is only one of an aggregate which make up the Society known as The Missions to Seamen. Every harbour has its own character and peculiarities, but there is scarcely one that does not offer work—which it is humbly believed God will bless and reward—for a strong steamer, a swift little motor, and a row-boat. The May number of THE QUIVER made known a serious fact connected with the Queenstown Mission. The Messenger sailing boat was worn out with thirty years of hard work. The need of a vessel to fill her place was urgent; it has now become desperate. Through the summer the Messenger managed fair weather trips; she can do no more than this with safety. Autumn is here, and will soon melt into winter. None can say what issues of life and death to soul and body hang on the possibility of obtaining a new vessel. The Editor of THE QUIVER has confidence in his readers that, if they only know and will make known the call for help, the Fund opened for a Mission vessel will be speedily completed.
